For one thing, the Gospels nearly always present Mary as being at Jesus' feet. In the first of these three stories, the story that involves Martha's rebuke, we see Mary listening to Jesus and learning from him. The story says that Mary "sat at the Lord's feet listening to what he said" (Luke 10:39). In John 11 we find the same thing, only here we find her expressing belief. Lazarus had died. Jesus had come and talked to Martha. Then he called for Mary, who came running at once and fell at his feet. We are told, "When Mary reached the place where Jesus was and saw him, she fell at his feet and said, 'Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died'" (John 11:32). Earlier, when Jesus had talked to Martha, Martha had said nearly the same thing; but her words must be understood as having expressed a complaint—"Lord, if you had been here [instead of wasting time with your work beyond Jordan], my brother [would not have had to die]." Mary, however, expressed her faith: "Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died," implying that even then Jesus could do a miracle. Finally, we see Mary in the house of Simon, where she had just broken the alabaster box full of ointment, again at his feet, anointing his head and feet, and then wiping his feet with her hair (John 12:3).

This leads us to another thought about Mary, for if we ask why Mary anointed Christ with the ointment, the answer is that she did it in view of his coming death (John 12:7). Jesus says so himself. And this means that of all those who were with Jesus during the final months of his life only Mary understood that he was going to die for sin. Moreover, if we then ask, "But how did Mary come to know this when the others apparently failed to understand it?" The answer obviously is found in the first of the points made about her, namely, that she had spent time learning at the feet of Jesus.

The use of the ointment suggests one thing more. It suggests that because Mary understood what Jesus was about to do and because she loved him for it, she was prepared to give him her all. Two details of the story indicate this. First, the value of the ointment. This impressed everyone who was there at the dinner, for the ointment was assessed at a value of three hundred denarii, which (if we remember that one denarius was a normal day's wage for a working man) was the equivalent of approximately thirty-five hundred dollars in our economy. We are not surprised, then, that it seemed a shocking waste to many. The second detail is that Mary broke the box that had contained the ointment. Mark tells us this (Mark 14:3). In other words, Mary gave her most valuable possession and gave it so completely that she even broke the box lest some of the precious substance should remain.

I wonder if you have given your most precious possession to the Lord Jesus Christ? Or, to put it in other words, I wonder if you have given yourself? If not—if you are holding something back—is it possible that you have never understood that he actually gave his life for you? Or, is it possible that you do not really love him above all else? I know that you may be thinking, as many do, that if you give your life to Christ, your life will be wasted. But it will not be wasted. It will be invested. Moreover, Christ, the greatest banker who ever lived, will pay great dividends.

We find one obvious dividend in Mary's story. Mary had broken her box and had poured the ointment over the head of Jesus. Some of it ran down to his feet. Then, so we read, Mary "wiped his feet with her hair. And the house was filled with the fragrance of the perfume" (John 12:3). But why was the house filled with the perfume? It could have drifted about naturally, I suppose. On the other hand, if Mary had wiped Christ's feet with her hair and if she moved about, then the odor may well have spread through the house because of her. That is, it clung to her and spread from her. If this is so, then it indicates that in giving her all to Christ, Mary had become identified with Christ and had become a blessing.

A Memorial

This message can be applied by a series of questions. Here were three persons, all different, yet all were affected by their close contact with Jesus Christ. Are you like them? Have you been likewise affected?

First, there is Martha. Martha served. This was her special function, and she did it well. But initially she served for what it would do for Martha and only later did she learn to do it for Christ. Are you like her in her second condition? When you work for the Lord, are your eyes really on Jesus? Second, there is Lazarus. Lazarus only sat. But where he sat mattered, and what he stood for mattered. Are you like him? Can others see that you are with Jesus and that he has changed you? Are you among his resurrected ones? Finally, there is Mary. Martha served. Lazarus sat. But Mary poured. She poured out the perfume of her life and so became a blessing. Are you like her? Have you broken your box? Have you poured out your all upon him?

Dr. Donald Grey Barnhouse, who tells this story far better than I have in one of his radio sermons, concludes at this point by asking whether you, the listener or reader, have experienced the joy of being at the feet of Jesus. "If not," he observes, "the difficulty is that you have kept your perfume sealed in a box. You have not poured it out at the feet of Jesus Christ. What is your perfume? Your perfume is a surrendered life. Only when you break your box and pour out your life upon him, only then will your life cease to be narrow and ingrown, and only then will you cease to clutch your perfume and say, 'But this is mine! This is mine!' When you break the box and give it all and anoint his feet, the whole house will be filled with the fragrance of the ointment, and you will know what it is to be in the glory of the presence of Christ."

Jesus said that what Mary had done would be remembered throughout the whole world as "in memory of her" (Mark 14:9). There are many kinds of memorials—monuments, buildings, books, tombstones. But the greatest is to be remembered as one who gave everything to the Lord Jesus.

Chapter 134.
He Who Loved Them

John 11:3

We have already looked at the characters who figure in the eleventh chapter of John's Gospel— Martha, Mary, and Lazarus—and we have learned something from them. The story begins, however, not with their past associations with Jesus nor even with expectation of their future blessings, which we have considered. It begins with a problem. The problem is that Lazarus was dying.

This is a problem with which we can all identify, for either it has come to us already or it will at some future time. In this life most people develop at least some close relationships—family relationships or friendships. We prize these highly. We would give anything to maintain them. Still from time to time the natural calamities of life intrude into our happiness, and we find our closest friends wrenched from us by accidents, sickness, and eventually death. Death takes the father of a young family. A mother is taken. A spiritual counselor or leader is taken from us just at the moment when we feel that we most need his presence and advice. One who has been most useful is laid aside by a lingering illness. In such moments some question the presence or love of God. Others, even those who do not doubt God's love and faithfulness, find their faith tested.

What are we to think in such circumstances? What should we do? There is probably not a better example of what we are to do in the entire Bible than the example given to us by Martha and Mary at the beginning of our story. It is simply that the sisters told Jesus of their problem. We are told that "his sisters sent word to Jesus, 'Lord, the one you love is sick'" (v. 3). That they did this is significant. How they did it is even more significant.

Beloved, Yet Afflicted

Before we look at the way in which Martha and Mary approached Jesus, however, we need to notice an obvious point, for it is often forgotten. The point is simply that even those whom Jesus especially loves get sick and eventually die. When the sisters approached Jesus, they did so on the basis of his love for Lazarus. They loved Jesus; his love for them was even greater. Nevertheless, Lazarus was sick and failing. The Greek word that John uses here (there are two principle words for "sick" in Greek) implies that he was "deathly sick" or "sinking." In other words, we are to learn from this that sickness in a believer is in no way incompatible with the Lord's love for him.

It may be that Mary and Martha, knowing as little of God's ways at this point in their lives as many Christians seem to know today, were surprised that someone whom Jesus loved could be sick. There is just a suggestion of this surprise in the word "behold." But they need not and should not have been surprised.

In the first place, they need not have been surprised for the simple reason that the man whom Jesus loves is after all still just a man. It is in the nature of being a man to suffer bodily ailments. In one excellent sermon on this text Charles Haddon Spurgeon wrote, "The love of Jesus does not separate us from the common necessities and infirmities of human life. Men of God are still men. The covenant of grace is not a charter of exemption from consumption, or rheumatism, or asthma." So let us learn from this and not be surprised when we ourselves or those we love suffer illness. The Bible says (in the words of one of Job's "comforters"): "Man is born to trouble as surely as sparks fly upward" (Job 5:7). It also says with absolute clarity, "Man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment" (Heb. 9:27).

Moreover, we should not be surprised at illness, for we know that it often is God's way of speaking to our hearts and of leading us on in the Christian life. That is, it often is used by God for our good. Many have known this. David knew it, for he wrote in one of the psalms, "It was good for me to be afflicted so that I might learn your decrees" (Ps. 119:71). Sickness helped him to love and understand the Scriptures. Elizabeth Prentiss, the hymn writer, apparently felt that it had helped her to love Christ more. She wrote:

Let sorrow do its work, Send grief and pain;

Sweet are thy messengers, Sweet their refrain,
When they can sing with me,
More love, O Christ, to thee,
More love to thee,
More love to thee!

So it has been for thousands who have been tested. Sickness has been a trial. But it has been a trial that was used by God for good. We know, do we not, that "in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28)?

We should also note that sickness in us is also sometimes used by God for the good of others. For this reason too we should not be surprised by it. This point does not need to be elaborated here, for we will come to it again farther on in the chapter. But it is obvious that this is what is involved when Jesus says as he later does, "This sickness will not end in death. No, it is for God's glory, so that God's Son may be glorified through it" (v. 4). If God is glorified by a Christian's illness, then the illness is for God's good and for the good of all who see this particular demonstration of his glory. In the case of Lazarus, to give just one example, for twenty centuries believers have been getting good from it; and even today, as we study it, we are the richer because the beloved brother of Mary and Martha died.

Our Help in Trouble

That we should not be surprised at sickness and death does not mean, however, that we are to desire sickness. Nor does it mean that we cannot tell Jesus of our desire to have the sick one made well. At this point the words of the two sisters provide an example to us of what we may do in sickness and of how we may pray about it.

Notice, in the first place, that the sisters did pray. Or, as we should more properly say in their case, they brought the matter to Jesus. It is always good to bring troubles to Jesus. In fact, it is good to be always in communication with him about everything.

Do we act as they did? Arthur W. Pink observes on this text, "It is written, 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble' (Ps. 46:1); yet, to our shame, how little we know Him as such. When the people murmured against Moses, we are told that, 'he cried unto the Lord' (Exod. 15:25). When Hezekiah received the threatening letter from Rabshakeh, he 'spread it before the Lord' (Isa. 37:14). When John the Baptist was beheaded, his disciples 'went and told Jesus' (Matt. 14:12). What examples for us! We have not an High Priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. No, he is full of compassion, for when on earth he, too, was 'acquainted with grief.' He sympathizes deeply with his suffering people, and invites them to pour out the anguish of their hearts before Him." Mary and Martha showed great wisdom in acquainting Jesus with their problem. And so do we, when we do likewise. True, Jesus already knows our problem. He knows everything about us. Still, he invites us to come to tell him and to receive that heart-relief which only he is capable of giving.

God's Love

This leads us, however, to the second characteristic of the sisters' prayer: the basis of their appeal. What was the basis of their appeal? Was it that they had often had Jesus in their home and that he therefore owed them something? No. Was it that they had served him faithfully and had been true to him when others of the disciples had dropped away? No. Was it that they loved him? No. The basis of the appeal was that he loved them. That is, it was in God's love rather than in the love of man that they took refuge.

There is no comfort in the reverse. Suppose for a minute that their appeal had been that they or Lazarus had loved Jesus. That would have been true at least in part, for they did love him. But if they had appealed on that basis, they would soon have been asking, "But have we loved him enough? Has our love been a pure love? Have we offended him?" and the honest answers to those questions would have thrown them into a morass of self-doubt. But this is not what they did. They did love him, but they knew that their love for Jesus would never in a million years be an adequate basis for their appeal. So their appeal was not that they loved him, but that he loved them. He had loved them freely, when there was nothing in them to commend them to him. He had loved them faithfully, when they were faithless. He had loved them with an everlasting love as, indeed, only God can love. This, then, was the basis. Indeed, it is the only grounds that any of us can ever have in approaching the Almighty.

Moreover, in coming to Jesus in this way, the sisters came, not seeking their own will but rather the will of Jesus. For one thing, they did not actually make a request. I do not think that it is fair to say on this basis that no request was implied. Clearly there was the implication that they would like Jesus to come to their aid, and there was certainly the suggestion that he might help them by healing Lazarus. If this is not implied, there was no point even in sending Christ the message. But at the same time, we cannot miss feeling that when they phrased the report as they did—"Lord, the one you love is sick"—they indicated by the form of it that they were seeking his will rather than theirs in the matter.

I wonder if you do that in your prayers. It is not so much the words you use—I am sure you understand that. It is the desire of your heart. Certainly you would like the trouble removed, the sick one healed. But is that your fundamental desire? Or is it that God's will might be done regardless of the outcome? It is only when we pray in the latter way that we are enabled to make our requests so known unto God that "the peace of God that passes all understanding" keeps our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus.

"It Is Well with My Soul"

Moreover, we need that peace of mind if only because God does not always act in the way we think he should act, or when.

Nothing is clearer than this from the story. No doubt when Mary and Martha first acquainted Jesus with the fact of Lazarus's sickness, they looked to see him recover as soon as the messenger reached Jesus. Or else they expected Jesus to come immediately to their aid. But neither happened. Instead of getting better, Lazarus became worse and died. Instead of coming, Jesus tarried for two more days and then arrived in Bethany at least a full four days after their brother's death. From this we learn that Jesus may be completely informed of our trouble and yet act as though he were indifferent to it. We learn that prayer for the sick may not be answered. Indeed, if this were not the case, no one would ever become sick or die so long as he had a friend or relative to pray for him.

No, the comfort in our prayers is not in the fact that Jesus always answers them as we wish. For he does not. It is that he, who made us and controls all circumstances, knows best and is well able to direct even sickness and death to his glory.

Do you object, "But that is easy to say in the case of Lazarus, for God raised him from the dead. That was obviously to his glory"? But shall we not be raised? Is Jesus not the resurrection and the life to us also? The story says, "Your brother will rise again." Then so he shall, and so shall we all. Thy brother shall rise again. Thy sister shall rise again. Thy mother shall rise again. Thy father shall rise again. Thy children shall rise again.

In the year 1873, a Christian lawyer from Chicago, named Horatio Spafford, placed his wife and four children on the luxury liner Ville de Havre sailing from New York to France. Spafford expected to join them in about three or four weeks after finishing up some business, but with the exception of his wife he never saw them again. The trip started out beautifully. But on the evening of November 21, 1873, as the Ville de Havre proceeded peacefully across the Atlantic, the ship was suddenly struck by another vessel, the Lochearn, and sank a mere thirty minutes later, with the loss of nearly all on board.

On being told that the ship was sinking Mrs. Spafford knelt with her children and prayed that they might be saved or be made willing to die, if such was God's will. A few minutes later, in the confusion, three of the children were swept away by the waves while she stood clutching the youngest. Suddenly the youngest child was swept from her arms. She reached out and caught the baby's gown. Then the baby, a little girl, was lost again. Mrs. Spafford became unconscious and awoke later to find that she had been rescued by sailors from the Lochearn. But the four children were gone.

Back in the United States Horatio Spafford was waiting for news of his family, and at last, ten days later (after the rescue ship had reached Cardiff), it came. "Saved alone" was his wife's message. That night Spafford walked the floor of his room in anguish, as anyone would have done. But this was not all. For as he shared his loss with his Lord, a loss that could not be reversed in this life, he found, as many have, that peace that indeed passes all understanding. Toward morning he told a friend named Major Whittle, "I am glad to be able to trust my Lord when it costs me something." Then, sometime later, as he reflected on the disaster at sea, he wrote:

When peace, like a river,
attendeth my way, When sorrows like sea-billows roll;
Whatever my lot, thou hast
taught me to say, It is well,
it is well with my soul.
Though Satan should buffet, though trials should come, Let this blest
assurance control,
That Christ has regarded my helpless estate, And has shed his own blood for my soul.

My sin—O the bliss of his glorious thought!— My sin, not in part, but the whole,
Is nailed to the cross and I bear it no more; Praise the Lord, praise the Lord, O my soul!
O Lord, haste the day when the faith shall be sight, The clouds be rolled back as a scroll,
The trump shall resound and the Lord shall descend; "Even so"—it is well with my soul.

The text tells us that Jesus loved Lazarus, as he also loved Martha and Mary. Does Jesus, in a special sense, love you? Are you aware of that love? You say, "But how can I be?" I will tell you how. You can know it if you love him; for we are told, "We love because he first loved us." Do you love him? Is there that love-bond that is evidence of the fact that you are one of his sheep, one of those for whom he died? If there is, then let me encourage you to live in a way that demonstrates the reality and depth of his love. If you are well, serve him vigorously. If you are sick, let the world see how you are able to glorify God in your sickness.

On the other hand, if you are not aware of that love, learn that you are without the brightest and most cheering love in the entire universe and begin to seek God. Do not pass into the next world without the love of the Lord Jesus.

Chapter 135.
A Sickness Not unto Death

John 11:4

Everyone wants to know how a story will end, at least if the story is a good one. Children will say to their mothers, as their mothers are reading a bedtime story, "Don't stop now, Mother. Read just one more chapter. I want to know what's going to happen next." Adults will stay buried in a book until they finish it or will stay glued to a television screen until a program ends. The same characteristic also works to keep us reading the daily newspaper until the latest political scandal fades away, the war ends, or the election results are finally tabulated.

Obviously, men and women also have this desire where their own personal stories are concerned, and this accounts for the eternal popularity of fortune-tellers (all ages have had them), oracles, mystics, futurologists, and even the kind of journalistic pundit who is not afraid to announce in print where the world is headed. Unfortunately, as those who follow such leads often discover, men do not know the future. So it is impossible to find out what will happen to us tomorrow or next week, not to mention what will happen to us at life's end. Many who do not know what is coming, therefore, fear the future and shrink from it.

Does anyone know how your life story will end? Surely no human knows. But there is One who does know. God knows. In this text Jesus, who is God, referred to a situation in which a friend of his was dying and he announced the outcome. Moreover, it was a good outcome. The text says, "When he heard this [that his friend Lazarus was sick] Jesus said, "This sickness will not end in death. No, it is for God's glory, that God's Son may be glorified through it" (John 11:4). As we read the story we discover that by the time Jesus had received the message Lazarus had probably already died. So Jesus was actually announcing that the final outcome was to be a demonstration of the glory of God through his resurrection.

Only God Knows

The place to begin with this verse is with the fact that God does know the future—as I have already said—and that only God knows it. Furthermore, because he knows and because he loves us and is concerned for us, he delights to reveal at least parts of that future to us.

Think of the Book of Isaiah, for instance. In the center section of that book, in a series of chapters dealing with the nonvalidity of the pagan gods (chapters 40-48), God taunts the idols on the basis of their inability to tell the future. In one place he says this: "Present your case. ... Set forth your arguments. ...Bring in your idols to tell us what is going to happen. Tell us what the former things [that is, what did happen] were, so that we may consider them and know their final outcome. Or declare to us the things to come, tell us what the future holds, so we may know that you are gods. Do something, whether good or bad, so that we will be dismayed and filled with fear. But you are less than nothing and your works are utterly worthless; he who chooses you is detestable" (Isa. 41:21-24). The point of this passage is that no one but God can tell the future because no one but God controls it. And the fact that he does tell it is one of the proofs that he alone is the true God.

God does not only reveal the future to demonstrate that he is God, however, though this is one reason. He also does it to warn the ungodly of judgment and to encourage those who are his own.

We find this thought as early in the Bible as the third chapter of Genesis. God had placed the first man and woman in the Garden of Eden and had warned them of death if they should eat of the fruit of the forbidden tree. They ate. So, when God came to them, he came with words of judgment that were, nevertheless, at the same time words of promise. He told of years of hardship—pain for the woman in childbearing and toil for the man as he would work to earn a living. But the same words also told of the coming of One who would eventually destroy the works of Satan. "He will crush your head," he said to the serpent, "and you will strike his heel" (Gen. 3:15). The promise so captivated Eve that she named her first son Cain, meaning (in a very rough translation), "Here he is," because she thought (wrongly) that Cain was the one whom God had promised to send.

In Hosea we find the same thing. God used the story of Hosea's life to illustrate the pending judgment upon and scattering of the children of Israel—the symbolic names of his three children were to indicate this future: "Scattered," "Not-Pitied," "Not-My-People." At the same time

God told of the blessing that would come after the scattering, thereby encouraging those who would have to live through the years of chastisement. We read at the beginning of the story (but as a description of the end), "Yet the Israelites will be like the sand on the seashore, which cannot be measured or counted. In the place where it was said to them, 'You are not my people,' they will be called 'sons of the living God'" (Hosea 1:10).

The Glory of God

Having established this background, then—the background that God foretells the future in order (1) to demonstrate his power to control it, (2) to warn the unsaved, and (3) to encourage believers—return to the text in which Jesus foretold the outcome of the sickness of Lazarus, saying that it would be for the glory of God and that he might be glorified by it.

First, Jesus said that the outcome would be glorifying to God. Notice that while this was true— we are going to see in a moment how it was true—it was not true in the way that the sisters might naturally have expected. I suppose that Christ's words were immediately reported back to Martha and Mary and that they came about twenty-four hours after Lazarus had passed away. I can picture the sisters saying, "But Jesus is mistaken. If he had been here earlier, he might have cured our brother; that would have been glorifying to God. But now Lazarus is dead, and it is too late. At any rate, if any glory is to come of this it will have to be at the time of the final resurrection, and by that time we will all be gone. So far as we are concerned, it is too late." It would have been natural for them to have thought in this manner; but if they did, it was wrong. In fact, the outcome, though different from their plans, was actually going to result in far more glory to God than they could ever have imagined.

The resurrection of Lazarus was itself glorifying to God. That much is obvious. To glorify God means to acknowledge him as being who he truly is; and, since one of God's attributes is omnipotence, clearly the resurrection of Lazarus caused many to acknowledge that great power and so glorify him.

At the same time, however, the glory of God was seen in an even greater sense in the changed lives of those who either took part in or witnessed the miracle. We see the effect on Lazarus, for instance, as we pointed out in the first study of John 11. Nowhere in the entire story are we told that Lazarus said anything. But we are told toward the end of the story that he became a great witness (vv. 10-11). How did this happen? We know that when a man comes to the place where he is going to die, especially if he is a spiritual man, it has an effect on him. So when Lazarus died and rose again, undoubtedly he emerged as one who had experienced a profound transformation and who showed it by his demeanor. Have you been changed? You will be when you come to the place where you have died to self and have been made alive unto Christ, when you have truly become "a new creation" in him. In this, though you may have to suffer greatly, the end (as Christ says) will be to God's glory.

The resurrection also had an effect on the sisters. We saw some of this also in the earlier study. Before it, Martha had been a scold when she was serving just one guest. Afterward she served a whole houseful of people gracefully.

And Mary? Mary came to understand that Jesus was going to give his life so that all the Marys, Marthas, and Lazaruses of this world might not have to die spiritually but might instead enter into newness of life and enjoy an eternity of God's blessing in heaven. Mary indicated this when she anointed Christ's head with the ointment, for Jesus said that she did it in anticipation of his death and burial.

Notice, too, that the death and resurrection of Lazarus had an effect on the disciples and that this was God-glorifying. We are not told in so many words, at least after the miracle, what the effect was. But before it, when Jesus was explaining to them what he was about to do, he said, "Lazarus is dead, and for your sake I am glad I was not there, so that you may believe" (vv. 1415).

Taken by itself, the first half of that second sentence is astounding: "Lazarus is dead, and ... I am glad."

"Glad?" we say. "Lazarus dead and Jesus glad? How can that be?" But then we read on and find Jesus saying, in effect, "Do not be surprised at my saying, and do not be dismayed at circumstances. Nothing ever happens to you that I have not first approved, and nothing is approved from which I have not previously appointed good results. Lazarus has died. Yes. The sisters are sorrowing. Yes. But the end will be good, even for you. For in your case the outcome will be a strengthening of faith in me, and you will influence thousands."

Learn from this for the times when trouble comes to you. Do not complain. But take this message seriously. Say, "Lord, I do not see it; but I know that this trouble may have come upon me for the sake of some friend. So use it that way, if it so pleases you. And help me to trust you and grow through the experience."

In the fourth place, notice that the death and resurrection of Lazarus had an effect on the immediate friends of the family. Here Donald Grey Barnhouse, who has developed this sequence well, observes, "Since they were a large family, they had many friends. In John 11:19, it says, 'Many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother.' These were the family friends. We know that whenever there is a death, the friends gather around the family. As an act of courtesy, friends send flowers, they go to the viewing, they shake hands with the loved ones and express sympathy. This is a part of our lives, and it was a part of their lives. And what happened? It says in verse 45, 'Then many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him.' They came to sympathize, and they remained to believe. So the effect of Lazarus' death now is seen in the family friends.

"We go a little further still to the acquaintances when the Lord Jesus Christ reaches the tomb site of Lazarus. As He's praying He says, 'Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. And I knew that thou hearest me always; but, because of the people which stand by'—that would be the curiosity seekers—'I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me' (John 11:41-42). Here was a circle of people just standing by. They knew that Lazarus was dead. They knew that Jesus had come. Many of them were 'the' important people of the community." Did these people believe? Some did. Others apparently did not. We are told that these merely "went to the Pharisees and told them what Jesus had done" (John 11:46).

To these last unbelievers Lazarus's resurrection was in the nature of a condemnation; for, though it was irrefutable evidence of Christ's power, they would not accept it, and it therefore increased their guilt. Even here, however, God was glorified. For he has been patient in demonstrating his great love and power to sinners.

Jesus Glorified

We return to the text and find there a last phrase that deserves consideration. Jesus had said that the sickness of Lazarus was not unto death in the final sense but rather that it was for God's glory. He then added, and "that God's Son may be glorified through it." How was Jesus glorified by Lazarus's death? There are two obvious answers and one that is not so obvious.

First, since Jesus is God, obviously anything that brings honor to God the Father brings honor to him also. This is made clear if we compare John 2:11, the verse that concludes the account of Christ's first miracle, with John 11:40, a verse that aptly sums up this one. In the former verse we are told, "This, the first of his miraculous signs Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. He thus revealed his glory." In the latter we discover him saying to Martha, "Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?" Christ's glory and God's glory! They are one and the same, for Christ is God. Therefore, "All may honor the Son just as they honor the Father" (John 5:23).

Second, Jesus was glorified in that the death and resurrection of Lazarus revealed him as One who is able to deal with any situation. The story tells us that Jesus delayed his return to Bethany until Lazarus had died and had been buried four days. In other words, Jesus got himself into a predicament. But he got himself into a predicament only so that he might get himself out. On this point Barnhouse writes: "I quite believe that God does that with everyone of us—all the time. That is the Lord's way. If God wants you to trust in Him, He puts you in a place of difficulty. If He wants you to trust Him greatly, He puts you in a place of impossibility. For when a thing is impossible, then we who are so prone to move things through by the force of our own being can say, 'Lord, it has to be you. I am utterly, absolutely nothing.'... And the Lord [will say], 'It is for you that this happened, for your disciples, for your family, for your friends, for your acquaintances and the bystanders, but it's also for me; it's for me.' And God is saying. 'I am in the midst of an invisible war. The repercussions of what I am doing will be known in eternity.'"

Finally, there is a point that is not so obvious. Jesus, so he himself said, was to be glorified by what was to come. But what was to come was not only the resurrection of Lazarus; it was also the cross, to which the term "glorify" often refers in John's Gospel. Think of John 7:39, for instance. There we are told that the Spirit had not been given at this time because "Jesus was not yet glorified," that is, had not yet died. Or again, when the Greeks come to him, as recorded in the next chapter, Jesus declares, "The hour is come for the Son of Man to be glorified" (John 12:23). It is obvious that he is thinking of his death in this passage, for he immediately goes on to speak of the corn of wheat that must fall into the ground and die. In the same way, just a few verses earlier, we read that the disciples did not understand these things at first but "after Jesus was glorified [that is, had been crucified and had risen again] ... they realized that these things had been written about him" (v. 16).

The raising of Lazarus was to result in Christ's death, therefore. And it did. This was the final spark needed to explode the accumulated hostility of the leaders against him and to propel them toward the ultimate sacrilege. As for Jesus, he foresaw the outcome and still moved toward it.

You may be saying, "I understand from this story that the ills of this life are no accident for the one who is a true child of God; and I am pleased that God, who knows the future, has chosen to reveal the outcome to me. But it is still hard to suffer." Yes, it is always hard to suffer. But the Lord Jesus Christ went through it all before us. He asks us to suffer. Indeed, he ordains it. But he does not ask us to do anything that he has not done first. Nor does he ask us to suffer without at the same time promising to go with us through the testing. The fact that he has done it is itself an encouragement. He died, yet rose again. He suffered, but he triumphed gloriously.

And so shall we. This present sickness—whatever it may be—is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified by it.

Chapter 136.
The Delays of Love

John 11:5-6

I wonder if you have ever noticed in your study of the fourth Gospel that the disciple whom Jesus loved—John, the author of the Gospel (John 21:20, 24)—is not at all reluctant to record that Jesus loved others also. Already we have been told that Jesus loved Lazarus. Now, in verse 5, we find that he also loved Martha and Mary, Lazarus's sisters. The verse says, "Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus."

The interesting thing about these statements concerning Christ's love is that they are given in a context that might cause us to doubt them—at least if we did not know better. We have already seen one such context and are about to see another. The problem we have seen lies in the fact that Lazarus was sick, in spite of the fact that Jesus loved him and could heal him. On the surface this seems difficult to accept, just as it sometimes is difficult to accept sickness or death when they enter into our experience. "If Jesus really loves us, how can he let this happen?" is the question we ask. In looking at that problem we saw some answers and learned that sickness and death are not incompatible with Christ's love.

But we have another problem at this point. No sooner are we told that "Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus" than we also find the report, "When he [Jesus] heard that Lazarus was sick, he stayed where he was two more days" (v. 6). This means that Jesus delayed his return to Bethany rather than immediately rushing either to help Lazarus or comfort the sisters. Moreover, we are to understand that the delay was in some sense connected with his love for these friends and flowed from it. How can this be? If we were in Christ's place, we would immediately have returned to Bethany—or at least we acknowledge that this is what we should do if we were in these circumstances. Yet Jesus does not. He stays where he is. It is only after two days that he finally does go back to Bethany, arriving there four full days after Lazarus's burial.

Here, then, is a text for careful study, particularly if we have ever experienced God's delay—in answering our prayers, showing us the path we should take, removing a difficulty, or some such thing. Does God delay? Yes, he does. But he delays always for a purpose.

In developing this text I am following a three-point outline given to it years ago by Alexander Maclaren of Manchester, England: (1) Christ's delays are the delays of love, (2) the delayed help always comes at the right time, and (3) the best help is not delayed. The discussion is mine, but the points are from Maclaren's excellent exposition.

Because of Love

To begin with, Christ's delays are the delays of love. If the verse teaches anything, it teaches this; for the point is that Jesus stayed where he was for two days because he loved them. We may not understand this. We cannot see the end from the beginning, as God can; therefore, we cannot see how Christ's delays contribute to an overall plan. Moreover, in the grief that we sometimes have we often cannot see clearly, even though God might have made his plan clear. It is hard to see through eyes filled with tears. The point, however, is that even though we cannot see how the situation will end or why it has come upon us, we can know that it flows from Christ's love and is controlled by it. Christ's delays are the delays of love. Therefore, his delays are to be interpreted in the light of his love and not the other way around.

This truth suggests several related points. First, if Christ's delays are the delays of love, then they are not the delays of indifference. He does not delay because he does not care.

We recognize that delays often flow from indifference in human affairs. In fact, Jesus once told a story based on this principle (see Luke 18:1-8). It concerned a judge and a widow. The judge was a hard man who lived for himself and who feared neither God nor man. The widow was the victim of injustice. She came to the judge with her case, but he refused to hear her. There was nothing in it for him. But because the widow persisted, the judge eventually rendered justice, reasoning that it was better to act and be done with the case than to be wearied with the widow's unending requests. Jesus concluded, "Will not God bring about justice for his chosen ones, who cry out to him day and night?" (v. 7). The story does not mean that God is like the unjust judge, of course; its point lies rather in the contrast. But the story does recognize that God sometimes delays in answering a particular prayer and that in human affairs this often is the product of indifference. It teaches that indifference is never a characteristic of God.

Second, if Christ's delays are the delays of love, then they are not the product of a preoccupation on Christ's part. That is, he does not delay his answer because he is too busy to deal with our problem.

There is a story in the Old Testament in which the pagan gods are contrasted with the true God on just this point. It concerns Elijah. Elijah was troubled with the apostasy of Israel in a day when the majority of the people had become worshipers of Baal. So he challenged Ahab the king and the king's prophets, the prophets of Baal, to a contest. The prophets were to prepare an altar upon which a bull was to be sacrificed; Elijah was to do likewise. In each case there was to be an altar, wood, and a sacrifice, but no fire. The true God was to provide fire. The 450 prophets of Baal built their altar, made their sacrifice, and then began to call on Baal to send fire. Nothing happened. They began to cry louder. Still nothing happened. Finally, they began to throw themselves upon the altar and even cut themselves with knives. Although they kept it up for the better part of the day, no flame descended.

At this point, Elijah began to mock them over the supposed preoccupation of their god. "Perhaps he is busy," he said. His actual words were, "Shout louder! Surely he is a god [that is, at least you say he is a god]. Perhaps he is deep in thought, or busy [this phrase is even a bit racy, for it means that perhaps Baal is busy in the bathroom], or traveling. Maybe he is sleeping and must be awakened" (1 Kings 18:27). Obviously, nothing happened. Baal was unable to respond to his worshipers. At last, after they had given up, Elijah called upon his God, Jehovah; and Jehovah, who is never preoccupied, responded with a fire that consumed not only the sacrifice but also the wood and stones and lapped up twelve barrels of water that Elijah had caused to be poured upon them.

We learn from such stories that the delays of God are never the delays of indifference or of preoccupation. They are the delays of love.

Love and Circumstances

To say that Christ's delays are the delays of love is also to say something positive, however. His delays are purposeful. Love has a purpose. Therefore, we are right to seek purposes in God's delays. I must confess that it would be presumptuous to pretend to be able to say always and in detail what God's purposes are. His ways are not our ways. His thoughts are not our thoughts. We cannot see the end from the beginning, as he can. Still, we can look for purposes. And we can suggest, at least in general terms, what some of them might be.

For instance, one of the goals reached by God through his delays is that of molding our errant wills to conform to his perfect will. When God answers us immediately, it often is the case that we then rush on to formulate our own plans for whatever comes next. When God delays, by contrast, we are forced to ask, "Am I right in what I am trying to do? Do I have the will of the Lord on this matter? Does he have more to teach or tell me than I have heard?" An example of such a purpose is seen in God's dealings with the people of Israel during the days of their desert wanderings; for God kept them in the wilderness for forty years, teaching them obedience, until they had become the kind of disciplined fighting force he was going to use one day to conquer Canaan.

Another of God's purposes in delays is to strengthen faith. Our faith does not grow much if we always get an immediate response, though we might think that it would. Rather, our faith grows when we are forced to wait, trusting that God knows what he is doing and that he will fulfill his promises toward us eventually and in the proper time. Abraham's faith grew in this manner. God had promised him a son through whom he was to have a great posterity; but Abraham grew old —in fact, he was nearly a hundred years old—before the son came. What happened to his faith during these long years? Did it weaken and die? Not at all. On the contrary, the years of delay were the years in which Abraham's faith grew most—so much so that at the age of ninetynine he was willing to change his name from Abram which means "father of many," to Abraham, which means "father of a multitude," as a sign of his faith in the promise of God concerning the son who even then was not given. It was in the year following this that Isaac was born.

God uses delays to mold our wills and strengthen our faith. May I suggest one thing more?
Sometimes he also does it simply to bring honor to his own name and to honor Jesus (v. 4).
Those who do not know Jesus may find this puzzling or even offensive. I have heard people say, "What kind of God is he who has to be honored?" But those who know him do not find this puzzling. Jesus is glorious. Consequently, to honor him is the only proper and desirable thing to do. In their best moods, Christians rejoice that God is able to honor himself through their circumstances.

Let me summarize this in a challenge that I hope you will remember. Learn to interpret circumstances by the love of Christ and not Christ's love by circumstances. Christ's delays are the delays of love; therefore, they should be interpreted by love. If we do it the other way around, we will be even farther from understanding the circumstances, and we may question the love. Begin with Christ's love. Say, "I know that Christ loves me. He died for me. Therefore I will do my best to see his purpose in the things that are happening." If you do that, you will begin to interpret circumstances in the light of love; and, as God gives light, you will begin to see how he is using them to perfect your will, strengthen your faith, and bring glory to his own wonderful name.

Help in God's Time

The second point that Maclaren makes is that the delayed help always comes at the right time. He writes: "Do not ... forget that Heaven's clock is different from ours. In our day there are twelve hours, and in God's a thousand years. What seems long to us is to Him 'a little while.' [Therefore] let us not imitate the shortsighted impatience of His disciples, who said, 'What is this that he saith, A little while? We cannot tell what he saith.' The time of separation looked so long in anticipation to them, and to him it had dwindled to a moment. For two days, eight-and-forty hours, he delayed his answer to Mary and Martha, and they thought it an eternity, while the heavy hours crept by, and they only said, 'It's very weary; he cometh not.' ...How long did it look to them when they got Lazarus back?"

No, we must not judge God's actions by our conception of time. We must learn that he always acts immediately and decisively when the time is right.

We have an illustration of God's mastery of time and circumstances in the deliverance of Peter from prison following his arrest by King Herod. Herod had killed James, the brother of John; and, since this had pleased the leaders of the people, Herod planned to kill Peter also. The church prayed. But while they prayed Peter still remained in prison. He had been imprisoned before the Passover, and Herod intended to kill him after it. So for at least seven days the Christians were praying, during which time God delayed. Each day went by, one by one, until it was the night before Peter's pending execution. The time was up. But that night, not a moment too soon or too late, the angel entered the prison and freed Peter.

Moreover, the liberation was done deliberately. Nothing was hurried. It is true that when the angel appeared the chains immediately fell off Peter's hands and the gates swung open. But there was no hurry. Instead, Peter was told to put on his sandals. The angel waited while he did so. Then he was told to throw his robe about him. After that the angel and Peter simply walked out of the prison, past the guards and into the streets.

Again let me quote Maclaren. "God is never in haste. He never comes too soon or too late. 'The Lord shall help them, and that right early.' Sennacherib's army is round the city, famine is within the walls. Tomorrow will be too late. But tonight the angel strikes, and the enemies are all dead men. So God's delay makes the deliverance the more signal and joyous when it is granted. And though hope deferred may sometimes make the heart sick, the desire, when it comes is a tree of life"

No Delays

We have one more point to our study. We have seen that Christ's delays are the delays of love. We have seen that the delayed help always comes at the right time. Notice finally that the best help is never delayed.

The principle we have been looking at is an important principle. But we need to notice that at best it applies to only one half—and not even the most important half—of our prayers to God and of God's answers. We ask for some things in which God delays. He delays guidance, healing, the changing of circumstances, and so on. But in the most important things—those that concern spiritual help, growth, salvation, and blessing—there is no delay. Rather in these the help comes instantly. We might say that if the text for the former circumstances is the one we have been studying—"He stayed where he was two more days"—then the text for the latter is Isaiah 65:24—"Before they call I will answer; while they are still speaking, I will hear." If you are praying for spiritual help, insight, salvation, or a deeper relationship to God, then you can be sure that God hears you and that he is moving even now to meet your need.

Here again Peter becomes our example. Do you remember that scene in which Peter saw the Lord Jesus Christ walking toward him over the water, approaching the boat in which Peter was riding? Peter was sometimes cowardly, but he was sometimes brave, too. So when he saw Jesus he reasoned that if Jesus could walk on the water, then by the power of Jesus, Peter could walk on the water also. "Lord," he said, "if it's you, tell me to come to you on the water." Jesus said, "Come." So Peter got down out of the boat and began to walk toward Jesus.

The sea was in turmoil. There had been a storm. Soon Peter began to look at the waves rather than at Jesus. He began to lose faith; when he began to lose faith, he became afraid and began to sink. "Lord, save me," he cried. We then read—this is beautiful—"Immediately Jesus reached out his hand and caught him ... and when they climbed into the boat, the wind died down" (Matt. 14:30-32). Immediately! This was no time for delays. Help was needed, and help came instantly.

Let us learn these great lessons: (1) If God delays, it is because he has a purpose in his delays, and (2) when we need help immediately, he is there and helps instantly. Moreover, in that help we always find what we most need.

Chapter 137.
Christ's Disciples Tested

John 11:7-10

Years ago, when I was growing up in an evangelical Sunday school, I learned a bit of doggerel that expresses a great truth. It goes like this:

> Only one life! 'Twill soon be past; Only what's done for Christ will last.

The lines are not much as poetry. Nevertheless, the thoughts they contain are good, and they deserve attention. Life is short. Time is valuable. How we spend our time is important. These thoughts lie behind the verses to which we now come in our verse-by-verse exposition of John's Gospel.

Jesus had delayed for two days after learning from Mary and Martha that their brother Lazarus was sick. "Then he said to his disciples, 'Let us go back to Judea.' 'But Rabbi,' they said, 'a short while ago the Jews tried to stone you; and yet you are going back there?' Jesus answered, 'Are there not twelve hours of daylight? A man who walks by day will not stumble for he sees by this world's light. It is when he walks by night that he stumbles, for he has no light in him'" (11:7-10).

Time Matters

In approaching these verses we must remember that they occur in a Gospel that shows an unusual interest in time. We noticed this first in the opening chapters. There John presents the first great opening week of Christ's ministry, noting in a series of seven significant days how John the Baptist first denied that he himself was the Messiah, how he pointed to Jesus, how the first disciples followed Christ, how those disciples brought others, how Jesus traveled to Galilee, and then, finally, how he turned water into wine at the marriage feast in Cana. The week ends with the significant statement, "This, the first of his miraculous signs Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee, He thus revealed his glory; and his disciples put their faith in him" (2:11).

The same attention to time is seen in other ways also. For instance, John pays particular attention to time references by which the events of Christ's ministry are marked. Thus, we find him dating Christ's first return to Jerusalem as occurring at the time of "the Jewish Passover" (2:13). Or again, Jesus goes back to Jerusalem a second time, having in the meanwhile left it, at "a feast of the Jews" (5:1). In chapter 6 when Jesus multiplies the loaves and fish in Galilee the "Jewish Passover Feast was near" (v. 4). In chapter 7 he is in Jerusalem for the "Feast of Tabernacles" (v. 2). In chapter 10 we are told of "the Feast of Dedication" (v. 22). The events of the last week of Christ's life take place at the final passover (12:1).

One of the Gospel's most important words is "time," used in connection with Christ's death and resurrection. Early in the Gospel we find expressions like these: "My time has not yet come" (2:4) or "his time had not yet come" (7:30; 8:20). Later, on the verge of the crucifixion, John records: "The hour has come" (12:23), "Jesus knew that the time had come" (13:1), "A time is coming, and has come" (16:32), and "Father, the time has come" (17:1).

We should find ourselves asking: What do I do with my time? Is my time used wisely? Who controls it? Do I really trust God to give me the time needed to do the work that needs to be done?

Who Controls Time?

Expressed in this way our questions about time become a test of our trust in God. This is significant, for it is precisely in this way that the subject is introduced by Jesus in John 11.

To see this we need to notice that when Jesus announced his decision to go to Bethany to help Lazarus, he announced it by inviting the disciples to go with him "to Judea." Apart from the context this was a strange thing to say. We might have expected him to say, "Let us go to help Lazarus" or, perhaps, "Let us go to Bethany." But in saying "Let us go back to Judea," he was deliberately choosing a word that would remind the disciples of what awaited them in the area of the capital. This was where Jesus' enemies lived. It was here that he had almost been stoned. Should they return to Judea? Was this wise? Should they place themselves once again within reach of their enemies? Clearly, by expressing the matter in this way, Jesus was testing his disciples to see whether or not they really trusted God with the ordering of their lives and whether or not they were really willing to spend whatever time might be given to them in Christ's service. Were the disciples willing? They seem to have been. Thomas says later, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (v. 16). But whether they were willing or not, at least this much is clear—they recognized the danger. They said, "A short while ago the Jews tried to stone you; yet you are going back there?" (v. 8). Obviously, it is in time of danger that we most need to trust God. So we can learn from these men. Whatever the danger, it is better to be with Jesus. Whatever the outcome, it is comforting to know that our times are controlled by God.

Sufficient Time

To say that the disciples recognized the danger of going to Jerusalem and chose, nevertheless, to stay by Jesus is not to say, however, that they understood the issues involved. In fact, they did not. They feared the Jewish leaders. And they had not yet learned that all of Christ's times (as also their own) were divinely determined. So Jesus began to teach them about time. He did so first by a question. He asked, "Are there not twelve hours of daylight?" (v. 9). This question was intended to set them thinking—and to set us thinking. It suggests three truths.

First, God gives each of us a certain amount of time, and nothing can shorten it. The day of our life will not finish before it ends. This applied to Jesus, of course. On an earlier occasion, when he was warned about the hostility of King Herod, he said, "Go tell that fox, I will drive out demons and heal people today and tomorrow, and on the third day I will reach my goal'" (Luke 13:32). Jesus' life was not going to be cut short by his enemies one minute before the time appointed by the Father. And neither is ours. I am not going to die too soon. You are not going to die too soon. If we are God's children, he has given us a certain number of days, and we shall have them.

An important conclusion follows from this. We need not fear what people can do to us. Or, let me say it in another way. If the prolonging of our days is in our own hands, then we must be extremely careful in all we do. We must be cautious. For instance, are you sure that you really want to take that trip by auto that you have planned for next summer? Many die on the roadways. You may be safer at home. Or again, are you sure you want to eat the kind of food you are often served in local restaurants? Perhaps it is not good for you. You may want to get on to health foods. Or again, are you sure that you have had sufficient medical checkups? Perhaps you should have a checkup each month. Or perhaps you should just check into a hospital permanently. Above all, be sure that you do not anger any one. The person you anger may be the kind that kills people. Be careful not to stand for anything.

You see my point. If God is not in control—if you are in control—then be fearful. On the other hand, if God orders the duration of your days and if nothing can cut them short, then you can be bold to serve him, as Jesus was. Indeed, you can be a Luther. He did not fear men, for he knew that there was God-appointed work to be done and that he would have sufficient time to do it.

Second, Christ's question to the disciples suggests that if God gives us each a certain amount of time and if nothing can shorten it, then there is time enough for everything that needs to be done. The conclusion to be drawn from this truth is that we need not be frantic. We are a fairly frantic people, we Americans. Work seems pressing. Necessities crowd in upon us. Time seems to be slipping away. It is a common picture, as we all know. But it is a picture we have painted for ourselves—this is my point. It is not of God. And since it is not of God, we do not have to be in it.

The principle of sufficient time is one by which we may establish priorities in our lives. If you are God's child and if you seem to have twenty hours of work to do in just sixteen hours, then obviously four hours of that work is not given to you by God. And you should not do it. Moreover, you can ask: What are the dispensable items? Perhaps you do not need that second job. You may, but perhaps you do not. Perhaps God simply does not want you to have the extra income. You may not need to belong to that club, or to that monthly bridge party, or maybe even to that extra committee of the church or that church board. You will not want to cut out your time of personal Bible study, prayer, worship, and fellowship with Christian friends; but there are items you can cut out. Or you can stop wasting time. If we are frantic, it is our fault; we should reorder our priorities. We have sufficient time for all that God has given us to do.

The third truth suggested by Christ's question—"Are there not twelve hours of daylight?"—is that, even though we have sufficient time to do all that God has given us to do, nevertheless, we have only that time, and the time should not be wasted. Are there twelve hours to the day? Yes! But there are not thirteen. So we cannot afford to waste even sixty minutes.

William Barclay makes points similar to these in his commentary and at this point calls attention to a famous passage from Christopher Marlowe's play Doctor Faustus. Faustus, as most people know from the Faustus legend, had struck a bargain with the devil by which for twenty-four years the devil would be the doctor's servant and in which his every wish would be granted. But, at the end of that time, the devil would claim his soul. At this point in the drama the time has almost come, and Faustus, seeing what a terrible bargain he has made, is grieving:

> O Faustus,
> Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,
> And then thou must be damned perpetually!
>
> Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven,
> That time may cease and midnight never come;
> Fair nature's eye, rise, rise again and make > Perpetual day; or let this hour be but A year, a month, a week, a natural day, That Faustus may repent and save his soul!
> O lente, lente currite noctis equi!
> The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike, The devil will come and Faustus must be damned.

No one can make a bargain like that. All people start by being condemned, a position from which we escape only by turning in faith to the Lord Jesus Christ (John 3:16-18). Nevertheless, the verse makes a true point about time. Time is precious. Nothing can lengthen it. Hence, it must be used wisely. Christians must "make the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil" (Eph. 5:16; Col. 4:5).

I am convinced that if we could think this way consistently, any one of these truths would effect a transformation of our lives. We would see many things we do dropping out. We would find many items of higher priority taking their place. And there would be less time wasted. "Only what's done for Christ will last," It is true. So we should spend our precious time in his service.

Christ's Comments

Having asked his question and having thus stimulated the thoughts of the disciples along the lines we have just followed, Jesus wrapped up his teaching by elaborating briefly upon the question and drawing some conclusions. We need to do the same. He said, "A man who walks by day will not stumble because he sees by this world's light. It is when he walks by night that he stumbles because he has no light" (vv. 9-10).

This is true on two levels, of course; and Jesus intended both of them. On the physical level, it refers to the sun. In Jesus' day there were no streetlights to illumine the cities. In fact, there was little artificial lighting of any kind. So when the day ended, a man's work had to be done. To be abroad after nightfall was to stumble and risk injury. On this level the words encourage a person to use time wisely.

On the other hand, there is also a spiritual meaning that can hardly escape any perceptive reader of John's Gospel. Here Jesus speaks of "the light of this world." But who can read the phrase without at once thinking of Jesus himself? He is the light of this world. This was one of the designations he gave to himself (John 8:12; 9:5). He is the sun in whose light a man may walk and not stumble. He is the One without whom we are in darkness. In making these observations, therefore, Jesus clearly wanted to raise our thoughts from the physical level (which, however, is valid and important in itself) to the spiritual level, and to cause us to ask: Am I in the darkness, or do I walk with Christ who is the light of life?

Ask that question of yourself. Is your life illuminated by the Lord Jesus Christ? Or is it in darkness? Is your path growing brighter and brighter? The Bible says, "The path of the righteous is like the first gleam of dawn shining ever brighter till the full light of day" (Prov. 4:18). Or does it grow darker with each milepost along it?

If you are in darkness—your own heart will tell you whether you are or not—let me warn you that there is a great danger of falling. Even a Christian may stumble when he turns his back upon Christ. He will stumble but not fall. The Bible speaks of God's power to "keep [him] from falling and to present [him] before his glorious presence without fault and with great joy" (Jude 24). He will not fall, but he may stumble. This is bad enough. But what if you are not a Christian? In this case the danger is greatly intensified; for if you will not turn to Christ, the time is coming when you will inevitably fall and that so hard that you will not be able to rise again. You will fall eternally.

What is Jesus warning of if it is not this danger? What was the apostle Paul describing when he said of those who refuse to believe, "for they stumbled at that stumbling stone," if it was not that a man or a woman can stumble spiritually and be lost? Jesus was not threatening people. He loved people and attempted to draw them to himself. But he was warning of what would happen if his call was neglected. I wish that you might heed that warning if you are running away from him. Do you sense the darkness? Return to him. Confess your sin. Confess your rebellion. Say, "Lord, I want you to be my Savior." If you do, you will find that he will make your path plain and fill your life with light.

Horatius Bonar, one of our greatest hymn writers, knew this and wrote of his experience:

I heard the voice of Jesus say,
"I am this dark world's Light;
Look unto me, thy morn shall rise, And all thy day be bright."
I looked to Jesus, and I found In Him my Star, my Sun;
And in that light of life I'll walk, Till trav'lling days are done.

It is better to enter into that experience than to come at the end of life's journey to that place described as being shrouded in eternal darkness where all who inhabit it are lost.

Chapter 138.
How Christ Viewed Death

John 11:11-15

There is an openness about death today. Once it was not talked of. Now it is, and with increasing candor.

One person who has contributed to this new openness is a member of my congregation in Philadelphia. His name is Dr. C. Everett Koop, and he is known not only for his leadership in pediatric medicine (where he is a pioneer) but also for the way in which he deals with the subject of impending death in his contacts with the parents of his patients. His writings on this subject have appeared in the Reader's Digest and in other publications. The Nurses Christian Fellowship, to give another example, is now conducting seminars on the subject of caring for the dying patient. These seminars are well attended. In the secular world, others, such as the late newspaper columnist Stewart Alsop, have made the subject popular. Alsop, while dying of leukemia, wrote of his struggle with death in a book entitled Stay of Execution. Once again, this is evidence of the new openness I am talking about.

But this brings us to an interesting question. For if we are finding out what the doctors, nurses, and columnists think of death today, certainly we also find ourselves wanting to ask, "But what did Jesus Christ think about death?" He was in contact with death—his own, which he clearly saw coming, and that of others. How did he regard it? Did he accept death? Or did he long for a stay of execution? What Jesus thought on the subject is important, obviously, as we all realize. For he had information that we do not have, and his views should illuminate our own.

Two Deaths

We must begin with the fact that Christ's answer to the question was twofold, depending upon whether the death in view was the death of an unbeliever or a believer. If the death was the death of an unbeliever,

Jesus was not encouraging. In fact, he warned men against dying in this state. To die without faith in himself as the Savior was to enter hell, he said. He spoke of this as a place of "eternal fire" (Matt. 25:41) or "eternal punishment" (Matt. 25:46). He said that it was a place of "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 13:42). At one point he told a story of a rich man who was suffering in hades and who appealed to Abraham to send someone to cool his tongue (Luke 16:19-31). He said on another occasion: "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather, be afraid of the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).

The explanation of Christ's sternness at this point is not hard to find. For in the teaching of the Bible death is separation, and the death of an unbeliever is a separation of the soul and the spirit from God. God is light. So a separation from God in death means darkness. God is the source of all good gifts. Death means a deprivation of those gifts. It is this dimension, not suffering alone, that makes death the fearful thing it is for unbelievers.

On the other hand, Jesus was most encouraging about the death of believers. In fact, he was as encouraging on this aspect of the question as he was discouraging on the other. Here he spoke of entering into Abraham's bosom, or paradise (Luke 16:22; 23:43). He spoke of a land filled with many mansions, which he was going to prepare for those who followed him (John 14:2). In the passage that we are about to study he called death "sleep" and said that he was glad that it had happened to his friend Lazarus. This passage reads: "After he had said this, he went on to tell them, 'Our friend Lazarus has fallen asleep; but I am going to wake him up.' His disciples replied, 'Lord, if he sleeps, he will get better.' Jesus had been speaking of his death, but his disciples thought he had meant natural sleep. So then he told them plainly, 'Lazarus is dead, and for your sakes I am glad I was not there, so that you may believe. But, let us go to him'" (vv. 1115).

Lazarus Dead and Jesus Glad

What a striking expression this is—"Lazarus is dead, and I am glad." We might understand it better if Jesus had said, "Lazarus is sleeping physically, and I am glad," for we would then have thought as the disciples thought when they apparently first misunderstood Christ's meaning. We would have thought that sleep is a good thing and that Lazarus might therefore recover. But this is not what Christ said. He said, "Lazarus is dead, and I am glad." So we find ourselves asking, "How can Jesus be glad? How can death possibly be a cause for rejoicing?"

There are several answers to this question, and they are all in the passage. First, Jesus was glad at Lazarus's death because Lazarus was a believer and he understood what the death of a believer was. It was not to be feared. It was a homecoming. In these verses he terms it a "sleep," which it is, and implies that not only is it not to be feared but rather that it is to be regarded as something beneficial.

We understand this better when we begin to reflect on sleep itself and of the good that comes from it. Notice first that sleep is harmless. So also is death for the believer. David knew this. He wrote in the Twenty-third Psalm, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil" (v. 4). Or again, Paul wrote, "The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 15:56-57).

Let me give this illustration concerning death's shadow. In Scotland an old man lay dying. He was afraid of death. The minister who was attending him was trying to comfort him. The minister asked if he had not been a shepherd. "Aye," answered the Scotsman, "I have waited upon the sheep many a day."

"And," asked the minister, "did you never stand on the hillside and watch the wind blow a cloud across the valley?"

"Many a time," said the dying man.

"And when the shadow of that cloud came racing across the heather toward you and the flock, were you afraid?"

The old shepherd drew himself up slightly from his pillow and cried, "What! Afraid of a shadow? Jamie has covenanters' blood in his veins, and he has never been afraid of anything."

The minister then turned to his Bible and read the Twenty-third Psalm as the truth broke over Jamie: "Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

For us death is indeed a shadow. But it is a shadow only because the grim reality of death with all its horror laid hold of our shepherd. Is death separation, separation from God? This is what Jesus bore for those who are his sheep. He was separated from the Father. He cried out, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" He was separated so that for us death might be a shadow.

May I make that even plainer? In the year 1776, the year of the signing of the American Declaration of Independence, an English minister, the Reverend Augustus M. Toplady, was walking across a field in Somersetshire when he was suddenly overtaken by a storm. He was still several miles from home. The place was exposed. But he noticed a cleft running down a mass of rock beside a road, and in that cleft he took refuge. There he stayed till the storm passed.
Toplady was a godly man. He had been converted in 1740, at the age of sixteen, while sitting in a barn listening to a man preach who could not even write his name. Toplady had since had a very fruitful ministry. Now, sitting in the cleft of the rock, he thought of spiritual things and, picking up a playing card that he found lying on the ground at his feet, he began to write the words of a hymn that has since become one of the most popular of the English-speaking world.

> Rock of Ages, cleft for me, Let me hide myself in thee.

This is why the death of a believer is harmless. It is not that death itself is harmless, but rather that Christ has tasted death fully in place of those who believe on him. He was struck for us in order that we might hide in him as the storms of death pass by.

Second, we may note that sleep is restful. It is a relief from the work of the day. The Book of Ecclesiastes notes that "the sleep of a laborer is sweet" (Eccl. 5:12). The disciples said of Lazarus, "Lord, if he sleeps, he will get better" (v. 12). It is the same with death. Thus, in Revelation we read, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on. 'Yes,' says the Spirit, 'they will rest from their labor, for their deeds will follow them'" (14:13).

Let me say that I do not believe this means that there will be nothing to do in heaven. In fact, I believe that the opposite will be the case. I believe that the life of heaven will be filled with activity; for God is active himself—he is the Creator after all—and we shall be like him. Heaven will not be restful in the sense that there will be no work to do. But it will be restful in the sense that what we do will be done without toil; that is, without the strain, labor, and sorrow that work involves in this life because of sin's curse.

There is one more thing about the resemblance between death and sleep. Sleep is temporary. That is, we sleep to rise again. In the same way, death is temporary. We die, but we do so in order to rise to a world prepared for us by our heavenly Father.

Moreover, on the spiritual level death is so temporary that it can hardly be described by timewords at all. How long is death? It has no duration. It is a passage rather, a passage from this world to the next. It is a doorway. Thus, to be absent from the body is "to be at home with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8).

There is a wonderful illustration of this truth in a detail from the funeral of Sir Winston Churchill. At one point in the funeral service a bugler, stationed high in the dome of St. Paul's Church in London, where the funeral took place, sounded taps while everyone waited in hushed silence. Taps signifies the end of the day in military circles. So this was a way of marking the end of Churchill's long and distinguished life. To some extent it was the passing of an era. It was sad, even a bit mournful. But then—and this is the point for which I tell the story—no sooner had the notes of taps died away in that great cathedral than the bugle sounded again. But this time the tune was not taps. The tune was reveille, the call by which the military world begins a new day. Churchill wished to give testimony to the truth that death is only a gateway into God's presence, into a life lived in his eternal day.

Since this is what death is, it is no wonder that Jesus could say, "Lazarus is dead, and I am glad."

A Resurrection

There was a second reason why Jesus could say that he was glad, however. In some ways it is the most obvious. Jesus was glad because he knew that he was going to raise Lazarus from the dead. This is what he implies in the same verse that speaks of Lazarus sleeping; for he says, "I am going there to wake him up" (v.ll).

Death could not exist in the presence of Jesus. There is no indication anywhere in Scripture that Jesus ever met a dead person and failed to raise him. On one occasion, when he was passing the little village of Nain, in Galilee, he met a funeral procession coming out of the city. A man had died, the only son of a widow. Jesus went to the bier, touched the dead man, and restored him to life. On another occasion, Jesus raised the daughter of a certain ruler of the synagogue, named Jairus. Here it is Lazarus who is raised. Jesus never met a funeral that he did not stop. In fact, I would be willing to state that he never came across an illness of any kind without making the situation right. So he was always glad. As here, he could rejoice at the outcome.

May I add one more thought? Jesus is able to raise the dead, as I have indicated; but, note this, only he can do it. No one else can. If a person is sick but not yet dead, there is a place for physicians. Medicine coupled with the skill of doctors and the natural rejuvenating powers of the human body can do wonders. But if the person is dead, then the doctors are useless. Only the voice of the divine Christ can call forth life in resurrection.

If only Jesus can call forth the dead, do you know the voice that will call them? Not everyone knows Christ's voice. Jesus said of many of his day, "You cannot hear my word" (John 8:43). He said that only those could hear who had been given to him by the Father. Only his sheep could respond (John 10:27). Are you one of his sheep? Have you been given to Christ by the Father? If you cannot answer that question with a firm yes, perhaps you should put yourself in a place where, by the grace of God, you may hear Christ's voice even now. Begin to read the Bible. Expose yourself to the preaching of the gospel by faithful men. Converse with those who already know Christ. Begin to attend church services. It may be that Jesus will speak to you, bringing forth spiritual life in your otherwise dead heart, and begin to prepare you for that second call that will raise you to the life of heaven.

A Strengthening of Faith

Jesus was glad that Lazarus had died, for a third reason. He was glad because he knew that he would raise Lazarus. He was glad because he knew that the resurrection would result in a strengthening of the faith of many. He indicates this by saying, "And for your sake I am glad I was not there so that you may believe" (v. 15). The faith of the disciples was to be strengthened. The faith of Martha and Mary was to be strengthened. Indeed, many who at that time did not even have faith were to come to it as a result of this dramatic resurrection.

The last point can be applied to you who are Christians by asking whether the resurrection that Jesus has performed in you has had that effect on other persons. Has your resurrection helped others to find Jesus? Perhaps you are saying, "What do you mean, my resurrection? My resurrection has not yet occurred. It will occur at the last day." Are you sure of that? Are you sure that this is the only resurrection you can talk about?

You must remember at this point that while all the miracles recorded are true, nevertheless these are recorded (rather than others) because these miracles are superb illustrations of salvation. Thus, the impotent man is a picture of each of us before we are restored spiritually. We are helpless, unable to move, unable to take even the first step toward Jesus. The man born blind is another example. He was unable to see Jesus. If Jesus had told the man to seek him and that he would then help him, the man could not have done it. Yet Jesus saved him. In the same way, the story of Lazarus is included to show what it means to be "dead in trespasses and sins" and why it is necessary that the voice of Christ sound forth to rouse us from this spiritual slumber. We will not awaken spiritually unless Christ calls. But when he calls we do awaken. This is your experience if you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. And so the question holds: Has your resurrection helped others to find Jesus?

This is what Paul wanted as a result of his transformed life. Do you remember that verse in the third chapter of Philippians in which he expresses the hope that he might "attain the resurrection from the dead" (Phil. 3:11)? The phrase does not suggest that Paul was uncertain about the ultimate outcome of his salvation, as though he might one day discover he was lost. The one who wrote in Romans, "For I am convinced that [nothing] will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38-39), does not mean that. What Paul meant was that he wanted to attain unto the resurrection now; that is, to live as a resurrected one among the millions who are spiritually dead, so that they might have a preview of eternal life in action and that some at least might come to faith in the Savior.

That is what I desire for you, if you are a Christian. You have been dead spiritually. You have been made alive in Jesus. Well, then, can others see it? That is one way in which Jesus would like to express joy in your death and resurrection.

Chapter 139.
The Shadow of Death

John 11:16

I do not know why a man's failures are often long remembered and his attainments forgotten, but that is the way things are. And it is not only in our own time that they are like this. Shakespeare phrased it perfectly when he had Antony say at the funeral of his friend Julius Caesar, "The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones."

The same thing is true of one of the minor characters of John's Gospel. His name is Thomas. Such is our opinion of him that no sooner do we hear that name than we immediately remember that one incident for which he is least praiseworthy. "Doubting Thomas!" That is the phrase that comes into our minds, for we automatically think of the story in which Thomas expressed disbelief in Christ's resurrection. Jesus had already appeared to the other disciples, Thomas being absent. But when Thomas was told about it, he replied, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands, and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe" (John 20:25). We forget that the other disciples did not believe until they had seen Christ either. But we remember this story and by it form our one-sided opinions of Christ's doubting disciple.

What a different picture we might have of Thomas if we could only remember the incident that occurs in the eleventh chapter of the same Gospel!

The Story

To understand this story we must remember that Jesus had announced his intention of returning to the area of Jerusalem and that only a few moments before this he had reminded his disciples of the danger that awaited them there. The danger was no illusion. The disciples were understandably frightened. Christ's enemies had tried to stone him on several occasions and in different places. But the opposition at Jerusalem had been extremely fierce; and the last incident, which had taken place only weeks before, was the most frightening of all. We sense the true danger when we recall that on this occasion Jesus actually left Jerusalem for the area of the Jordan River.

Now he was going back, and the disciples were frightened again. They knew that they could not stop Jesus if he had determined to return. But what were they to do? I can imagine them looking around at one another, then at the ground, then at Jesus. I can imagine them wondering, "What will happen to Jesus if he goes to Jerusalem? No doubt he will die. What will happen to us if we follow him? No doubt we will die also." Perhaps there was a long pause. But at last one of the disciples spoke up with precisely the right words for the occasion. That disciple was Thomas. Thomas said, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (11:16).

I must admit that this was hardly a cheery statement. It was melancholy, even a bit grim. Thomas did tend to look on the worst side of things after all. Still, I cannot help admiring his words. For one thing, they were honest. The way to Jerusalem was the way to death. Second, they were loyal. Thomas was saying that no matter what lay ahead it was better to be with Jesus. And so it is. It is always better to be with Jesus. Finally, the words were courageous. In taking this stand Thomas was literally stating his willingness to walk with Christ into the lion's den.

I know that the time came when Thomas, as well as the others, forsook Christ and fled from him. I also know that the death in Jerusalem was not the whole story, that there was a resurrection beyond it. But all this was before Thomas, and at the time (regardless of what the future held) he did the right thing. So let us remember this and try to be like Thomas in his best moments.

Death and Denial

We might be helped in remembering this incident from the life of Thomas if we remember that it is only one expression in Scripture of an important and pervasive principle. It is the principle of death and denial—of dying, of saying no to oneself and to the world in order that we might say yes to Christ. This principle is found throughout the New Testament. For instance, in Romans 6 we read, "If we have been united with him like this in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection. For we know that our old self was crucified with him so that the body of sin might by done away with, that we should no longer be slaves to sin" (vv. 5-6). Or again, in Galatians 2:20, "I have been crucified with Christ." Or, later on, "May I never boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal. 6:14).

Let me say again, then, that this is a very important principle, and not the least because we do not naturally want to fit into it. Who wants to die, after all? No one! Who wants to deny himself? Who wants to turn down a chance to fulfill his desires? No one! Moreover, we live in the midst of a world that says no to nothing. No is unpopular. Yet this is where Christianity begins, in one sense, and it is the sole way that victory in the Christian life may be established. In other words, to know victory in the Christian life we must become like Thomas. Like him we hear Christ's call, and like him we are at once aware of many other things that we would rather do or become. But we must not do them. Like Thomas we must turn our backs on these things and follow Jesus.

One Principle, Two Applications

This should not be difficult for us to understand, if we are Christians. For this is where Christianity began for us, as I have indicated. What does it mean to have become a Christian? It means to have turned your back on any attempt to please God by your own efforts and instead to have accepted by faith what God has done in Christ for your salvation. No man can save himself. So we must stop trying. We must die to our efforts. We must say no to them. It is only after we have done this that we can receive God's salvation as a gift.

Let me give an illustration of this from the testimony of Paul. Before his conversion Paul had been trying to please God by his personal achievements. After he had met Christ on the road to Damascus, he said no to this course of action and instead lived for Christ. His own words on the matter are expressive. He wrote, "But whatever was to my profit I now consider loss for the sake of Christ. What is more, I consider everything a loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whose sake I have lost all things. I consider them rubbish, that I may gain Christ and be found in him" (Phil. 3:7-8). This is where the Christian life begins. So, as I say, the principle of death and denial should not be a difficult one for any true Christian to understand.

The difficulty, however (as in many other areas in life), is not with understanding so much as it is with application; and it is here that most of us fall down. The first application of the principle is to the moment of faith in Christ, and we have both understood and applied the principle at that point—if we are Christians. But then—this is so common—we have forgotten that the principle must also be applied to the living of the Christian life, if we really are to live it. Life? Yes. But only after death. Blessing? Yes. But only after we have taken up our cross.

Let me be explicit at this point. If we are really going to experience death and denial that, in one sense, is the basis of the Christian life, then we must be willing to say no to anything that is contrary to God's will and way for us.

First, it means saying no to anything that is contrary to God's revelation of himself; that is, anything contrary to the Bible. This is the way in which we are to approach the law, for instance. We are not under law in the sense of being under a list of rules and regulations. We are free from that. But we are to obey the law in the sense that it reveals to us the nature of God and shows us those areas of life in which by the power of God we are to say no in order that we might go on with Christ. The first of the Ten Commandments is an example: "You shall have no other gods before me." Here is a negative, an obvious one. It tells us that we are to say no to anything that would take God's rightful place in our lives. Is it an actual idol? We must say no to the idol; we must burn it, destroy it, as many primitive people have done when they have responded to the gospel. Is it money? If so, we must get rid of the money; for it is better to be poor and a close follower of Christ than rich and far from him. Do not misunderstand. Money is not something that necessarily takes the place of God in a life. It is possible to be a devoted and deeply spiritual Christian and rich at the same time. But if it is or has become a god, then we must say no to it, for "You shall have no other gods before me." Is it another person who has taken the place of God for you? Is it a business? An ambition? Your children? Fame? Achievement? Whatever it is, you must say no to it, if it is keeping you from Christ. This is the negative principle, the principle of dying. It must be taken seriously.

If you want to test yourself on this, you may do so with each of the other commandments. "You shall not murder." This means that we are to say no to any desire to take another's life or slander his reputation. "You shall not commit adultery." We are to say no to any desire to take another man's wife or another woman's husband. "You shall not steal." We must say no to the desire to take another person's property. If we have not said no at these points, then we can hardly pretend that we are living in the newness of Christ's resurrection life. Indeed, we are not living the life of Christ at all.

Second, if we are going to experience death and denial, we must also say no to anything that is not the will of God for us. In one sense, this point is related to the previous one about the law. But it also goes beyond it in that not everything permitted in the Word of God is God's will for us. For instance, there is nothing at all wrong with marriage. In fact, the contrary is true.
Marriage was created by God and has his blessing. Still, marriage may not be the will of God for you; and if it is not, then you must say no to marriage, consciously and deliberately. Until you do you will not really begin to live the life God has for you. The same thing holds true for a profession, for your own conception of yourself, and for many other matters.

Two quick questions before we go on. First, how can I learn to say no? The answer: watch Jesus, follow him. He is the supreme example of self-denial, for he said no even to the glories of heaven in order that he might become man and die for our salvation. We can learn from him. It was certainly from watching Christ that Thomas was able to say what he did on the occasion of their joint return to Jerusalem.

The second question: How can I know when I have said no? The answer is: when you have stopped complaining. If you are murmuring, as the Israelites murmured in the wilderness, you have not really turned your back on Egypt. But if you have stopped murmuring, then you are ready to go on, as Paul was when he said, "Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:13-14).

Resurrection

I have emphasized the principle of death and denial—first, because it is the major lesson of our text, and second, because it is not often taught to today's Christians. However, I do not want to leave the text at this point, for as it stands it is still one-sided. Death is a great principle. It is this that Thomas's words so clearly teach us. But there is also more. In the biblical scheme of things death is always followed by life, crucifixion by the resurrection. It is this that is truly exciting and for which we are willing to die.

Let us go back for a minute to the texts I quoted earlier. "If we have been united with him like this in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection" (Rom. 6:5). True, we must die to self; but we do so in order that we might live to Christ. We die "that the body of sin might be done away with, that we should no longer be slaves to sin" (v. 6). We read something similar in Galatians: "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20). We also find the truth just one chapter farther on in John's Gospel. Jesus is speaking. He says, "Unless a kernel of wheat falls to the ground and dies, it remains only a single seed. But if it dies, it produces many seeds. The man who loves his life will lose it, while the man who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life" (12:24-25).

What does this mean practically? It means that when we give up trying to run our own lives or when we give up those things that seem so precious and so utterly indispensible to us, then (and only then) do we find the true joy of being a Christian and enter into lives so freed from the obsessions that we can hardly understand from that point on how they could have had such a strong hold on us.

So what is the difference between a joyless Christian and a joyful Christian, a defeated and a victorious one? Death and resurrection! The joyless Christian may have died and risen with Christ in some abstract, theological sense, so that he can in the same sense be termed "a new creature in Christ." But he has certainly never known it in practice. On the other hand, the joyful Christian has found satisfaction in whatever God dispenses to him and is truly satisfied, for he has said no to anything that might keep him from the richness of God's own blessing and presence, and has risen into new life.

A Word to Others

One final thought comes from these ten brief words of Thomas. Have you noticed that Thomas was not only willing to deny himself in order to follow Christ but that he also invited others to do so? His exact words were, "Let us also go, that we may die with him." He wanted the others to do as he did. And he was successful in his invitation, for a little later in the chapter we find that the disciples are all still with Jesus. Are you like Thomas in that? You may already have learned these lessons. Of course, you may not have; and if this is the case, you must begin there. But if you have, if you have really learned to say no and have thereby also entered into the joy of new life in Christ, then this is the point at which you in particular must imitate Thomas. If you have learned these things, teach others. If you have found joy, invite them to follow the One who taught you how to find it.

Thomas! The word means "twin" in Hebrew; it is the equivalent of Didymus, which means "twin" in Greek. Thomas was a twin. I wonder who the other one was. He was not one of the other disciples certainly. He may not even have been a man; the twin may have been a woman. We cannot know. Yet there is a sense in which I would like you to find him. I would like you to find him every time you look into the mirror. Only I would like you to find, not "doubting Thomas," but rather the one who said to others, "Let us also go, that we may die with him."

Chapter 140.
"I Am the Resurrection and the Life"

John 11:17-26

About fifty years before the birth of Jesus Christ a letter was written by a well-known Roman, Sulpicius Severus, to the great orator Cicero on the occasion of the death of Cicero's beloved daughter Tullia. It is a magnificent letter. It expresses deep sympathy. It reminds the orator that his daughter had only experienced a lot common to mankind and had passed away only when the freedom of the Republic was itself failing. It is warm and moving. But in spite of these great qualities the letter contains nothing of a hope of life beyond the grave. In reply, Cicero thanks his friend for his sympathy and enlarges upon the measure of his loss. A century later the apostle Paul was in contact with Christians who had become similarly discouraged by the death of their friends, as the result of which he too has left us a letter. But Paul's letter is different. True, it acknowledges sorrow; but it also breathes hope. It deals with death, but it also knows the comfort of a resurrection. In it Paul writes, "Brothers, we do not want you to be ignorant about those who fall asleep, or to grieve like the rest of men, who have no hope. We believe that Jesus died and rose again and so we believe that God will bring with Jesus those who have fallen asleep in him___Therefore encourage each other with these words" (1 Thess. 4:13-14, 18).

These letters present a remarkable contrast, for they throw into relief that new awareness of the future life introduced by Christianity. Cicero was not unaware of Plato's arguments for immortality or of any of the other arguments advanced in his day, but these were poor comfort in face of the cruel horror of death. Paul, on the other hand, moves in a new spirit of hope and confidence.

A Troubled Believer

Before we look at Christ's statement regarding the resurrection and of himself as "the resurrection and the life," we need to look at the one to whom he spoke it. For the person to whom he spoke was Martha, and Martha is an excellent example of a certain type of believer, of whom we have many today. These do not distrust the Lord, but neither do they believe with that full confidence that would allow them to lay aside their care and rest in his good provision. They believe, but they are always troubling themselves with questions of "How?" and "Why?" and "What if?" and so miss the blessing that could be theirs if they would only believe more simply.

Such faith always attempts to limit God or, which is the same thing, to scale down his promises. Notice that Martha limited the Lord's working both to time and place, for she said, "Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died" (v. 21).

We need to recall here that Jesus had deliberately delayed his return to Bethany for two days so that he eventually arrived in Bethany four full days after Lazarus' burial. Some have felt that Jesus delayed until Lazarus had died (and have imagined this to be cruel), but a careful thinking through of the days will show that this probably was not true. If we number the days one through four, we can reconstruct what happened. On the first day, as Lazarus was getting worse, the sisters sent to Jesus. Apparently Lazarus died some time after the departure of the messenger and was quickly buried, so that this day counts as the first of the four in which he lay in the tomb. Quick burials were customary in such a hot climate. The next two days Jesus stayed in the area of the Jordan; that is, days two and three. Then, on the fourth day, Jesus returned to Bethany and performed the resurrection.

Lazarus was therefore already dead by the time word of his illness reached Jesus; Jesus knew of it and therefore delayed his return, not that Lazarus might die but for an entirely different purpose. The reason Jesus delayed his return from the Jordan was that there might be no doubt that Lazarus was dead and that there might therefore be no cause for doubting the miracle. Thus we know that from the beginning he intended to perform it.

Martha did not see this, however, so when Jesus returned to Bethany her first words were a bit of rebuke. And they expressed her own limited faith, as I have indicated. "If you had been here," she said. That is, she felt that Jesus could have done something four days earlier but that he could not do what was obviously necessary now. True, one verse later Martha says, "But I know that even now, God will give you whatever you ask" (v. 22). But we know that her "whatever" did not include a resurrection, for she was quick to rebuke Christ later when he asked that the stone be rolled away from the tomb of Lazarus. Moreover, Martha also clearly tried to limit Christ by place; for she said, "If you had been here" that is, in Bethany. It implied that Jesus could not have healed her brother from a distance. A little later she does the same thing when she reacts to Christ's promise concerning her brother—"Your brother will rise again"—by saying, "I know he will rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (v. 24).

In the same way many of us also seek to limit Jesus. We believe that he is able to do all he says he will do—but not now and not here. At least we do not expect him to and are genuinely surprised or disbelieving when he does.

The second characteristic of Martha's strange faith is that she treated the words of Christ impersonally. The first recorded words of Jesus after his return to Bethany were a tremendous promise. He said, "Your brother will rise again" (v. 23). But instead of taking this in the best and most personal sense—as a promise that Jesus was about to restore her brother to her—Martha pushed the words off into the future as though to say that they had no relationship either to herself or her situation.

This is also what we do with Christ's promises, many of us. We believe them, in a sense, that is, as they apply to others or to a far distant time. But we do not receive them personally. For us, the glorious promises of God become something like a mighty fleet that has been put in moth balls, or like antiques in the attic. They have value, we suppose; but practically we get nothing out of them. The story is told of a gentleman who visited the home of a poor French couple a long time ago where he saw a note for one thousand francs papered to the wall. He asked them how they got that particular piece of paper. They answered that they had found a poor soldier, who had been wounded, and that they had nursed him in their home until he died. He had given it to them. It was such a nice memorial of him, they thought, that they had caused it to be plastered to the wall where they would always be able to see it. Naturally they were surprised when they were told that it would be worth quite a little fortune to them if they would turn it into money.

Unfortunately many Christians do that with God's promises. But they should not—that is the point. As Spurgeon once wrote, they should have "grace to turn God's bullion ... into current coin."

A New Revelation

We have looked at Martha, then. Let us now look at Jesus and at the way in which he dealt with her. She had come expressing a poor kind of faith, a faith that was half faith and half doubt. Even her words had a hint of rebuke about them. But Jesus did not get angry with her for her weak faith, or rebuke her in turn for her attitude. He could have said, "Martha, Martha, what poor thoughts you have of me. I have been with you for a long time and you still do not know that I am both willing to and will raise your brother." He could have said something like that, but he did not. Rebuke in a time of great sorrow is not helpful, and is uncalled for. Besides, it would even have been misunderstood; for Martha thought she was expressing great faith in Jesus when she said, "But I know that even now, God will give you whatever you ask" (v. 22).

Instead, Jesus used the opportunity to teach Martha more of himself. He said, "I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in me will live, even though he dies; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die" (vv. 25-26).

What did Jesus teach Martha? His first words were words to her condition specifically. She had attempted to push the resurrection off to the last day. Jesus replied by saying that he himself was the resurrection and that, therefore, wherever he is there is life. In this case, the Lord Jesus Christ was present physically; so there was going to be physical life. Lazarus would live again. When Jesus returns physically at the end of this age, there will be a physical resurrection then also. At other times, as today, Jesus is present spiritually; so there is a spiritual resurrection rather than a physical one. If you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, you have experienced this resurrection. You were dead in trespasses and sins, but you have been brought to life by Jesus.

Likewise, all who know the Lord Jesus Christ will experience a physical resurrection. So at this point, having spoken directly to Martha's situation, Jesus goes on to develop his teaching. "He who believes in me will live, even though he dies; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die" (vv. 25-26).

These comments can mean any of three things. First, both halves of Christ's saying can be taken spiritually. If we do this, the sense would be, "Whoever believes in me, though he were spiritually dead, yet shall he become spiritually alive. And whosoever is spiritually alive and continues to believe in me shall never die spiritually." The advantage of this interpretation is that it takes the terms in the same sense. If it is followed, the major thought is that the one who believes in Christ, having received the eternal life of God, will never be lost.

The second interpretation is one that takes the first half of Christ's words physically and the second half spiritually. It would give us a meaning somewhat like this: "He who believes in me, even though he should die physically, yet he will live physically [that is, there will be a final resurrection]. And whosoever is spiritually alive and believes in me shall not die spiritually." The advantage of this interpretation is that it relates to Martha's problem directly—the problem of physical death answered by physical resurrection. The disadvantage is that the terms, particularly the term "life," must be taken in different senses.

The third interpretation takes both halves of Christ's statement physically, that is, as applying to the time of Christ's second coming at which time those who are alive will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air while those who have died will be raised physically. This, while true, does not seem to relate to the situation in John 11. But if it were the meaning of the verses, we would have to read them like this: "He who believes in me, though he shall have died physically by the time of my return, yet shall he be raised. And whoever is a believer and is still living at the time of my return, shall never die physically but shall be caught up to heaven." This was the interpretation of C. H. Spurgeon and some other commentators.

Which of these is to be preferred? It is probably impossible to say with certainty; for, since the statements involved in each view are true in themselves, each could be possible. In my opinion the second is the most likely in that it begins with Martha's situation but then goes on to present a higher principle. If this is the case, then Christ's promises are all-inclusive. There is a promise of spiritual life and physical life. There is a promise of life now and also life to come. Moreover, it is clearly stated that this life is only for those who believe on Christ and who are therefore members of his covenant people.

A Direct Application

This brings us to our conclusion, which is at the same time (let us note) the conclusion that Jesus pressed upon Martha. It is a conclusion in the form of a question: "Do you believe this?" (v. 26). Jesus had made a statement ("I am the resurrection and the life"); he had elaborated upon it. Now he asks, "Do you believe this? Do you really believe it?" This is the question I would like to leave with you also. Do you believe Christ's teaching?

As you think about it, notice that Jesus speaks of faith and not feeling. He did not say to Martha, "Do you feel better now, Martha? Have you found these thoughts comforting? Do you feel your old optimism returning?" According to Jesus it was not how she felt that was important, but what she believed. Feelings are deceiving. Moreover, they come and go. On the other hand, faith is an anchor fixed in bedrock. To believe the words of Jesus is to believe in One whose promises are absolutely trustworthy.

Notice also that Christ was specific. He did not say, "Martha, do you believe generally?" He said, "Martha, do you believe this? That is, do you believe the specific truths I have taught you?"

I ask that question of you. I trust that your answer may be different. Do you believe this? You should be able to say, "Yes, Lord, I believe it. I believe all that is written in your Book.

"I believe in one great God, who has made this earth and has placed me upon it. I believe that I am sinful. I believe that this same God in love and wisdom sent the Lord Jesus Christ to die for me that I might be saved. I believe that Jesus existed with God and as God from the beginning, that he became man, that his death was a substitutionary death for me by which my sin has been removed as far as the east is from the west and on the basis of which it will be remembered against me no more. I believe in Christ's historical, literal, and bodily resurrection, by which God has demonstrated that Christ's sacrifice on the cross is acceptable to him as an all-sufficient atonement for the sin of his people and in which he has also given a foretaste of the coming resurrection of all who believe on him. I believe in the person and power of the Holy Spirit. I believe that he opens blind eyes to see Christ and moves rebellious wills to embrace him to their salvation. I believe that he illuminates the written Word of God so that those who are saved can understand it and obey it. I believe in the fellowship of the saints. I believe in the church. I believe in God's providence, by which nothing enters the life of the Christian that is not the product either of God's direct or permissive will. I believe that God chastises his children. I believe that he is determined to perfect the character of Jesus Christ in all who are united to Christ by faith. I believe that Jesus will one day return from heaven even as he was seen to go into heaven—bodily and in time. I believe that in that day there will be a final resurrection of believers to the life of heaven and of unbelievers to judgment. In hell there will be suffering. In heaven there will be a life of blessing prepared in advance by God for those whom he has chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world."

There is much more that can be said, of course. But every Christian should be able to say at least that. "Do you believe this?" You should be able to echo the teaching of the written Word in answer to the question of the living Word, rounding it off with a hearty, "Yes, Lord, I believe all that is written in your Book."

Chapter 141.
Faith's Foothold

John 11:27

In our last study, as we were looking at Christ's question to Martha on the occasion of his return to Bethany soon after Lazarus had died, we saw what our answer should be to the question, "Do you believe this?" We should be able to respond, "Lord, I believe everything you say. I believe what is written in your Book." This involves the truth that God is the creator and sustainer of life; that we are sinners; that God has redeemed us in Christ Jesus, his Son; that Jesus rose bodily from the dead, ascended into heaven, and is coming again; that there will be a final judgment; and many other doctrines. However, it may be that some will hear this and say, "I know that is good, and I wish I could affirm all those things. But I haven't come that far. I cannot say them for certain. What should I do?" If that is the case in your life, then the verse to which we now come is for you personally.

Jesus had asked Martha, "Do you believe this?" Her answer is the verse we are considering. She replied, "Yes, Lord, I believe that you are the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world" (v. 27).

We should notice that Martha did not reply directly to what Christ had asked, for her answer did not include her assent to what he had been teaching. Still, it was a good reply. She did not affirm more than she knew, but she affirmed what she did know. Moreover, I am sure that from this point she went on to even greater understanding.

I call her words "faith's foothold," for they were a sure support from which she could climb higher. I have often seen a mountain climber make his way up an outcropping of rock, which someone else might consider unclimbable, simply by finding small footholds in the rock's surface. They are not big, but they are firm; and one who will rest his whole weight on them can move up and on from that position. This is what Martha did. Her sphere of knowledge was not large, but it was firm. So she built upon it. It is my desire that many might begin as she began, as a result of this study.

The Words of Jesus

When we consider her answer a phrase at a time, we notice, first of all, that she gives the basis of her understanding. The basis is the word of Christ. We have it in her affirmative response: "Yes, Lord, I believe." This does not mean that she understands everything he has been saying —in fact, she did not—but rather that she accepts it, whatever it is, because she knows that his words are trustworthy. This is an ideal starting point for anyone. This should be true of your spiritual understanding.

Moreover, it is not only that Jesus' words are absolutely trustworthy. It is also the case that only his words are fully trustworthy. With anyone else the question of truth is relative. A person may speak what is true at one time but what is false at another. Or he may speak partial truth; that is, truth mixed with error. Or he may not know what is true. With Jesus it is different. Jesus spoke the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Moreover, he claimed to be the truth; for he said in John 14:6, "I am the way and the truth and the life." In other words, according to Jesus, the only valid starting point in any religious matter is what he himself has said and done, and not the words or deeds of some other person.

Why is it that in a discussion of religious questions someone will frequently express an opinion on something of which he has no knowledge at all and others will at once adopt his opinion, while the words of Jesus on the same subject (about which he has knowledge) are ignored?

Let me give an example. Someone says, "I believe in reincarnation. If you do well in this life, you will reappear as a person with a good position in life—perhaps someone rich or in a position of authority. If you do badly, you may reappear as an animal or insect. Eventually, if you do well enough, you may progress up and out of the system into a blessed state." Someone who is listening replies, "That sounds good to me. I'll believe in reincarnation too." But why should he? There is no evidence for that view of the afterlife whatsoever; so any opinion about it is groundless. On the other hand, Jesus, who came from eternity and who returned to it, who demonstrated the truth of his claims by means of a resurrection, taught the conscious continuation of the individual soul beyond death, in which state he either suffers for his sins as the result of a punishment imposed by God or else enjoys the bliss of heaven on the basis of Christ's death for him, which he has received by faith—and this is neglected. Why? Generally it is because men and women do not like what God says to them. The Bible says simply that it is because they do not like to retain God in their knowledge and so prefer lies.

When we are talking about the words of Jesus in this way, we must realize that we are also talking about the whole of Scripture, for he inspired Scripture. Indeed, his Spirit stands behind the particular words and books that have been written.

Let us be clear about the fact that we live in a day when men and women have grown unhappy with this book and have therefore thrown it off. Let us also note that they have done so because they do not like what it says, not because it has been shown to be untrustworthy. The standard view is that modern biblical criticism has shown that the Bible contains errors. This quotation expresses it: "The scientific development of the last century has rendered untenable the whole conception of the Bible as a verbally inspired book, to which we can appeal with absolute certainty for infallible guidance in all matters of faith and conduct." But the fact that this is not the major reason why the Bible is neglected is seen in the truth that most people who neglect the Bible cannot give you even one example of an alleged error in Scripture, let alone prove it to be an error. So it is not the supposed errors that have turned them off, but the Bible's teaching. It is that the Bible reveals men and women to be sinners in need of a Savior and that most persons do not like to be told this. If men and women were praised by God, biblical truth would be popular.

What shall we do then? Shall we also throw off the Bible and with it the words of Christ? How can we? If we were to do that, we would be abandoning the only sure source of spiritual knowledge available to fallen man, and we would be rendering an answer to the question "Do you believe this?" impossible. Without a sure word from God we cannot believe anything. Indeed, all is uncertain and there are no answers to the great spiritual questions that confront us. On the other hand, with the Bible as a base we can go on to sure knowledge and expanding faith, as Martha did.

It is my firm conviction that we will not have a true revival in today's church until the church as a whole returns to this high view of Scripture. "Yes, Lord, I believe." This should be our starting point, and we should say both to God and others that we do believe all that the Scriptures teach. Indeed, the Word should become our starting point and thus also our only infallible rule of faith and practice.

A Threefold Confession

The second important thing we should notice about this verse is that it also gives a statement of content as regards Martha's confession. The first notable feature is the basis upon which she believes. The second is the content or what she believes. Clearly this is also important, for faith without content is meaningless. If a person says, "I believe," we want to ask, "But what do you believe?" If he has no answer to that question, we must conclude that he does not know what belief is in the biblical sense and that he is deluding himself in spiritual matters.

Martha was not like this, however, Martha said, "Lord, I believe." Then she immediately went on to say what she believed: "I believe that you are the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world." This confession has three points, but the most important thing to be said is that all three points have to do with Jesus. In other words, he himself is the content of her confession. There are other matters in the Christian faith, of course. But in a sense they all focus in Christ, so that he really is the content of Christianity. Therefore, in this as in the matter of the basis of Christian faith Martha becomes a valuable guide for ourselves and our contemporaries.

God's Messiah

First of all, then, Martha expressed belief that Jesus is "the Christ." Christ means "Messiah," or "the Anointed One." So, by saying this, Martha was affirming that Jesus was the one prophesied to appear in the end time as God's specially appointed servant.

We must admit that there were different expectations in Judaism regarding the Messiah, just as there are different views regarding him by Jewish thinkers today. Some expected an otherworldly Messiah. Some expected a great teacher. The society that produced the Dead Sea Scrolls is an example of this. Still others, perhaps the majority, expected a political or warlike Messiah whose primary work would be to drive out the Romans who then occupied the Jewish lands. Many such views were current, but the expectation that tied them together was the belief that one day God would send a specially anointed individual who would be the herald of salvation. Martha believed that Jesus was this anointed one, and so should we all; for it is through him alone that we have salvation.

Second, Martha called Jesus "the Son of God." By this she acknowledged his divinity. If you were to ask me how much about Christ's divinity Martha really understood at this time, I am not sure that I could give a firm answer; for she does not explain her own statement. Did she recognize that Jehovah, the God of Israel, was actually incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth? Did she know that he was the God-man, a totally unique person in whom all the attributes of God and all the attributes of man, except a sinful nature, were present and combined? I am not sure. I am certain that Martha wanted to confess his divinity in some sense, however. And I am certain that all these truths are implied in the general use of the term "Son of God" in John's Gospel.

It is important that Jesus be divine. For only if he is divine is he able to do that which he has been sent to do and that which we need. If Jesus is not God, then his words are to be trusted no more than any other man's. They might be right—in part—but we cannot build upon them. We cannot trust the question of our eternal destiny to his teaching. If Jesus is not God, then his death on the cross has no more meaning than the death of any other individual. It may have been courageous. It may be an example to others who are subjected to persecution and suffering. But it is not an atonement for sins, and those who trust in it are deluded. If Jesus is not God, then he did not rise from the dead; and those who preach the resurrection are of all men most miserable and are deceivers of others. If Jesus is not God, then he has not gone to prepare a place for his own, will not return again for them, and is not now present to guide and assist those who trust him. All this depends upon the affirmation that Jesus is fully divine. So this affirmation must be part of our testimony.

Finally, Martha confessed that Jesus is the one "who should come into the world." What did she mean by this? She meant that Jesus is the one who had been promised in the various Old Testament Scriptures and who had therefore come to fulfill them. Jesus is the one promised to the fallen and dejected Adam and Eve in the Garden, the one who should crush the head of Satan though Satan should wound his heel (Gen. 3:15). He is the seed of Abraham through whom all families of the earth should be blessed (Gen. 22:18). He is that prophet whose coming God foretold to Moses (Deut. 18:15,18). He is the suffering one of Isaiah's prophecy (Isaiah 53), the crucified but resurrected one of the Psalms (Pss. 16:10; 22:1-18). He is the one who shall rule forever upon the throne of his father David (2 Sam. 7:16).

Do you believe that Jesus is all these things, as Martha believed that he was? If you do, a great consequence will flow from it; namely, that you will stop looking elsewhere for the answers to life, history, and salvation. Some people claim to be Christians, but they act like pagans where their lives are concerned. They say they believe in Jesus, but they do not expect him to help them. Instead, they trust science, politics, education, ecology, or whatever else seems to have caught the fancy of their contemporaries.

Understand that I am not opposed to such endeavors. We must have them. But they are not themselves the answer to society's problems. Shortly after his solution to the immediately pressing problems in the Middle East in the spring of 1974, someone said to Dr. Henry Kissinger, the secretary of state of the United States, "Dr. Kissinger, thank you for saving the world."

Kissinger replied, "You're welcome."

But Kissinger did not save the world, though he may have helped a bit. This is proved by the fact that the guns were soon sounding once again in new conflicts. Clearly, men can work toward solutions; but they can never provide final solutions. Only Jesus can do that. He has already provided the final solution to the problem of sin. He is the only answer to present peace and victory for the individual in this life. In time he will return to solve all problems as he reigns on earth in righteousness for one thousand years. Do you seek solutions? Then this is where you should look—to Jesus, who is "the Christ, the Son of God," the One "who was to come into the world."

An Anchored Faith

Let me ask these final questions. Is your faith like Martha's? Is it based on a knowledge of God's Word, and is it centered in the person of Christ? Or is it without substance, without content, and therefore essentially no more than a state of your mind?

In India there is a tradition that some magicians are able to take a coil of rope, throw it up into the air in the midst of an open field, have a boy start climbing up it, and then have the boy disappear into the sky after which the rope falls back to the ground. It has been shown by many people that this does not actually happen. No one has ever seen it done. But it has become a persistent and fascinating tradition, much like our stories of Paul Bunyan or similar figures. This makes a good illustration of the nature of some people's faith. Their faith is like a rope coiled beside them. They are proud of it. If we ask what they intend to do with it, they reply that they are getting it ready and that when the time comes for them to die they intend to uncoil it, throw it toward heaven, and then climb it into salvation. If we reply that this is impossible, that faith must be attached to something, they object that we are unreasonable and that their faith could never be so limited.

True faith is different. This faith comes down from heaven, for we are told that even faith is not of ourselves, it is the gift of God (Eph. 2:8). In this situation faith comes close to the earth, but does not touch it. So we need only to lay our hand upon it and climb. It is not of man, for it is let down from heaven. It is not groundless, for it is fixed in God and in the truth revealed in his Scriptures. This should be the nature of your faith, as it was of the faith of Martha.

Chapter
142. Mary

John 11:28-32

We are going to look at an invitation of Jesus Christ that is not recorded in the Bible. It was spoken—we can read it between the lines—but not recorded. It is an invitation of Christ to Mary; and I want to study it for what we can learn from the bearer of the invitation, from Mary's response to the invitation, and from the way in which the invitation comes to us.

In this chapter Jesus had come to the area of Bethany, near Jerusalem, because Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, had been sick and subsequently died. By the time Jesus got to the area a great crowd of mourners had collected. So Jesus did not go into the city. He stayed on the outskirts. Word came to Martha that Jesus was there, so she went out to meet him. Jesus then had that conversation with Martha that is recorded in the central part of this chapter in which he reveals himself to be the resurrection and the life. At this point—although it is not recorded— Jesus must then have said to Martha, "Go, call Mary. Ask her to come to me." We know he must have said this because, as we are told in verse 28, Martha "went back and called her sister Mary aside. 'The Teacher is here and is asking for you.'"

I want to apply the invitation by pointing out that the Master has come and calls for you. Do you hear his voice? Will you respond to him?

High in the Alps, at the historic Saint Bernard Pass, there is a hostel that is run by monks. They keep the great Saint Bernard dogs there. In the last century, in the winter, when the snow would be coming down and the air would be so filled with flakes that a person could not see the trail, the monks used to ring a great bell so that the traveler who was making his way up the trail through the snow could almost be led to the hostel by the sound. That is what I want to do. I want to sound the bell. Life is sometimes so filled with the mist of afflictions or sorrows (or whatever it may be) that we cannot see the way clearly. But here is a bell that all can hear and follow. Come to me! Come to me! It is the invitation of the Lord to anyone who will hear, leave present occupations, and come to him. To those who will hear there is the promise that if they will come Jesus will not cast them out.

The Messenger

First, we need to look at the bearer of the invitation, Martha. Martha is still in the story, as we can readily see; and she is still a prominent figure. Mary was quiet. But Martha seems always to have been prominent. She had met with the Lord Jesus Christ and had been given this task—to go and call Mary. And so she does.

There was a time—we read about it in Luke 10:40—when Martha tried to keep Mary from Jesus. It was the occasion of the supper in her home. Mary was sitting at Jesus' feet, learning from him. Martha was doing chores and was troubled. She asked Jesus to rebuke Mary. In other words, she tried to get Jesus to make Mary get up from his feet and go into the kitchen to help her. But that was before! Here Martha goes to call Mary to be with Jesus. What has happened? What is the difference? The difference clearly is that Martha herself has met with Jesus and has been stirred by his teaching.

Are you a Christian? "Yes," you say, "I am." Well, then, do you go to call others to Jesus Christ? Do you bear to them that invitation that first came to you? If you find yourself admitting, "No, I am afraid I do not," is it not that you have not spent sufficient time with Jesus and have not been stirred by him? You will never be a great soul winner unless you do spend time with Jesus. Unless you do that, all you will be talking about is a theory or doctrine. If you spend time with Jesus, you are talking about a person whose invitation you can bear to other people.

There is a second noteworthy thing about Martha's action. She called Mary secretly; that is, personally (v. 28). The story tells us that, and the action suggests it. For instance, when Mary arose quickly and went to Jesus, the Jews did not understand where she was going (v. 31). Clearly, this is because Martha had whispered the invitation to Mary. When Martha came into the house, the friends must have been clustered around Mary. So if Martha had shouted in a loud voice, "The Master has come and is calling for you," they would have heard and would have understood. Instead, Martha must have whispered the message: "Mary, the Master is here, and he is calling for you." There is an important principle involved here. It is the principle of "one-toone" evangelism. I am not saying here that there is not a place for mass evangelism. Certainly there is, though even in mass evangelism the strength lies in the fact that God the Holy Spirit takes the Word to the individual heart. But I am saying that the best evangelism, the most effective evangelism, is when you, the individual Christian, take the Word of the Lord Jesus Christ to one who does not yet believe him.

If you do that, the actual words of Christ will help you. Years ago, when my wife and I were engaged in a Bible study ministry, we had a young woman attend who at that time had difficult marital problems. She and her husband had fights. As we understood it, they did not just argue; they actually hit one another. Sometimes she was bruised as a result. Christians had been trying to get her to our Bible study for a long time, and for one reason or another she had been unable to come. But on this particular occasion she came. We were studying Matthew. We had begun with chapter 1 and had by this time gotten to the Sermon on the Mount. We started to read, and the first Scripture that was read was Matthew 5:39. "Do not resist an evil person. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." There was a long pause, the longest pause I have ever experienced in a Bible study. Finally the girl herself spoke up. She said, "I think I understand what this means. It means that if someone hits you and you hit him back, then he will hit you again. But if he hits you and you don't hit back, then the fight will end." We all mumbled something to the effect that this is true. Then she said something very profound. She said, "But it is not so easy to do, is it?" Indeed, it is not! So we had an opportunity to speak to her of the power of the Lord Jesus Christ to make such things possible and to heal relationships.

Let me give you another story of how God speaks to the individual. It is the story of a man who lived next door to a church in St. Paul, Minnesota, which was then pastored by one of my assistants. This man did not believe the gospel, and he did not want to go to church. In fact, he refused all invitations. However, one week the church had a series of special meetings featuring exceptional music. The neighbor heard the music and was so taken with it that he decided to go in and hear it. He said to himself, "I'll go, but I'll go just for the music. When it is over, I'll leave." So he went in and sat down in the back of the church. When the musical portion of the evening was over and the preacher was standing up to preach, the man tried to slip out, but he could not. The church was too full. He said, "I'll do the next best thing; I'll put my fingers in my ears so I can't hear him." So there he was with his fingers in his ears while the preacher was bringing his message. That sort of thing does not really bother God very much. He controls all things. In this case he sent a little fly to buzz around the man's nose. The man ignored the fly as long as he could. But finally that little fly buzzing around his nose got to be too much for him. He took his finger out of one ear and smacked at the fly. But as he did that the preacher said, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear what God says."

There is a third feature about Martha's activity. First, she called Mary. Second, she called her personally. Notice, third, that she did it on orders from the Lord Jesus Christ. Does that apply to us? Certainly it does! For we are under orders to take the gospel into all the world to every creature. This is our Great Commission, and it comes to every believer. It is not a commission to ministers alone. It is not a commission for missionaries exclusively. It is a command for all who know Jesus Christ as Savior. Furthermore, it is repeated many times. I sometimes make the point that anything that is repeated in Scripture is obviously of great importance. If God says something once, we ought to sit up and pay attention. But if he repeats it again and again, the truth should literally seize us and command our thinking. The Great Commission occurs at the end of every one of the four Gospels and at the beginning of the Book of Acts. So we should take notice. Our task is to take the gospel to every creature and teach each one concerning Christ. This is what the Duke of Wellington called "marching orders for the Church."

Ears to Hear

Next, I want us to look at Mary's response to Martha's invitation, because Mary's response is a pattern for us also. If Martha's work in bearing the invitation is a pattern for Christians in communicating the gospel to non-Christians—which it is—then Mary's response is a pattern for what non-Christians should do when they hear the word of Christ.

What did Mary do? We are told, first of all, that Mary ran to Jesus. That is, she went to him quickly. In order to do that she had to leave the others who were with her. Other people are often a great hindrance to belief. Here was Mary, mourning in her home. Her friends and acquaintances had come, as was the custom in biblical times and still is to a large extent today. They had sympathized. They had surrounded her with comfort. They had brought in food. Mary could have said to herself, "Jesus has called me, but I have these friends to think of. What will they think of me if I leave them and rush off to Jesus?" Many people think that way today. They hear the gospel. They hear that they are sinners. They hear that they need a Savior. They hear that Jesus Christ is that Savior, and they even believe it. But they say to themselves, "What will my friends think of me if I become a Christian? My friends will say, 'What a fanatic he has become!' I don't want to offend them." So they postpone the day of decision, and the opportunity passes by. Do not do that. Do not let the opinion of others hinder you from coming to Jesus.

Moreover, do not even let them delay you. Not long ago, when I was speaking at a Bible conference, I was asked why I was not giving invitations. Actually I was. But the questioner was asking why I had not invited people forward or asked them to speak to me afterward. On this occasion I had a good way to answer the question. For just that morning, after I had concluded by asking any who were not Christians to turn from sin, believe in Christ and follow him, another man stood up and asked people to come forward afterward. He thought he was giving an invitation. He said, "If you want to believe on Jesus, come and talk to us." But actually he was delaying the decision, for he was suggesting that the listener postpone his decision until after he had talked to a minister. I told this and then asked my questioner what he thought the best approach was. He acknowledged that the first was better. Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation.

Someone once asked a little girl whether she obeyed her mother. She turned to her mother and asked, "Mother, do I always obey you?"

"You know the answer to that better than I do," the mother replied.

"Well, I never disobey you," the child said. "I always do what you tell me, but sometimes I go slow." Many people are like that with the Lord Jesus Christ. But not Mary! Mary ran to Christ immediately!

Second, Mary fell down at Christ's feet and worshiped him. This too should be true of us. When the Lord Jesus says, "Come unto me," and we do, our next act should be to fall at his feet to worship him.

Every time we see Mary in the Gospels she is at the feet of Jesus. In Luke, in the story I referred to earlier, she is at his feet learning from him. Here she is at his feet worshiping. On the third occasion she is at his feet serving, having broken over him the alabaster box full of ointment. That should be true of us. We sit at Christ's feet first to learn from him. Next, we fall at his feet to worship him. And then we serve him. Have you done that? Perhaps you have learned of Christ but you have not worshiped him. If not, you should acknowledge him as God Almighty, your Savior and your Lord, and then serve him, because we are called to do that also.

Finally, after Mary had run to Christ and had worshiped him, she expressed her faith verbally. This is what we find in verse 32: "When Mary reached the place where Jesus was and saw him, she fell at his feet and said, 'Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died.' Anyone who reads this closely will notice that Mary said the same thing as Martha—"If you had been here, my brother would not have died." But most persons who read closely will also recognize a difference in the cry. Martha had debated with Jesus. Mary fell at his feet, and her comment was made in the context of total trust and confidence. Mary's words meant, "Lord, you are everything; you can do everything. I trust you totally." Can you say that? Is that your confession?

He Calls for You

Let me sound the bell of the monks once again, as clearly as I am able. Martha called Mary by telling her, "Mary, the Teacher is here and is asking for you." Now the Teacher calls for you! Do you hear him?

Notice that he calls for you, not someone else but for you! You are the one who is to respond. Do you say to yourself, "I am far too unimportant for the Lord Jesus to call me. I am no one"? Mary was the no one of the story. She was the quiet one. The only thing she says in this entire chapter are the words we have here—"Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died." Mary was the quiet, overlooked one. Yet Jesus called Mary.

Perhaps you say to yourself, "I am too important; I am too prominent. Jesus could not expect me to come to him." If you are saying that, I want you to hear this story told by Bishop John Taylor Smith, a former chaplain general of the British army. On one occasion, when he was preaching in a large cathedral on the text "You must be born again," Bishop Smith said by way of illustration, "My dear people, do not substitute anything for the new birth. You may be a member of a church, even the great church of which I am a member, the historic Church of England, but church membership is not new birth, and our text says that you must be born again." The rector was sitting at his left. He continued, "You may be a clergyman like my friend the rector here and not be born again, and you must be born again." On his right sat the archdeacon. Pointing at him he continued, "You might even be an archdeacon like my friend in this stall and still not be born again, and you must be born again. You might even be a bishop like myself and not be born again, and you must be born again."

The bishop finished his message and went on his way. But a day or two later he received a letter from the archdeacon that read in part, "My dear Bishop: You have found me out. I have been a clergyman for over thirty years, but I have never known anything of the joy that Christians speak of. I never could understand it. But when you pointed to me and said that a person could be an archdeacon and not be born again, I understood what the trouble was. Would you please come and talk to me?" Naturally Bishop Smith did talk to him, and the archdeacon, important as he was, responded to Christ's call.

There are none too low or too high for whom the gospel does not apply. Nor are there any who do not need to hear Christ's call.

Chapter 143.
Jesus Wept

John 11:33-37

In reading the Bible I have often been displeased by the work of those men who divided the text into verses. Done for liturgical reasons originally, often it is harmless. But sometimes the divisions have made the text difficult to understand or have destroyed its meaning. The beginning of Ephesians 2 is an example of this; for the words "and you" (v. 1) rightly continue a thought found four verses earlier in chapter 1 and belong to it. In the division we have, the connection is lost. Similarly 1 John 2:1-2 really belongs with 1 John 1:5-10. There are other examples. There is a handling of one verse of the Bible by these men for which I have nothing but praise, however. The verse is John 11:35, our text for this and the next three studies: "Jesus wept." The text is only two words, which makes it the shortest verse in the English Bible. Yet it is of such importance that it rightly deserves to stand alone. Underline it! Mark it with red ink! Add an exclamation point! Print it in capital letters! "JESUS WEPT!" Spurgeon, who preached two sermons on this passage in the course of his ministry, wrote, "There is infinitely more in these two words than any sermonizer, or student of the Word, will ever be able to bring out of them, even though he should apply the microscope of the utmost attentive consideration."

I agree with Spurgeon. We shall never exhaust these words. But let us try. If we do, we may well find John 11:35 to be a window through which we shall see into glory beyond. It is a small window; but if we place our eye close to it, we will see much. Let us look at these words for what they teach about the Lord Jesus Christ, about God the Father, about ourselves, and finally about the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for us, which is to be our example.

The first of these, what the words teach about the Lord Jesus Christ, shall concern us in this study.

Truly a Man

What do these words teach about Jesus? The first answer is that they teach us that Jesus was truly a man. Indeed, it is primarily as a man that he wept on this occasion.

There are other facts that reveal the full humanity of our Lord, of course. Many of them are physical. We read that Jesus was born of a woman, that he was wrapped in swaddling clothes. We are to suppose that he was nursed like other babies. We read in Luke that he increased in knowledge. The full text says, "And Jesus grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Luke 2:52). We read that Christ hungered. This was true many times, obviously, but especially on that occasion when he fasted for forty days in the wilderness and was tempted by Satan to turn stones into bread. After the resurrection Jesus ate broiled fish and a piece of honeycomb to demonstrate that even then he had a real body. Jesus knew thirst. On one occasion, being wearied with his journey, he sat on Jacob's well and asked the woman of Samaria for a drink. On the cross he cried, "I thirst," and they gave him vinegar. Jesus grew tired. One time he was so tired that he fell asleep in a wildly rocking boat, and even the wind and waves failed to rouse him.

The Lord's humanity is seen also in his emotions. At times he was angry, though he differed from us in most of our anger in that he grew angry without sinning in the process. In such times he denounced the hypocrisy of the religious leaders of his day, calling them "blind leaders of the blind," "whited sepulchres," "a generation of vipers," and "children of the devil." Jesus also showed pity, as in his compassion for the multitudes whom he termed "sheep without a shepherd." At times their hunger moved him, for he fed them in Galilee on at least two occasions.

These facts from the life of Christ all speak of his humanity. Yet we compare them with the verse before us and confess that they do not speak to us as this text does. Jesus wept! From this we know that his body had glands, as ours do—tear glands. And we know that he felt as we feel. What a Savior! He is a Savior who became as we are so that we might become like him. Can you not identify with such a One? Can you not love him? Hold fast to Christ's divinity by all means. A Savior who is not divine is no Savior at all. But while you hold to his divinity do not give up the fact that he is also truly human; for it is as a man, as well as God, that he presents himself to perishing men and women.

Acquainted with Grief

Second, the fact that Jesus wept teaches us that Jesus experienced grief, as we do. In this we find him fulfilling Isaiah's prophecy, for Isaiah said that he would be "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief (Isa. 53:3). It may be that Jesus could have come to this earth and died for our sin without having entered into the grief that we experience, but he did not avoid sorrow. We conclude, therefore, that, whatever our grief may be, Jesus knows of it and has entered into it.

We have a problem at this point, however, for the word that is translated "deeply moved" in most of our Bibles is one that is difficult to understand. It is the word enebrimēsato. Part of the problem is that the word occurs only three other times in the New Testament and that even then it has a meaning that does not seem to fit this situation. We find the word in Matthew 9:30 and in Mark 1:43 and 14:5. In the first two instances it is translated "strictly charged," in the sense that Jesus strictly commanded a person whom he had healed to tell no one. In the third instance it is used of those who witnessed the anointing of Jesus with costly ointment by a certain woman and who were said to have "murmured" about it. Neither of these translations—"strictly charged" or "murmured"—seems to fit the context of John 11.

In each of these uses there does seem to be what William Barclay calls "a certain sternness, almost anger" to Jesus' expressions. And since this is true, some commentators have placed the idea of indignation or even anger in John's passage. They would translate the verse, "Jesus was moved to anger in his spirit." If we ask why Jesus should be angry, they answer either that he was angry with the supposed unbelief or hypocrisy of those who were weeping over Lazarus (so Morris, Plummer, Loisy, Hoskyns) or else with death, which he would have viewed as a tool of Satan and a great enemy (so Chrysostom, Zahn). It may have been that some of the weeping of the crowd was less than sincere, but this is not said or implied in the passage. Besides, whatever may have been the case with the crowd, it was certainly not the case that Mary and Martha were faking. So we reject the idea of anger, at least at the hypocrisy of the crowd. Anger may have produced shouts of an outraged sensibility, but it certainly did not produce tears on this occasion.

The other possibility is to translate the word in a way that suggests deep emotion. This is made possible by the fact that one other known use of the word enebrimēsato in the Greek language is to describe the snorting of a horse, as in the excitement of battle or under a heavy load. Thus—and this is far better than the former interpretation—Jesus may be said to have groaned with the sisters in deep emotion, emotion out of which an involuntary cry was wrung from his heart. This is the view captured by Phillips, who renders the phrase, "He was deeply moved and visibly distressed," or by the translators of the New International Version, who say, "He was deeply moved and troubled."

Some Christians have found this unacceptable, for they imagine that it is just not proper for Jesus to have been moved to such a degree, particularly by the grief of others. They say that he had to have been moved by something no less great or terrible than sin. But this does not satisfy me. I am willing to grant that Jesus grieved over sin, even more so than he grieved over death, which is the consequence of sin. I also grant that he was saddened by unbelief, as he was on that other occasion when he looked out over unbelieving Jerusalem (Luke 19:41). But how can these be separated from the grief of the sisters? And how can we read the passage without seeing that Jesus wept with them? At the least these items must be taken together—grief, sin, unbelief, death, sorrow. For, as Lightfoot says, "The expression used ... implies that he now voluntarily and deliberately accepts and makes his own the emotion and the experience from which it is his purpose to deliver men." Morgan writes, "He ... gathered up into his own personality all the misery resulting from sin, represented in a dead man and broken hearted people round him."

What does all this mean? It means that Jesus was acquainted with grief, as we are, that he understands it and is therefore able to comfort those who sorrow. The author of Hebrews knew this, for he commends the suffering of Christ to Christians as a point of identification. "For surely it is not angels he helps, but Abraham's descendants. For this reason he had to be made like his brothers in every way, in order that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in service to God, and that he might make atonement for the sins of the people. Because he himself suffered when he was tempted, he is able to help those who are being tempted" (Heb. 2:16-18).

It is not an impassible, insensitive, unmovable Christ that is commended to you and me in Christianity. It is One who has entered into our grief and who understands our sorrows. Are you suffering? He knows it. Are you in tears? He has been there before you. Are you distressed? So was he. But he went on to overcome these things so that we might overcome them. Meanwhile, he is One who understands you and to whom you may come.

Not Ashamed

This verse teaches us a third truth about Jesus. It teaches us that he was not ashamed to be human. Here we note that he could have repressed his tears rather than giving vent to them. He can do all things; he could have done this as well. Moreover, he could have given himself good reasons for doing it. He could have said, "If I show tears, my tears will be misunderstood; they will be taken as a sign of weakness." Indeed, this is exactly how some reacted; for it is what they meant when they said, "Could not he who opened the eyes of the blind have kept this man from dying?" (v. 37). They interpreted his tears as a confession that he could do nothing. Or again, Jesus could have argued that it was foolish to cry when he was about to raise Lazarus. "Why weep now?" he might have pondered. "In a few minutes everyone will be rejoicing." I suppose, finally, that he might even have viewed his tears as inappropriate in that the whole episode was going to redound to God's glory (v. 4). But he did not use this excuse either. True, the miracle would result in the giving of glory to God, but that was still minutes away. Now the sisters and their friends were weeping; and if they were weeping, he would weep with them. Jesus knew how the story would end, but in the meantime he was not ashamed to be one with his brothers.

Identified with Others

This leads us to our fourth point. For not only does the weeping of Jesus teach us that he was truly man, that he was acquainted with grief, that he was not ashamed of his humanity; it also teaches that he was pleased to thus identify with his brothers. He could have remained aloof (as we often do), but he did not. Instead, he identified with us in all things, thereby becoming our example.

Why is it that we who are Christians so often fail to do this? Why are we so strong in our crusades against sin but so weak in our identifications with the sinner? Are you one who has launched a crusade? Are you disturbed, for instance, by the declining moral tone of our nation? If you are, I am glad. I wish you well. We need fighters and prophets. But as you declaim against corruption do not fail to weep for those who are caught up in it. Does the current widespread visibility of homosexuality disturb you? Are you against it? Good! But as you strike out against homosexuality do not forget to weep for the homosexual. Are you troubled by the traffic in habit-forming drugs? Splendid! Fight it with every weapon at your disposal. But as you strike out at drugs do not forget to weep for the victims and even for those who victimize.

Os Guinness gives us a biblical example of this principle toward the end of his impressive book The Dust of Death. It is the example of Moses. Moses, you will recall, suspected that he was to be the liberator of the Jewish people. But the first time he attempted to liberate them it was from a position of privilege and superiority, and he was a failure. He was a member of the household of Pharaoh. He killed an Egyptian who had been beating an Israelite. But when he came back the next day he was rejected by the very people whom he was trying to serve. "Who made you ruler and judge over us?" was their question (Exod. 2:14). Years later, however, after he had chosen "to be mistreated along with the people of God" (Heb. 11:25), Moses was able to identify with them, to share their hunger, danger, and problems. And they followed him. In the same way, Guinness concludes, "It is when Christians have at least partially entered into the profundity of identification that the Christian community has been at its most human and most sensitive and that its message has been most credible and compelling."

Jesus Loves

Finally, the fact that Jesus wept at the grave of Lazarus also teaches us that he loves. This is what the people of Christ's day saw in his tears; for they observed him and said, "Behold, how he loved him!" (v. 36). Did Jesus love Lazarus before that? Of course he did! He also loved Mary and Martha and the others. But it was his tears that actually got through to at least some of them and convinced them of his love. They knew that he loved when they saw him weep with the sisters over Lazarus.

Is there not in the story of Christ's tears that which will touch your heart and teach you to love him if you have never done so? Perhaps you are one who has heard the gospel? You have heard it presented doctrinally and experientially and in every way the preachers and teachers of the Word know how to present it. But it has remained a theory for you. It has never become that which could touch your heart. Is there not something in the picture of the weeping Christ to reach you? He is God; yet he became man, entering into all the grief and suffering that you know, including tears; and then he died intentionally and willingly for your salvation. If this cannot reach you, what can?

Finally, you may be a Christian. If this is so, then let me ask if there is not in this picture of the weeping Christ that which will convict you of your own cold indifference toward the lost and compel you to bear the gospel to them. Our hearts are cold. We must admit that. But there is in Christ that eternal flame of true love that will enkindle them if we but expose ourselves to it.

We sometimes sing in our Sunday services "Oh, how I love Jesus," and we mean it, up to a point. But do we love him enough to show love to other people? Do you love him enough to leave the affluence of our country to cross the seas to a land where men are starving and in which even on your missionary allowance you will have to live without much that you are now accustomed to in order to present the gospel? Do you love him enough to be a missionary? Do you love Jesus enough to leave your suburban home—I will not say for good, but "once a week"—to cross your town to love and serve those whose state of life is not actually much different from those you might find in many foreign cultures? Do you love him enough to help an inner-city mission? Do you love Jesus enough just to cross the street to your neighbor in order to love him and win him to the Savior?

Humanity! Sorrow! Pride! Identification! Love! All are in these verses, and more besides.

Chapter 144.

Our Tears in God's Bottle

John 11:33-37

There is a strange law of biblical exposition that says that the longer the text to be taught, the shorter the amount of time necessary to deal with it. Or, conversely, the shorter the text, the more time necessary. I find that if I have only ten minutes to speak, I can, if necessary, deal with an entire book. I have done that on occasion. If I have only ten seconds, I can cover the Bible. In fact, I can do it now in just ten words. The message of the Bible is: "Man's complete ruin in sin/God's perfect remedy in Christ." Thus it is that a long text takes a short time. On the other hand, a verse as short as John 11:35—"Jesus wept"—takes weeks.

We have already had one study of this text, in which we looked at the words for what they have to teach us about Jesus Christ. But they can also teach us about God the Father, about ourselves, and about the love of Christ, which is to be the pattern of our love both for God and for one another. It is the first of these remaining subjects—the teaching about God the Father—that we want to turn to now. We can see how this follows from the fact that the text teaches us about Jesus; for if Jesus is God (as he is) and if Jesus wept, then there must be a sense in which we can say that God the Father weeps too. We must be careful how we say this, of course. I will introduce some qualifications later. Nevertheless, even with these qualifications, we must say that if Jesus weeps, then we are to learn that the God of the universe weeps in the sense that he cares about us, identifies with us, and shows us mercy.

A Compassionate God

We should notice before going further that this was a novel and even shocking idea in Christ's day, particularly among the Greeks to whom John was writing. Today, conditioned as we are by a culture that has taken on some Christian ideas and values, we find the idea of a compassionate God natural. Why wouldn't he be like this? we reason. But in John's day, among the Greeks, God was thought to be above all such emotions.

Barclay presents the situation well in his commentary, showing that to most pagan thinkers the primary characteristic of God was what they called apatheia. This is the word from which we get our English word "apathy," but it does not mean precisely what we mean when we see the word in English. "Apathy" means "a lack of feeling" or "indifference." Apatheia means a total inability to feel any emotion whatever. By it the Greeks meant that God could not feel anger, love, pain, disappointment, hope, or any of the other emotions that so totally make up our existence. How did the Greeks come to attribute apatheia to God? They reasoned like this. If a person can feel sorrow or joy, gladness or grief, it means that someone else can have an effect upon him; for it is someone else who causes these emotions. If another can have an effect upon him, it follows that he must also have power over him, at least for the moment. But no one can have power over God. That is impossible, and if this is so, then it must mean that God cannot have feelings. He must be lonely, isolated, compassionless. He can be approached through reason perhaps, but not on the basis of his love or pity.

The Jews should have had the right picture, for the Old Testament reveals God as a God of love and compassion. But even the Jews had lost this element as a result of the formal and legalistic religion that had been developing in Israel in the centuries before Christ's birth. Jehovah had become cold and distant, just as he had always been to the Greeks. But Jesus wept and thus revealed a God who enters into the anguish of his people and grieves with them in their afflictions.

A Suffering God

I wrote a few moments ago that I would need to introduce some qualifications in this whole matter of speaking of the sufferings of God, and I must do that now. For we must not think that we are saying precisely the same thing when we say we suffer and when we say that God suffers.

For one thing, when we suffer, weep, or grieve we never do so entirely in innocence. Our sorrows are linked to sin, and we are never entirely sinless in any situation. This is not true of God. If he sorrows with us, it is because of our sin and its consequences and never because of some sin or shortcoming in himself. Second, when we say that God suffers with us, we do not mean that there is therefore a change in God, as though he were not suffering before but now suddenly grieves because of what we have done. In their aversion to this idea the Greeks were right. God is the eternal one. He is the same yesterday, today, and forever. In God there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning (James 1:17). So while saying that God enters into our suffering we do not mean that God has ever been surprised or has altered his feelings or plans because of anything we have done. Third, we must notice that, while we are told that Jesus wept on three separate occasions (at the grave of Lazarus, over Jerusalem, and in the Garden of Gethsemane), strictly speaking we are never told that God the Father weeps, either in the Old Testament or in the New Testament.

So we must be careful as to what we infer from John 11:35. We may say that God weeps, perhaps. But as we do we must remember that this is not true for him precisely as it is for men and women.

The Tears of His People

What, then, may we say about the tears of God? The answer is that we may say anything that is both suggested by the tears of Jesus and substantiated by other verses. Let me give a few thoughts on this.

First, we may say that God notices our tears. Nothing is more apparent than this in the story of Christ's weeping at the tomb of Lazarus, for the text tells us that Jesus wept when he saw the others weeping—"When Jesus saw her weeping, and the Jews who had come with her also weeping, he was deeply moved in spirit and troubled" (v. 33). Jesus wept because he noticed their weeping. In the same way, many texts tell us that God the Father sees our tears. They tell us that he is not oblivious. They tell us that he takes notice of them.

One example of this is found in the story of God's dealings with aged King Hezekiah. Hezekiah was sick and about to die, and Isaiah was sent to tell him to put his house in order. Instead of doing this, Hezekiah began to weep. He cried to God, saying, "Remember, O LORD, how I have walked before you faithfully and with wholehearted devotion and have done what is good in your eyes" (2 Kings 20:3). The Bible says that he wept very much. What did God do?

Surprisingly we read that God spoke to Isaiah at once and told him to return to Hezekiah with a new message. "Go back and tell Hezekiah, the leader of my people, 'This is what the LORD, the God of your father David says: I have heard your prayer and seen your tears; I will heal you. ...I will add fifteen years to your life'" (vv. 5-6). As we read the story we may feel that the king's tears were unwise, for the fifteen years he lived after this were not good years. Nevertheless, the point of the story is that God heard him, as he also hears us. In the same way, Job declared: "He hears the cry of the needy" (Job 34:28). Likewise, David testified: "The LORD has heard my weeping" (Ps. 6:8).

These last verses also introduce us to a further thought, for they really mean, not only that God knows of our tears but also that he is touched by them. Jesus was touched by the tears of Mary and the others; it is because of this that he wept with them. In the same way, the Father is touched. It is this that we mean above all when we say that God weeps with his people.

Here again a number of Old Testament texts are helpful. Job said, in the verse that we have already quoted: "He hears the cry of the needy" (Job 34:28). David wrote: "He does not ignore the cry of the humble" (Ps. 9:12). He said again, "The eyes of the LORD are on the righteous and his ears are attentive to their cry" (Ps. 34:15). Here are three verbs—hears, does not ignore, are attentive—each of which suggests that God is genuinely touched by our sorrow. Should we fear, then, to pour forth tears before him? Should we ever fear that, if we come to God earnestly, we will find him unmoved?

This should be a great encouragement in our prayers. Of course, we will not want to pray foolishly, as Hezekiah did. But neither will we want to pray coldly, particularly when it is another's interest that concerns us. Did Jesus weep before his loving Father? Then so can we. And we will find our tears effective. Spurgeon wrote: "No prayer will ever prevail with God more surely than a liquid petition, which, being distilled from the heart, trickles from the eye, and waters the cheek. Then is God won when he hears the voice of your weeping."

Notice one thing more about our tears and the concern that both the Father and Son have for them. We have seen that God notices our tears and is touched by them. Notice also that God remembers our tears and that they are therefore precious to him.

In the Psalms there is a wonderful verse that expresses this truth in a metaphor; it has given us the title of this study. David is writing, telling on this occasion of the many griefs he has had as the result of the deeds of his enemies. They fight against him. They slander him, distorting his words. They hide themselves in order to fall upon him by surprise and destroy him. But, he cries out to God, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle. Are they not in thy book?" (Ps. 56:8 KJV). What is the bottle about which David speaks? We know that the Romans frequently had little glass bottles called tear bottles, in which they collected their tears. But that is not what David is thinking here. The only bottles he knew were large leather bottles, the kind that Jesus later termed wineskins. He is saying that God possesses such a bottle into which he puts David's tears. It is not that David presents his tears to God, as though to prove something. Rather, it is God who collects David's tears, and he does so in a bottle so large that he will lose none of them. In other words, God notices the tears of his people, is touched by them, and places them up in remembrance before him. If you are God's child, know that he treasures your tears and that he remembers them after you have long forgotten.

Tears Wiped Away

Finally, I want you to see that God acts to remove our tears. That is my fourth point. God notices our tears, is touched by our tears, remembers our tears; yes, but God also acts to remove our tears forever.

Here again, the example of Jesus is instructive. Suppose for a minute that the eleventh chapter of John had ended with the verse we are studying—"Jesus wept." Or suppose we should read, "Jesus wept and returned to the area of the Jordan." That would not be much of a story. There would be no comfort in it. If that were the case, I doubt if John would have included the story in his Gospel. But this is not what happened. Instead we read that Jesus first wept, but then acted to raise Lazarus and restore him to his sisters. He wept, but he moved to remove the tears and bring joy to the sisters.

It is the same with the Father. He notices our tears, but he also acts to remove them. Thus, we read in the Old Testament, "For you have delivered ... my eyes from tears" (Ps. 116:8). Or again, "Those who sow in tears will reap with songs of joy" (Ps. 126:5). Or, as in this verse from Isaiah, "He will swallow up death forever. The sovereign LORD will wipe away the tears from all faces" (Isa. 25:8).

We should note that this last verse is picked up twice in the Book of Revelation, once in chapter 7 and once in chapter 21, to speak of the final blessedness of God's saints. There we read, '"These are they who have come out of the great tribulation; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore, "they are before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple; and he who sits on the throne will spread his tent over them. Never again will they hunger; never again will they thirst. The sun will not beat upon them, nor any scorching heat. For the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd; he will lead them to springs of living water. And God will wipe away every tear from their eyes"'. ...I saw the Holy City, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband. And I heard a loud voice from the throne saying, 'Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God. He will wipe away every tear from their eyes'" (Rev. 7:14-17; 21:2-4).

Do Something

So where do these truths end? They end with these conclusions. First, do not look at sorrow and death as an unbeliever might do, but see them rather through eyes that have been accustomed to dwell on such promises. This does not mean that we will not sorrow. Sorrow is still sorrow; death is still an enemy. But it does mean that we must sorrow differently, our sorrow being mixed with faith and expectation. Thus, as Paul acknowledged, we will sorrow, but not as those "who have no hope" (1 Thess. 4:13).

Second, do not be afraid to feel with those who feel sorrow. What was proper for our Lord and his Father is not improper for us who are his servants. If Jesus wept for others, we may weep. Indeed, it is as we weep that we most identify with others and exhibit our right to speak the comforting word of the gospel to them.

I think of two great examples of this point, one from the Old Testament and one from the New. The Old Testament example is Moses, whom I have mentioned in another context earlier. Moses had learned to weep with his people, so much so that he was actually willing to be sent to hell if it could mean that they would experience salvation. The story is a simple one. Moses had gone up onto Mount Sinai to receive the law. But as he was receiving it the people who remained below in the valley were breaking it. God asked Moses to step aside while he destroyed them. Moses was horrified and frightened, horrified at the sin of the people and frightened because he knew that God meant business. He went down the mountain. He dealt with the sin. Then on the next day he returned with an offer that must have welled up from a heart nearly broken with grief. In Hebrew it is even choppy, and one sentence is incomplete. We read: "So Moses went back to the LORD and said, 'Oh, what a great sin these people have committed! They have made themselves gods of gold. But now, please forgive their sin—but if not, then blot me out of the book you have written'" (Exod. 32:31-32). Here is a cry from the heart of a man who so identified with his people that he was willing to be sent to hell if only it could mean their salvation.

The other story is from the New Testament. It involves the apostle Paul. He, too, grieved for Israel, and wrote: "For I could wish that I myself were cursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, those of my own race, the people of Israel" (Rom. 9:3). Paul is saying the same thing Moses said. Only, unlike Moses, Paul knew that the thing for which he was asking was not possible. This is what it means to be godlike or godly. It is to those who are willing to be like this that God most entrusts the work of spreading the gospel.

Chapter 145.
God's "Valuable" People

John 11:35-37

It is possible to examine a subject from different points of view. For example, the American Revolution can be studied from the viewpoint of what was happening in England or America in the eighteenth century or from the viewpoint of economics, political theory, or other matters. If it is studied from the viewpoint of England, it can be expected to throw light on such questions as:
What was England's relationship to the colonies at this time? What was King George doing? What were the policies of the court? Why were the cries of the colonists unheeded? If it is studied from the American perspective, the examination might tell in part how the revolutionary ideas originated, what the settlers desired from England and from their regional governments, and so forth. Each of these approaches is valid, and the answers derived will be valid depending upon the amount and quality of work done in each area.

In a similar way, the text we have been studying may also be looked at from diverse points of view. In fact, we have already looked at it from two of these viewpoints. The verse is John 11:35—"Jesus wept." It may be looked at for what it teaches us about Jesus, about the Father, about ourselves, and finally about the love of Jesus for us, which is to be our pattern in loving others. It is the third of these, what the text teaches us about ourselves, that will now be our subject.

In an earlier study I compared this text, the shortest in the Bible, to a little window through which, if we get close enough to it, we may see much. At this point we may perhaps compare it to the hole in an old-fashioned pin-hole camera, in which the picture becomes sharp only when the hole is small.

What does John 11:35 teach us about ourselves? It teaches that we are precious in God's sight, that we have gotten ourselves into such a state that even God weeps over us, and that we need God. We need to look at each of these points carefully.

God's Treasures

First of all, the text teaches us that we are precious in the sight of God. In fact, this is one of the most obvious lessons of John 11:35, since it is only because we are precious to God that Christ weeps over us. Suppose for a moment that you are walking down a street in your town or city and that you step on a bug. Do you stop and cry over the bug? Not at all. The reason is obvious: the bug is not precious to you. In the same way, most of us do not weep over broken pottery, a torn shirt, a run in a stocking, a dented fender on the car, or thousands of other things. They may have value. Their loss may be an inconvenience to us. But they are not precious, and so we do not weep over them. On the other hand, we do weep over the loss of a friendship, the death of a friend, and similar heartbreaks or disappointments.

God considers us precious in just this sense. Moreover, in case we should miss the point through our slowness in understanding his actions, God actually tells us that we are valuable to him; not, to be sure, because of anything that is in us inherently, but because of what he has made us and will yet make of us.

Made in God's Image

Why are we precious to God? Here we get into an important area of biblical studies, for the answer takes us back to the earliest chapters of Genesis, where man is said to have been made "in God's image." This is actually stressed in Genesis so much that it can be said to be the most important characteristic of the man and the woman. It is what makes them different from the animals and from the plants. Genesis puts it like this, "Then God said, 'Let us make man in our image, in our likeness, and let them rule over the fish of the sea and the birds of the air, over the livestock, over all the earth, and over all the creatures that move along the ground.' So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them" (Gen. 1:26-27).

In speaking of the fact that man was created in God's image I have sometimes referred this to the three-part nature of man's being. We say that God is a Trinity: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. So when we say that man was created in God's image we mean that in an analogous way man is also a trinity. In man's case this means that he consists of a body, soul, and spirit.

We tend to think that the body is what differentiates man from God; we have a body, while he does not. But in view of the fact that God became incarnate in a human body in Christ, this is not as obvious as it might seem. Which came first in the mind of God, the body of Christ or Adam's body? Or to put it another way, did Christ become like us by means of the incarnation or did we become like him by means of God's creative act? I would say that we were made like Jesus. And if this is so, then our bodies are of great value and should be honored in the way we treat them. Indeed, we can say, as Paul does, that our bodies were made to be "temples" of God.

The soul is the part of man that we would call the personality. It centers in the mind and includes all likes and dislikes, special abilities or weaknesses, emotions, aspirations, and anything else that makes the individual different from all others of his species. Here again we are made in God's image. And here again what we do with our souls is important. Are they being trained to desire the best that God gives? Or do they wallow around in the worst things we know? Do they strive to think God's thoughts after him and so grow intellectually and spiritually and in every other way? Or are they captivated by sinful thoughts and values? In this area we are dealing with the fact that God has what we would call personality and that we have our personalities because of him. It is because we are created in God's image in respect to our souls that we are able to have fellowship, love, and communication with one another.

Finally, man also has a spirit. This is the part of his nature that communes with God and partakes in some measure of God's own essence. God is nowhere said to be body or soul, but he is defined as spirit. "God is spirit," said Jesus. Therefore, "his worshipers must worship in spirit and in truth" (John 4:24). Because man is also a spirit he can have fellowship with God and love him.

Here, then, is a remarkable thing. Man is made in God's image and is therefore valuable to him.
God loves him, as he does not and cannot love the animals or plants or inanimate matter. Moreover, he feels for him, identifies with him, grieves over him, and intervenes to make him into all that he himself has determined that a given man or a given woman should be. We get some idea of the special nature of this relationship when we remember that in a similar way the woman, Eve, was made in the image of man. Therefore, though different, Adam saw himself in her and loved her as his companion and corresponding member in the universe. It is not wrong to say, therefore, that men and women are to God somewhat as the woman is to the man. They are God's unique and valued companions in the universe. In support of this we need only to think of the teaching concerning Christ as the bridegroom and the church as his bride, which we find throughout the Old and New Testaments.

One more thing needs to be added before we move on. We have said that man has been made in God's image and that this gives him value. We need to add to this that it is true even after the fall. Even in the state that man is in now he preserves something of the image of God and so remains valuable to him.

We see this in several places in the Bible. For instance, in Genesis 9:6, the verse that records God's institution of capital punishment as a proper response to murder, we read, "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man." Or again, in James 3:9-10 in verses that forbid the use of the tongue in cursing other men, we find, "With the tongue we praise our Lord and Father, and with it we curse men, who have been made in God's likeness. ...My brothers, this should not be." Here the murder of another or cursing of another is forbidden precisely on the grounds that the other person (even after the fall) retains something of God's image and for this reason is to be valued by us as God also values him.

Evangelicals especially need to recognize this and proclaim it widely. It is not intentional, of course, but evangelicals often so stress man's sinful and depraved nature that they end in dismissing the value of man altogether. They look at men with horror-filled eyes and then cease to care for them. In seeing the sin, they lose sight of the sinner and cease to love him. Such things ought not to be. Indeed, if we allow them to be, it will be but a short time until we return again to the dark ages out of which only the Christian ethic, with its emphasis upon the unique value of man, has rescued us.

Some years ago in Philadelphia an expanded surgical team at the world-renowned Children's Hospital separated a pair of eighteen-month-old Siamese twins, Clara and Alta Rodrigues, who had come to the hospital from the Dominican Republic. We had a great deal of interest in this at Tenth Presbyterian Church, which I serve as pastor, because the head of the surgical team, Dr. C. Everett Koop, his first assistant, Dr. Louise Schnauffer, and the head of the anesthesiology team, Dr. Eugene Betts, were members of the church. This operation involved eighteen doctors and five nurses, just for the operation itself. And in addition to this there was a week of tests and at least a month or two of postoperative care. The family came from the poorest area of their country. Literally, they had no income at all. If they had need of something, they would take some of their homegrown vegetables down to the village and exchange them for what they needed. Yet here was an operation done on their children by the best pediatric surgeons in the world at a cost which observers placed at upward of $100,000, yet was cost free to them.

What produces such compassion, such effort? It is not the so-called "spirit" of Western man. For at one time babies like these would have been discarded on a remote hillside to die from exposure or from the ravages of beasts. Or, to bring it closer to home, it is not so long ago that they would have been placed in circuses so that some unscrupulous promoter could make money at their expense. What accounts for this effort? The only adequate answer is the inherent value of man revealed to him by God through Judaism and Christianity and now embodied, at least for a time, in the best of Western ideals and institutions. Take away such a revelation and such values and the age of barbarism will return upon us.

A Shattered Image

We have dealt at length with the matter of man's value, the first of the lessons about man that the phrase "Jesus wept" suggests, because it is the most neglected. But it would not be right to deal with this subject without going on to point out also that man has marred God's image and is therefore in a state to be wept over. Thus, as I said earlier, the text teaches that we have gotten ourselves into such a state that even God, who might be thought to be above tears, weeps for us.

Do we need another example than that of Christ before the tomb of Lazarus? If so, we find one in an event that comes shortly after this in Christ's ministry. A few days after the raising of Lazarus, on what we call Palm Sunday, Jesus entered Jerusalem riding on a donkey. He had sent his disciples to find it; and when they had brought it to him, he sat upon it and rode toward Jerusalem while those disciples who were with him and those who came out of the city at his approach threw their clothes in his pathway and paved the way with branches stripped from the palms. In such a context we might expect Jesus to have been filled with excitement and even joy. We might expect him to have rejoiced in the fact that so many were apparently following him. But this is not what we find. Rather, we find Christ weeping, for he knew that the cheers of the people were shallow and that unbelief rather than faith characterized the multitudes that filled the city. Valuable? Yes, the people were valuable. But they were also so submerged in sin that their eyes were blinded to that which could have been their blessing and spiritual peace (Luke 19:4144).

It is a terrible thing, this shattering of the image of God in man. It is catastrophic both for the individual and for those with whom he is in contact. Paul tells about it in Romans, showing that sin has broken relationships—with God, first of all, then with others, and finally of the individual with himself. He puts it this way: "For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles. Therefore God gave them over in the sinful desires of their hearts to sexual impurity for the degrading of their bodies with one another. They exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator—who is forever praised. Amen" (Rom. 1:21-25).

This should cause weeping. Indeed, as we look at man through God's eyes, our text should be Ecclesiastes 3:4, which tells us that there is "a time to weep." Or perhaps Luke 23:28, which contains Christ's words to the women of Jerusalem as they followed him on his way to the cross: "Do not weep for me; weep for yourselves and for your children."

A Needy People

My final point is that we need God. We are valuable to God, yes. But we are so marred by sin, so unable to extricate ourselves from the bondage into which our sin has plunged us, that there is no hope for any of us unless God saves us. Here is the unique quality of Christ's tears at the tomb of Lazarus. If the situation had been redeemable by human effort, Christ would not have wept. If sin could have been overcome or if death, the product of sin, could have been eradicated, we should expect Jesus to have said, "Dry your tears. Stop feeling sorry for yourselves. Get on with the work. Solve your problems." But he does not do that. Instead he weeps, because from man's point of view man is hopeless and his problems unsolvable.

But with God all things are possible. Jesus says to Martha just five verses later, "Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?" (v. 40).

Martha did see God's glory, for her brother was raised. But so do all who come to Christ as their Savior. We need him. Sin, suffering, and death ably testify to that. But God in Christ is able to meet our need; indeed, he has met it, for he has given his life and then been raised from the dead in order to deal with the entire sin question.

Isaiah told about it a thousand years before Christ was born, stressing that we who had been made in his image so bruised and battered him that physically, at least, his image became even more deformed than our own; but he endured this and all suffering in order that he might restore in us that perfect image of God that we had before we rebelled against him. "But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities; the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed" (Isa. 53:5). Here is the ability and great love of our God. For these and only these take us from the depths of our sin and restore to us that lost image of God, through faith in Christ Jesus.

Chapter 146.
"Behold How He Loves"

John 11:36-37

The last of our studies of the phrase "Jesus wept" brings us to the reaction of the spectators to Christ's tears. There were two reactions. On the one hand, there was the reaction of those who were obviously unbelievers. These thought that Jesus' tears were a proof of his weakness; so they concluded, "Could not he who opened the eyes of the blind have kept this man from dying?" (v. 37). These persons were surprised that Jesus had not been able to do something about Lazarus's sickness earlier, but they reasoned that obviously he had not been able to help out or he would have done it. It did not even begin to enter their minds that Jesus was about to raise Lazarus from the dead.

The other reaction to Christ's tears was neither an expression of belief or disbelief. It was just an observation. These people looked at Christ's tears and concluded rightly that Jesus loved Lazarus. They said, "See how he loved him!" (v. 36).

Many people, perhaps most of those who will be reading these words, know the Lord well enough to know that he loves others. And most of these know that he also loves them. But if this is so, then it is surely right to take the text personally and say, "Behold how he loves us!" Or, to make it even more personal, "Behold how he loves me!" This is a cause for great wonder. Spurgeon, in an excellent sermon on this text, once wrote, "Most of us here, I trust, are not mere onlookers, but we have a share in the special love of Jesus. We see evidences of that love, not in his tears, but in the precious blood that he so freely shed for us; so we ought to marvel even more than those Jews did at the love of Jesus, and to see further into his heart than they did, and to know more of him than they could in the brief interval in which they had become acquainted with him."

Let us say, "Behold how he loves us!" and then think quietly over what we know to underlie that statement.

An Everlasting Covenant

As the eyes of our mind ponder all we know concerning Jesus, from the past to the present, where is it that we first see his love? Is it when we first became aware of his love? Or when he died for us? Or when he created us? None of these points represents a true beginning; indeed, there is no beginning. For as far as we can look back into the past we find him loving us. It was in eternity past that he so identified himself with us that he took up our cause and determined to redeem his fallen people.

In his divine foresight Jesus looked upon the race that, as yet, was not created and saw it ruined through sin. We see everything through the blinders of time. For us life is past, present, and future. But it is not this way with God; he is above or beyond time so that to him, in some sense, all things are present. It was in this way, then, that Christ looked out upon what was to come and saw the ruin into which our sin would plunge us. Who was there in that moment beyond time to take our side, espouse our cause, and pledge himself to redeem that fallen temple? There was no one but Christ. As Isaiah wrote concerning God's search for a redeemer, "He saw that there was no one, he was appalled that there was no one to intervene" (Isa. 59:16). It was Jesus, then, who took up our cause.

Moreover, in that moment he also pledged himself to be the surety of his covenant people; that is, he took man's part in the creation of an eternal covenant between God and man, pledging to fulfill man's part. For he knew that the demands of that covenant could never be met by human beings.

The nature of God's covenant with man in Christ is seen in the record of a similar covenant that God later established with Abraham. In Abraham's day a covenant was sometimes made through a strange ceremony in which animals were cut in two along the backbone and placed in two rows over against one another, thereby forming a space in which the parties to the covenant stood while they exchanged their vows. The shed blood of the animals made the covenant particularly sacred. Since this was the form Abraham was used to, God used it in promising Abraham that he would bless him. In this case, however, there was one significant variation. Abraham became a spectator to the covenant—he was on the sideline seeing it in something like a dream or vision— while God, represented by a smoking furnace and a lamp, passed alone between the pieces. The point was that God was establishing the covenant apart from any participation on the part of Abraham. Therefore, it was unilateral, eternal, and undeserved.

In a similar way, Jesus established a covenant on our behalf and for our good, long before we were able to have any part in it personally. He pledged himself to die for us, thereby giving his life as a ransom and an atonement for our sins. The pledge was unilateral, for he did it by himself and without our asking. It is eternal, for what he has begun he will most certainly bring to completion. It is undeserved, for we are lost in sin and therefore have no claim upon him. Moreover, it is sealed with Christ's blood; for we are saved, as the author of the letter to the Hebrews says, "through the blood of the eternal covenant" (Heb. 13:20). Jesus pledged himself to do what we could never do, so uniting himself with us that his death became our death, his life our life, his resurrection our own resurrection. And when did he do this? Before we were even born; indeed, before there was even a physical creation. So great was his love for us!

God's Servant

It also is true that in time the Lord Jesus Christ loved us enough to leave the glories of heaven and take the form of a man upon himself. In this form he endured all temptations, disappointments, and suffering that we are heir to. Paul writes about it in Philippians: "[He], being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness" (2:6-7). This is the essence of the incarnation. It is one of the greatest wonders of all time; but it means, simply, that Jesus became like us in order that we might become like him.

How was he like us? He became like us in temptations; for the author of Hebrews writes that he "has been tempted in every way, just as we are —yet was without sin" (4:15). Have you been tempted? Are you being tempted? So was he; yet he was victorious over it. Now he reigns with the Father in heaven so that you might turn to him to find mercy and have grace to help in time of need.

Jesus also became like us in disappointments. A friend betrayed him. Others let him down. No one really understood him. His own countrymen, whom he had tried to help, killed him. Clearly, Jesus knew disappointments, but these did not defeat him. They did not make him bitter. Instead he triumphed over them.

He also knew suffering. Did anyone ever suffer as much as Jesus did? In a physical sense I suppose it is possible that some persons could have, though there are few forms of suffering as great as that endured in crucifixion. But in a total sense, that is, in a sense that involves mental and spiritual anguish as well as physical suffering, no one can match him. He who knew no sin was made sin for us. He who had never experienced so much as one second of broken fellowship between himself and the Father was separated from him so that he called out in great agony of soul, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" No other suffering was ever as great as his. Yet he endured all this, because his love for us was so immeasurable!

Our Sin-Bearer

This leads to our next point, for we may certainly say, "Behold how he loves us" when we reflect on his death by crucifixion. Jesus loved us so much that he became our sin-bearer. It is as Paul says, "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21).

I am sure that we will never understand the full extent of this action on the part of Christ, certainly not in this life. I even doubt that we will understand it fully in the life to come. For how can it be that the One who had existed with God the Father from eternity and who was himself God could become man and suffer even unto the point of spiritual death, so that he was actually made sin for us and was separated from his Father? I cannot understand it. Yet that is what the Scriptures teach, and I believe it. Moreover, I marvel at it. To look to the cross of Jesus Christ is to marvel at the extent of his love for us. We see there the height and depth of his love. We see the length and breadth of it. Does Jesus love us? Yes, he does. The cross is the proof of his love. He, who knew no sin, was made sin for us, so great was his love for us.

Christ's Call

Jesus also loved us so much that he called us personally and individually, persisting in his call until by the force of his love he drew us to him.

Jesus died for us; that is true. But what was that to us until he called us to him? At best it was an exemplary death, but it meant little. When first we heard of it we were indifferent. If we had been in Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion, we would not have intervened to save him, nor would we have thought much about it once the death had been accomplished. Now, after the passage of two thousand years, it has meant even less than a little. But Jesus pursued us. We failed to understand the meaning of his death, but he carefully explained it to us. We grew tired of the explanation, but he changed his methods of instruction and taught us differently. We said no to his call, but he would not accept our no. At last, when we could resist him no longer, we yielded to what Spurgeon called "the sweet compulsion of his grace." And we found him forgiving our sin, justifying us from all iniquity, adopting us as his sons and daughters, filling us with his Spirit, and imparting to us all the riches of his abounding grace.

Moreover, this is not just our experience of him in the days before we became his children. Even after we believed, his grace continued. For we were not faithful. He was faithful to us; but we each went our own way, despising his will and pursuing a course of sin marked out by our own stubborn hearts. If Jesus had cast us from him at this point, at least from the point of view of our sin, he would have been justified. But Jesus did not cast us off. Rather, he loved us even in our willfulness and strove by every means to melt our cold indifference and restore us to him. Sometimes Jesus calls loudly. Sometimes he calls softly. But always there is his call. So great is his love for us.

Do We Love Him?

Let us turn the statement around. Up to this point I have been writing of the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for us and have called upon each one who knows that love to marvel at it. When we look at his espousal of our cause in eternity past, his incarnation, his death on the cross, his call to us to come to him, and his bestowal of all spiritual riches upon us, we may well say, "Behold how he loves us!" But turn it around. Do we love him? Has anyone ever said of you, "Behold how he loves Jesus"?

Spurgeon asks that same question in the sermon I referred to earlier, and he answers it like this. "Listen for a minute or two while I tell you of what some saints have done to show how they loved their Lord.

"There have been those who have suffered for Christ's sake. They have lain in damp dungeons, and have refused to accept liberty at the price of treachery to their Lord and His truth. They have been stretched upon the rack, yet no torture could make them yield up their fidelity to God. If you have read Foxe's Book of Martyrs, you know how hundreds of brave men and women, and children too, stood at the stake, gloriously calm, and often triumphantly happy, and were burnt to death for Christ's sake, while many of those who looked on learned to imitate their noble example, and others who heard their dying testimonies, and their spiritual songs (not groans), could not help exclaiming, 'Behold how these martyrs love their Master!' "There have been others, who have shown their love to their Lord by untiring and self-sacrificing service. They have laboured for him, at times under great privations and amid many perils, some as missionaries in foreign lands, and others with equal zeal in this country. Their hearts were all aglow with love for their dear Lord and Savior, and they spent their whole time and strength in seeking to win souls for him, so that those who knew them could not help saying, 'Behold how they love their Lord!' Some of us can never hope to wear the ruby crown of martyrdom, yet we may be honored by receiving the richly-jeweled crown from the hand of Christ as he says to each of his laborers, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant ... enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' "Then we have known some saints who showed their love to their Lord by weeping over sinners and praying for their conversion. There have been gracious men and women, who could not sleep at night because of their anxiety about the eternal welfare of their relatives and friends, or even of lost ones who were personally unknown to them; and they have risen from their beds to agonize in prayer for sinners who were either calmly sleeping, and not even dreaming of their doom, or else at that very hour were adding to their previous transgressions ...

"Others have proved their love to their Lord by the way in which they have given of their substance to his cause."

These paragraphs by Spurgeon are a good statement of what others have done because of their great love for the Lord Jesus Christ, and they may serve as a challenge to us. But the question remains: Do you love Jesus? Has anyone ever said of you, "Behold how he loves his Master"?

Years ago a woman missionary went to North Africa and settled in Tunis where she began to try to win Moslems to Christ. She met with little success, as seems often to be the case in Moslem lands. But she persisted, above all continuing to love those to whom she was witnessing. One young Moslem lad came to her home every week for English classes. She had been giving such classes as a way of getting to know some of the Tunisians and of helping them. So, as she taught him English, she tried to tell him of Jesus. The student listened, but he was unmoved. Months passed. Finally, the summer before he was to go away to university came, and the lad dropped his classes. The summer passed. One day, just before his departure, the young man came to say good-bye to the missionary for the final time. The two of them had tea together, and the woman told of Jesus for what seemed to be the final time. Still there were no results. The Moslem was polite but adamant. At last the moment came for final farewells, and the student left the missionary's door and walked down the path leading through the garden to the outside gate. Here he stopped and looked back, and saw his teacher standing in the doorway looking after him with tears streaming down her face. He could resist no longer. Her tears conquered the rebellion in his heart, and he returned up the path and into the living room where he received the Lord Jesus Christ as his Savior.

Could that be a picture of you? Could it be you, standing there in a foreign land weeping for the lost? Could it be a picture of you at home weeping for a husband, a wife, a son, a daughter, a neighbor? Such a thing should be possible. For many should be able to see the tears of Christ in you and say "Behold how he loves Jesus!"

Chapter 147.
The Seventh Miracle

John 11:38-44

The raising of Lazarus from the dead is the climactic miracle of John's Gospel—by any standard of measurement. Its position in the Gospel alone indicates this, for it is the last of seven miracles and is inserted just before the beginning of the final week of Jesus' earthly ministry. The length of the narrative (forty-six verses) and its detail also reveal its importance; it is the longest and most elaborately described of the miracles. Only the miracle of the restoration of sight to the man born blind is of comparable length, but the miracle in John 9 is still shorter than this one. The results of this miracle are more momentous than those of any other sign, primarily in the increased determination of the religious leaders to eliminate Jesus. Finally, and most importantly, the deeper or spiritual meaning of the miracle is striking and is essential to the book's theology.

The first of the miracles in the Gospel of John is the turning of water into wine (2:1-11). It is a small miracle, as miracles go, but it reveals Jesus to be the true source of joy and of life in abundance. It concludes with the observation, "This, the first of his miraculous signs, Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. Thus he revealed his glory; and his disciples put their faith in him" (v. 11). The second miracle is the healing of the son of a nobleman (4:46-54). It shows Jesus to have power over human sickness and, by extension, over that sickness of the spirit caused by sin. The third miracle is the healing of the invalid (5:1-16). Here the spiritual meaning of the miracle is obvious, for the invalid is an eloquent symbol of the helpless spiritual state to which sin has brought all men and women. The feeding of the five thousand (6:1-14) reveals that Jesus is "the bread of life." The story of his walking upon the water (6:15-21) points to his power over nature. The sixth miracle is the restoration of sight to the man who had been born blind (9:1-41). This shows the effect of sin on the mind—the sinner is spiritually blind and walks in darkness—and the need for Christ who alone can restore sight. The story is summarized in advance in Christ's saying, "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life" (8:12).

In each of these stories there is a real miracle, but it is told by John primarily because of the spiritual meaning found in it. The same is also true of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, the seventh miracle. Lazarus was certainly raised from the dead; in fact, as John indicates, it was the report of this astonishing miracle that led the religious leaders to the conclusion that they would have to dispose of Christ immediately. In addition to this it is also a picture of how a man or woman who is dead in sin is brought to spiritual life by Jesus. It may well be studied for what it has to teach about sin, faith, the power of Christ, and evangelism.

Believing Is Seeing

The story begins, "Jesus, once more deeply moved, came to the tomb. It was a cave with a stone laid across the entrance. 'Take away the stone,' he said. 'But, Lord,' said Martha, the sister of the dead man, 'by this time there is an odor for he has been there four days.' Then Jesus said 'Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?'" (vv. 38-40).

The lesson Jesus had for Martha, and therefore for us also, is that in spiritual matters believing is seeing. He said, "Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?" These words, "seeing" and "believing," sound natural to us because of the expression "Seeing is believing." But we can hardly miss the fact that Jesus puts it the other way around. "Seeing is believing," we say. "Believing is seeing," says the Lord Jesus.

Both are right so long as we realize that in our expression we are talking about human affairs while Jesus in his expression was talking about a relationship to God. In human affairs the expression means simply that men and women are untrustworthy. Some are more trustworthy than others, no doubt. These are the ones we seek to work into positions of responsibility and authority, but even here we are not entirely believing. So corporation heads are bonded, builders are bound by contracts, union heads sign work agreements, and so on. Take as an example a case in which a personnel representative in a company is interviewing a young applicant for a job. "Do you think you can do the work?" the representative asks.

"Certainly," the young man answers. It is obvious that he does not lack confidence.

"Do you know what is involved?"

"Yes, I have read all about it. And, besides, I have had two years' experience doing the same thing in Phoenix."

"And did the job go well there?"

"Very well," is the reply. "And I know I can do well here." The personnel representative is probably pleased to see the young man's confidence. In spite of this he does not take his profession of ability at face value. Instead, he writes for references. Moreover, he does not promise that the job will be permanent even if he offers it to him. "We'll see how it goes," he says. In other words, seeing is believing; and this is right because in human affairs performance has not always followed promise. We want references. Or, to put it in other terms, we want collateral before the loan is made.

How then can Jesus invert the adage and say, "Believing is seeing"? There is only one answer: it is because he is not speaking of men but of God. Men are untrustworthy, but God is not like men in this respect. "God is not a man, that he should lie," the Scriptures tell us (Num. 23:19). God has never made a promise that he has not fulfilled fully. Consequently, to believe God is to put oneself in the place of blessing, from which one will certainly see all that is promised in due time.

Perfect Faith

Jesus' statement links "seeing the glory of God" (which refers here to the raising of Lazarus) to such faith. But the interesting thing about this is that Martha apparently did not have such faith, nor did anyone else so far as we can discern from the narrative. When Jesus said, "Did I not tell you... ?" he probably was referring to his message to Martha through the messenger, recorded much earlier in the chapter (v. 4). But when Jesus finally arrived at Bethany four days later, Martha did not expect the resurrection. Moreover, even after Jesus had talked with her face-toface she did not expect it. For when Jesus said, "Take away the stone," Martha replied that this would be unwise in that the body would undoubtedly have begun to decay. She did not expect a resurrection. She only thought that for some reason Jesus wanted to look at and mourn over the body.

The crowd that was standing by did not believe in the possibility of a resurrection either. For most of them were saying, "Could not he who opened the eyes of the blind have kept this man from dying?" (v. 37).

Where then was the faith that was to result in seeing God's glory? Again there is only one answer. If it is not seen in Martha or Mary or any of the others, the only person left in whom it can be seen is Jesus. He is the One who believed and who therefore saw God's glory. Consequently, his trust in God at this point becomes a model for our own.

What is it that makes Christ's faith in the Father what it is? Or, to put it in other language, what is the nature of Christ's faith? There are several answers. First, it is personal. That is, it is not faith in some abstract concept or some mere truth that Jesus knew about God. His faith was in God himself, which he indicates by calling him "Father." John records it this way: "So they took away the stone. Then Jesus looked up and said, 'Father...'" (v. 41). Is your faith like that? Is it personal? Faith in the biblical sense most certainly involves propositions, but it is not propositional alone. It is faith in a person. Thus, regarding salvation we should be able to say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I love you and want you to be my Savior." Or in the matter of prayer, "Father, I lay such and such a need before you."

Second, the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ was a perfect or totally trusting faith. This is indicated by the fact that Jesus offered God thanks for the miracle even before it had taken place. We find him praying, "Father, I thank you that you have heard me. I knew that you always hear me" (vv. 41-42). I do not know personally how close we can come to that total belief of the Lord Jesus Christ. Certainly we often fail to express confidence that God will hear and answer our prayers. On the other hand, we often pray in ways that are mere presumption. We fail, but we should still grow toward the point of such perfection.

Dr. Harry A. Ironside used to tell the story of one old man who had. He was a Scotsman who on one occasion was making his way by foot to a certain synodical meeting of the Free Kirk in Aberdeen. On the way, he was overtaken by a young theological student, also on his way to the meeting, and as they had much in common they continued on their way together. At lunchtime they turned aside to a grassy embankment to eat their lunch, first thanking God for the food. They had good conversation. Then, before they started out again, the old man suggested that they each pray, asking God for what they would need that evening. The young student was embarrassed; but he agreed, and the older man prayed. He had three requests. First, he reminded the Lord that he was hard of hearing and that if he did not get a seat well up toward the front of the meeting hall, he would get little from the sermon that evening. So he asked that a seat be kept for him. Second, he told the Lord that his shoes were badly worn and that they were hardly fit for the city. He needed a new pair, although he did not have money to buy them. Finally, he asked for a place to sleep that night, for he knew no one in the city from whom he could seek accommodations. As he made each request the old man thanked the Lord in advance for answering them.

The theological student was aghast at what he considered to be the impertinence of the old man, and he determined to check up on him later to see what came of his prayers. That night they reached the meeting a bit late. The hall was crowded. There was not a seat left. The student thought, "We will see now what becomes of such prayers." However, someone came out, and the old man managed to squeeze into a place near the door, where he stood with one hand cupped to his ear.

Just then a young lady in the front row turned and saw him. She called an usher. "Sir," she said, "my father asked me to save this seat for him, saying that if he should be late I should offer it to someone else. Evidently he has been detained. Will you please go and offer it to that old man who has his hand to his ear and is standing just inside the door." The usher followed her instructions, and so in just a few minutes the first request of the old man had been answered.

The time came for prayer. In Scotland in those days some persons always knelt for prayer while others reverently stood. The old man was the kneeling kind. The young woman was the standing kind. Standing thus beside her guest and looking down she could not help noticing the condition of his shoes. Her father ran a shoe store. So afterward she politely raised the subject and asked the old man if she might take him to her father's store, though it was closed for the night, and give him a pair. So petition number two was answered. Finally, while in the store, the young woman inquired where the old man was staying that night; and he answered that God had not yet shown him the room. "Well," she said, "I think we have the room for you. The Rev. Dr. So-andSo was to use our guest room tonight, but he has telegraphed to say that he is not coming. Will you use it?" The next day when the theological student inquired how the old man had made out, he learned the answers and found that God is not indifferent to the believing prayers of his people.

Finally, we notice that the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ was public. That is, he did not express his faith quietly in a corner, but rather audibly and openly before men. In this respect we find him praying, "I knew that you always hear me, but I said this for the benefit of the people standing here, that they may believe that you sent me" (v. 42). If we will do likewise, at least on occasion, then others may also come to believe as the result of our indirect testimony and God's action.

The prayer of Jesus leads to the moment of the resurrection itself. Having finished his prayer, Jesus called to Lazarus in a loud voice, so all could hear (Lazarus, of course, would have heard even if he had whispered): "Lazarus, come out." The story continues by reporting with great understatement, "The dead man came out, his hands and feet wrapped with strips of linen, and a cloth around his face. Jesus said to them, 'Take off the grave clothes and let him go'" (v. 44).

Here is the climax of the miracle, and it is here that it must be applied spiritually. The resurrection of Lazarus happened. But we notice that it is also what happens spiritually whenever Jesus speaks to a lost and fallen child of Adam. According to Scripture, anyone without Christ is dead spiritually. He is "dead in trespasses and sins," as Paul wrote to the Ephesians. As such he is helpless. There is nothing he can do to improve his condition. But Jesus comes. He calls. He calls the dead one by name. And the one who hears his voice responds and rises from his grave to meet him. Perhaps he is calling you. Do you hear him? Will you follow?

Finally, the story says this to Christians: Will you also play your part in Christ's miracles? You say, "But what do you mean? Haven't you said that the work is Christ's alone? No one can raise the dead but Jesus." Yes, that is true. But have you noticed that although it was Jesus alone who could bring the dead to life; nevertheless, he delighted to involve the bystanders in the miracle. First, they were told to move the stone. Then, after the miracle, they were told to unbind Lazarus. True, we cannot bring the dead to life. But we can bring the word of Christ to them. We can do preparatory work, and we can do work afterward. We can help to remove stones—stones of ignorance, error, prejudice, and despair. After the miracle we can help the new Christian by unwinding the graveclothes of doubt, fear, introspection, and discouragement.

The miracle is Christ's. But there is work for us to do if we will do it. Will you? Jesus used Ananias to reach Paul, even after he had been struck down on the road to Damascus. He used Peter to reach Cornelius. Philip preached to the Ethiopian. Do you doubt that he would use you if you were ready to do such work? Then get ready! Or be ready! As Pink says, "There is no higher privilege this side of Heaven than for us to be used of the Lord in rolling away gravestones and removing graveclothes."

Chapter 148.
What Shall We Do with Jesus?

John 11:45-50, 53

The resurrection of Lazarus by the Lord Jesus Christ was over, and the people who had been standing by and had witnessed the miracle were left to wonder at it. What was to be their reaction? Would they believe on Jesus? Or would they fail to believe? Would they become his followers or his enemies? As we read the sequel to the story we are not surprised to find that both were true; that is, some believed, while others disbelieved. There were people who had come to Mary, and had seen the things that Jesus did and "put their faith in him" (v. 45). Their case reminds us of the report of the people of Samaria, who had come to Jesus through the testimony of the woman whom Jesus met at the well and who had then believed. They said, "We no longer believe just because of what you said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Christ, the Savior of the world" (4:42). Theirs was a wonderful experience and an example. We would do well to be like them. Or again, we would do well to be a channel for faith, like Mary or the woman of Samaria through whom others believed. If we had more time, we could reflect on this profitably.

The story does not allow us to do that, however. For no sooner are we told that some believed, than we are also told that others did not. In fact, these did worse than merely disbelieve. These actually reported on Jesus to the authorities, who then held a council. We are told of them, "But some of them went to the Pharisees and told them what Jesus had done" (v. 46).

An Evil Council

What a strange council this was! And what an evil one! We look at the action of those who had witnessed the raising of Lazarus, then went and told the Pharisees, and we say, "How could they show such ill-will toward Jesus? How could they be so hateful to him and so impervious to his miracles?" But then we look at those to whom they reported, and the hatred of the first group seems mild by comparison. Presumably the bystanders reported to the Pharisees who in turn informed the Sadducees, who then called a meeting (either officially or unofficially) of the great Sanhedrin, the supreme governing body of the nation. Here were the best men of the nation—at least in their own opinion. There were chief priests in their robes; the chief priests were all Sadducees. There were Pharisees, the "holiest" men of all, in their phylacteries. These met in holy council. No doubt they opened their meeting with prayer. Yet, what were they meeting for? They were meeting to oppose a perfectly innocent man. He was a man who had been doing great miracles, so great in fact that a proper council would have been one on how to encourage his work and lead multitudes to follow him.

It was an unlikely coalition. The Pharisees, strictly speaking, were not a political party at all, though they had political power because they were so highly regarded. Actually, they were a religious party or denomination. They were concerned chiefly with observing each minute requirement of the law and with encouraging others to do so. They were sticklers for detail. One example of their outlook is seen in the objection of Nicodemus, who was probably a Pharisee, to proceedings in a council held earlier. Nicodemus is reported to have said, "Does our law condemn anyone without first hearing him and to find out what he is doing?" (7:51).

On the other hand, there were the Sadducees. These were not religious men, though some undoubtedly played at religion for their own ends. These were the politicians. They were wealthy and aristocratic, and they collaborated with the Romans to preserve their privileged position. These men had much to lose, particularly if there should be a civil disorder; for that would bring swift intervention by the Romans. They compromised to preserve their position. If justice and civil order ever came into conflict, the Sadducees would always be found on the side of the Romans in preserving civil order.

The interesting thing is that these two groups were enemies or rivals. That is, they hated each other and often opposed each other bitterly. Yet —and this is the wonder—we find them working together here in their opposition to Jesus. Why was this so? Clearly because their opposition to Jesus was more important than their rivalry with each other. The Pharisees hated Jesus for his religious views; he exposed their sin. The Sadducees hated him for being a threat to their privileged position. But both hated him, and so they collaborated. A little later we find the same thing in connection with Herod and Pilate, who were also enemies but who made common cause in doing away with Jesus. "Then Herod and his soldiers ridiculed and mocked him. Dressing him in an elegant robe, they sent him back to Pilate. That day Herod and Pilate became friends — before this they had been enemies" (Luke 23:11-12).

The situation gives us insight into the hearts of sinful men and women. People would rather unite with their enemies than follow Jesus. Winston Churchill once said facetiously that if Hitler invaded hell, he was sure that he would be able to find a good word to say for Satan in the House of Commons. Many persons are like that spiritually. They will agree with anyone and work with anyone rather than Jesus. I hope it is not true of you. I hope rather that you have seen the folly of such an outlook and have come to him.

An Evil Discussion

We need to notice further that the council of the Pharisees and Sadducees, convoked with such an evil intent, proceeded next to equally evil deliberations. First of all, they muddled about in indecision. "What are we accomplishing?" they said. "Here is this man performing many miraculous signs. If we let him go on like this, everyone will believe in him, and then the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation" (vv. 47-48).

The most striking thing about this discussion is its unintentional confession of Christ's strength versus their weakness. It is more striking in that it happens on several levels. For one thing, there is no attempt to deny the miracles. "Here is this man performing many miraculous signs" was their testimony. There was an earlier point when these same men sent officers to arrest Jesus and admitted, after the soldiers had returned empty-handed, that they really did not know what he was doing (7:51). But now they do know, and still they deny him. One commentator has written, "They owned the genuineness of his miracles, yet were their consciences unmoved." Another states, "They admitted the miracles, yet opposed the Miracle-worker."

Moreover, they admitted that they had been powerless over a considerable period of time, for this is the effect of the question with which the discussion began: "What are we accomplishing?" The religious leaders were acknowledging that their efforts had for long been ineffective and that they were now at their wits' end. We might capture the force of the question by translating the sentences: "Look how Jesus is growing in popularity. What are we doing about it?" Implied in the question is the admission that a new policy is needed, precisely because the old one is not working. Jesus' plans were working, but theirs were not working. Their efforts were weak, but he was strong.

I said earlier that the fact that the Pharisees and Sadducees collaborated against their natural instincts to do away with Jesus reveals the nature of sin in the heart of man. That is true. But the same point is even more obvious here. Sin had formed them and hardened them. Thus, no matter what others did, no matter even what Jesus did, these men were determined not to believe on him. In fact, they would not even raise the question of whether his miracles ought not rather to be taken as evidence that he was who he said he was, or even that he was a prophet to whom they should listen. They had already shut their ears to such issues and were only seeking a way to stifle his influence or eliminate him.

Does this seem extreme to you? Or foolish? It is foolish, of course, but it is not so different from what many do today. A number of years ago a lady was invited by a friend to go to a gospel meeting. "I am afraid to go for fear I will get converted," she answered. Imagine! She was afraid that she might get straightened out with God. On another occasion a minister said to a certain woman in his congregation, "I have not seen your husband lately. Has he lost interest in the gospel?" She answered, "Well, he is afraid to come; for when he comes and hears the Word, it takes him nearly two weeks to get over it."

What are we to do with such a one? Or again, what are we to do with you, if this is your policy? We will keep preaching the Word. But be careful that you do not slip away forever like these Sadducees.

An Evil Conclusion

What did they do? How did their council end? One of them, named Caiaphas, stood up and counseled sordid self-interest. He did not put it that way, of course. He said, as politicians always do, "We must think of the good of the people." But this is what he meant. He succeeded in swaying the council too; for it was on this level, the level of self-interest, and not on any high level of rule by law or the good of the nation that these malicious men were malleable. Caiaphas said (we shall return to his words in more detail in our next study), "You know nothing at all! You do not realize that it is better for you that one man die for the people than that the whole nation perish" (vv. 49-50).

I am impressed with how cleverly Caiaphas spoke. He began by dismissing all comments by all previous speakers. "You know nothing at all," he dogmatized. That is, "Everything said thus far is foolishness." Then, eloquently and simply, he advised that it was better that one man die (though innocent) than that all should perish. And he won! First, he won in the council. We read, "So from that day on they plotted to kill him" (v. 53). Second, he won before Pilate, for it was when Pilate perceived that a riot was developing and that he could be held responsible before Caesar, and even viewed as an insurrectionist himself, that he released Jesus for crucifixion (John 19:12-13).

Expediency! That was the lever then, as it so often is today. It is in the name of expediency and self-interest that the most terrible things are done.

I am also impressed by the fact that this is not the end of the story. Indeed, we can hardly miss the point that this is not the end or that John especially tells the story as he does to suggest a different end from this beginning. What we have here is a remarkable case of high dramatic irony. Caiaphas had said it was better to kill Jesus than that the entire nation perish. But this is what happened anyway. The very events they dreaded came to pass. True, they eliminated Jesus—in one sense at least. But in the aftermath of the crucifixion and the gradual scattering of the Christians from Jerusalem, the revolutionary spirit began to grow with intensity in Palestine, a war broke out, and the Romans intervened to crush the rebellion. In that great war all the strongholds of Israel were overthrown, Jerusalem was besieged and destroyed, and the temple was left in ruins. In fact, as Josephus tells us, a plow was even drawn across the temple area to stress the desolation. How different events might have been if these men had received their Messiah! But they did not. They resisted him, and the sin of resistance had consequences. As Barclay says, "The very steps they took to save their nation destroyed their nation."

Since the destruction of Jerusalem took place about A.D. 70 and since John was writing about A.D. 90, according to conservative estimates, no one who read the Gospel in John's day would miss this irony. Moreover, they would not miss the irony inherent in a thriving Christianity either. The Sanhedrin had acted as it did in order to put down Jesus. "If we let him go on like this," they said, "everyone will believe in him." But what happened? Men believed on him. They killed him; but it was through his death that the gospel spread, not only throughout Judaism but to all nations (v. 52). Indeed, as John wrote there were Christians in every major city and in every country of the empire.

You cannot frustrate God. You can oppose him, but only you will pay the consequences, as did these men. You may oppose him, but Christianity will spread. The Bible says, "Many are the plans in the mind of a man, but it is the purpose of the LORD that will be established" (Prov. 19:21 RSV).

Three Choices

So let me turn the story of the Jerusalem council around in order to address you personally. It began with a question: "What are we accomplishing? Here is this man performing many miraculous signs." Make this your question. "What am I accomplishing—what am I doing —with the Miracle-worker?"

There are only three choices for you, so far as I can see. The first is to try to ignore him. Many try this, of course. You may be trying it too. But if this is your choice, I do not believe that you get very far with it. Why? Because he does too many miracles. He did them then; he does them today. Do you not fear that if you "let him alone, all men will believe on him"? And if they do, what will you do? How will you survive in such a Christ-centered world? How will you ignore him when your daughter believes, your son believes, your husband believes, your wife believes, your father believes, your mother believes, your friend believes? How will you ignore him on that day when, as we are told, every knee will bow and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:10-11)? Can he be ignored? Is Jesus really One whom you can thus put down?

Your second choice is to oppose him. Many have taken this course too, as we know. Caiaphas was the first but certainly not the only or even the worst persecutor of the Nazarene. History is full of those who opposed the Lord Jesus Christ. But where are they? The church remains, but what has happened to the persecutors?

Not long after the persecution of the early Christians instituted by Caiaphas and the other leaders of the Jews, Rome also tried to stamp the church out. Under Nero the Christians in Rome were gathered up and executed as scapegoats for the great fire. Some were sewed up in animal skins and mauled by bloodhounds. Some were bound to oxen and thus torn to pieces in the arena. Many were crucified. Some were dipped in pitch and set on fire like torches in order to light the gardens of the mentally deranged emperor. Under Diocletian, several centuries later, churches were destroyed, sacred books confiscated, clergy imprisoned, and many believers forced to sacrifice to pagan gods by torture. But the more they were persecuted the more the early Christians thrived, until at last the gods of the heathen were overthrown and Christianity was accepted as the faith of the empire.

Can you oppose him? If you do, do you really believe that you will be successful? Will you not rather be in the deplorable company of those rulers who "take counsel together against the LORD and against his Anointed, 'Let us break their chains,' they say, 'and throw off their fetters,'" of whom we are told, "The one enthroned in heaven laughs; the Lord scoffs at them" (Ps. 2:2-4)?

The last of the three choices is the only sensible one. You can believe on Jesus and follow him. "Follow him?" you say. "But he went to the cross. He was crucified. What is desirable about that?" That is true; his way is the way of the cross. But the cross is the way to victory, for it is only by losing life that a man can save it. It is only by following Jesus that the victory is won. If you reject him, you will not win. In fact, you will lose all that you have, as did the Jewish rulers. But if you believe on Jesus and follow him, though you may lack some things now, you will pass beyond that and share his glory.

Chapter 149.
Why Did Jesus Christ Die?

John 11:51-52

It is no exaggeration to say that, along with the resurrection, the cross of Jesus Christ stands at the center of Christianity. But it is also no exaggeration to say that few people really understand it. Few doubt that he died; indeed, all men must die. Few doubt that he died by crucifixion. But why Jesus died or what his death means is a puzzle to them. Why did Jesus die? As we might expect, the answer, being of great importance, is found throughout the Bible—in the illustrations provided by the Old Testament sacrificial system, in prophecies such as Isaiah 53, in narrative, and in explicit doctrinal teaching. But there are few verses that speak of the death of Christ as deeply and in as short a space as our text for this study.

In this text John says of the unwitting prophecy of Caiaphas, the high priest of Israel, at the time of the death of Christ, "He did not say this on his own, but as high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus would die for the Jewish nation, and not only for that nation but also for the scattered children of God, to bring them together and make them one." This is John's comment on Caiaphas's prophecy: "It is better ... that one man die for the people" (v. 50).

Unwitting Prophecy

It is interesting and somewhat surprising, however, that a prophecy of the meaning of Christ's death should come from this source. For of all the self-seeking and ruthless men who made up the Sanhedrin in that year, Caiaphas must have been the most self-seeking and the most ruthless.

Generally speaking, those who attended the council at which the decision was reached to kill Jesus were just distressed and confused. They confessed that Jesus was doing many miracles. They expressed their fear that unless something was done it was likely that all men would believe on him. But they did not know what to do. We can imagine them trying out various suggestions and then rejecting each one. There was one man in that group who did know his mind, however, and that was Caiaphas. Others may have been confused, but Caiaphas at least was not. "There is one thing to be done," he said. "Never mind about the miracles. Never mind about his teaching. Never mind about his character. The man must die. For, every minute that he lives the danger to ourselves and our prerogatives is intensified." Caiaphas expressed this in terms of the greater good of the people, of course. Politicians always do. Nevertheless, his advice to the council was clearly pure self-interest and expediency. And it carried, for the decision was reached immediately to do away with Jesus (v. 53).

The amazing thing, however, is that John tells us that in giving his ruthless council Caiaphas prophesied unwittingly. For "being high priest that year he prophesied," John says. That is, unintentionally Caiaphas foretold, not only that Jesus would die but also why he would die and the scope of his atonement.

It does seem strange that the prophecy should come from such an evil source, then. But it does not remain strange when we look at it in the light of God's dealings with men throughout biblical history. Maclaren writes, "Did not the Spirit of God breathe through Balaam of old? Is there anything incredible in a man's prophesying unconsciously? Did not Pilate do so, when he nailed over the cross, 'This is the King of the Jews,' and wrote it in Hebrew, and in Greek, and in Latin, conceiving himself to be perpetuating a rude jest, while he was proclaiming an everlasting truth? When the Pharisees stood at the foot of the Cross and taunted Him, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save,' did they not, too, speak deeper things than they knew? And were not the lips of this unworthy, selfish, unspiritual, unscrupulous, cruel priest so used as that, all unconsciously, his words lent themselves to the proclamation of the glorious central truth of Christianity, that Christ died for the nation that slew him and rejected him, nor for them alone, but for all the world?"

We learn from this that God uses even the wrath of man to accomplish his purposes. Indeed, Jesus may well have said to the unscrupulous high priest, as Joseph did to his brethren after he had revealed himself to them in Egypt, "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:20).

Some commentators have imagined that in verse 51 the evangelist shows himself to be in error and that, as a result, we have here one example of why the Scriptures may not be considered entirely trustworthy. John says that Caiaphas was high priest "that year." "But," they say, "the office of high priest was a permanent office, not an annual one. John is mistaken, and the Scriptures do contain errors." But this is not what John means. John knew as well as anyone that the high priests were appointed permanently. His point, therefore, is not that Caiaphas was high priest that year in the sense that someone else had been high priest the year before and that still another would be high priest in the year following. Rather, his point is that in that eventful year of the crucifixion of the Son of God, Caiaphas was high priest.

What an irony! What a tragedy! For this was the year in which the great "High Priest for ever" came and stood by the earthly high priest—the reality by the shadow—and by his sacrifice of himself for sin emptied the earthly priesthood and earthly sacrifices of all validity. Caiaphas did not even know it! Consequently, he lost not only his place and his nation, but his office as well, which henceforth passed to that One who alone is worthy of it and who is able to execute it perfectly.

A Vicarious Sacrifice

But Caiaphas did prophesy concerning Christ's death. In the first place, he told the nature of it.

From the human side it was a ruthless murder for political ends. The Sanhedrin, on the advice of Caiaphas, plotted to kill Christ in order that there might not be an uprising at the feast. This would endanger their privileges and power. Pilate consented to his death in order that he might not be accused of encouraging an insurrection or an insurrectionist. But from the divine side, which is conveyed to us in the prophecy, the death of Christ was a vicarious sacrifice for sinners. That is, it was Christ taking their place, dying in their stead, taking upon himself the guilt and punishment of their sins, in order that there might be nothing left for them but God's heaven.

We must admit, of course, that the view of the atonement that is expressed in this verse is incompatible with many modern ideas about God and the nature of salvation. Some think the idea of a vicarious sacrifice to be at odds with what we know about God. "Isn't he a God of love?" we are asked. "How then can he require a sacrifice as the basis of man's salvation? Or again, why is one necessary? If God is love and if he is all-powerful, isn't it true that he can simply forgive men outright? Moreover, if this is so, then are we not justified in considering the idea of a sacrifice merely a carryover from an outdated, Hebraic worldview?" To this we must answer that God is not only love; he is also a God of perfect holiness and justice. Therefore, salvation must take place so that none of these attributes is violated.

We are also told that the idea of a vicarious sacrifice is inadequate and immoral. It is inadequate, we are told, because the suffering of one man for only three hours (however intense) can never be equal to the eternal suffering of even one sinner in hell, not to mention a whole race of sinners. And it is immoral, our opponents add, for it is unjust of God to punish one man for others' sin. The answer to these objections is that they do not take into consideration who was dying, nor all that was involved in his sacrifice.

After all, who was dying? Not man, though Jesus was a man and had to be to die, but God. God the Son was dying. Moreover, it was because of the love and holiness of God the Father that he was dying.

One writer puts it like this: "God is not only perfectly holy, but the source and pattern of holiness. He is the origin and the upholder of the moral order of the Universe. He must be just. The Judge of all the earth must do right. Therefore it was impossible by the necessities of His own being that He should deal lightly with sin, and compromise the claims of holiness. If sin could be forgiven at all, it must be on some basis which would vindicate the holy law of God, which is not a mere code, but the moral order of the whole creation. But such vindication must be supremely costly. Costly to whom? Not to the forgiven sinner, for there could be no price asked from Him for His forgiveness; both because the cost is far beyond his reach and because God loves to give and not to sell. Therefore, God Himself undertook to pay a cost, to offer a sacrifice, so tremendous that the gravity of His condemnation of sin should be absolutely beyond question even as He forgave it, while at the same time the love which impelled Him to pay the price would be the wonder of angels, and would call forth the worshiping gratitude of the redeemed sinner.

"On Calvary this price was paid, paid by God: the Son giving himself, bearing our sin and its curse; the Father giving the Son, his only Son whom he loved. But it was paid by God become man, who not only took the place of guilty man, but also was his representative....

"He offered himself as a sacrifice in our stead, bearing our sin in his own body on the tree. He suffered, not only awful physical anguish, but also the unthinkable spiritual horror of becoming identified with the sin to which he was infinitely opposed. He thereby came under the curse of sin, so that for a time even his perfect fellowship with his Father was broken. Thus God proclaimed his infinite abhorrence of sin by being willing himself to suffer all that, in place of the guilty ones, in order that he might justly forgive. Thus the love of God found its perfect fulfillment, because he did not hold back from even that uttermost sacrifice, in order that we might be saved from eternal death through what he endured."

Let me pause here to ask whether this is your faith and whether or not you know that you have entered into a right relationship to God through Christ's sacrifice. Do you know that he did indeed die for you, that he took your place so that you might never have to suffer the consequences of your sin and spiritual rebellion? Do you trust him as your personal Savior? If you cannot answer yes to these questions, do not let this hour go by until you have put your trust in Jesus. The testimony of the entire Word of God is that he was wounded for your transgressions, that he was bruised for your iniquities that your chastisement was upon him in order that by his stripes you may be healed.

A Definite Atonement

There is more to the prophecy of Caiaphas than a mere statement of the nature of the atonement, however. For John goes on to say that his prophecy was that Jesus should die "not only for that nation but also for the scattered children of God" (v. 52). This verse amplifies his previous statement; for, having informed us of the nature of Christ's death, he now likewise informs us of the power and scope of it.

On this point Arthur Pink is so excellent that I cannot forebear quoting him. He writes: "The great Sacrifice was not offered to God at random. The redemption-price which was paid at the Cross was not offered without definite design. Christ died not simply to make salvation possible, but to make it certain. Nowhere in Scripture is there a more emphatic and explicit statement concerning the objects for which the Atonement was made. No excuse whatever is there for the vague (we should say, unscriptural) views, now so sadly prevalent in Christendom, concerning the ones for whom Christ died. To say that He died for the human race is not only to fly in the face of this plain scripture, but it is grossly dishonoring to the sacrifice of Christ. A large portion of the human race die unsaved, and if Christ died for them, then was his death largely in vain. This means that the greatest of all the works of God is comparatively a failure. How horrible! What a reflection upon the Divine character! Surely men do not stop to examine whither their premises lead them. But how blessed to turn away from man's perversions to the Truth itself. Scripture tells us that Christ 'shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. 'No sophistry can evade the fact that these words give positive assurance that every one for whom Christ died will, most certainly, be saved.

"Christ died for sinners. But everything turns on the significance of the preposition. What is meant by 'Christ died for sinners'? To answer that Christ died in order to make it possible for God to righteously receive sinners who come to Him through Christ, is only saying what many a

Socinian has affirmed. The testing of a man's orthodoxy on this vital truth of the Atonement requires something far more definite than this. The saving efficacy of the Atonement lies in the vicarious nature of Christ's death, in His representing certain persons, in His bearing their sins, in His being made a curse for them, in His purchasing them, spirit and soul and body. It will not do to evade this by saying, 'There is such a fulness in the satisfaction of Christ, as is sufficient for the salvation of the whole world, were the whole world to believe in Him.' Scripture always ascribes the salvation of a sinner, not to any abstract 'sufficiency,' but to the vicarious nature, the substitutional character of the death of Christ. The Atonement, therefore, is in no sense sufficient for a man, unless the Lord Jesus died for that man: 'For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us'

(1 Thess. 5:9-10)___ "For whom did Christ die? 'For the transgression of my people was he stricken' (Isa. 53:8). 'Thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. 1:21). 'The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Matt. 20:28). 'The good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep' (John 10:11). 'Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it' (Eph. 5:25). 'Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people' (Titus 2:14). 'To make propitiation for the sins of the people (Heb. 2:17). Here are seven passages which give a clear and simple answer to our question, and their testimony, both singly and collectively, declare plainly that the death of Christ was not an atonement for sin abstractly, nor a mere expression of Divine displeasure against iniquity, nor an indefinite satisfaction of Divine justice, but instead, a ransom-price paid for the eternal redemption of a certain number of sinners, and a plenary satisfaction for their particular sins. It is the glory of redemption that it does not merely render God placable and man pardonable, but that it has reconciled sinners to God, put away their sins, and forever perfected His set-apart ones."

The Children of God

I am glad that John also wrote, "And not only for that nation" but also for "the scattered children of God." For that includes representatives from among the Gentiles and from our own time also. If Christ had died only for an elect company from among the Jewish nation, he would have been just; for he need not have died for anyone. If he had died only for people who lived in his own time and not for us, that would have been just too. But this is not the case. Jesus died in order that he might bring many sons into glory among whom are men and women from every tongue and race and tribe and nation. These he is gathering. It may be that he is gathering you into the company of his people at this moment.

Will you resist him? Why? He died for you. He loves you. In fact, he commends his love to you on the basis of the fact that he did in truth die for you. Receive him. Yield to the sweet prodding of his Spirit. And find that salvation that is indeed already complete in him and is to be the basis of your assurance before him forever.

Chapter 150.
His Hour Not Yet Come

John 11:54-57

The end of chapter 11 marks an important division in John's Gospel, second in importance perhaps only to the close of chapter 12. It closes what has been called by some scholars "the book of signs." According to these commentators, John is to be divided into four parts: the prelude and introduction (involving the whole of chapter 1), the book of signs (involving chapters 2 through 11), the passion narrative (chapters 12 through 20), and the postscript (chapter 21). Thus, the verses we are to study mark the halfway point in the Gospel and form a transition to the beginning of the last and most eventful week of Christ's ministry.

In my outline of the Gospel, the break at the end of chapter 11 is of less importance than the break at the end of chapter 12. For chapter 12 sums up the public ministry, explaining why as a whole the people did not receive Jesus; and chapter 13 introduces us to the entirely different and very private final conversations of the Lord with his disciples. Nevertheless, there is enough of a break at the end of chapter 11 to make the verses that we find here significant. For one thing, the verses reflect a great tension, a tension broken finally only by the dramatic appearance of Jesus in Jerusalem on what we call Palm Sunday. For another thing, they clearly summarize the point to which the three great protagonists in the final struggle had come. These protagonists were the people, the leaders of the people, and Jesus. Therefore, in summarizing the period of Christ's public ministry centered in the signs, we should look at each one.

The Common People

I have said that there were three great protagonists in the final struggle portrayed in the last half of John. But, strictly speaking, the people are hardly great protagonists. They are important. They figure in the action in that the Pharisees and the chief priests proceed as they do because of their fear that if they arrest Jesus openly, the people will riot in support of him. Still, they are hardly great protagonists, for they seem generally confused. They are onlookers, spectators, as the majority of people have always been.

The situation was this. Jesus had raised Lazarus from the dead, and this was so spectacular and so public that the leaders of the people had proceeded to hold a council at which the decision was reached to arrest Jesus, bring him to trial, and execute him. Jesus, however, knew that his hour was not fully come. True, it was close at hand; within days he would go up to Jerusalem for the final time. Still, it was not yet quite at hand. So, with his disciples, he left the Jerusalem area to go to a place where he could not easily be found. The Scripture says, "Therefore Jesus no longer moved about publically among the Jews. Instead he withdrew to a region near the desert, to a village called Ephraim, where he stayed with his disciples" (v. 54). This city (maybe the one named in 2 Chron. 13:19) was probably near Bethel and thus about fifteen miles north of Jerusalem near the wilderness country that divided the highlands of Judah from the lush Jordan River valley.

All this had happened on the verge of the Passover, however. And this meant that at the time when Jesus left the area of the capital, many Jews from throughout the country were going up to Jerusalem. Before they could attend any feast they had to be ceremonially clean. So, many came to Jerusalem early, with the intention of purifying themselves through the prescribed ceremonial washings and offerings. All this took time, so while they waited they apprently gathered in little groups and eagerly discussed the major topic of the hour. "Where is Jesus?" they asked. "Do you think he will not come to the feast?" The way they phrased the question indicates that they did not expect him to come; for they knew, as Jesus did, that the leaders had determined to arrest and execute him.

Surely this is a deplorable picture. True, they had not yet set themselves in opposition to Jesus, as the Pharisees and chief priests had done. But neither had they come out for him. Moreover, they were content merely to observe the outcome, which they knew might well mean the execution of a perfectly innocent man—and to do it even while they went about the aspects of their ceremonial religion. What matter that Jesus was innocent? They would see what would happen, and enjoy it. What matter that he was God's own Passover who should that very week give his life for the sins of his people? It did not matter to them so long as they could enjoy their own Passover with its delightful ceremonies.

Do you think this is too hard a judgment on these poor sheep? Then what about this quotation from the Babylonian Gemara, dating in its edited form from about A.D. 550? The Gemara is the written commentary on the Mishnah. "Tradition reports that on the evening of the Passover Jesus was crucified, and that this took place after an officer had during forty days publicly proclaimed: This man who by his deception has seduced the people ought to be crucified. Whosoever can allege anything in his defense, let him come forward and speak. But no one found anything to say in his defense. He was hanged therefore on the evening of the Passover."

The Gemara is not inspired, of course. It does not even claim to be. The words quoted may be simply a justification of their action by the leaders. But there is no need to be skeptical of these words, and there is every reason to believe that this is precisely what happened. If this is right, then these people were interested in Jesus, even sympathetic to him, but they would not stick out their own necks in order to be identified with his cause. Moreover, they would even be religious while they watched him be crucified.

I think we see something similar to this today. Throughout America there are thousands of people who, while they are very careful about their church membership and about the details of Christian worship, nevertheless, being in their hearts unwilling to be identified with Jesus, in fact reject him. They may have been baptized. They may faithfully attend the Lord's Supper. They may even be church officers. But they will not come out for Jesus. So God looks down upon their empty rites and pronounces them to be a curse, for they are that by which they bring down judgment upon their own soul.

The Rulers

The second of the protagonists who figure in the events of Christ's last week are the rulers. These were the chief priests and Pharisees, according to our text, and they had given a command that if anyone knew where Jesus was, he should tell them "that they might arrest him" (v. 57). These men were opposed to Jesus and were determined to eliminate his presence from their lives and land.

It is an amazing fact, but a true one, that the raising of Lazarus had intensified the hostility of these rulers to Jesus. We might have expected them to have been convinced by the miracles. At least we would expect them to have been curious. But neither of these things happened. Rather, instead of belief or curiosity, we find hatred. We have seen the same thing before, of course. At the beginning of chapter 5, where their hostility originated, we find that they were angered that Jesus had healed the invalid who had spent thirty-eight years at the pool of Bethesda. Why? Because he had healed the man on the Sabbath. They seem to have been entirely insensitive to the needs of the man and indifferent to the great wonder that had been performed by Jesus. In chapter 9 we find that they become even more angry at the healing of the man born blind. Again, it is because of the violation of their little rules for the Sabbath. They do not even marvel at the great healing. Nor do they rejoice with the one who had been so miraculously delivered from a long nighttime of darkness.

Notice further that these were not acts performed over a period of many centuries by many different men, or in far-flung regions of the Jewish state for which they might therefore be excused if they lacked certain knowledge. These acts were done either in Jerusalem or in the immediate area of the city by one man during a period of just a few years. What is more, they were amply witnessed by many hundreds, if not thousands, of people. Still they would not believe. What a picture of traditional religion—that is, religion without the divine life. It hardens the heart, dulls the conscience, narrows the mind, and sets the will against the true God who is revealed in Jesus.

Are you one? If so, I fear for you. Far better to be an atheist, far better to be the most ungodly among the ungodly, than to be a hypocrite who masks hatred for the Son under the guise of a formal worship of his Father. Will you not fear for yourself? Will you not so shake for fear that you will turn in desperation to the Savior? Do not wait, if this is your status. Turn now. The days hurry on; the moment of grace may be fleeting. God grant that his grace might extend to you and that you might find yourself walking in the steps of Saul of Tarsus, who once opposed Christ but later served him, rather than in the steps of Caiaphas.

The Lord Jesus Christ

The third of the three great protagonists is Jesus. Yet he hardly seems to be a protagonist at this point, so great is his mastery of the situation.

Three factors contribute to that mastery. First, there is his knowledge of people and with that his knowledge of all that was transpiring. This is suggested at the beginning of the passage by the word "therefore." We are told that "Therefore Jesus no longer moved about publically among the Jews. Instead he withdrew to a region near the desert." What does it mean, "Therefore Jesus no longer moved about publically"? Simply that he knew of the decision of the council reported just one verse earlier. We have no reason to suppose that someone told him what had transpired. At least nothing like that is suggested. Jesus simply knew what was happening. No wonder John, who witnessed this, told us earlier, "But Jesus would not entrust himself to them, for he knew all men. He did not need man's testimony about man, for he knew what was in a man" (2:24-25). Nothing anyone has ever done has caught him by surprise.

Second, Jesus had a sense of God's timing. Jesus knew that he was to be crucified. He did not shrink from it. In fact, he prays just one chapter later, "What shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'? No, it was for this very reason I came to this hour" (12:27). Though the hour was coming, it was nevertheless not yet come. So he waited. At the precise moment and with great determination he entered Jerusalem.

This leads to the third point: his courage. The people, as they waited in Jerusalem, concluded that he would not come. After all, a man would have to be foolhardy indeed to take on the whole might and authority of Jewish officialdom. Of course he would not come. No one could expect him to come to this feast, things being what they were. But the people had underestimated Jesus. He was not fearful. He was courageous under God. Consequently, when the time came for his appearance, nothing, not all the rulers of Israel, no, not even the hosts of hell, would hinder him.

Barclay, who notes the presence of a similar courage in those who follow Jesus, writes thus of Martin Luther: "Luther was a man who hurled defiance at cautious souls who sought to hold him back from being too venturesome. He took what seemed to him the right course 'despite all cardinals, popes, kings and emperors, together with all devils and hell.' When he was cited to appear at Worms to answer for his attack on the abuses of the Roman Catholic Church, he was well warned of the danger in which he stood if he went. His answer was: I would go if there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on the housetops.' When told that Duke George would capture him, he answered: 'I would go if it rained Duke Georges.' It was not that Luther was not afraid, for often he made his greatest statements with a voice and with knees that shook; but he had that courage which conquered fear," which, we might add, he had learned from Jesus and in which many others, who have also known Jesus, share. Barclay concludes: "The Christian does not fear the consequences of doing the right thing; he fears the consequences of not doing it."

An Open Confession

This brings us to our conclusion and leads me to ask: Where are you in this summary of these three great protagonists? Each of us must be identified with one.

To say that it is not your fight, that you are not for Christ or against him, that you have other concerns—these sayings put you in the camp of the common people who were sympathetic but who would not come out openly for Jesus and who therefore missed their moment. Jesus was there, but they could not decide either for him or against him. Thus, one week they were with the mob who welcomed him into Jerusalem with palm branches, shouting "Blessed is the King of Israel, who comes in the name of the Lord," and the next they were the mob that shouted "Crucify him! Crucify him!" These people do not make history. They are victims of history. Moreover, they are victims of their own sin and selfishness, for to such it is just too costly to be identified with him.

What is the cost if you or anyone else is to be identified with him? First, there is renunciation. When Jesus asked people to come to him, the simplest form of his call was "Follow me." But there can be no following without a previous forsaking of all that keeps you from him. The disciples had forsaken all. So they were with Jesus in Ephraim. But these who were in Jerusalem had forsaken nothing. Thus, they were not with Jesus and did not even know where they might find him. Some people are in these shoes today because they will not renounce their sin.

Second, to follow Jesus one must confess him openly. Jesus said, "If anyone is ashamed of me and my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of Man will be ashamed of him when he comes in his Father's glory with the holy angels" (Mark 8:38). Or again, "Whoever acknowledges me before men, I will also acknowledge him before my Father in heaven" (Matt. 10:32).

If you find yourself in the great camp of the uncommitted and are disturbed by it, this is the way to move into the camp of Christ's followers. First, forsake all that can keep you from him. Second, confess him publicly. Will you do it? Will you say, "Yes, I have been uncommitted, but I will turn from my sin and my own plans for myself and will follow Jesus"? If you do, God will bless you. He will save you. The Bible says that "if you confess with your mouth, Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:9-10).

What will happen if you do not confess him? Before long you will find yourself in the second category, the category of those who are opposed to Jesus. This will occur because it is impossible ultimately to be neutral. Eventually you will have to decide, and when you decide against him you will be among those of the opposition whose eyes are increasingly blinded and whose hearts are hardened.

On the other hand, what will happen if you do believe? You will increasingly become like Jesus.
You may suffer as he did. Jesus warned that his way would be costly. But you also will become like him in insight, timing, and courage—even in this life. You will amount to something. And you will know God's full blessing both in this life and in the life to come.

Chapter 151.
Memorial to a Woman's Love

John 12:1-8

We now begin a study of the most momentous week in world history, a week that began with the arrival of Jesus of Nazareth at Bethany on his way up to Jerusalem, where he was to be crucified, and that ended with the crucifixion itself on what I believe to be Thursday of the Passion week. No other week is quite like this week, not even the other most important weeks of biblical history. The week of creation is an important week, beginning with God's creation of light and ending with God's resting upon the seventh day. The first week of Christ's earthly ministry is also important. The fourth evangelist is even careful to highlight it in the opening pages of his Gospel. Nevertheless, these weeks do not compare with the block of seven great days with which John and all the other Gospels end. Nearly one-half of John's Gospel is given over to a narration of the events of this week and what follows it (nearly two-fifths of Mark, over one-third of Matthew, and over one-fourth of Luke). And they are right to do so. For the events of this week were brought on by Christ's steadfast determination to go up to Jerusalem, to die for the sin of the world, and thereby to give his life a ransom for his people. The events of this week contain the anointing of Jesus at Bethany, the entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, the cursing of the fig tree, the Olivet discourse recorded by the Synoptics, the final discourses with the disciples recorded by John, the Last Supper, the arrest, trials, and crucifixion of Jesus, and the embalming and burial of the body by Joseph of Arimathaea and Nicodemus. After three more days the events of this week are climaxed by the resurrection.

Anointed for Burial

Knowing what this momentous week contains, as we do, we are not surprised to find that it begins with the supper given for Jesus in Bethany at which Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, anointed Jesus with spikenard, doing it, as Jesus said, "for the day of my burial." In actual fact, the burial was still six days away. But this was the moment at which Jesus was symbolically set apart for burial by the only one who really understood what was happening, just as in a similar way he was also set apart as God's great Passover Lamb on Palm Sunday.

John does not tell us all that happened as Jesus began his journey to Jerusalem for the final time, but we know some of the details from the other three Gospel writers. For one thing, we know that he did not return to Jerusalem directly from Ephraim, where we last saw him. If Ephraim was to the north of Jerusalem, as it seems reasonable to believe, Jesus could have returned directly southward, entering Jerusalem from the north. Instead of this, we know that he went east into the Jordan River valley, south to Jericho, and then upward to the west through Bethany to the capital. In Jericho, he had stayed with Zachaeus after the diminutive tax collector had climbed a sycamore tree in order to see him (Luke 19:1-10). As he left Jericho, he restored sight to blind Bartimaeus and his friend (Matt. 20:29-34; Mark 10:46-52).

John does not tell us these things, however. He only tells us that "Six days before the Passover Jesus arrived at Bethany, where Lazarus lived, whom Jesus had raised from the dead. Here a dinner was given in his honor. Martha served" (John 12:1-2).

From Matthew and Mark we learn that this was held in the house of Simon the leper, a man whom Jesus at one time had undoubtedly healed of his leprosy. This supper was presumably a celebration for the raising of Lazarus or, if you will, a "thank you" supper; and, as such, it was a brave thing for the friends of Jesus to have done. We remember that the Sanhedrin had given an order that if anyone knew where Jesus was, they should report it to the authorities. To fail to do so would make them more or less accessories to his crime. Still Christ's friends held this supper and held it openly. As a result of it we know that Lazarus at least was placed in danger; for we read just a few verses later, "So the chief priests made plans to kill Lazarus as well, for on account of him many of the Jews were going over to Jesus and putting their faith in him" (vv. 1011).

What stuck out in everyone's mind concerning this supper, however, was not the presence of Lazarus so much, or even the bravery of Christ's friends. What the disciples remembered of this dinner and wrote about long afterward was the act of Mary who, we are told, "took about a pint of pure nard, an expensive perfume; she poured it on Jesus' feet and wiped his feet with her hair" (v. 3).

One Who Knew

Our text contains a marvelous statement regarding Mary, for it tells us that she knew that Jesus was about to die. He was about to give his life for us on the cross, and Mary knew it. Moreover, she was the only one who knew, so far as we can tell. Jesus had tried to tell the others. Hours before on the way to Jerusalem he had told the disciples, "We are going up to Jerusalem ... and the Son of Man will be betrayed to the chief priests and teachers of the law. They will condemn him to death and will hand him over to the Gentiles, who will mock him and spit on him, flog him and kill him. Three days later he will rise" (Mark 10:33-34).

But the disciples had not understood it, as becomes clear from their conversation with Jesus in the Upper Room (John 1314) and from their despondent, almost unbelieving reaction to his crucifixion. Only Mary understood. She had understood for some time. Now she broke her box of perfume over Jesus in order to show him that she understood.

How did Mary understand these things when the others, particularly the disciples, failed? The answer is: by being often in the place where we find her now. Where? She is at the feet of Jesus, anointing him and wiping his feet with her hair. Where is she always? At the feet of Jesus! Thus we find her there in the story of the supper held for Jesus in her own home, the supper at which Martha busied herself with much serving, and we find her at Jesus' feet in John 11, at the time of Lazarus's death. In each case Mary is at his feet worshiping him and learning from him.

May I suggest that if you do not know much concerning spiritual things, it is because you have not spent time at the feet of Jesus? Do you want to learn? Do you want to grow strong in a knowledge of God's will and ways? Then you must learn from Jesus.

You say, "But how do I do that? Certainly I cannot sit at his feet literally today."

That is true, but you can do the same thing through studying the Bible. In Hebrew idiom, sitting at one's feet meant only to learn from that person. It was the place of a child learning from a parent, or a pupil learning from his rabbi. Today we do the same thing by studying the Book Christ gave us and in which we find him. Do you study the Bible? Do you really study it? Some people would like to know it, but they will not discipline themselves for the necessary work. Years ago a young boy was riding with a well-known Bible teacher on a train enroute to one of the Bible teacher's meetings. The teacher was reading his Bible. The boy was reading the newspaper. Finally, the boy looked over at his mentor and saw what he was doing. "I wish I knew the Bible as you do," he remarked in a complimentary way.

"You'll never get to know it by reading the newspaper," the teacher answered kindly. The boy got the message, put the paper away, and began to read his own Bible. In time he went on to become a widely known Bible teacher in his own right. Not all will become Bible teachers. But if we are to learn anything about Jesus, then the words about Jesus are essential and we must study them. Will you? I could wish that every one of us might become followers of Mary in this important characteristic.

Love's Extravagance

There is another characteristic also in which we should be like Mary. We should be like her in her love, and that even to the point of extravagance.

Here we get close to the real motivation of this wonderful woman. For when we ask, "Why did Mary pour out this valuable ointment on Jesus?" we cannot really answer adequately that she did it just to show that she knew that he was about to die. Jesus knew that anyway, and she knew that he knew. No, she also did it for something much more simple and more sublime. She did it just to show that she loved him, understood his sorrow at what was coming, and wanted to identify with him in his sorrow even as he had identified with her in her sorrow and in her moments of joy. Did she succeed? Of course, she did. She had sat at his feet, looked into his eyes, and seen his sorrow. She had said to herself, "What can I do to show that I love him and that I understand what he is doing for us?" She had thought of her most precious possession, her ointment. She said, "I'll give him that." She had given it, and he (as is always the case) had understood. In replying to Judas it is as though Christ had said, "Stop annoying the woman, for she alone of all of you has understood what I am about to do and loves me for doing it."

Are you like Mary? Or are you like the Judases of the world, who criticize those who are bountiful in their love? What a contrast there is at this point! Judas's objection to Mary's action contains the first recorded words of Judas in the Gospels. They are a carping complaint:

"Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred denarii, and given to the poor?" Mary's first words are a trusting confession, "Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died" (John 11:32). Out of his greed Judas eventually sold Christ for thirty pieces of silver, an amount probably equal to 120 denarii. Mary gave Jesus an offering worth two-and-a-half times that amount. Judas kept the bag, from which he pilfered. Mary broke her box in order that all might be given to Jesus. Judas sought to turn attention from Jesus. Mary sought to turn it to him.

So who are you like? Judas? Or the one who gave her all for Jesus? Remember, as you think of this, that Mary gave her most valued possession. Your most valued possession will be different. It may be a comfortable home, a successful self-image, a bank account, a pension, a family, or a dozen other things. But whatever it is, the question holds. Could you (would you) give it for Jesus? Is there a way that you could employ it to serve him, or just to show your love for him? Would you let your children leave the standard of life that you have created for them, and of which you are so proud, to go into Christian work, perhaps in a distant unrewarding place? Would you leave everything to go yourself, if God should so lead you? Would you be able to use your substance to send others?

"But I would be throwing away all that I have worked for," you say. Yes, in a sense you would. At least, that is the way the world will look at it. But, on the other hand, you will be investing in great spiritual dividends with God. Such blessings bestowed on Christ out of love always come home to roost on those who dispense them.

We see this in the case of Mary. Mary had broken her box, giving her all. Then she stooped to wipe Christ's feet with her hair. From her point of view that was the end of the story. But John adds, "And the house was filled with the fragrance of the perfume." How did the house become filled with that odor? It may have spread around all by itself, of course. But on the other hand, if Mary was also helping to serve (as I have no reason for doubting she was) and if the odor of the ointment was now in her hair (as it must have been), then the odor may well have spread from her with the result that her gift to Jesus, given with no thought of herself, nevertheless became the means by which she shared the blessing.

Apply this personally. If you are not a blessing to other people, if seeing you does not make them think of Jesus, if your own life seems dry and unprofitable, then do what Mary did. Get down on your knees before Jesus. Give him your all. Do it now. Pour out your life before him. If you seek to hoard your life and substance, you will not be a blessing to others, and you will lose even those possessions in the end. "You will be saved," as Paul says, "but as by fire." On the other hand, if you give him your life, then you will become enriched yourself and will inevitably become a blessing to all about you.

A Lasting Memorial

There is one final lesson in the story though John does not bring it out verbally. At the end of the story in both Matthew and Mark, after Jesus has explained Mary's motivation in anointing him, the Savior goes on to say, "I tell you the truth, wherever the gospel is preached throughout the world, what she has done will also be told, in memory of her" (Mark 14:9). Mary's act was to become a lasting memorial of her love for Jesus, and so it has. What the others did on that occasion has been forgotten; many of their names have even been forgotten. But Mary—well, Mary is remembered. Indeed, after the passage of two thousand years we are remembering her now.

Do you want to be remembered? Then do not build monuments, build love. Do not be stingy with your possessions, share them. Share yourself. Give yourself away. Jesus said, "For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me and for the gospel will save it" (Mark 8:35).

And one more thing: Mary loved Jesus and gave her all, but so also did Martha. She did not give her ointment. She had none to give, I suppose. As I read the story and try to understand Martha, I even suspect that Martha was not the kind of person who treasured perfume, or kept it for a special occasion, as Mary did. Martha would not have valued the perfume, but she did value something. She valued hard work. That can be seen in every context in which we find her. So what is she doing? She is working. She is dealing in perspiration rather than perfume. But, more importantly, she is serving Jesus, and she is not complaining about it as she did formerly.

What a joy to serve Jesus! In any form! Ironside tells of an elderly man who had always wanted to be a preacher but who had no gift for it. He was a successful businessman, high up in his company. But he wanted to get involved in Christian work somehow. So he helped open up a small mission hall in the downtown area of one of our big cities. There, after the office had closed for the weekend, he would roll up his trouser legs and shirt sleeves, take a bucket of water and a brush, and clean the chairs and floor. No one in the company knew of his service. Besides, as is often the case when something is done well but quietly, no one even thought to ask who did the cleaning. One day a couple of men from his company went over to the hall on a Saturday to get some songbooks, and they saw him scrubbing. They threw up their hands and said, "Oh, we never knew you were doing this! You shouldn't do it. We will scrub the floor, or at least we will get someone else to scrub it."

The old man objected. "No," he said, "please let me do it. I want to do it for Jesus' sake" That is exactly it. "For Jesus' sake!" It is not so much what is done that is important, though there are specific things that need to be done. It is rather that it be done for Jesus and that it be done by those whose hearts are fully surrendered to him.

Chapter 152.
Inescapable Evidence

John 12:9-11

For those who live in America in the post-Watergate era there is no novelty at all in the idea of people trying to destroy evidence. The Watergate tapes are themselves an example. The famous "eighteen-minute gap" is a further specific. In colloquial language we even speak of burying the evidence. If one is innocent, there is no need to destroy evidence. If one is guilty, this is at least one way of trying to avoid conviction and maintain a facade.

When we think of it we soon recognize that this is nothing new. For one thing, we do it ourselves. We try to cover over facts that present us in a less-than-favorable light. For another, we find similar cases from other periods of world history.

Here is a biblical example. "A large crowd of Jews found out that Jesus was there and came, not only because of him but also to see Lazarus, whom he had raised from the dead. So the chief priests made plans to kill Lazarus as well, for on account of him many of the Jews were going over to Jesus and putting their faith in him" (12:9-11). These verses tell us that as a result of Jesus' miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead, Lazarus had become important as evidence that Jesus was right in his teaching and that the rulers of the people, the Pharisees and Sadducees, were wrong. The Pharisees and Sadducees were, therefore, seeking to destroy the evidence by killing Lazarus.

One Must Die

It is a sad picture in some ways; such things always are. But it is humorous too, when we remember that the decision to start killing people was reached after Caiaphas had first argued, "It is better for us that one man die for the people" (John 11:50). At that time it was one. But now the rulers are finding out that one will not do. Jesus is not enough. Now it is "Lazarus also." In time it will be Stephen and James and Peter and then the many other martyrs. Such is the course of trying to cover up evidence for a truth. It is as if the truth were an artesian well or spring. A person can try to hide it if it is a tiny stream. But sooner or later the water will come bubbling through, bearing dirt with it. The efforts to cover it up, no matter how great, will be wasted.

G. Campbell Morgan writes on this point, "Hostility to God as manifested in Christ, has been the characteristic of the world ever since [the days of Jesus and Lazarus], and it has ever been trying to get rid of him. How many have they put to death in the endeavor? Pilate probably thought he had done the business presently when he put Jesus on the cross. When he handed him over it was with a sort of sense of relief, that it was done with. Done with! Within a couple of generations the power he represented had to repeat the martyrdom of Jesus ten thousand times in Rome itself." That is the point (or at least one of two points) of this study: the evidence for the truth of Christ's teaching and of his power to change lives is undestroyable and therefore inescapable.

The other point, since I suppose that we should really separate them, is that those who are Christians are the evidence and should therefore be equally undestroyable and inescapable. Are you evidence of Christ's claims? Are you really? If so, you should be like Lazarus, whom we find in this story, and should share his experience.

An Irresistible Attraction

What is it that we learn about Lazarus in these verses? We learn several things, the first of which is that he had become an irresistible attraction. Jesus had raised him from the dead; now people were coming to Bethany, not just to see Jesus (whom most had seen before) but also to see Lazarus and hear his story. The text says, "A large crowd of Jews found out that Jesus was there and they came, not only because of him but also to see Lazarus, whom he had raised from the dead" (v. 9).

I wonder if you are irresistible as evidence of the truth of Christ's teaching. I wonder further if you are really an attraction by which men and women are finding him. Are you good bait? Has your life been made so delicious by Jesus that others cannot resist biting and thereby getting caught by the greatest of all fishermen?

As I ask those questions I know you may have to admit that you are not irresistibly attractive in the sense about which I am speaking, and you may be concerned about it. If you are, let me point out the two things that made Lazarus attractive and show how they apply to you. First, Lazarus had been brought to life by Jesus. He had been dead. He had no hope of making any physical recovery. Others, even his own sisters, Mary and Martha, had no hope of reviving him. But Jesus came and raised him from the dead. He had called with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come out," and Lazarus had come out of the tomb still bound with grave clothes. Granted, none of us has ever been physically dead. We cannot say that we have been brought back to physical life by Jesus. But we have been dead spiritually. The Bible teaches this when it declares that we "were dead in transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Being dead, we were without hope of recovery, just as Lazarus was. Then Jesus came and called us, as a result of which we were made alive and rose up at his voice to follow him. This is the case of all who are Christians. This is what it means to be a Christian. It means to have been made alive by Jesus. Consequently, we too can be an attraction by which others find Jesus, if we have really been made alive by him.

Another way of saying the same thing is to say that ultimately it is not we who are attractive; it is Jesus. Therefore he must be in us if he is to attract others to himself through us. Is Jesus in you? Are you a thoroughly converted person? If not, remember what Jesus said to Peter shortly before his crucifixion. He said, "When you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:32). This meant that Peter was in no position to help others until he had himself—after his cowardly denial of Jesus—turned again to Jesus and been changed by him.

The second thing we notice about Lazarus is that he was with Jesus. Indeed, John stresses this; for he points out that at the dinner given for Jesus in Bethany "Martha served, while Lazarus was among those reclining at the table with him" (John 12:2). I can imagine Lazarus being constantly by Jesus in those days, so that those who came to see Jesus saw Lazarus and those who came to see Lazarus inevitably saw Jesus. Can anything be plainer? Put yourself in the place of Lazarus and then conclude: I will help others to see Jesus to the degree that I spend time with him.

It is easy to see why this is so; for those who spend time with Jesus become like Jesus, and Jesus is the true attraction. Ralph Keiper wrote that this truth was one factor in his own discovery of the secret of effective witnessing. Before this time, he had looked upon people as fish to be caught, and he was distressed that so many ungrateful people would not cooperate in letting him save them. He imagined, so he says, that their obstinacy would cause him to get an "F" on his report card in heaven. Then he discovered that his first job was not to win souls but rather to be like Jesus. He writes, "Turning to the Scripture, I was stunned by what I found. I discovered that my first duty was not to win souls for Christ. My primary obligation was to live for him in the daily tasks which were mine, so that the people with whom I came in contact might see God's salvation in action." After he had learned the secret of being with Christ and therefore of becoming like Christ, the "job" of witnessing became the "joy" of leading others to him.

I need to point this out in the opposite way too. I have said that as we spend time with Jesus we will become like Jesus and therefore become an attraction for him. But on the other hand, we will be like him only to the extent that we spend time with him. To put it in other words, our time of prayer and Bible study cannot be neglected.

Here I can profitably quote from Hugh Evan Hopkins's excellent little book Henceforth. "The practical side to victory over sin lies in the keeping of a Quiet Time with God. It is then that faith is fed and holiness cultivated and victories won. Nothing in the life of the Christian is more attacked than his times alone with his God. Yet nothing is more essential if he is to go forward in the spiritual life. Frequent interviews with his Master are the secret of abiding in him. All the saints of the past have been men who have made time to see their King's face. John Wesley and Charles Simeon were up by four in the morning; Bishop Ken and Samuel Rutherford are reputed to have risen earlier still; Lancelot Andrews spent five hours a day in his devotions; Gordon of Khartoum used to tie a white handkerchief outside his tent door during his Quiet Time and no one was allowed to disturb him." Hopkins acknowledges that such prolonged hours are hardly possible for the average man or woman today, in our much busier times. But he adds, "The essential point is determination and sincerity of purpose rather than length of time. The closed door and the quiet spirit are what the Father requires of his children when they would meet with him."

One other truth follows from the fact that Lazarus spent time with Jesus. He became courageous. It was not easy to be courageous in such times, for the friends of Jesus as well as Jesus were in danger. But if they were near him, they could be bold even though danger threatened.

A Threat to Unbelievers

There is a second characteristic that we learn about Lazarus from these verses. He was a threat to unbelievers. In this case the unbelievers were the chief priests. We read of them, "So the chief priests made plans to kill Lazarus as well, for on account of him, many of the Jews were going over to Jesus and putting their faith in him" (vv. 10-11).

There were two ways in which Lazarus was a threat to these men. First, they were threatened politically. The chief priests were the wealthy, aristocratic rulers of the Jewish people. They were not particularly religious, but they were successful. They were at the top of the social heap; they had much to lose. In Roman times a conquered people were often permitted great freedom in governing themselves, as the Jews were. But let an insurrection start, even a small civil disobedience, and at once the Roman armies cracked down. Usually they executed the insurrectionists and removed from authority those who had been responsible for keeping the peace. These were the days of Passover. Excitement was running high. The chief priests saw Jesus as the leader of a potential rebellion. Everything he did inflamed the situation, so they believed. The raising of Lazarus inflamed it most of all! So they determined to remove Lazarus as a political factor.

The one who spends enough time with Jesus will always become a threat to unbelievers, particularly those whose chief interest is in maintaining their own position, the status quo. This does not mean that believers in Jesus will become revolutionaries in the political sense, at least not with violence. But it means that they will become revolutionaries in a far deeper sense, for by their values they will be a challenge to the established and selfish comfort of mere political authority. Christians have always been a threat in this sense, at least to the degree that they become like Jesus.

Lazarus was a threat to the chief priests in another sense also. He was a threat to their beliefs or theology. We must remember that the chief priests were all Sadducees and that, unlike the Pharisees, the Sadducees did not believe in the resurrection of the dead. It was the Sadducees who tried to trap Jesus with a problem regarding the seven brothers who had each been married to the same woman. They had asked, "Whose wife shall she be in the resurrection?" Here were Sadducees, who did not believe in the resurrection. Suddenly they are confronted with this unknown man Lazarus, who had been raised from the dead. What were they to do? Where could they turn? The irony of the situation is almost humorous, and John does not miss it in telling the story. For he refers here just to the Sadducees and not to the Pharisees and the chief priests as he had in recounting the results of the council earlier. These men were threatened politically, and they were threatened theologically. So, unless they could take decisive action both their power and the influence of their teaching would soon be slipping from beneath their feet.

There was only one course for them to follow. Since they would not believe in Jesus, the only thing they could do was seek to eliminate Lazarus.

Have you become a threat to anyone because of your testimony? If you have, you will know soon enough; for it is likely that you yourself will be threatened. Does your life challenge anyone through its Christlike character? Then prepare to be defamed. Does your testimony with its clear logic and unimpeachable experience strike home to the hearts of those who hear you? Then be prepared to be called a fool for your testimony. Does your love for the lost expose, as it must, the great hate and selfishness of the world around you? Then be prepared to be hated and even spit upon for Christ's sake. Do not be under an illusion as to what it means truly to follow Jesus, for Jesus himself did not allow anyone to be deceived on that subject. He told his disciples that following him meant a cross. As someone has said, "He never hides his scars to win disciples." On the other hand, you can know that to be with him in his suffering is to be identified with him and to allow him to bring glory through you to his own name.

A Blessing to Many

There is one final thing that we learn about Lazarus from these verses. It is for this perhaps above all that Christ's enemies wished to destroy him. He was a blessing; for many, we are told, believed on Jesus because of Lazarus. Here was a man so much alive because of Jesus and so identified with him in discipleship that others believed on Jesus just because of him. The application is obvious. Has anyone believed on Jesus because of you? Can it be said of you, "On account of him [or her], many put their faith in Jesus" (v. 11)?

One year the missionary conference of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia was attended by four veteran missionaries. Two were a couple who had given more than thirty years of their lives to working in unevangelized fields in Africa. Another, together with her husband, has done pioneer Bible translation work in Mexico. The last had spent over forty years in Spain. These presented their work at a series of meetings and dinners during the week and then eventually returned to their fields. After they were gone I received this letter from a woman who had been a member of the church for many years and had attended the conference. She wrote, "In 1936, I started attending Tenth Church while in college and have followed ever since then the work of these three missionaries, who had just then left for missionary service. The Wolls have evangelized Kenya in that time. They have trained and sent out workers. They have established churches and Bible schools. Maria Bolet in that same time has been training Spanish missionaries in a Bible school and has sent those trained throughout Spain. She has operated summer camps. She has been persecuted, several times been put out of Spain, and then allowed to return. Now the children of her earlier converts are attending camps, and the mothers are crying out for more camps. In that time the Lathrops have reduced a language to writing, have translated the New Testament into that language, and have evangelized the entire Tarascan area of Mexico. They have established an indigenous church there. I have pursued my profession at home and overseas and have a few years remaining, a satisfying career. But who will greet me in heaven when I arrive there and say, 'I am here because you gave your life to proclaim the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ'? Who will count me such a blessing?"

I know this person well enough to know that she has been a blessing. Quite a few have come to know and trust in Christ as a result of her testimony. But the question still stands—for me and for you. Have you been brought to spiritual life by Jesus? Can others tell that you have been with Jesus? Have any believed on Jesus because of your testimony? God grant that this might be true of each of us, or that we will allow God to make it true as we spend more time with him.

Chapter 153.
The King Is Coming

John 12:12-19

With the exception of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, no incident from his life is better known than his triumphal entry into Jerusalem on what has come to be known as Palm Sunday. Yet, few incidents from his life are more widely misunderstood. For whatever reason— whether the love of mere spectacle, the requirements of church liturgies, or just the misreading of the Gospel accounts—the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday has been regarded by many as a last public offer of himself as King to the people of Jerusalem. Up to this point he had avoided allowing himself to be thought of as a King, so the argument goes. But now, with the hostility of the leaders of the people building up against him and with the moment of his destiny rapidly closing in, Jesus makes one last attempt to gain a following. It is only when the Hosannas turn to demands for his crucifixion that Jesus abandons this plan and goes to Calvary.

Unfortunately for this view, the Gospels tell us that Jesus had already offered himself to Israel as King once, early in his ministry (Matt. 4:17). He had been rejected. Now he entered Jerusalem with an entirely different purpose.

He Came to Die

Why, then, did Jesus enter Jerusalem as he did on Palm Sunday? There are several answers to that question, the first of which is that he came to die. Here Mark's account is most explicit, for he tells us that Jesus explained this to his disciples just two days earlier, that is, on the Friday preceding the Passover at which he was killed. "They were on their way up to Jerusalem, with Jesus leading the way, and the disciples were astonished, while those who followed were afraid. Again he took the Twelve aside and told them what was going to happen to him. 'We are going up to Jerusalem,' he said, 'and the Son of Man will be betrayed to the chief priests and teachers of the law. They will condemn him to death and will hand him over to the Gentiles, who will mock him and spit on him, flog him and kill him. Three days later he will rise'" (Mark 10:32-34).

Against this background it is certain that Jesus entered Jerusalem as he did, not to win over the people (the time for that had long passed) but rather to goad the Pharisees and chief priests into action and thus precipitate the events that he knew awaited him.

Scriptures Fulfilled

The second reason why Jesus entered Jerusalem as he did was that he might fulfill Scripture. To us this may seem like an inverted way of doing things. We think that Jesus, as God, should be bound by nothing. But Jesus did consider himself bound by Scripture as an infallible expression of the will of the Father, as many other Scripture-led actions throughout his ministry also indicate. Thus, both Matthew and John refer to the prophecy of Zechariah in which was written, "Rejoice greatly, O Daughter of Zion! Shout, Daughter of Jerusalem! See, your king comes to you, righteous and having salvation, gentle and riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey" (Zech. 9:9). John tells us that the disciples did not understand this at the time but that they came to understand it later.

When Did Jesus Die?

To my way of thinking the most important reason why Jesus entered Jerusalem, particularly when he did, was to show himself to be our Passover. That is, he wanted to exhibit himself as our Passover Lamb who was to take away the sins of the world.

The making of this point depends upon the dating of the events of the Passover week at which Jesus was killed. So it is necessary to deviate from our main theme in order to deal with the problems of that dating. In the traditional view of this week Jesus was crucified on a Friday, which we call Good Friday, and was raised from the dead early on Easter Sunday morning. In terms of the Jewish calendar, this means that the Passover Sabbath was Saturday; so Saturday must have been the fifteenth of the month of Nisan. In this reconstruction Jesus therefore entered Jerusalem on Sunday, the ninth of Nisan, after a Sabbath rest in Bethany, was crucified on the fourteenth and was raised from the dead on the sixteenth.

The strength of the traditional view results from two factors; first, the length of the tradition and, second, the apparent placing of the crucifixion of Jesus on the day immediately before the regular Saturday Sabbath by all four of the Gospel writers (Matt. 27:62; Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; and John 19:31). In spite of these factors, which are, however, not as obvious as they appear, the traditional view presents us with several major difficulties.

Most people who know anything at all about the Bible are aware of the first difficulty. It is the difficulty of squaring a Friday crucifixion with Christ's prophecy that the Son of Man shall "be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40). It is true that according to Jewish idiom the phrase "three days" does not necessarily mean a period of seventy-two hours. It can mean merely one whole day plus parts of two others. But while this observation helps us in dealing with texts that actually say "three days," it hardly helps us in dealing with this important prophecy from Matthew. "It is possible that parts of one day and one night are involved, rather than three full days and three full nights; nevertheless, three periods of light and three periods of darkness must be accounted for. And this, regardless of anything else, is fatal to a Friday crucifixion theory. As one writer says, "Add to this indictment of Friday the statement of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, spoken on the afternoon of Sunday (Luke 24:21), 'Today is the third day since these things were done,' and the case looks black indeed against Friday. Sunday is not the third day since Friday."

The second difficulty with the Friday dating is one known to anyone who has attempted to sort out the events of the final Passover week and assign them days. On an average, about one-third of the Gospels is taken up with the events of the last week of Christ's life; we should rightly infer from this that the events of this week, being of great importance, are given to us fairly completely and in detail. Indeed, from the arrival of Jesus in Bethany, six days before the Passover, until the resurrection, every moment seems to be accounted for. Yet when the events of these days are pieced together one whole day, and possibly two, is lacking. One of the silent days can be explained as the preceding Sabbath, a day in which Jesus rested in Bethany and received those who came to see both himself and Lazarus. But what of the other day? Can it really be that in a week as full as this one was, one whole day is unaccounted for?

It should be noticed that the difficulty of accounting for this day has led no less careful a scholar than Frederick Godet to move the events of Palm Sunday forward to Monday, thereby compressing six days of activity into five. However, we cannot help also noticing that the same effect can be achieved by moving the crucifixion backward a day to Thursday rather than by moving Palm Sunday forward.

One more difficulty must be seen before we attempt a solution. It is a difficulty of more recent development. The dating of historical events is a complicated and often uncertain matter, involving the days and times of solar and lunar eclipses and of new moons. But in recent years, thanks to the use of computers, much that was formerly uncertain is known. Thus, to give an example, as recently as 1973, a work entitled New and Full Moons by Herman H. Goldstine was published, from which it is possible to calculate the days of the week upon which the Jewish Passover had to fall in any given year during Christ's lifetime or thereafter. If this would establish a Saturday Passover and therefore a Friday crucifixion for any year near the time at which Jesus must have been crucified, it would be excellent support for the traditional theory.
But, in fact, it does not. Instead, the day before Passover falls on a Friday only in the year A.D. 26, which is too early, and in the year A.D. 33, which most scholars agree is too late.

What, then, are we to do with these problems? Is there a solution? I believe there is and that it is obviously the solution, once we get over the idea that the crucifixion must have been on a Friday, as tradition says. The solution is simply that two Sabbaths were involved in this last week of Christ's earthly ministry. One was the regular weekly Sabbath, which always fell on Saturday.
The second was an extra Passover Sabbath, which, in this particular week, must have come on Friday. In this reconstruction, Jesus would have been crucified on Thursday and would have been raised from the dead sometime before dawn on Sunday morning.

April 6, A.D. 30

What does this rearrangement do to the problems we have already encountered as a result of the traditional dating? In a word, it eliminates each one. First, it clearly allows for the required three days and three nights in the tomb in line with Christ's prophecy. Jesus had spoken of a period beginning with daylight and comprising the whole of three days and nights, with the possible qualification that the opening period of day and the closing period of night need not necessarily be a full twelve hours. This is provided for as follows. Jesus died on Thursday afternoon about three o'clock; hence, the hours from 3:00 p.m. until dusk qualify as the first day. This period is followed by Thursday night, Friday, Friday night, Saturday, and Saturday night; that is, a total of three days and three nights in that precise order. In this scheme of things Jesus could have risen from the dead at any point after dark on Saturday evening. We know that he had been raised before the women got to the tomb at dawn on Sunday morning.

It is worth adding here that several minor points tend to reinforce this conclusion. For one thing, when the soldiers invented their excuse as to why they were unable to guard the tomb successfully, they ended up saying, "His disciples came during the night and stole him away while we were asleep" (Matt. 28:13). This would be a natural outcome if the resurrection and the subsequent opening of the tomb by the angels took place during the night.

The second area of difficulty for the traditional view is the absence of one whole day of activities during the final week. This too is overcome if the crucifixion is seen to have been on Thursday. In this scheduling of events we have the following:

Sunday: Jesus enters Jerusalem riding on a donkey after having first made arrangements to secure the animal. He goes to the temple and looks about, but as it is late he returns to Bethany, having done nothing.

Monday: Jesus returns to Jerusalem. On the way he curses the fig tree as a symbol of the barrenness of Israel and as a prophecy of what was coming to the nation. In Jerusalem he cleanses the temple for the final time and returns to Bethany where he spends each night of this week save the last.

Tuesday: On the way back to Jerusalem the disciples find the fig tree withered and receive Christ's explanation. In the city the disciples comment on the magnificence of the temple and are told that the day is coming when it will be torn down. On the way home Jesus pauses on the Mount of Olives to give what has come to be called the Olivet Discourse concerning things to come. Prophecy seems to be the theme of this day from beginning to end.

Wednesday: Jesus sends the disciples to make preparation for the Passover that is, however, eaten that evening without the Passover lamb. Jesus is arrested that same night as he deliberately tarries in the Garden of Gethsemane on what would have been his normal trip back to Bethany.

Thursday: Jesus is tried and eventually crucified. The trial begins on what we would call Wednesday night (but which is actually the early hours of Thursday by Jewish reckoning) and is completed in the morning. Jesus is buried that evening by Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea. The women observe where Jesus is buried and buy spices, but as it is now the start of the Jewish Passover (that is, the Friday Passover Sabbath that began at dusk on Thursday evening), they are unable to attempt to anoint the body until Sunday morning.

Friday and Saturday: The body of Jesus remains in the tomb. The women and disciples observe the two Sabbaths. Jesus rises from the dead sometime between the coming of darkness on Saturday evening and the coming of the dawn on Sunday morning.

The final difficulty with the traditional view is also easily answered in accord with the Thursday Passover theory. We recall that the day before Passover, the fourteenth of Nisan, did not fall on a Friday between the years A.D. 26 and A.D. 33. But how about Thursday? The answer is that the fourteenth of Nisan fell on a Thursday once during those years and that this one time perfectly fits the situation. The fourteenth of Nisan fell on a Thursday in the year A.D. 30, the most probable year of the crucifixion even by other measurements. Therefore, to put it in our terminology, the crucifixion of Jesus may be dated with some certainty as having occurred on April 6, A.D. 30.

Christ Our Passover

But what does this mean for the question with which we began this study, namely, why did Jesus enter Jerusalem as he did on Palm Sunday? Well, if the crucifixion, which we know to have been on the fourteenth of Nisan, occurred on a Thursday as I have just argued, then counting backward we find that Palm Sunday was the tenth of Nisan, which is important, because it was on that day that the thousands of Passover lambs that were to be sacrificed were taken up to Jerusalem and kept for three days in the homes of those who were to eat them.

Not all are aware how many lambs were involved. So it is necessary to note that there was a great number. Josephus, the Jewish historian, tells us that one year a census was taken of the number of lambs slain for Passover and that the figure was 256,500. In other words, with numbers this large, lambs must literally have been driven up to Jerusalem throughout the entire day. Consequently, whenever Jesus entered the city he must have done so surrounded by lambs, himself being the greatest of lambs. Four days later, at the time the lambs were killed, Jesus himself was killed, thereby becoming the ultimate Passover lamb on the basis of whose shed blood the angel of spiritual death passes over all who place their trust in him.

Is he your Passover? Have you received him as your Savior? Say with Isaiah, "He was pierced for my transgressions, he was crushed for my iniquities; the punishment that brought me peace was upon him, and by his wounds I am healed" (Isa. 53:5). Truly, "we all like sheep have gone astray," but in accord with his grace "the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all."

Chapter 154.
Christ's Hour Come

John 12:20-23

As a preacher and public speaker it falls to my lot to see a side of pulpits that congregations seldom see. On the audience side of the pulpit there is usually ornamentation, perhaps a carved figure or a cross. On the speaker's side there are less glamorous things: buttons to push, wires to trip over, stacks of books, glasses, fans, heaters, squeaky boards, and so on. I have been in pulpits held up by hymnbooks. I have been in pulpits equipped with a clock—so the speaker knows when to stop. Sometimes there are signs: "The service ends at 12:00 noon" or "When the red light goes on you will have just two minutes remaining." Obviously, I am not always as impressed with the pulpits as I trust the audiences are with the messages that come from them.

There is one pulpit that I always remember favorably, however. It is the pulpit of the little chapel on the campus of the Stony Brook School, located at Stony Brook, Long Island. I suppose that there are times when the backside of this pulpit is filled with hymnbooks and glasses of water too. There may even be buttons. But I have never noticed these things when I have been there, because of something else. That something else is a quotation from the Bible, which faces the preacher as he stands to address his congregation. It is a short quotation, but an arresting one. It simply says, "Sir, we would see Jesus."

"We would see Jesus!" That is a good word for any preacher. I could wish that every preacher and teacher of the Word of God might have those words before him constantly as he prepares his messages and as he speaks them. But at the same time, the sentence is also a word for all who hear or read messages. Would you see Jesus? If that is the case, then in one sense you will never be disappointed; for you will find Jesus. I know that any given sermon may be disappointing. I have been in places where it is almost always disappointing. Still, you will find Jesus if you seek him. He himself said, "Ask and it will be given you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives; he who seeks finds; and to him who knocks the door will be opened" (Luke 11:9-10).

We Would See Jesus

I introduce our study in this way because the verse I have quoted—"Sir, we would see Jesus"— occurs in the midst of a story told in the next few verses of John's Gospel, and it is this story we want to study. Interestingly enough, we are not told that the people who made this request actually did see Jesus, though I do not doubt that they did. Rather, we are told of Christ's reply to their question and, therefore, indirectly of the significance of the fact that they had asked it. The significance of the story for us lies in the fact that we will see Jesus when we properly understand his answer.

We do not know precisely when the incident that is recorded here took place, for John does not give us a time indication. From my reading of the other Gospels I doubt that it was on the same day Jesus made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, for on that occasion he seems to have returned quickly to Bethany. Perhaps it was the next day, or the next. On the day following his dramatic entry into Jerusalem, Jesus cleansed the temple courtyard of the money changers who were always found there. And, since this was in the so-called "Court of the Gentiles," it may be that the Gentiles who came to Christ—for they were Greeks in the gentile sense, not Hellenistic Jews—saw his actions. At any rate, some time after Christ's dramatic appearance in the capital certain Greeks came to see this great rabbi from Nazareth.

We are told that the Gentiles came first to Philip, though John does not say why. It may be because Philip had a Greek name: Philipos. It meant "a lover of horses." The name may also have reminded them of the great Greek king, Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander. At any rate, they came to Philip; and Philip, who did not know whether Jesus would talk to Gentiles or not, went to Andrew. Incidentally, Andrew also had a Greek name, and both men had come from Bethsaida, a town that was located near a Greek area of the ancient east known as Syrophoenicia. Together Philip and Andrew conveyed the Greeks' request to Jesus.

If we ask why Philip hesitated to bring the Greeks to Jesus immediately, we must remember that from the point of view of the disciples there had been some ambiguity in Christ's actions toward the Gentiles. When he had sent them out on their first preaching mission, he had instructed them, "Do not go among the Gentiles or enter any town of the Samaritans. Go rather to the lost sheep of Israel" (Matt. 10:5-6). He had told the Syrophoenician woman, "First let the children eat all they want, for it is not right to take the children's bread and toss it to their dogs" (Mark 7:27). He had told the woman of Samaria, "Salvation is from the Jews" (John 4:22). On the other hand, Jesus had healed the daughter of the Syrophoenician woman at her request, and apparently he had gone out of his way not only to reach the woman of Samaria but also to preach to her entire town. We recognize that Jesus was not bigoted in his more restrictive statements and actions. He simply felt an obligation to proclaim the coming of his kingdom first to Israel, in fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies. Besides, he knew that the prophecies foretold a turning to the Gentiles after Israel had rejected her Messiah. But Philip and Andrew did not understand this and so must have debated the matter before going to him.

Christ's Hour

I do not know what Andrew and Philip were expecting when they first told Jesus that the Greeks had come to see him. But I am certain they were completely surprised by his answer. They might have expected him to say, "I am not seeing Greeks now." Or, again, "I would be glad to see them." But Jesus voiced neither of these. Instead, he seems to have looked upon the coming of the Greeks as a sign that the climax of his mission had at last arrived; for he said, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified" (v. 23).

This, then, is the first point of Christ's reply. His hour had come. The phrase makes us think of those other instances throughout the Gospel in which we are told that his hour had not yet come. The first was in chapter 2. There Jesus had been confronted by his mother with the implied request that he do something about the lack of wine at a wedding. He replied, "Woman, why do you involve me? My time has not yet come" (2:4). In other words, though Jesus later provided approximately 120 gallons of the best wine, he was saying that the hour of his crucifixion had not yet come and that he therefore did not want to draw attention to himself by means of a public miracle. In the same way, we read in John 7 that Christ's brothers wanted him to go up to Jerusalem at the time of one of the feasts in order to do miracles there. They did not believe on him, John tells us. But they had noticed that his followers seemed to be slipping away at this particular time and thought that a few strategically performed miracles might recover the lost momentum. Jesus replied that the brothers could go up to Jerusalem any time they wanted, for their time was always at their own disposal. On the other hand, he said, "The right time for me has not yet come" (7:6, 8). Similarily, on two other occassions when the leaders of the people were seeking to arrest him, John the Evangelist concludes, "But no one laid a hand on him, because his time had not yet come" (7:30; 8:20). All through the three years of his public ministry this had been a dominant theme, but now suddenly it changes. Before, "My hour has not yet come." Now, "The hour has come." And all, so John implies, because of the coming of the unnamed Greeks to Jesus in Jerusalem.

What was the significance of the Greeks? Clearly, they were a sign that the turning point had come, as a result of which salvation would now be offered to Greeks as well as to Jews. Indeed, it would be the beginning of the proclamation of the gospel to the entire world.

John indicates this in his own careful way in telling the story. He does it by contrast and irony.
The contrast is seen in the picture of the Greeks, on the one hand, and in the picture of the Pharisees given just one verse earlier, on the other. The Pharisees had rejected Jesus. They were Jews, even the most highly regarded of religious figures among the Jews. Yet they had rejected Jesus and were going about to kill him. On the other hand, here were Gentiles, aliens from the house of Israel, seeking him. The irony that I mentioned is also seen in these verses. In verse 19 the Pharisees, who have rejected Jesus, complain, "See, this is getting us nowhere. Look how the whole world has gone after him!" As they say this they are thinking of the great Jewish crowd that had surrounded Christ on Palm Sunday. But they spoke truer than they knew, for this was the point at which literally the entire world, represented by these Greeks, was beginning to go after him.

Christ's Glory

The second point in Christ's response to the question of the Greeks is that now he was to be glorified. "The hour has come," he said. That is, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified."

There are two senses in which this was true. The first is that it was obviously glorifying to Christ to have the Greeks come to him, indeed, to have all men come to him for salvation. We tend to think in the opposite way, as C. S. Lewis has pointed out in a brilliant little essay called "The Inner Ring." We tend to think that we have arrived when we are exclusive. If we can shut off others in order to preserve what we consider to be a more sophisticated way of life, we think that we are honored and that others will honor us. We notice that it often is hard to get to see and know the so-called "great" of this world. So we try to break into their inner circle, and on the way we exclude others as if to prove to them and to ourselves that we are getting there.

Jesus did not think this way. Rather, his glory consisted in opening the doors wider and wider, so that at the last men and women from every tribe and race would be members of his spiritual family. Indeed, this is almost the last view we have of him. For the same John who gave us this Gospel has also recorded in the Book of Revelation that new song in which those who have been redeemed by Christ praise him, saying, "You are worthy to take the scroll and to open its seals, because you were slain, and with your blood you purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation. You have made them a kingdom of priests to serve our God, and they will reign on the earth" (5:9-10).

If you wish to see Christ glorified, seek to help others find him. Lead them to Jesus. I am sure that if you do not, Jesus is still honored by your praise of him for saving you. At least I hope you are praising him for that. But what if you also lead others to him? In that case, I am convinced that even your praise will be better; and, besides that, there will then be two or more voices to give him glory.

Christ's Cross

The second sense in which the Son of man was to be glorified is obviously by the cross. Jesus said, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified." But when we ask what that hour was we immediately realize that it was the hour of his death, burial, and resurrection. Consequently, we also recognize that it was by dying for us that he was glorified.

The next verses say this explicitly. "I tell you the truth, Unless a kernel of wheat falls to the ground and dies, it remains only a single seed. But if it dies, it produces many seeds. The man who loves his life will lose it, while the man who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life" (vv. 24-25).

I wonder if you have seen this—not so much as it applies to Christians in the living of their own lives, for we shall come to that again in our next study—but as it applies to Jesus. Have you seen that it was only by dying that he could save men and thus draw us to him? What do the verses I have just read mean? They use the image of a grain of wheat that falls into the ground and dies. Clearly that is Jesus himself. So the teaching is that unless he died there would be no fruit, that is, no salvation for any poor sinner and that, on the contrary, if he did die, many would be saved.

It is only the crucified Christ dying in the place of sinners who saves. The example of Christ does not save. Jesus is not saying to us that if we will only follow his example and try to live as he lived we will find happiness in this life and salvation in the world to come. That is not his message. No man was ever saved by following Christ. Following is involved, of course. After we are saved we are to follow him; he has left us an example for that. But we are not saved by his example. We are saved through faith in what he has done on the cross. After that we can follow him. Moreover, we are not saved by his teaching. Jesus did not say that he could point out the way to God and that if men and women would only follow that way, they would find him. That is what teachers of the other world religions have done, but not Jesus. He did not say, "I will show you the way." He said, "I am the way." Besides, the entire teaching of the Word of God is to the effect that he made the way by dying for us.

Here is Christ's glory, that he died for us; and it is in this above all else that he should be honored. Will you honor him? The best way is by coming to him in faith in order to receive him as your Savior. Or again, if you already know him as your Savior, it is by living as he lived and by bringing others to him.

There is a children's T-shirt that has this inscription: "To know me is to love me." That, as it seems to me, is supremely true of Jesus. To see him as the crucified Savior is to truly know him, and to know him is to love him fervently. God grant that it may be true of many and that those who know him may also glorify him by living their lives in accordance with his Word and in the power of the Spirit.

Chapter 155.
How to Save Your Own Life

John 12:24-26

We live in an age that is conscious of the value of life, at least in some areas. As a result, we have many devices for saving life. We have life preservers, life belts, life rafts, lifeboats, lifelines, life nets, lifeguards, even life insurance, which is a bit of a misnomer since it pays off only at death. And there are also many courses on lifesaving. In all this emphasis upon the saving of life, however, there is probably no instruction as strange as that of the Lord Jesus Christ, who said to the people of his day, "The man who loves his life will lose it, while the man who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life" (v. 25). We say, "The one who would save his life must save it." Jesus said, "The one who would save his life must lose it, for only by losing it can he save it for the life to come."

Why should we listen to advice that seems so foolish? For two reasons. First, the One who spoke those words did exactly what he said. He gave up his life, yet in such a way that we can hardly regard his having done so as foolish. Second, by giving his life he was extraordinarily successful; he gained both his own life and also a vast host of followers.

This is instruction that cannot easily be put aside. Therefore, we turn to his words with interest. As we study these words we notice that they contain four elements: (1) a great principle, (2) an application of the truth, (3) a personal invitation, and (4) a reassuring promise.

A Great Principle

To begin with, the Lord Jesus Christ enunciated a great principle drawn, as was often his procedure, from nature. He said, "Unless a kernel of wheat falls to the ground and dies, it remains only a single seed. But if it dies, it produces many seeds." We have already seen this principle in John 11:16; we have also seen that it is found throughout Scripture. It is the principle of death and denial, the truth that life comes only by death. Here Jesus illustrated the principle by referring to a grain of wheat, which remains unfruitful so long as it is kept to itself but which becomes fruitful when thrown into the ground and buried there.

We see this in many areas. The man who works only to put in time and receive a paycheck is not worth much to his employer. On the other hand, the man who gives himself to the work, who is seeking above all to do a good job and to get it done, is invaluable. The family provides us with another application. If a father or mother lives only for himself, or herself the family suffers and the children eventually go astray. On the other hand, if they give of themselves, the family thrives and the children become an honor to their parents and multiply the parents' joy.

If this is true in business and family life and in other areas, as it is, then it is particularly true in spiritual things. For only when we say no to ourselves do we become capable of saying yes to God and so receive his fullest blessing. This is what Paul meant when he said, "I have been crucified with Christ" (Gal. 2:20). He meant that he had died to self in order that he might live for God. Or again, "May I never boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal. 6:14). In saying this Paul meant that his identification with Christ in death made it possible for him to live for Christ and by Christian values and not for the world and its values.

This is the principle then: death and denial. It is only by death that life comes. We see it in many areas and can hardly miss the fact that Jesus demonstrated the principle by his own death and subsequent resurrection.

The Truth Applied

The difficulty with a principle is that it is so often abstract. Or, to put it in other language, we have difficulty relating it to ourselves. We can relate it to other people, but it does not carry the same weight for us personally. Jesus knew this, of course; so his next words make the application. He had talked about a grain of wheat. Now he says, "The man who loves his life will lose it, while the man who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life."

The most interesting feature of this verse is that it contains a contrast that is not apparent in the English translation. We read, "The man who loves (or hates) his life," and he shall keep his "life," and for us there is no way of telling that the words "life" and "life" are different in the original language. Yet this is the heart of what the verse is saying. The first word is psuche, which refers to the life of the mind. We call it the ego. It means the human personality that thinks, plans for the future, and charts its course. Jesus is saying that this is what must die. In other words, the independent will of man must die, so that the follower of Christ actively submits his will to him. The other word is zoe, which, joined to the adjective "eternal," means the divine life. Every Christian has this eternal or divine life now, but he has it in its fullness only when his entire personality with all its likes and desires is surrendered to Christ. It is close to the same thing to say that the Christian will experience the fullness of God's blessing only when he consciously and deliberately walks in God's way.

For some reason the idea is current today that, because God is gracious and loving, a Christian can therefore enjoy the fullness of God's blessing without at the same time accepting the full lordship of the Lord Jesus Christ in his or her life. This is not biblical. Those who have convinced themselves of this flout God's laws. They disregard his instructions about the permanency of marriage, for instance. So they get divorces. They ignore his instructions about continuing to meet together with other Christians. So they retreat into their own little private shell of Christianity. They ignore the lost and perishing around them, forgetting that Jesus has sent them as witnesses into the world. They do not live by the highest of moral standards. So they are not happy, and they do not know why. Well, this is why. They have not died to their own desires in order that they might live for Christ. They have not been crucified with him. They have not obeyed him. Jesus is their Savior, but he is not truly their Lord.

If this is true of you, I encourage you to learn this lesson. It is not pleasant to be crucified, I know. But you will never truly live in the full spiritual sense until you are. George Mueller could be your example. He lived in England several generations ago and founded many great orphanages, maintaining them solely through prayer. He was extremely effective. But when asked the secret of his effective service, he replied, "There was a day when I died—died to George Mueller, his opinions, preferences, tastes and will; died to the world, its approval or censure; died to the approval or blame of my brethren or friends; and since then I have studied only to show myself approved unto God."

To lose your own life in order to gain it unto life eternal does not mean you must do what Mueller did. But it does mean you must be willing to do anything for Christ, if he directs it. It will not be a sad and gloomy thing either. Do not think that. The sad thing is to disobey him. To obey is a joy. Remember that it was "for the joy set before him" that our Lord endured the cross and scorned the shame (Heb. 12:2).

A Personal Invitation

The third element in our Lord's teaching about life through death is an invitation. He has stated the principle and applied it. Now he invites each of us to put it into practice by following him. He says, "Whoever serves me must follow me."

I am sure there is a sense in which any Christian thinks he would like to serve Christ. We read in the Gospels of Jesus going about from place to place without so much as a home to call his own. He slept in the fields. He was weary. At times he was hungry. There were times when he was hounded by his enemies. We read these things and think how we would like to have been there. "For," we say, "if I had been there, I would have taken him in. I would have fed him. I would have seen that he had a place to sleep. I would have shielded him from his enemies." It is possible that we may have done that if we had lived in Christ's time. We may have been like Mary and Martha rather than like the indifferent millions. But I am afraid that whenever we think along these lines much of our thought is mere sentiment. For if we would really serve Christ, that we can do it now. He has even told us how, for he has spoken to all of us at all ages of the church when he said, "Whoever serves me (that is, anyone who really wants to serve me) must follow me."

How can we follow him? Let me suggest some ways. First, you can follow him in the same kind of self-denial about which I have been speaking. That is, you can take up your cross and follow him. As I say this, I do not want to suggest that this will necessarily mean a total change in what you are doing with your life. It may be that you are essentially where the Lord wants you. On the other hand, it may mean a total change. For none of us is doing all the Lord has for us to do. The real issue, as I have shown, is the issue of the will. Are you willing to do whatever Christ calls you to do? To be poor in his service, if he so leads? To be despised? To be forgotten or nearly forgotten because you are working in some obscure corner of the world? To surrender your leisure time because there is work to be done that you cannot do during your normal workweek and because there is no one else to do it? To surrender a cherished hobby, sin, or pastime? I cannot tell what the details will be in your case. But God knows them, and you know them. Will you obey him? Will you serve Christ by following him in self-denial?

Second, you can follow him in service. You say, "But how can I serve him? He is not here to be served." Really? Did he not say, "Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me" (Matt. 25:40)? And what was he talking about when he said this? He was talking about those who fed the hungry, welcomed the stranger, clothed the naked, and visited the sick and those in prison.

Do we do those things? There was a time when the evangelical church led the way in such areas. We founded missions and built hospitals. We launched welfare programs and cared for widows and orphans. But I am afraid that we do not do that so much anymore. Rather we have allowed unbelieving churchmen to drive a wedge between evangelism and social service and then push us into only one half. Moreover, we have convinced ourselves that we are fully obeying the Lord by doing it. Do not misunderstand me. We must evangelize. That too is a command of Christ; and if liberal churchmen will not do it, then we have an even greater burden to carry the gospel to all who have not heard it. Moreover, there is much evangelical social work going on. In my city there are evangelical missions, orphanages, homes for the aged, welfare programs. But I am asking whether these works really involve us or whether, on the contrary, we do not simply allow a small minority to do them while we enjoy the comforts of our middle-class life and use our free time selfishly?

Third, you may serve Christ by following him in holiness. He lived a perfectly holy life, so holy that even his enemies could find no fault in him. If you would serve him, you must strive to be like him in that. To do that you must put aside all you know to be sin, spend time with him in order to grow in him, and then seek to practice what you already know.

Fourth, you may serve Christ by following him in faithfulness to his teachings. Here I speak especially to those who are ministers or teachers of the Word. Are you faithful to Christ's teaching in your teaching? Or are you seeking to be novel or clever or to gain a reputation for being different from every other teacher? If you are doing the latter, learn that it is not Christ's way. I am aware that our pride wants to serve Christ by striking out in new paths. Spurgeon once wrote, "Proud man has a desire to preach new doctrine, to set up a new Church; to be an original thinker, to judge, and consider, and do anything but obey." But this is no service to Christ. True service consists in faithfulness. It is to tread in the old paths, where he alone leads the way. To follow him in these ways is really to follow him, and to follow is to serve.

Two Incentives

Having given his invitation, the Lord Jesus Christ next offered two incentives to help us respond. They are in the form of promises. First, he promised that he would be with anyone who followed him; second, he promised that God would himself honor such a one. He said, "Where I am, my servant also will be. My Father will honor the one who serves me."

The first half of this phrase, containing the first promise, may be understood in two ways. Probably both ways are intended. On the one hand, it can apply to this life. If we follow Christ here, we can be sure that wherever we are, he will be with us. Indeed, this is self-evident. For if we are with him, then obviously he is also with us. To me this is a great promise. "What is better?"

I ask myself. "To be in the best of circumstances without Jesus? Or to be with Jesus even if being with him means being with him in persecution or suffering?" The only answer I have is: to be with Jesus whatever the circumstances or whatever the cost. He is worth any cost.

The second way Christ's promise that we will be with him may be taken is in reference to the fact that he was going to be with the Father. I know that he said, "Where I am," using the present tense. But this can refer to something in the immediate future and often does. Here it likely refers to his soon return to heaven. It means that if we are with Jesus here, identifying with him in his suffering and sorrow, we will also be with him in glory. It is the equivalent of Paul's statement (which he says was a faithful or true statement often quoted in the early church), "If we died with him, we will also live with him; if we endure, we will also reign with him. If we disown him, he will also disown us" (2 Tim. 2:11-12).

This leads to Christ's second promise: "My Father will honor the one who serves me." In one place Spurgeon imagines how this will be. He imagines a case in which a prince and the prince's servant fall into the hands of bandits, who hold the prince for ransom. The negotiations for the ransom are delayed, and during the interval life goes badly for the one who is of noble blood, and, of course, also for the servant. The prince falls sick. The servant tends him. The servant wipes his master's fevered brow and gives him cool water to drink. There is a point in their captivity when the servant, who is well, finds an opportunity to escape; but he declines his opportunity, preferring to remain with his lord. Finally the whereabouts of the prince are discovered, and both the prince and his companion are rescued. "Now," asks Spurgeon, "who is the man whom the King delights to honor?" Clearly it is the servant. "For," says the King, "this is the man who was with my son in the prison, who cared for him, attended him, who nursed him when he was near death. He shall therefore be with my son in his honor, even above that of the greatest statesman of the realm."

In the same way, Jesus tells us that God will honor those who follow him in this life. In this life his way often involves suffering. Sometimes it involves death for his sake. It always involves self-denial. But, says Christ, the suffering will be followed by honor and the self-denial by praise.

Can we not hear it? I think I hear the King's voice. "Stand back, you angels! Make room, you seraphim! Make way! For here comes the man, here comes the woman, who was with my Son. He was only a poor sinful man. He was born in an ungodly time in the midst of an ungodly people. He did not know much. But he was with my Son. He was like him. He stood by him. Now I will honor him. Come up here. Here, take this crown, and then sit there with my Son on his throne and reign with him. For you shall indeed be with my Son in his glory, even as you were with him in his shame." God grant that this might one day be true for all of us who truly call upon his name.

Chapter 156.
Christ's Soul Troubled

John 12:27-30

None of us understands fully what it cost God the Father and Jesus Christ the Son to forgive our sins. We sometimes pray, in saying the Lord's Prayer, "Forgive us our sins as we forgive those who sin against us." But we often do not think of how costly it was to God to make that prayer possible. Nor do others, who are not Christians, appreciate it. Some mock it. On one occasion Voltaire, the famous French agnostic, was asked whether he thought God could forgive some terrible sin, and he replied glibly, "Pardoner? C'est son metier!" ("Forgive? That's his job.") Obviously it had not entered his head, nor has it entered the heads of many, how much salvation cost God.

Will we ever know how much salvation cost him? I do not see how, for I do not see how we can ever enter fully into the experience of Jesus as he was separated from his Father during those hours of suffering in which he was made sin for us. Still, that is not all that can be said. For, while we can never result of what the Bible has to tell us. In particular, we can learn from the verses that are before us, which tell us that on the eve of the crucifixion Christ was troubled. "Now my heart is troubled, and what shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'? No, it was for this very reason I came to this hour. Father, glorify your name" (vv. 27-28).

As we study these verses we also learn an equally valuable and even more personal lesson. For not only do they teach us about Jesus, they also teach us how we may find comfort when our souls are likewise troubled.

In studying these verses we will look at: (1) the reason why Christ's soul was troubled, (2) the underlying resolve that gave him stability even in the midst of trouble, (3) the divine reassurance in the form of a voice from heaven, and (4) how this may all be applied to ourselves for those times when we also go through testing.

A Cause for Trouble

We look first, then, at the reason why Christ's soul was troubled; and we confess, even before we look for a reason, that the fact itself is startling. If this were a mere man, we would not be surprised. For what man is there who is not sometimes troubled by pressing circumstances or disquieted by fears of what the future may thrust upon him? But this is no mere man. This is the Son of God! This is the Christ! This is the One who stilled the raging waves on Galilee and rebuked the disciples for their lack of faith—"Why are you so afraid? Do you still have no faith?" (Mark 4:40). This is the One who walked through rampaging crowds led by men intent on his death. This is the same Jesus who in a short while will instruct his disciples, "Do not let your heart be troubled. Trust in God, trust also in me" (John 14:1). How can this be? How can the One who turns to us to say, "Let not your heart be troubled," say of himself, "Now is my heart troubled"? It seems incongruous, even inconsistent.

It is not inconsistent when we realize what it was Christ was dreading! We must remember that the coming of the Greeks, recorded just a few verses earlier, had launched a train of thought in Christ's mind that led to musings on his coming crucifixion and on the fact that he would soon bear the sins of the world. He had rejoiced in the coming of the Greeks as an earnest of the many Gentiles soon to come. But their coming presupposed his death—only a crucified Savior could avail for sins—and this meant separation from the Father judicially as he bore the sins of his people. It was not physical death that he dreaded; it was this spiritual death.

How could the One who had never known one second of unbroken fellowship with his Father, had never sinned, peacefully contemplate that hour in which he should be made sin for us and in which the fellowship that he had would, at least for a time, be broken?

Let me give you a remarkable contrast to make this clear. Consider the death of Socrates as it is described by Plato in the Phaedo. Socrates had been condemned to death by the council on grounds of teaching the youth of Athens atheism. While he was awaiting the hemlock potion that he was to drink and that would bring about his death, Socrates discoursed on the immortality of the soul and argued forcefully with his assembled disciples that one should not fear death. Rather he should embrace it peacefully. The body and soul belong to different worlds, he argued. Hence, the destruction of the body cannot affect the soul. It sets it free. As he rehearsed this teaching, Socrates did not merely proclaim his theorems; he lived them. So at last when he drank the hemlock potion and lay down to die, he did so peacefully. Socrates' death is a beautiful, though touching death. Nothing is seen of death's horror. Instead, it is not really a horror, for it merely is that which frees him from the body.

On the other hand, we have Jesus. All the Gospels agree in telling us that as the cross drew near, Jesus began to tremble and be deeply troubled (Mark 14:33). He declared that he had a baptism to be baptized with and was "distressed" until it should be accomplished (Luke 12:50). In Gethsemane he prayed three times that the cup he was about to drink might pass from him. And when at last he concludes, "Yet not as I will, but as you will," this does not mean that at the last he attained to some of the faith of Socrates by coming to regard death as a liberating friend. Rather it means that in spite of his particular death being the greatest of all horrors, he was nevertheless determined to embrace it fully in fulfillment of the plan of God for our salvation.

That is the meaning of the sentence "Now my heart is troubled." We cannot plumb its depths. But when we see the death of Christ in these terms we can at least begin to comprehend it.

An Underlying Resolve

There is another thing to notice about these verses. In spite of the depth of Christ's trouble (which is intensified by linking it to the many verses that speak of his soul's trouble, as I have just done), there is nevertheless an underlying strength or resolve that runs through all Christ is saying. To be sure, Christ's soul is troubled. But there is not even a hint of pulling back or changing course. "What shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'?" The answer is obvious. Of course not! Because, "for this very reason I came to this hour. Father, glorify your name."

There is something important here. Obviously there is a strong resolve in Christ that sees him through this struggle. But what is the distinct nature of that resolve? Jesus is resolved to die. But why is he resolved to die? We answer, of course, that Jesus is determined to die for our salvation, to save us, and it is true. But notice that Jesus does not give this as his chief reason. To glorify God is his chief end. Thus, although the death he is to die has its horrors, he will not shrink from following whatever way the Father chooses to have the Son glorify him.

God Glorified

Did God glorify himself through Jesus' death? Indeed he did. Moreover, not only was his name glorified, there was even a special voice from heaven to announce that it had already been so and would be so again.

God's name had already been glorified in Christ, for the voice from heaven spoke of the past. Where do we see that past glory? For one thing, in the incarnation. For that, there must be praise to God. The incarnation is the greatest of all mysteries, that the great and holy God of the universe should so take up the cause of his sinful and rebellious creatures that he should become one of them, becoming like them so that they might become like himself. On the occasion of the incarnation the angels did well to sing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

Moreover, there are the years of quiet ministry in Nazareth as the One who once ruled angels now learns to do a humble carpenter's work, to know poverty, to be a friend of sinners, to be despised and rejected by those who would have considered themselves important.

Pass on to the cross and beyond that to the first Easter morning, and find there a glory that was yet to come. Jesus had been crucified. To many, the dream seems over. The disciples are scattering. But then the great name of God is glorified again as God breaks the bands of death that bind his Son and sends him forth to empower his weak disciples to the task of world mission. Soon many believe, and in this God is glorified.

Finally, the day will come when Christ will return in glory to judge the living and the dead and to set up his kingdom, and in this God will be glorified. Indeed, in that day the angels who sang at the birth of the Savior will again sing, "To him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb be blessing and honor and glory and power forever and ever" (Rev. 5:13).

When We Are Troubled

What heights there are in that resolution and prayer, "Father, glorify your name." But now we must step down from the rarefied atmosphere of this third heaven to make this practical in our own earthly environment. It is easy to do. We read that the soul of Christ was troubled. Well, is our soul ever troubled? Is it likely to be troubled in the days ahead? What are we to do in such circumstances? What are we to do when relatives die? When sickness strikes? When we lose our job? When enemies abuse us and friends fail to understand? What shall we do?

We learn from the Master, who when his soul was troubled breathed this prayer, "Father, glorify your name." In other words, if I must lose my health, glorify your name by my sickness. If I must lose my wealth, glorify your name by my poverty. If I must lose my good name, glorify your name by my humiliation. If I must lose my life, glorify your name by my death and send the resurrection.

There is power in that prayer. Look at it a word at a time. The first word is "Father." Anguish is ameliorated, trouble is transformed when we can address God as "Father." We see this in children. A number of years ago when our middle daughter was very small, my wife and I and a group of friends were in Granada, Spain, on a hot afternoon. Earlier we had been up to see the Alhambra, that great monument to Moorish art and culture; but now we were in the bustle of the old city making our way around the great cathedral to a covered market on the other side. There were more adults than children on this particular trip, so there always seemed to be one adult holding each child's hand. Yet suddenly, there we were in the marketplace with the realization that our middle child was missing. Quickly we retraced our steps and at last found her where we had been blocks away. Apparently she had become preoccupied with something and we had gone on, thinking that she was with us. When she noticed that we were gone she had begun to cry, as well she might. For she was lost in a large and frightening city, and there was no one able even to try comforting her in her own language. I got to her first, and at once she came to me, calling out, "Daddy!" She had already stopped crying, and the word "Daddy" was a cry of relief that she had been found.

We may be lost in this world with not a friendly face in sight. We may not know which way to turn. The circumstances may be hopeless. Yet if we will only catch a glimpse of our heavenly Father, though the circumstances remain exactly the same there is a sense in which they will nevertheless be entirely changed, for we will not be lost anymore. And we need not say more. For when we have said, "Father," we have said all that really needs to be said.

The next words are, "Glorify your name." How blessed we will be if we can say those also. "Your name!" The difficulty is that we often substitute my for your and mean "my name," or at least, "your name and my name together." We want God glorified, but not at our expense or in a way that is not that which we would choose personally.

Ralph L. Keiper illustrates this from his own experience. He was born with very bad eyesight and consequently was greatly handicapped during his years of study for the ministry. He fretted about it and, I suppose, like Paul asked many times that the thorn might be taken away. One day, as he was sitting in the library trying to study, the Holy Spirit began to speak to him. He said, "Keiper, what is the chief end of man?"

Keiper was a student of theology, so he certainly knew the answer to that. He replied, "That's easy. That's the first question of the Westminster Shorter Catechism. Man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy him forever."

"And is that your chief end?" the Holy Spirit prodded.

"Of course," said Keiper.

At this point, according to Keiper, the Holy Spirit got a bit discourteous. "Which would you rather have," he asked, "perfect eyesight or the privilege of glorifying me?"

This time the young student did not answer so quickly. But at last he said, "There is no comparison. The only possible answer is the privilege of glorifying your name." "Then," said God through the Spirit, "why worry about the means I have chosen to have you glorify it?"

In Me

Finally, if you have followed me and have prayed the prayer of the Lord Jesus Christ this far, I wonder if you can also add one more thing, to make it inescapably personal. Add the words "in me" or "in my body." Pray, "Father, glorify your name in me; glorify your name in my body."

I have biblical warrant for asking you to do this; for, in this form, the words are almost the exact words of the apostle Paul as he reflected on the circumstances of his imprisonment in Rome in writing to the Philippians. He wrote of his hope "that I will in no way be ashamed, but will have sufficient courage so that now as always Christ will be exalted in my body, whether by life or by death" (Phil. 1:20).

Think of what had happened to Paul. He had planned a trip to Rome as a free ambassador of the gospel. He had hoped to have been well received and to have been furthered on his way by the prayers and gifts of the Roman Christians. Instead, there had been an abrupt arrest and imprisonment. There had been a two-year confinement in Caesarea. This was followed by perils at sea, a shipwreck, landing on Malta, another journey by sea, and then the long walk to the city of Rome—in chains, in the company of the condemned. Believers had gone out to meet him, as they would have gone out to meet any great celebrity, and for a time Paul had a degree of liberty in his own rented house in Rome. But then circumstances changed. He must have been confined more closely, for in time the Christians even forgot his whereabouts. We know this because when Onesiphorus arrived in Rome to see Paul, no one seemed able to tell him where Paul was, and it was only after considerable searching that this faithful brother found him (2 Tim. 1:16-17). Paul witnessed in prison, and some of the guards began to believe, with the result that the gospel spread into the courts of the emperor. When word of this got back to some of the Christians in the city, they became jealous and soon began to make trouble for Paul. I believe that it was as the result of this trouble that Paul was eventually executed. These were Paul's circumstances. Yet in spite of them Paul rejoices that God will be glorified in him, whether by his life or his death.

That should be our prayer also. If we have difficulty praying it—as we naturally do—we can be helped by the secret of the surrendered life that Paul offers in the next sentence of his Philippian letter. It is: "For me to live is Christ." To live is Christ! Christ! May that be true of us! If it is, then we will be able to endure either joy or sorrow, sickness or health, bane or blessing, to see him glorified.

Chapter 157.
Jesus, the Great Attraction

John 12:31-33

In the whole of human history nothing, no matter how important or how unusual, has attracted men and women like the uplifted Christ. There have been attractions that have seemed to compete for a time. In the ancient world, men and women turned out by the hundreds of thousands to praise the Roman emperors as they returned from their military triumphs. But the emperors passed on, one by one, and at last even Rome itself fell to the advancing barbarians. In more recent times, millions turned out to praise Hitler and followed him to ruin. Now Hitler is gone, and the day that he ushered in lives on only in bad memories.

What attracts men and women today? Is it sports? Certainly millions are caught up in the excitement of a world series or Superbowl playoff. But this year's winner is soon forgotten. And even at the peak of excitement, even on the day of the Superbowl contest itself, not so many can be found watching the playoff (even with the marvel of television) as can be found on the same day, morning and evening, worshiping the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Lord Jesus Christ has attracted more people to Madison Square Garden in New York for more consecutive days and in greater total numbers than any event in New York's history. He has attracted greater crowds for longer periods than any other single personality—in Dallas for Expo 72, in Korea for mass rallies. Christian radio programs have endured for decades where secular programs have succumbed to changing fancies, and Christian churches have remained strong from generation to generation and have even grown both in impact and in numbers.

What is the attraction? It is not the attraction of mere human personalities, for they change. It is not denominational distinctives, for they are all different. It is not slick methods of promotion, for often there is no promotion at all. The attraction is the uplifted Christ. It is the One who said, nearly two thousand years ago in the text that we are now to study, "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself. "Jesus promised to draw people to himself, and so he has. Nothing or no one has ever attracted men and women like Jesus.

The Historical Jesus

This remarkable fact deserves some careful consideration. So, taking his promise, let us consider some questions regarding it. First of all, let us ask who is speaking. Who is the "I" of the statement? The answer is Jesus, the Jesus of history.

Notice that it is not an imaginary Christ who draws men and women. Reuben A. Torrey, one of whose greatest sermons was based on the words of this text, has written, "The speaker was our Lord Jesus. He was not the Christ of men's imaginings, but the Christ of reality, the Christ of actual historic fact. Not the Christ of Mary Baker Eddy's maudlin fancy, or of Madam Besant's mystical imaginings, but the Christ of actuality, who lived here among men and was seen, heard and handled by men, and who was soon to die a real death to save real sinners from a real hell to a real heaven."

The situation bears this out, for Christ's words were spoken in the context of the coming of the Greeks to Jesus about which we have been studying. These were real men, who presumably were well acquainted with the religions and philosophies of Greece. But they had come to a real Jesus because they had found mere philosophies inadequate. We must remember that Greece had some of the greatest philosophers the world has ever known. Greece was the native land of Plato, Socrates, Aristotle, Epictetus, and many others. But these were not saviors, nor did their philosophies satisfy. So the Greeks came to Jesus, and Jesus saw in their coming the first fruits of those many millions of all tribes and tongues and nations who would eventually flock to him when he had been crucified as the world's Savior. Let me say it again: It was no myth to whom the Greeks came. It was the flesh-and-blood Jesus, the real Jesus, the Jesus of history. It is this Jesus alone who still draws people today.

Christ Crucified

Our second question is this: In what aspect is this historical Jesus presented? That is, in what guise or stance does he draw people? The answer is found in the phrase "lifted up from the earth" and in the following sentence: "He said this to show the kind of death he was going to die." Clearly Jesus was referring to his crucifixion, and the point of the verse is that it is the crucified Christ alone who draws human beings.

In an earlier study of this theme, in a related verse (8:28), I pointed out that the idea of the uplifted Christ often is taken as an encouragement to lift up Christ in our preaching, with the suggestion that if we will do that, he certainly will draw people. Indeed, Jesus should be lifted up in our preaching, and it is always a shame when any preacher, no matter how conservative or evangelical, allows anything else to take the primary place in his preaching. Jesus should be lifted up in the sense that we must talk about him and seek to present him vividly to the world's gaze. But this is not the primary meaning of this text. The lifting up referred to here is not the lifting up of Christ by preaching but rather the lifting up of the historical Jesus by his enemies in crucifixion. It is the Christ of Calvary who draws. It is the Christ whose blood was shed and whose body was broken. It is the Christ who gave himself in the place of sinners so that he might bear in himself the proper and justified wrath of God.

This is the true reason why the conservative churches are growing and the liberal churches fail.
"Preach any Christ but a crucified Christ," says Torrey, "and you will not draw men for long." They may come for a time for a social gospel, but they will not be there for the duration. They may come for a time for bingo or out of fear, but they will not be hearty and joyous followers of the Nazarene. Modernism does not draw. Moral rearmament does not draw. Only the crucified Christ draws men and women, for only the crucified Christ reveals the great love of almighty God and provides that Savior whom we need.

Drawn, Not Driven

The third question is this: What does the historical Jesus so presented promise to do? The answer, as already noted many times, is: draw people.

This phrase involves much sound theology. For one thing, it reveals the need of men and women. If they need to be drawn to Jesus, it follows that apart from this gracious and effective drawing all are separated from him. And if they are separated from him, they are separated from everything good and need a Savior. It is not just a small or insignificant separation either. For, as Paul describes it in writing to the Romans, it is a separation that is our ruination. He shows that although the existence and power of God have been revealed to all people, they have nevertheless turned from him to follow their own wisdom and to pursue those vices that originate in their own rebellious hearts. Paul writes, "For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (Rom. 1:21-23). This is a terrible state. So we learn from Romans and from Christ's own statement that men and women are far off from Christ and that he must draw them to him.

There is another point of sound theology in these words. Not only are men and women separated from Christ, they are also separated from him in such a deep and profound way that they will not even come to him unless he draws them. In other words, their very will is captivated by the sin into which they have plunged themselves. Christ is lifted up. But they will not return to him unless he draws them.

Why is it that we must make such an effort to win people and then in addition pray that God will bless our efforts and convert them? It is because they will not come without his intervention. Spurgeon once wrote on this text: "Sometimes, when I am trying to prepare a sermon to preach, I say to myself, 'Why must I take all this trouble?' If men were in their senses, they would run to Christ without calling. Why must we put this business so temptingly? Why must we plead? Why must we be so earnest? Because men do not want to come, not even to their own Savior. They do not wish to have their sins forgiven. They do not wish to be renewed in heart; and they never will come—no, not one mother's son of them—unless He that sent Christ to them shall draw them to Christ. A work of grace in the heart is absolutely necessary before the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus will be accepted by any one of us."

There is a third great lesson in the words "draw him." We discover it when we notice that people are drawn to Christ, not driven to him. Some think that people must be driven to him. Therefore, they preach on the law and judgment. They seek to frighten people into Christ's kingdom. But this is not Christ's way. Let me say here, lest I be misunderstood, that the law is indeed our schoolmaster to lead us to Christ (Gal. 3:24) and that preaching from the law, as part of the Word of God, is useful in its way. In fact, many men and women have been frightened enough of their sin and its consequences to flee to Christ in desperation. But I have noticed—and I believe that anyone will find this to be true who takes the trouble to poll any true Christian congregation — that an overwhelmingly greater percentage of people are won to Christ by the sweet drawing of his love than have ever been won by fear of his disfavor. What does the Word of God say? "I led them with cords of human kindness, with ties of love; I lifted the yoke from their neck and bent down to feed them" (Hosea 11:4).

Oh, the drawing power of the crucified Christ! How gentle it is! How sweet, how gracious, how quiet, how effective! Men and women are separated from Christ and will not come to him of their own will. Yet he draws them to himself and saves them in spite of themselves to the praise of his glory.

All May Come

There are two more questions that we must ask of Christ's statement. First, who does this historical, crucified Jesus promise to draw? The answer is: everyone. We must understand here that this is not a statement that can be quoted in support of universalism. It is not a promise that every individual who has ever lived will come to Christ and be saved. If it were, it would not be true; for certainly many millions of people go through a lifetime and eventually die without coming to him. It is not a promise that every individual will be won to Jesus, but rather that all types of people—from every level of life and every race and nation—will come to him.

The gospel of the crucified Christ has been preached in palaces and halls of state, and the mighty of this world have come to him. It has been preached in the dirtiest and most dangerous of the back alleys of our cities, and the weak and outcast of this world have come to him. It has been preached to Americans, and Americans have come. It has been preached in the nations of Africa and Asia and South America, and citizens of those nations have come. It has been preached to children, and children have come. It has been preached to the aged, and the aged have come. It has been preached to the intelligent and the not-so-intelligent, to the socially favored and to the socially disadvantaged, to blacks and whites, to Jews and Moslems and Buddhists and total pagans, and men and women from each of these groups have turned to Jesus as the One who is able to cleanse from sin and lead them in the way everlasting.

Will you come? Will you allow the crucified Christ to draw you? It does not matter who you are or what your background is. The text tells us that Christ draws and will draw everyone. Why, then, should not you be among them?

Himself to Himself

The last of our questions is even more obvious than the others. It is this: To whom does Jesus promise to draw such people? The answer is: to himself. It is not said that Jesus will draw men and women to the visible church, still less to one particular expression of it. It is not said that he will draw them to a particular denomination, sect, movement, or program. It is possible that he may bless these endeavors and even raise up leaders for them, but he does not promise that he will draw men and women to any of these. The promise is only that they will be drawn to Jesus. "Himself to himself!" That is the heart of the text. Is it your desire that those you know might indeed be drawn to him?

This brings me to the point at which I can easily conclude this message. I can conclude it by applying it first to believers and then to unbelievers.

First, to believers involved in serving Christ. If you are serving Christ, you undoubtedly are trying to lead others to him; if you are, then you should learn from this study. Learn, first of all, that if you would win men and women for Jesus, you must draw them rather than drive them to him. Some think that people are won by black looks and scowls, but few come to this kind of preaching or witnessing. Do not scowl at people. Do not seek to condemn them. Love them for Christ's sake, and draw them through his love and by gentle invitations.

Second, learn even as you seek to draw them that, nevertheless, it is Christ who draws and who must therefore be the great and sole attraction. Would you win people? Then do not deal too much with more peripheral matters. Of course, you must cover the whole counsel of God in time in your preaching, if you are a preacher. You must also deal honestly with whatever questions are asked you as a result of your witnessing, regardless in what direction they tend. But to win men and women, it must be the case that Christ, rather than these other matters, is central. And, more than this, it must be Christ crucified. Speak of the Christ who died for sinners, and that very Christ will draw sinners to himself in abundance.

Finally, if you are not yet a Christian, learn that if Jesus said he will draw men and women to himself, then he will draw them now as much as at any point in history. He has not changed. The value of his death has not changed. People have not changed. The problems have not changed.

The attraction of the Lord Jesus Christ is always present, and he will draw people now. Do you sense that he is drawing you? If so, do not ask, "May I come to Jesus?" Of course you may come, if you are drawn to come. If he is drawing you, come! Resist no longer. Turn from all that might hold you back, and fly to Jesus.

Chapter 158.
Who Is This Son of Man?

John 12:34

The existence of God is not a terribly difficult concept for modern man. In fact, if we are to believe the opinion polls, most of our contemporaries do believe in him. The difficulty most people have is in other areas. Take the idea of God suffering, for instance. For many, the existence of God is probable; but the idea that he became a man in order to die for sinners is an offense so great as to be almost blasphemous. This is not just a problem for men and women of our own day, however. It also was a problem for Christ's contemporaries. No doubt they had all the intellectual difficulties with this idea that we do, but in addition to this, they had a difficulty that arose out of what they knew to be the teaching of the Word of God. In the chapter of John that we have been studying, Jesus had prophesied his death, saying that "the Son of Man [should] be glorified" by it (v. 23). But how could anyone connect the Son of Man with suffering? the people wondered. The Old Testament said, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed" (Dan. 7:14). God had told David, "When your days are over and you rest with your fathers, I will raise up your offspring to succeed you, who will come from your own body, and I will establish his kingdom. He will build a house for my Name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever"

(2 Sam. 7:12-13). Isaiah had prophesied of the coming Messiah, saying, "Of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end. He will reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing justice and righteousness from that time on and forever" (Isa. 9:7). These and many other texts speak of an eternal and everlasting rule of the Son of Man. So how could the Son of Man suffer? How could he be lifted up? In the Gospel, John reports the people as asking, "We have heard from the Law that Christ will remain forever, so how can you say, 'The Son of Man must be lifted up'? Who is this 'Son of Man'?" (v. 34).

This is a very important question, of course. And it becomes even more important when we recognize that the tide "Son of Man" was virtually the only title used by Jesus of himself. He has other titles. He is the Lamb of God, the King, the Messiah, the Beloved, the Word, the Son of God, and many others. But Jesus did not use these titles of himself. They were given him by others. In his own speech, he was always the Son of Man. This title occurs sixty-nine times in the synoptic Gospels and twelve times in the Gospel of John.

Moreover, the title "Son of Man" is a particularly inclusive title, as we shall see. One scholar writes, "The idea of the Son of Man ... embraces the total work of Jesus as does almost no other idea." To study the term is, therefore, to study not only what Jesus thought of his own ministry—including why he was to die—but also to gain the broadest possible outlook on it.

A Semitic Idiom

The place to begin in a study of the term "Son of Man" is with the simple meaning of the words, which is quite interesting. Our phrase is a direct translation of the Greek words huios tou anthropou, but this phrase is based upon original Aramaic or Hebrew expressions. In Aramaic, the phrase is bar-nasha. In Hebrew, it is ben-ish or ben-adam. The first part of these expressions, bar or ben, means "son." We have it in the proper names Barnabas, Barsabbas, Bartholomew, and others. The second part, nasha, ish, or adam, means "man." The Hebrew ben-adam, meaning "son of man," is known to many English-speaking people through Leigh Hunt's winsome poem "Abou ben Adam," the opening line of which reads, "Abou ben Adam, may his tribe increase."

The significance of this linguistic study lies in the fact that in Aramaic and Hebrew idiom (not Greek), the word bar or ben often is used in a figurative sense, so that, as in the phrases we are considering, the word following it designates the classification to which one belongs. For instance, for "liar" the Aramaic idiom is "son of a lie" or "son of the lie." Sinners are "sons of sin." A wealthy man is a "son of wealth," and so on. Our term, bar-nasha or ben-ish, therefore denotes one who belongs to the human classification. That is, it simply means "man." In a sense, therefore, the Greek translation of the term, from which we get our title "Son of Man," is too literal and therefore also just a bit misleading. It misleads us when we miss the fact that by using this term Jesus was on the simplest level just calling himself "a man."

This is important, for it speaks to us both of the great humility of Christ and of the joy he found in being made one with his brethren. To be sure, he was much more than man. He was God. He could have called himself "God." But instead of this, we find that the great second person of the Godhead, that is, the Christ who became flesh, rejoices to be precisely what he became—"a man." In a sense, it is his boast. For he knew that in becoming like us, he would open the way for us to become like him.

The Phrase in Daniel

We must not be misled in our study of the phrase by stopping at this point, however. It is true that the words "Son of Man" do mean "man" in Semitic idiom. But it also is true that they had come to mean more in Christ's time as the result of one unique occurrence of this term in the Old Testament and of a subsequent development of the term in the intertestamental period.

The one Old Testament reference is in Daniel, in the seventh chapter. This is the chapter that relates Daniel's vision of the four great beasts that come up out of the sea and reign in succession on earth for a time. It is clear that they represent world powers. The first was like a lion, representing the kingdom of Babylon. The second was like a bear. It represented the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, who conquered Babylon. The third was like a leopard. It represented Greece. Finally, there was a beast too terrible to be compared with any known animal. It represented the coming Roman empire. Within this empire, different kings competed for prominence, and one king, represented by a "little horn," displaced three of the others.

At this point, the vision shifts to heaven, and Daniel describes a scene in which thrones are set up and the Ancient of Days takes his place upon one of the thrones and renders judgment. In this judgment, the last of the beasts is killed and all have their kingdoms taken away. Daniel then writes of the final conquest and of a new and everlasting kingdom: "In my vision at night I looked and there before me was one like the Son of Man, coming with the clouds of heaven. He approached the Ancient of Days and was led into his presence. He was given authority, glory and sovereign power; all peoples, nations, and men of every language worshiped him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed" (Dan. 7:13-14).

In the period following the writing of Daniel and before the coming of Christ, this concept of the Son of Man was taken up in various apocryphal writings (such as 4 Ezra and the book of Enoch) and in the Targums. In these books, "Son of Man" is one term given to the anticipated Messiah.

This is a different situation from the purely linguistic meaning of the Hebrew or Aramaic phrases, therefore. Linguistically, the phrases mean man. But in these sources, they obviously mean man in a very specific sense. That is, they mean "The Man," understood as that eternal or archetypal man who exists eternally with God and who is to appear at the end of time to consummate God's plan of salvation.

One other thing must be said about this Son of Man figure. As we read the apocalyptical writings, we detect that there is not always full agreement as to who the Son of Man is or what he will do. He is a Messianic figure, but a shadowy one. Consequently, there must have been a wide variety of opinions concerning him in Christ's day. Here we probably have a clue as to why Jesus used this term rather than another to describe himself. The other terms—Messiah, Son of God, Deliverer—all had very fixed meanings, and the meanings were not those Jesus wished to have attached to his ministry. To give one example, to most people the word "Messiah" denoted a political figure whose primary work would be the deliverance of Jewish lands from the Romans. Jesus was the Messiah. He acknowledged this indirectly in his conversation with the Samaritan woman (John 4:25-26). But if he had said this publicly, everyone would have expected him to organize an army and lead a liberation movement; and he did not want this. So he did not make an open claim to be the Messiah. However, with the Son of Man concept, it was different. People knew that this was a special Messiah-type figure, but they did not know what to think about it precisely. The question of our text indicates this. "Who is this 'Son of Man'?" Therefore, Jesus used this phrase of himself while at the same time infusing it with whatever content he chose to give it. In other words, it became the supreme title by which he described his own person and ministry.

A Suffering Savior

This leads to the question of how Jesus did use the title, which is the important issue. What did he mean by the Son of Man? What ministry did he conceive for this figure? As we look at the references to this figure, primarily in John's Gospel, we discover several major teachings.

1. Jesus used the term "Son of Man" to teach that he was preexistent. That is, the life of the Lord Jesus Christ did not begin at birth, as our lives do. Rather, he is eternal, having existed with God the Father from the beginning, as John declares in the prologue to his Gospel. This is the first clear teaching about the Son of Man in John's Gospel. It occurs in Christ's conversation with Nicodemus. In this conversation Christ said, "No one has ever gone into heaven except the one who came down from heaven—the Son of Man" (3:13). In other words, no mere man can say what heaven is like, because no man has ever been there. But Jesus can because he came from heaven. His life did not begin on this earth. In chapter 6, there is a similar but indirect reference to the same truth. In that chapter, Jesus asks of those who were offended by his teaching, "What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before!" (v. 62). In other words, "What if I should not go to the cross but rather just return to heaven?" In these verses the preexistence of the Son of Man is self-evident teaching.

2. The unique element in Jesus' teaching about the Son of Man is that the Son of Man was to suffer humiliation and death. So we naturally find more verses devoted to this teaching than to any other. For example, in the verse immediately following the one in which Jesus taught Nicodemus about his preexistence, the Master disclosed, "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up, that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life" (3:14-15). Clearly, even at this point in his ministry, Jesus had his crucifixion in view.

There is another reference to his suffering in chapter 8. "So Jesus said, 'When you have lifted up the Son of Man, then you will know that I am the one I claim to be and that I do nothing on my own but speak just what the Father has taught me'" (v. 28). In chapter 12, in the verse that begins the section we are studying, the same truth is suggested, "Jesus answered, 'The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified'" (v. 23). Again, in chapter 13, "When he [Judas] was gone, Jesus said, 'Now is the Son of Man glorified and God is glorified in him'" (v. 31).

None of Christ's hearers would have thought that suffering was a part of the Son of Man's ministry. Thus, when Jesus spoke of suffering, they were always puzzled. They looked for glory and power when the Son of Man should come. Jesus taught that glory was to come by suffering, and power by way of the cross.

3. The third point to Christ's teaching about the Son of Man is that he was to become a vital part of all who should believe on him. That is, the salvation that he would bring was to be not merely objective or abstract but personal. It was to be applied individually. On this point, the teaching in John 6 is quite clear. "Do not work for the food that spoils but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give you. On him God the Father has placed his seal of approval" (v. 27). "I tell you the truth, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you. Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day" (vv. 53-54). We have already seen that eating Christ's flesh and drinking Christ's blood is the equivalent of "coming" to Christ or "believing" on him.

4. At several points Jesus refers to the Son of Man in the context of the final judgment. This is the fourth doctrine, and it is this that comes closest to the original teaching concerning the Son of Man in Daniel. In John's Gospel, Jesus is reported as saying, "For as the Father has life in himself, so he has granted to the Son to have life in himself. And has given him authority to judge because he is the Son of Man" (5:26-27). In Revelation 14 there is a more elaborate description of this judgment; there the Son of Man appears with a sharp sickle in his hand, and both he and an angel "gathered its [the earth's] grapes and threw them into the great winepress of God's wrath" (Rev. 14:19).

5. Mention of the Book of Revelation leads to a fifth teaching concerning the Son of Man that, although it is not mentioned by Jesus in the Gospels, nevertheless is important. This teaching comes from a vision of Christ that John had on Patmos, which is recorded in the first chapter of Revelation. Here Jesus is seen, not as a separate figure coming to the Ancient of Days to sit with him on one of two thrones (as in Daniel) but as the Ancient of Days himself. John writes, "I turned around to see the voice that was > speaking to me. And when I turned I saw seven golden lampstands, and among the lampstands was someone 'like a Son of Man,' dressed in a robe reaching down to his feet and with a golden sash around his chest. His head and hair were white like wool, as white as snow, and his eyes were like blazing fire" (Rev. 1:12-14). The importance of this vision is twofold: first, it identifies Jesus with God the Father, and second, it regards him as being active on earth in the midst of the seven golden lampstands.

What are the lampstands? A few verses later we are told that the lampstands are "the seven churches" (v. 20). Thus, the picture is of Christ's current rule over the churches. Indeed, in the next two chapters, Christ addresses the churches, warning of judgment on some and encouraging those who are still faithful to remain so.

Savior and Lord

We need to apply these truths to ourselves, in spite of the fact that much of what I have said seems to be purely academic. How shall we do this? The best way is by catching a vision of the Son of Man and thereby realizing precisely who it is we worship. When we preach Christ or when we gather as God's people to worship Christ, we are not thinking merely of a figure who lived on earth two thousand years ago. True, he did live on earth; it is because of this that we know him. But more than this, we are thinking of the great and eternal God of the universe, the second Person of the Trinity, the one who existed before all things and through whom all that we know came into existence, the one who will also be there at the end to render judgment. This is a glorious Christ. This is one who rightly demands our worship and deserves our service.

If you are not a Christian, you need to come to him first as Savior. You need to thank him for coming and dying for you, and then trust him and follow him. You will not make a wiser decision in your entire remaining life, no matter what that may hold. On the other hand, if you are a Christian already, you must give him an opportunity to be all he desires to be to you, in order that he who is your Savior might also be your Lord.

Chapter 159.
An Appeal and a Promise

John 12:35-36

There is something especially poignant about a great man's last public teaching or last words. I remember, for instance, how moved I was as a boy when I memorized General Douglas MacArthur's farewell address to the American Congress after he had been relieved as commander of the armed services. I had memorized this speech for a declamation contest and was personally affected as I got to the closing lines. MacArthur referred to the old military ballad, "Old soldiers never die, they just fade away," then concluded, "And like the old soldier of that ballad I now fade away, a soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty. Good-bye." I suppose there was something equally poignant about Napoleon's farewell to his troops from the steps of the hunting retreat at Fountainbleu before his deportation to Elba, and of the last speeches of many other great men.

We come now to the last words of the public teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ, uttered just a few days before his crucifixion. These words were followed by many words of private instruction, of course. Undoubtedly, there were wonderful conversations between Jesus and the disciples at the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus at Bethany. John himself records the last discourses of Jesus with the Twelve in those final days in and around Jerusalem and in the upper room. But these last were all private words, spoken only to his own disciples. The words we are to study now were his last public teaching.

At this point the sun of righteousness had all but set. Within two or three days, God would blot out the sun on Calvary. Yet, there was still time to turn to the light. So Jesus, who was always love toward those who were perishing, speaks these last words of solemn appeal and promise. Alexander Maclaren, who provides an excellent sermon on this text, writes, "He loves too well not to warn, but He will not leave the bitterness of threatening as a last savour on the palate; and so the lips, into which grace is poured, bade farewell to His enemies with the promise and the hope that even they may become 'the sons of light.'"

Jesus said, "You are going to have the light just a little while longer. Walk while you have the light, before darkness overtakes you. The man who walks in the dark does not know where he is going. Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light."

We notice as we read these words that they are not a direct answer to the question that Jesus had been asked in the verse preceding. He had said that he was going to be lifted up from the earth in death, and the people had asked how this could be true of the Messiah. "We have heard from the Law that Christ will remain forever, so how can you say, 'The Son of Man must be lifted up'? Who is this 'Son of Man'?" (v. 34). This was their question, but Jesus did not answer it. Instead, he dealt with a different theme entirely. The people wanted to discuss expectations of the Messiah. Today it would be prophecy. Jesus, on the other hand, wanted to talk about the relationship of an individual to himself. "The darkness is coming," he said. "So seize the light while you have it." The same words apply to our time in which the darkness is even more evident and the light often shines but faintly.

What is our analysis of these verses? From my viewpoint, they provide a perfect last will and testimony. They have four parts: (1) a reminder, (2) a challenge, (3) a warning, and (4) a promise. That is the message I would also leave with you in this study.

Christ's Reminder

The reminder is a reminder of a simple truth: namely, that Jesus Christ is this world's light. This is marked in the Greek text, because in four of the five occurrences of the word "light" in these verses, "light" is preceded by the definite article—"the light." It is a clear reference to Christ. "You are going to have the light a little while longer. Walk while you have the light... put your trust in the light." This is all the more obvious in that in the last occurrence of the word, in reference to men and women rather than to Jesus, the article is omitted. There we read merely of being "sons of light."

This is significant, because it is a teaching found throughout the Gospel and is almost the first descriptive epithet used by John of Jesus. The first descriptive term is "word" or logos. It occurs in verse 1. The second is "life." But then, as early as the fourth verse of the Gospel, the term "light" occurs, and this is immediately picked up and repeated so often that it occurs six times just in the next six verses. "In him was life, and that life was the light of men. The light shines in the darkness, but the darkness has not understood it. There came a man who was sent from God; his name was John. He came as a witness to testify concerning that light, so that through him all men might believe. He himself was not the light; he came only as a witness of that light. The true light that gives light to every man was coming into the world" (1:4-9). Later Jesus will himself say, "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5). John writes elsewhere in his Gospel, "This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil. Everyone who does evil hates the light, and will not come into the light for fear that his deeds will be exposed. But whoever lives by the truth comes to the light, so that it may be seen plainly that what he has done has been done through God" (3:19-21). The last occurrence of the image is in John 12:46, in which Jesus cries out, "I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness."

This is a profoundly rich image, of course, which is why Jesus reverts to it here on the eve of his crucifixion. For one thing, it identifies him with God the Father, which means that he is also preexistent and eternal. Light is an ancient image of God. David writes in one psalm, "The LORD is my light and my salvation" (Ps. 27:1). Again he says, "For with you is the fountain of life; in your light shall we see light" (Ps. 36:9). In mathematics, there is an axiom to the effect that "things equal to the same thing are equal to each other." Consequently, if Jesus is light and if God is light, Jesus must be the same as God. He is God. This is certainly the biblical teaching.

Second, the image teaches that Jesus makes God known. Light is as universal an image for the illumination of the mind as it is an image of God. Without illumination, men are in mental and spiritual darkness. They do not know God. Jesus comes; his light shines upon men. Now those who were in darkness have the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

Third, Jesus is unalterably opposed to the darkness. That is, he is opposed to ignorance, sin, and evil, and is determined to destroy them. How does he do this? In the simplest terms, he does it simply by shining. The cross is the focal point of his victory, of course. But in terms of the response of the individual, he overcomes ignorance and evil simply by shining into our hearts and by thus drawing us to him. This is so natural a part of the illumination he gives that John can argue in his first epistle that if we are not drawn away from sin into righteousness, we are not truly Christians (1 John 1:5-7).

Fourth, this image reveals Jesus as a full or genuine light, as opposed to all partial lights. It is what John means when he calls him "the true light" that has come into the world (John 1:9). To call Jesus the light is not to deny that there are other lights, however derivational, misleading, or imperfect. Man is made in the image of God; and, in spite of the fall, some vestiges of that image remain. He aspires to good things. He desires peace, progress, prosperity. None of these things is bad. It is just that they are partial lights. They are good so far as they go, but they do not go far enough. They deal with externals, but they do not provide that inner satisfaction that all men need and so desperately crave. To call Jesus the true light is, therefore, to refer to him as that sole source of full illumination by which men and women can learn the truth about God and about themselves and enter into that close personal relationship to him to which they are called. All this is involved in Christ's reminder that he is the light.

Suppose the people reject him? It does not matter. He is still the light. Suppose they kill him? He is still the light. He is the light for our own time also.

A Challenge

Jesus did not only give the people a reminder, however; he also gave them a challenge that was coupled to it. It has two parts: "walk" in the light (v. 35), and "believe" in the light (v. 36). Here Jesus speaks of walking first and of believing second. Placed in logical order, "believe" should come first and "walk" second. First, we must believe on the light. After that we are to walk in it.

What does it mean to believe on the light? Simply, it means to believe on Jesus, which is to trust him. In the twentieth chapter, John gives this as the purpose of the book: "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (vv. 30-31). In the biblical sense, believing on someone means to take that individual at his or her word and then to act upon it. In the case of Jesus, it means to take him at his word when he declares himself to be the Son of God and our Savior and then to act upon that conviction by trusting him as Savior and following him as Lord.

Is Jesus God? Then he must be our God and we must worship him as God. Is he the Savior? Then he must be our Savior. Is he the One who lives to instruct and help and strengthen his people? Then he must be our instructor and helper, and the source of our strength.

This leads to the second part of Christ's challenge. It is the challenge to "walk" in Christ's light. This is a step beyond merely believing, though it is related to it. It involves continuing activity or progression. In other words, a proper response to Jesus involves much more than merely committing oneself to a set of truths and acting upon them once. Rather, it involves committing oneself to Jesus, who is on the move, and following him continuously. It means walking in his steps. It means doing what he does, thinking as he thinks, acting as he acts. To do that is to walk in the light, for he is the light. To refuse to follow him is to fall back into darkness.

The Encroaching Darkness

The third part of Christ's final teaching is a warning: "Walk while you have the light, before darkness overtakes you." This is serious, for it is the teaching that if we do not follow Christ, not only do we remain in darkness, but the darkness in which we find ourselves intensifies. Maclaren has written, "Rejected light is the parent of the densest darkness, and the man who, having the light, does not trust it, piles around himself thick clouds of obscurity and gloom, far more doleful and impenetrable than the twilight that glimmers round the men who have never known the daylight of revelation."

The Pharisees in John's story of the man who had been born blind are the clearest example of this principle. On the one hand, the story of the man who had been blind is the story of Christ bringing light to one who had been born in darkness. This was true both physically and spiritually. The physical miracle is obvious. The spiritual miracle is seen in the blind man's gradual growth in perception as to who Christ was and in believing on him. At the beginning of the story, he knows him only as "the man they called Jesus" (9:11). Later on, he calls him "a prophet" (v. 17). Still later, Jesus is referred to as being "from God" (v. 33). The last we see of the man who had been born blind, he is calling Christ "Lord" and worshiping him as "the Son of Man" (vv. 35, 38). In other words, the story of the man born blind is the story of the coming of spiritual (as well as physical) light to a man who had been born in both spiritual and physical darkness. On the other hand, the story is also the story of a progression into greater darkness by those who would not have Christ's light. The Pharisees could see physically, but they would not see spiritually. Consequently, they come to hate the light increasingly as the story unfolds.

What will it be like in our lives? Will we go from faith to faith and from sight to sight, as was the case in the life of the man who had been born blind? Or will we go from unbelief to unbelief, from darkness to darkness? It all depends upon our relationship to him who is the only genuine light of this world.

A Promise

Finally, we notice that Christ's words also contain a promise. It is the promise that, if we believe in the light, we will be "sons of light." How gracious this is! We notice that, in one sense at least,
Christ's final sermon is complete even without this promise. It has contained a reminder of Christ's teaching. It has presented a challenge. It has even possessed a warning of what will happen if the challenge goes unheeded. If Jesus had stopped at that point, who could say that anything is lacking? No one! Yet such is the grace of our Lord, that he seems unwilling to end his public words with a warning and instead closes on a note of promise. True, the darkness is coming. But though it comes, the one who believes on Jesus may, by that very belief, become a child of light and thus reflect the radiance of his departed Master to the darkening world.

This does not mean that the followers of Christ will be lights in the same sense that he is the light. There is only one true light; that is Jesus. But it does mean that they may reflect him and thus become a source of blessed illumination to others.

This, then, is Christ's final message. For some it must be a reminder. If you have heard the truth but have not responded to it, you must be reminded. You must also believe. Others require a challenge. If you are one who needs a challenge, you may remember what Jesus has said and know that you must do something. But you have not done it. Heed the challenge. Jesus commands you to "put your trust in the light" and "walk in it." Still others must be warned. You need to be warned if you have delayed your decision. Learn that you are in danger of slipping away into darkness forever. Learn that there is a true light and a true darkness, and believe on Jesus. Finally, there are those who must be encouraged by Christ's promise.

"Put your trust in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light." Believe on him, and enter into that great and promised blessing.

Chapter 160.
The Miracle of Unbelief

John 12:36-40

Jesus' last sermon to the people of his day—a sermon that contained a reminder of his teaching, a challenge to respond to him, a warning to those who would not respond, and a promise to those who would—properly closes this, the middle section of John's Gospel. It is a section in which Jesus began to call a people to himself out of Judaism. It started with Christ's call to the man who had been born blind; it ends with this final and open invitation: "Believe in the light while you have it, so that you may become sons of light" (v. 36). The next section of the Gospel, chapters 13 through 17, properly contains Christ's private teaching to those who are his own. Therefore, there are no more public invitations to come to him. In spite of this good ending, however, John seems unwilling to conclude this section of the Gospel without a few summarizing comments. Therefore, in verses 37-50, we find a three-part conclusion. First, there is an analysis of the stark fact of Israel's unbelief (vv. 36-41). Second, there is the acknowledgement that, nevertheless, some did believe, coupled to an explanation of why they did not come forward publicly to defend the Lord (vv. 42-43). Third, there is a resume of the whole of Christ's teachings, stressing (1) his relationship to the Father, (2) his identity as this world's light, (3) the danger of unbelief, and (4) the nature of his teachings and the blessed result of responding to them (vv. 44-50).

This threefold summary of Christ's public ministry will occupy us in this and the last two studies of the twelfth chapter. The next study, "What Isaiah Saw," is an excursus.

Unbelievable Unbelief

Jewish unbelief has been a recurring theme throughout this Gospel. So we are not surprised to find that, as John brings his account of the public ministry to a close, he reminds us of this once more. He writes, "When he had finished speaking, Jesus hid himself from them. Even after Jesus had done all these miraculous signs in their presence, they still would not believe in him" (vv. 36-37). It is a striking fact, but a true one, that Israel would not receive, and actually killed God's Messiah.

The unbelievableness of Israel's unbelief escapes us today, being separated from the events of those days by nearly two thousand years. But though it means little to us, the strangeness of Israel's unbelief did not escape the early preachers of the gospel, most of whom were Jews, and in fact actually became a source of great puzzlement and anguish for them. These men lived their lives in the light of the Old Testament prophecies and therefore knew that the Messiah of God was to come to bless Israel. Besides, they knew that Jesus was this Messiah. What should have happened? Obviously, Israel should have believed in Jesus and have welcomed him joyfully. But instead of this, Israel seemed as a whole to be rejecting him while the Gentiles seemed to be increasingly responding. How could this be? Did it mean that God had changed his mind, that he had cast off his people? Did it mean that events had taken even God by surprise? The importance of these questions and the struggles that they reflect are seen clearly in Romans 9-11, in which Paul fights his way through such questions forcefully, concluding at the end that God has not cast off his people but rather has allowed them to fall into unbelief for a time in order that his grace in Christ might be extended to the Gentiles as well as to a remnant chosen out of Israel.

This is precisely the problem with which John is dealing. And while it is true that he does not deal with it as analytically as does Paul, nor as fully, nevertheless it is along the same lines (particularly in regard to prophecy) that he answers it. This answer is in the verses before us.

John asks why it is that the nation of Israel as a whole did not believe. The answer he gives is that the unbelief of the Jews is in accord with prophecy. "Even after Jesus had done all these miraculous signs in their presence, they still would not believe in him. This was to fulfill the word of Isaiah the prophet: 'Lord, who has believed our message, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?'" (vv. 37-38).

It is a terribly significant prophecy that John refers to, of course. For the verses he quotes are those that open the magnificent fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. The chapter begins with the questions: "Who has believed our message, and to whom has the arm of the LORD been revealed?" The answer is: No one. So the chapter goes on to show the consequences of the failure to believe. The Messiah came, but he was "despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with grief. Like one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not" (Isa. 53:3). This is the more remarkable in that the Messiah was to speak such great words and perform such great deeds. Here Bishop Westcott, one of the most careful commentators on John's Gospel, notes: "The prophecy itself (Isa. 53:1) sets forth the two sides of the divine testimony, the message as to the servant of God which appealed to the inward perception of truth; and the signs of the power of God which appealed outwardly to those who looked upon them. In both aspects the testimony failed to find acceptance. The message was not believed; the signs were not interpreted." John also indicates that Jesus spoke wisely ("These things spoke Jesus," v. 36) and acted powerfully ("He had done so many miracles," v. 37); yet the people of his time did not respond to him.

John's quotation cannot be construed in any way that would lessen the responsibility of men and women for their own disobedience. It is true that by their disobedience the people of Christ's day fulfilled Scripture (v. 38). It is also true, as the next verses will also show, that as a result of their disobedience God increasingly blinded their eyes so that they could not see, or understand, or be converted (vv. 39-40). But this does not mean that they were not responsible before God for their lack of response to Jesus. John does not minimize human responsibility. Consequently, the tone of the passage is actually one of marveling that the people of Christ's day could have disbelieved, particularly after he had taught so persuasively and done so many miracles.

In view of this emphasis it may be well to translate verse 38 by using the second of two possible meanings of the Greek word lying behind the word "that." The word can mean "in order that," which would tend to put the blame for their unbelief upon God. But it can also mean "so that" or "consequently." If that is so, the verses may be translated, "They believed not; consequently the saying of Isaiah was fulfilled." John's point is not that God made them disbelieve, but rather that we should not be surprised by their disbelief in that God had prophesied it even before it happened.

Anyone who is away from God is away from God because of his or her own desires and decisions. Men and women departed from God in Adam, and they remain cut off from God because they prefer their own will to God's will and will not have Christ to be their Savior.

When God Hardens Hearts

"But what of the next verses that quote Isaiah 6:9-10?" someone might ask. "Do they not say explicitly that God blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts precisely so that those involved might not see, understand, or turn to Jesus?" It is a good question. Let me answer it.

Above everything else, we must say that if God chooses to intervene in a specific way in an individual life to harden that life so that the individual cannot believe on Jesus, then God is right in so acting. If this is what he actually does—and notice that I only said "if—then God is just, and no man (least of all we ourselves) has the slightest ground for rebuking him. As Paul writes, "What then shall we say? Is God unjust? Not at all! ...Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:14-18). If God hardens hearts as a result of which men and women cannot believe and are judged for it, then that is just the way it is, and God is guiltless. We are in no position to judge him by our limited wisdom and inadequate standards.

But is this, in fact, what he does? Or, to be more specific, is this what our text teaches? I do not believe so, for these reasons:

First, this is not what the Word of God as a whole teaches. What does it teach? Does it teach that men are able to choose God but that God singles out some, whose minds he closes, who therefore do not believe, and who are therefore damned? Is it this? Or is it that men begin by being unable to choose God, God intervenes graciously to open some eyes to see the truth and embrace it, and, as a result, these objects of God's gracious intervention are saved? Certainly it is the latter. Jesus said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (John 6:44), and he pointed out that God does draw some (John 6:37). Consequently, in terms of salvation it is hardly necessary for God to blind anyone; for men begin blind and come to Christ only when God intervenes to give sight to them. If God wishes anyone to go to hell, he needs only to withhold his grace, and the individual will go there as the inevitable consequence of his or her own negative capabilities.

The second reason why this is not the proper interpretation of our text is that an entirely different sequence is indicated even in this passage. We notice here that John does not begin with a quotation from Isaiah 6:9-10. He begins with the statement that even though Jesus did so many miracles, "they still would not believe in him." That is, he begins with their unbelief. It is only after this that he notes that God hardened their hearts lest they should see and be converted. In other words, this is a judicial activity. In the beginning they "would not" believe. Afterwards they "could not."

The third reason why we must not reason from God's blinding of eyes to unbelief (but rather the reverse) is that it is the latter that occurs in the immediately preceding words of Jesus. In that passage Jesus warned his listeners not to reject the light, arguing that if they rejected the light, an even greater darkness than they now knew would come upon them. This is not a darkness that causes unbelief but rather a darkness that results from it. It is a working out of God's just laws, by which faith leads to even greater faith and unbelief to even greater unbelief. We think here of Paul's threefold repetition of the phrase "God gave them over" in the first chapter of Romans. "If God withhold abused grace, and give men over to indulged lusts, if he permit the evil spirit to do his work on those that resisted the good Spirit, and if in his providence he lay stumbling-blocks in the way of sinners, which confirm their prejudices, then he blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts, and these are spiritual judgments, like the giving up of idolatrous Gentiles to vile affections, and degenerate Christians to strong delusions."

In all this there is a most solemn affirmation of human responsibility and an even more solemn warning of what transpires when the light of God goes unheeded. Because of her unbelief God gave Israel up to a deep darkness. Because of unbelief God has also promised to give the gentile world up to a "powerful delusion, so that they will believe the lie" (2 Thess. 2:11). Could that be true of you? If so, be warned by this teaching, and do not trifle with the overtures of God's love for you or his great grace.

Having said all this, one problem remains. We have concluded that God does not specifically keep some men and women from believing on Jesus but rather elects some to salvation as an outflowing of his mercy. God's hardening of hearts is a judicial hardening of those who have already turned from the light to walk in darkness. But why, we might ask, does he not save everyone? Why does he not intervene to save all men before they persist in unbelief and enter into an even greater darkness?

In the most profound sense, we must say to these questions that we just do not know. "Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?" (Rom. 11:34). This is perhaps the greatest of all mysteries; and if our understanding here is not perfect, it is only what might be expected. We must simply confess our limited understanding.

On the other hand, while we do not understand the matter perfectly, there are at least in this particular case some suggestions by which we may discern a little of God's purposes. To begin with, the first passage quoted from Isaiah is from that chapter in which the death of the Lord Jesus is fully prophesied. Isaiah shows that he was to be rejected by his people and therefore to be crucified. Moreover, he shows that as a result of this undeserved death the Messiah was to be the Savior of a great number of people. How could Jesus have died as he did unless the nation of Israel had rejected him? We might surmise that it could have happened in some other way. But it is hard to see how Jesus could have died unless he had been rejected. In this case, then, the blinding of Israel becomes the means by which the light of God shines forth from the cross unto salvation.

Moreover, it is also true that it was by the blinding of Israel that the gospel extended to the gentile nations (cf. Rom. 11:25). Had the Jews accepted the gospel it is hard to see how it could have gone out freely to the Gentiles. "But when the Jews rejected it, it became a world religion," as Morris notes. It may be that this is suggested by John's second quotation from Isaiah; for it occurs in a context in which it is said that the whole earth (not just the land of Israel) is filled with Christ's glory.

True Conversion

These are difficult words both because they speak of God's sovereign purpose in the affairs of men and because they speak of our responsibility. The sovereignty of God? That is something over which we have no control, and of which we possess only limited understanding. On the other hand, responsibility is something which must concern each of us personally.

Have you responded to the light you have been given? If not, let me remind you from the Isaiah quotation what should happen. The quotation contains four steps for a true conversion. First, you must see with your eyes. That is, you must perceive the reality of divine things and have some knowledge of them. I am well aware that this is impossible except by the grace of God. But perhaps God is thus graciously working in you and you have progressed thus far. If so, it is good. You must begin by such perception. Second, you must understand with your heart. This means that you must not only hear the truth and understand it objectively; you must also understand it and receive it personally. Third, you must be converted. This means that you must turn from sin to Christ, for conversion is nothing more than such an about-face or turning. It means leaving everything that might exert a contrary claim upon you in order truly to have and follow Jesus. Finally, you must be healed by God. This is God's final seal upon conversion and is itself salvation. God's healing involves justification, sanctification, and glorification for which God alone is responsible.

In the first quotation Isaiah asked, "Who has believed our message, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?" May God give you grace to answer, "I have believed it; I do believe it." To so believe and so answer is to become a son or daughter of light and a recipient of God's healing.

Chapter 161.
What Isaiah Saw

John 12:41

The Gospel of John is a book filled with many extraordinary verses. But none is more extraordinary than (and few are equal to) the verse to which we come now. It is a verse in which John refers to one of the most glorious visions of God ever given to a human being—the vision received by Isaiah at the beginning of his ministry as a prophet, in which he saw Jehovah sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, with his train filling the temple—saying quite naturally, it would seem, that this applies to Jesus. John says, "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him" (v. 41).

To us the reference may seem natural, for we are conditioned by centuries of Christian theology, in which full divinity has been ascribed to Jesus of Nazareth by many persons. But it was hardly natural to John, who was a Jew. Nor was it natural to his contemporaries. We must remember that for the Jew of Christ's time God had become something almost inaccessible and incomprehensible. God was the Holy One of Israel, and rightly so. He dwelt in glory unapproachable. None actually saw him. When on occasion some extraordinary figure like Moses or Isaiah received a vision of God in his glory, this was not believed even then to be a viewing of God as he is in himself but only what we might call an image of him. And even this was extraordinary and filled with wonder. Moreover, of this limited number of visions, none was more glorious than that received by Isaiah, so that if one wanted to describe what God was like in himself, nothing could come closer than this vision. Yet it is precisely this vision with all its breathtaking splendor that John blithely applies to Jesus. Without questioning, it would seem, John takes this, the most exalted portrait of Jehovah in the entire Old Testament, and says that it is a portrait of the humble carpenter from Nazareth, who was about to be crucified as a result of the hatred of his people and the indifference and calculating political expediency of the local Roman government—so great is his opinion of Jesus.

This is not the only time that Jesus has been called God, of course. He is said to be God in the opening verses of John: "In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God and the Word was God" (1:1). The same truth is implied by Jesus himself in John 8: "Before Abraham was born, I am" (v. 58). It is at least not denied toward the end of the book: "Thomas said to him, 'My Lord and my God'" (20:28). But nothing quite equals this amazing utterance, for it is so graphic, so dynamic, and so unexpected.

To understand this we need to ask precisely what it was that Isaiah saw when "he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him." And we need to ask what it teaches about the Lord Jesus.

Four Elements

Here is Isaiah's full record of the vision: "In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple. Above him were seraphs, each with six wings: With two wings they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they were flying. And they were calling to one another, 'Holy, holy, holy, is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory.' At the sound of their voices the doorposts and thresholds shook, and the temple was filled with smoke" (Isa. 6:1-4). The vision contains four elements. First, there is the vision of the Lord himself, high and lifted up. This speaks of God's sovereignty in the universe. Second, there is the view of his train filling the temple. This has to do with the fact that at this highest point of the universe there is room for no one else. Third, there is a picture of those angelic beings who wait upon God to do his bidding. This speaks of service and of how it should be performed. Finally, there is a demonstration of worship, which teaches us how we should worship the Lord Jesus Christ, who is our great God.

A Sovereign God

The first element, then, is the element of sovereignty, embodied in the picture of "the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted." It is a dramatization of the fact that he and he alone is in control of things and is always in control of them.

The obvious contrast with Uzziah is important, for it was in the year King Uzziah died that Isaiah received his vision. Uzziah was a good king who had enjoyed a long rule—in all, fifty-two years—during which time the kingdom was restored to a measure of that righteousness and prosperity it had enjoyed under David and Solomon and their immediate successors. Isaiah had grown up under the latter years of the rule of this great king. Unfortunately, however, Uzziah became ill with leprosy and eventually died. His successor was a young man of only twenty-five years of age. Besides this, trouble was brewing in the form of an increasingly belligerent and powerful Syria to the north. In time this kingdom overran the northern kingdom of Israel and threatened Judah. In the year that Uzziah died, Isaiah undoubtedly bewailed the king's loss and despaired over what the future might bring. But it was precisely at this time that God revealed himself to Isaiah as the One who was still on the throne. Uzziah might be dead, but Jehovah was living. Uzziah might have yielded up his throne, but Jehovah reigned. God, not man, was in control. Consequently, Isaiah need not fear but instead could trust God in spite of circumstances.

And, indeed, he did! In fact, trust in the sovereign God lies at the base of all Isaiah's subsequent preaching and is the secret of his great strength. Jeremiah faced many hard tasks. He knew the greatness of Israel's God, as Isaiah did. Yet Jeremiah complained and drew back and sometimes doubted. Isaiah never complained; nor did he doubt. Isaiah had peace even in storm, and the secret of it was his assurance of the sovereignty of God as revealed in this vision.

I wonder if you know God to be a sovereign God to you? Not abstractly but in a personal way? If not, it is a pity; for this is the most important of all the doctrines that concern our God.

In one of his minor writings, Donald Grey Barnhouse, the founder of the Bible Study Hour, tells a story from his childhood that illustrates the proper place of this doctrine in any system of theology. It concerns a visit to his home by a member of the U.S. Cavalry. In those days there were very few automobiles and no airplanes; so the army still used horses, and the cavalry was an important and glamorous branch of the armed services. This cavalryman gave the young Barnhouse a troop flag that read "Troop M, 14th Cavalry." One day in boasting about the relative importance of this branch of the service, the soldier said, "The most important thing in the armed forces is a Cavalry General. After that there is a Cavalry Colonel, a Cavalry Major, a Cavalry Captain, a Cavalry Lieutenant, a Cavalry Sergeant, and a Cavalry Trooper. And then there is the Cavalry Trooper's horse, followed by nothing, followed by nothing, followed by a General in the Infantry."

Everyone laughed. But years later Barnhouse remembered it and applied it to the relative importance of the various doctrines in Christianity. What is the most important doctrine in Christianity? The most important doctrine is the sovereignty of God. Our God is the Lord, high and lifted up. Beside him there is no other God. We might say that after that there is no second doctrine. He is the Lord. Nothing is second to that. So after it there is nothing, followed by nothing. Then come the doctrines that concern God's attributes, the person and work of Jesus Christ, justification, sanctification, and so on. Then there are more blank spaces. Finally there come doctrines about which the churches are divided. How should the churches be governed? Should there be bishops? What forms should the ordinances take? Is the Lord's Supper a mere memorial or does it contain a real presence of the Lord? And so on. The tragedy of most Christian discussion is that it centers almost exclusively on the third of these categories, rarely considers the second of these categories, and almost never even appreciates the first category. Isaiah began with category number one, and it transformed his ministry. So would it transform us all, if we would only see it and believe it wholeheartedly.

No Other Gods before Me

The second thing that Isaiah saw was God's train (or robe), and he noticed that it filled the entire temple. This suggests that there is room for no one else at the highest pinnacle of the universe. It is not just that Jehovah reigns, therefore, but also that no one else reigns beside him or in opposition to him. It is not just that the Lord Jesus Christ is Lord; it is also that no one else is Lord. A little later on in Isaiah's prophecy we find God saying, "I am the LORD; that is my name! I will not give my glory to another" (Isa. 42:8). In the Ten Commandments he says, "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:2-3).

This causes us to ask whether what is true in this absolute sense is true for us personally. Jesus is Lord. There is no one beside him. But is he Lord in our lives? Or is he forced to compete with our own conflicting loyalties? Does his train fill the temple of our soul? Or does he occupy just a corner of the throne room while we try to crowd many other items in also?

Some try to crowd many things in. We try to crowd in our own plans for our lives. We try to crowd in other people. Some of us crowd in our successes or the good opinion of our friends.

Then we are disturbed when our lives seem cluttered and disorganized and when they seem to have no meaning. If that is so for you, you need to learn to let other things go. Let Jesus have his rightful place and learn to pray with true sincerity, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." It is rightly said that either Jesus is Lord of all or he is not Lord at all. So allow him to be what he must be and certainly will be one day. The Bible says, "For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor. 15:25). It also says, "Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:9-11).

Humility and Service

The third element in Isaiah's vision was a sight of those angelic beings that wait on God to do his bidding. Isaiah calls them "seraphim," the only occurrence of this name in the Bible. He says each had six wings: "With two wings they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they were flying" (6:2). Here a great deal is suggested. In saying that they covered their face, he is saying that they were reverent, for they did not consider themselves worthy even to gaze upon God. In saying that they covered their feet, he speaks of self-effacement.

"Seraphim" probably means "the burning ones," so they are glorious also, as is God. Yet they did not want any eyes to settle on them, but on God only. Finally, he speaks of the wings that they used to fly. This speaks of service, for they used these to do God's bidding.

Would we serve God? Then here is a picture of what is required: humility, self-effacement, and readiness to respond. The seraphim are a pattern for such service.

Moreover, they are a reminder of the resources that are available to God in accomplishing his purposes and protecting those whom he has promised to protect. For one thing, these angelic powers were available to the Lord Jesus Christ during the days he spent on earth. In the Garden of Gethsemane, after Peter had sought to defend him against the soldiers who had come to arrest him, Jesus said, "Put your sword back in its place, for all who draw the sword will die by the sword. Do you think I cannot call on my Father, and he will at once put at my disposal more than twelve legions of angels? But how then would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen in this way?" (Matt. 26:52-54).

That same lesson is demonstrated in the story of Elisha and his young servant at Dothan. Ben Hadad, the king of Syria, had been fighting against the king of Israel at this time; but every time he made plans to attack Israel, God revealed the plans to Elisha, Elisha told the king of Israel, and the Jewish armies escaped. Ben Hadad thought that there was a traitor in his camp. But when he was told the truth he determined to capture Elisha. One night, when Elisha was at Dothan with his servant, Ben Hadad surrounded the city so that at daybreak, when the servant went out (probably to get water) he saw the soldiers, horses, and chariots, and was terrified.

"Oh, my lord, what shall we do?" cried the servant.

Elisha responded, "Don't be afraid. Those who are with us are more than those who are with them." Then he prayed, asking God to open the young man's eyes so that he might see the true situation. God opened the eyes of the servant so that he saw "the hills full of horses and chariots of fire all around Elisha" (2 Kings 6:17). We may apply these stories personally, noting that all the glory and power that surrounds the court of our Lord is also available for the defense of those who are his servants.

Holy, Holy, Holy

The fourth thing that Isaiah noticed was the worship given to God by these hosts of heaven. "They were calling to one another," we are told. "'Holy, holy, holy, is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory.' At the sound of their voices the doorposts and thresholds moved and the temple was filled with smoke" (6:3-4). Worship means to acknowledge God's worth, that is, to take up his attributes and to remember them before him one by one. Is it not interesting, therefore, that the attribute of God that most impressed these angelic beings, who knew him so well, was holiness? If you stop any normal person on the street and ask what is the most important of God's attributes, the answer you will almost always get today is "love." Well, that is important; but it is not what most impresses those who see God face-to-face. Those who see God or have a striking revelation of God are always impressed with his holiness. Thus, it was with Isaiah himself. "Woe to me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (v. 5). It was the same with Peter: "Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man" (Luke 5:8).

If this is so, then holiness should obviously characterize the lives of those who are God's people. All the attributes are important, of course. We should be wise, as he is wise. We should love one another. We should be merciful. But above all we should be holy. We should be increasingly freed from the power of sin in our lives.

Isaiah's Commission

All this is what Isaiah saw. But it would not be right to stop at this point without at least suggesting the effect of this entire vision on his life. For the point of this is that the same effect will be seen in our lives if we catch a vision of God either through his vision or else directly from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Actually, Isaiah had three visions. The first was a vision of God; we have looked at that most carefully. The second was a vision of himself; for having seen God in his holiness, he recognized afresh that he was a sinner. Finally, there was a vision of service. This came about when Isaiah confessed his sin, was cleansed of his sin by God, heard God's voice saying, "Whom shall I send? And who will go for us?" and then responded, "Here am I. Send me." Moreover, our text tells us what he did when he was sent: "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him." Isaiah had more to say about the Lord than any other Old Testament writer. He tells of his humiliation and glory, his nature and names, his atonement and future reign. So should it be for us. If we have truly seen Jesus and then have confessed our sin and been cleansed of it, we too will want to speak of Jesus as the faithful incarnation of our God.

Chapter 162.
A Silent Majority?

John 12:42-43

Is it possible for a person to be a secret believer in the Lord Jesus Christ? Is it possible to believe in Jesus as the Son of God and our Savior from sin and truly to be committed to him and yet be silent about it? Is it possible to believe in Jesus with our whole hearts and not confess him openly?

These questions are pertinent in the light of our text, for it tells us that although the Jewish people as a whole rejected Jesus during the time he was on earth, nevertheless many did believe on him even though they did not confess him publicly. "Yet at the same time many even among the leaders believed in him. But because of the Pharisees they would not confess their faith for fear they would be put out of the synagogue; for they loved praise from men more than praise from God" (vv. 42-43). On the surface, the text seems to say that silent belief is possible, for they "believed" on Christ yet "did not confess him." At the same time the language is such that we naturally wonder if the belief involved was genuine. We can hardly avoid contrasting these verses with Christ's own statement recorded in Luke 12, in which he says explicitly, "Whoever acknowledges me before men, the Son of Man will also ackowldge before the angels of God. But he who disowns me before men will be disowned before the angels of God" (vv. 8-9).

These verses are fascinating and instructive. Yet I must confess that, even after studying them carefully, I am still not sure what final answer they give to our questions. Was the belief of these men genuine? Were they really a believing majority, though silent? If they were, it is certainly an abnormal situation; and we are warned by it. If they were not, we are encouraged to make clear by a public confession whatever faith in Christ we may have.

Secret Believers

It is easy to outline these verses, for the statements depend on three verbs: believe, confess, and love. The first two tell what the men involved did; they seem to be contradictory. The third verb explains the situation.

The first thing that is said of these men, then, is that they believed on Jesus. This is John's usual phrase for speaking of true belief (6:40, 47; 7:38; 9:35; 10:42; 11:45; 12:11, 44, 46; 14:12; 17:20). What is more, they tell us that many believed and that these were among the rulers of the people and not just among the masses. In light of the verses that come just before this statement, which tell us that the majority did not believe because the Scriptures had foretold a general rejection of Jesus by his people, the statement that some nevertheless did believe is significant. It is John's way of saying that unbelief is never total, that human responsibility persists regardless of the biblical prophecies, and that (regardless of the depravity of the age) God always preserves to himself a remnant. We remember that it is a characteristic of this book that after having spoken of unbelief, John almost always adds that nevertheless some followed Jesus (7:31; 10:3942; 11:45; 12:10-11).

At this point, then, it would seem that the belief of these rulers was genuine. And if this is so, then the message is the same as the one Paul gives in discussing the unbelief of the masses of Israel in Romans 11. "I ask then: Did God reject his people? By no means! I am an Israelite myself, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin. God did not reject his people, whom he foreknew. Don't you know what the Scripture says in the passage about Elijah—how he appealed to God against Israel: 'Lord, they have killed your prophets and torn down your altars; I am the only one left, and they are trying to kill me'? And what was God's answer to him? 'I have reserved for myself seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal.' So too, at the present time there is a remnant chosen by grace" (vv. 1-5). I repeat, then, that if the belief of these rulers was genuine, then we have a marvelous illustration of the grace of God in preserving his remnant. For here, even at the time of the crucifixion of the Lord, there were those who believed on him.

On the other hand, suppose that theirs may not have been a genuine faith. Suppose they did not believe to the point of actually committing themselves to Jesus. Still they believed intellectually and were at least sympathetic. Who can tell what they might have done had someone only spoken to them and sought to draw them to a more open commitment?

We should be encouraged by that in our witnessing. At times it seems as if all are openly hostile or at least indifferent to the claims of Christ, and we feel ourselves defeated even before we begin to speak to them of Jesus. But we cannot see their hearts, and it may well be that many of those to whom we speak actually already secretly believe a great deal of what we have to say and only need a small degree of encouragement in order to make an open profession. Here Matthew Henry writes most perceptively: "The truth of the gospel has perhaps a better interest in the consciences of men than we are aware of. Many cannot but approve of that in their hearts which yet outwardly they are shy of. Perhaps these chief rulers were true believers, though very weak, and their faith like smoking flax. ...Some are really better than they seem to be. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. The kingdom of God comes not in all with a like observation; nor have all who are good the same faculty of appearing to be so."

If this is the case, then we who have confessed Christ openly may be greatly encouraged and may make every effort to "lift up the hands which hang down and the feeble knees" and lead many to an open confession of Christ unto salvation.

Cost of Discipleship

At this point, however, we have said everything positive that we know to say about these secret believers. For having said that they "believed on" Christ, the text goes on to add that nevertheless "they did not confess their faith for fear they would be put out of the synagogue." They believed, in some sense; John says so. But, having said this, there is no more good to add.

But perhaps even here some small good may be said. For it is at least true, is it not, that they recognized the true cost of discipleship, even though they were unwilling to pay it. What was the cost? In their case it involved what we would call excommunication. It involved being barred from public worship. It involved being excluded from the religious life of their fellow men. It involved the loss of the sacrifices as an atonement for sin. It involved loss of position. It involved becoming somewhat of a pariah, an outcast, one to be kept from the society of decent people and to be spoken of to children as a warning of the consequences of sin. These were no small items, particularly for those who had been leaders in Israel. They were costly—too costly. So, although these men wished to believe on Christ and confess him, and although they recognized the cost of such discipleship, they would not pay the price and so kept silent.

They were trying to do something that ultimately is impossible—to be secret disciples. Someone has said that secret discipleship is a contradiction in terms; for either the secrecy kills the discipleship, or else the discipleship kills the secrecy. Perhaps it was the latter. Perhaps they eventually came out for Jesus. But we do not know what happened. We only know that they ran a great risk. For, having failed to confess him, there is always the other alarming possibility, that they fell away.

I wonder who those are who are trying to be secret believers today. Are you one? Are you one who believes in Christ but who is willing to have others deny him and never raise a word in his defense?

I wish I could get through to you, if that is the case. I wish I could show you that this is not true discipleship as the Bible speaks of it. Dietrich Bonhoeffer is one who faced precisely this problem in his day and who wrote a book about it. He served in the state church in Germany, a church in which many claimed to be believers and yet never thought of paying the cost of confessing Jesus openly. Bonhoeffer fought such a practice, calling it "cheap grace," and by contrast called for a grace that was "costly." He wrote, "Cheap grace is the preaching of forgiveness without requiring repentance, baptism without church discipline, Communion without confession, absolution without personal confession. Cheap grace is grace without discipleship, grace without the cross, grace without Jesus Christ, living and incarnate.

"Costly grace is the treasure hidden in the field; for the sake of it a man will gladly go and sell all that he has. It is the pearl of great price to buy for which the merchant will sell all his goods. It is the kingly rule of Christ, for whose sake a man will pluck out the eye which causes him to stumble. It is the call of Jesus Christ at which the disciple leaves his nets and follows him....

"Such grace is costly because it calls us to follow, and it is grace because it calls us to follow Jesus Christ. It is costly because it costs a man his life, and it is grace because it gives a man the only true life. It is costly because it condemns sin, and grace because it justifies the sinner. Above all, it is costly because it cost God the life of His Son: 'Ye were bought at a price,' and what has cost God much cannot be cheap for us. Above all, it is grace because God did not reckon His Son too dear a price to pay for our life, but delivered Him up for us. Costly grace is the Incarnation of God."

As I reason along these lines I find myself thinking that these rulers of the people were not children of God after all. I find myself anxious that all who think they believe should be Christ's true and open followers. Costly? Yes, Jesus never said otherwise. But still it is the only wise thing to do. Remember that our Lord asked perceptively, "For what good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26).

For Men or God?

The third of John's verbs is the verb "love" by which he gives an explanation of what would otherwise be totally contradictory and confusing. These men believed on Christ; yet they did not confess him. Why not? One answer is that they did not want to be excommunicated from the synagogue. But why did they value that so highly? The man who had been born blind was excommunicated; yet he willingly endured that for the joy of knowing Jesus. What was wrong with these rulers? John gives us the explanation by the word "love," explaining that they did not confess Christ because ultimately "they loved praise from men more than praise from God." There is a wonderful expression of irony in this verse that we will miss if we look only at the English translation. The English says that the believing rulers loved the "praise" of men more than the "praise" of God. This is technically correct as a translation. The difficulty, however, is that the word rendered "praise" is not the normal word for "praise" but rather the word that is almost always elsewhere translated as "glory," the word doxa. Why does John use this word? The answer is seen in verse 41, in which John writes of the great vision of Isaiah, saying, "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory [doxa] and spoke about him." Verse 43 refers back to verse 41, as if to illustrate the folly of preferring any earthly glory, however impressive, to that overwhelming and magnificent glory that belongs to God.

John tells us that these rulers had a scale of values into which, on the one side, they put the praise of men and, on the other, the praise of God. There was much to be said for the praise of God. They knew that by confessing Christ they should be praising God and should be approved by him. On the other hand, there was even more to be said for the praise of men, so they reasoned. This is a world in which men and women operate on the basis of mutual esteem. It was good to give deference to those in high positions, and it was enjoyable to receive such deference from others. They wished to be thought well of by their superiors and to be praised by those who were beneath them in the social scale of their culture and age. In this scale the followers of the Nazarene had nothing to offer; they had lowly positions and were looked upon with contempt by all who seemed to be pillars in Jerusalem. In this balance the praise of men predominated; and the rulers concluded, to their eternal hurt, that it was better to be thought well of by men than to be accepted by almighty God.

How sad this all is, and how tragic! "No doubt," as Barclay writes, "these rulers thought themselves wise and prudent men; no doubt they thought that they were playing safe. But their wisdom did not extend to remembering that the opinion of men might matter for the few years in which they lived upon this earth; but the judgment of God matters for all eternity."

A Bold Confession

We come at the end to the question with which we began. Is it possible for a person to be a secret believer in the Lord Jesus Christ? It seems to my mind that the question is still unanswered by this text, though I tend to think that the weight is on the side of secret belief being an ultimate impossibility.

But does it matter? It does to the extent that these questions teach us the meaning of true discipleship and motivate us to take a forthright and public stand for Jesus. What does this text teach about discipleship after all? First, it teaches that belief in Christ and confession of Christ properly belong together. Possibly, just possibly, one can believe in Christ and fail to confess him, whether from fear of what others might think or from some other cause. But this is clearly abnormal and not at all to be praised. In normal belief, confession follows inevitably. So much is this the case that Paul can link the two inseparably, as he does in writing to the Romans. "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus, is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:9-10).

Second, the text teaches that even granted the possibility of such secret discipleship, nevertheless belief without confession is dangerous. Belief may win out. But silence may stifle belief instead, as indeed it seems to have done with these rulers. Did they later come out for Christ publicly? Were they among the three thousand who believed at Pentecost or the five thousand who, we are told, believed later? We do not know.

Finally, the verses teach us the relative value of God's approval as over against the variable and passing praise of men. Ultimately only God's approval matters. Who cares if men should mock us? Who cares if we should lose the esteem of this world's beautiful people? What matters if we lose everything, so long as we have God's approval? Do we have these values? Do we think in these terms? God grant that we might and that, as a result, we might be bold to confess Christ openly.

Chapter 163.
What Jesus Said

John 12:44-50

The most obvious division in the Gospel of John occurs at the end of chapter 12, for up to this point John has been dealing with what the Lord Jesus Christ did publicly—his miracles, public teaching, and healings—while after this, from chapter 13 through the end of the book the ministry of the Lord becomes a private one directed toward his disciples. These last chapters contain the beloved final discourses, plus the record of Christ's death and resurrection.

This makes the verses that end chapter 12 particularly important; for in them John sums up what Jesus has said and done and reflects upon it, thereby also commending the teachings of Christ to any who may not yet be Christians. This has been true of all these final verses, of course, beginning with verse 37; but it is particularly true of the verses to which we come now. These last verses (vv. 44-50) contain what we can only call a resume of Christ's teaching. These are not the last words Christ spoke publicly—the last words he spoke publicly are recorded in verses 35 and 36—but they are a final summation of his teaching.

In them, Jesus speaks, first, of his relationship to the Father (vv. 44-45). This involves his deity and is very important. Second, he speaks of himself as the "light of the world" (v. 46). Third, he speaks of the danger of unbelief (vv. 47-49). Finally, in the last verse, there is a command to believe (v. 50).

Knowledge of God

We begin, then, with the deity of Jesus. The importance of this is explained by the Lord himself in saying, "When a man believes in me, he does not believe in me only, but in the one who sent me. When he looks at me he sees the one who sent me." The importance of the deity of Jesus Christ is that we know God only in him; and if the Lord Jesus Christ is not God, then we do not know what God is like because we have no basis for saying anything about him.

If God does not intervene in history to speak of himself (which is what we have in Scripture), and if he does not act to show himself (which is what we have in Jesus Christ), then we have no knowledge of him. We can hold conferences. We can say, "I think God must be a being who cares for us; because we care for one another God must care for us." But that is all inferential. It may be right, but we do not know that it is right. On the other hand, when God intervenes to tell us about himself in Scripture—through men who, as Peter says, were "borne along by the Holy Spirit"—then we have sure knowledge about God. That is why the Word is important. And when God intervenes in history in Jesus Christ to give us not just words but also to show us a personality, then we know him personally.

What is God like? The answer is that God is like Jesus. That is the importance of the deity of Jesus Christ. There are other important truths connected with this, of course. If Jesus Christ is not God, Jesus could not have died for our sin. If he were just a man, he had to die for his own sin.
That is part of it, and there is more. Nevertheless, in terms of our knowledge of God, which this Gospel, written to a Greek world very much concerned with knowing God, emphasizes, the deity of Jesus Christ is important in that it is the ultimate and only solution to knowing him.

Do you think that God is love? You know that God is love because Jesus Christ is love and showed it by dying for us. Do you think that God is holy and righteous and good? Do you want to know that God is filled with wisdom, that he understands you, that he is able to help you in any extremity? You know that because of Jesus. Therefore we, as Christians, are not left in the dark as to what God is; we do not find ourselves saying, "Oh, I wish I knew what he is like! If only I could know him, that would certainly be satisfying!" We are not in the position of those who make that kind of a statement. Rather we are those who turn our eyes to the Jesus we find in the Scriptures and say, "There is our God revealed." And we love him and worship him because of it.

Escape from Night

The second thing Jesus says is that he is "a light" come into the world in order that whoever believes on him should not abide in darkness. This is another great theme of the Gospel. John speaks of it in the opening chapter, for instance, describing the Lord Jesus Christ as both light and life. Then in two great texts later on—once in the eighth chapter, verse

12, and once in the ninth chapter, verse 5—the Lord Jesus Christ says explicitly, "I am the light of the world."

What does it mean that Jesus is this world's light? It means several things. First, it means that apart from him this world is in darkness. That does not mean that there are therefore absolutely no glimmerings of what we might call light. Certainly man was made in the image of God and retains something of that image even after the fall, although in a debased form. Our minds, as partial remnants of that image, can think God's thoughts after him. They can provide and disseminate a certain degree of light in human thought and philosophy. But our minds cannot do this in spiritual things. That is the point. And that is why the world is in such deep darkness. The world can understand mechanics, science, art, interpersonal relationships, and many other subjects. But spiritually, it has no light at all. Jesus is the One who came to impart light in order that we might see what goodness, truth, and righteousness are, and above all might see what God himself is.

When the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world and shone as God's light, he exposed the darkness of the world as no one had ever done previously. And, of course, those who had an invested interest in things as they were hated him for exposing their darkness and eventually had him crucified.

It is interesting and helpful to review the claim "I am the light of the world" in the contexts of the two stories in which it occurs in John's Gospel. Take the eighth chapter, first of all. There the sentence occurs in verse 12. But what occurs in verses 1-11? In those verses John tells the story of the woman taken in adultery, which story reveals the hatred and ruthless activity of Christ's opponents more than anything else in the entire Gospel. These men said, "Perhaps we can catch him in this way. We know that he preaches love and forgiveness. We also know that he pretends to speak for God. Let us catch him in a situation in which he will be forced to choose between love and God's law. If he says to forgive, we will say, 'What kind of a prophet is this that speaks against the law of Moses?' If he says to obey the law, we will say, 'What is all this talk about love?' We will discredit him." Eventually someone thought of confronting him with a woman who had been caught committing adultery. It was brilliant, they thought; it fit the bill perfectly. It was a good capital offense by Mosaic law, yet it was also the sort of thing that would draw out sympathy. So they set it up. Probably they enticed the woman; at least one of them did. Then they trapped her, making sure, of course, that they had two eyewitnesses. They peeked through the keyhole. Then they dragged the poor woman off to see Jesus. Imagine going to such lengths just to catch Jesus Christ!

Jesus said, "All right. You want to operate by the law. Let us operate by the law. The law requires two witnesses. Who is going to witness? Who has a pure enough heart to stand up and condemn this woman?" It was certainly not going to be one of those who had seen her, because under Jewish law, entrapment was just as reprehensible as it is under our law. Besides, they were guilty of other sins also. So under Christ's gaze they all just faded away one by one, and in the end there was only one person who could have accused her, the Lord himself. He said, "We have operated under the law, but there is only one witness now. The law cannot function, for it requires two witnesses. Therefore I now choose to operate on the basis of my grace based upon the death that I am going to provide as an atonement for sin." So he forgave her, saying, "Go, and sin no more."

"I am the light of the world." A great light! But that light also reveals the terrible darkness of the human heart.

When one turns to the next chapter of John's Gospel, he finds Christ's statement in another context. Here is a man who had been born blind. He had lived all his life, thirty-eight years, in this state. He had never seen the sun. He had never seen a tree, a stone, a lamb. He had never seen a person. This man had moved around the city of Jerusalem by touch for all these many years. At last, however, the Lord singled him out and healed him. And what happened? The healing had taken place on the Sabbath, and these same leaders were angry that Jesus was breaking their Sabbath regulations. They did not care at all about the man who had been healed. So they dragged the man in, interrogated him, and in exasperation eventually excommunicated him. He had not done anything. He had just been a passive victim of a healing. Yet they threw him out, thereby revealing the darkness of their own hearts. They preferred ecclesiastical rules, regulations, and liturgies to God's transforming work within the life of a man or a woman. Jesus was "the light of the world," but these rulers were in darkness.

Then, too, it is not only that the world is in darkness and that Jesus is the light. This is not the only thing Jesus says here. Jesus also says that it is possible to be delivered out of darkness. If the world is in darkness, we are in darkness. But Jesus Christ does not come just to reveal our darkness, to say, "Look! You are in darkness, and darkness it is." He comes to lift us out of our darkness by means of his marvelous light. He says, "I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness."

To believe on the Lord Jesus Christ—that is the solution! He is the light. So if we come to him and depend upon him, we have light and walk in his light. Moreover—because this is not just external, because it is also an internal transformation—we even become, wonder of wonders, what he himself calls us: "sons of light." That is, we come to partake of his nature through believing on him.

Judgment Coining

There is a third point, beginning with verse 47. It is what I would call the danger of unbelief. "As for the person who hears my words but does not believe, I do not judge him," says Jesus. "For I did not come to judge the world, but to save it. There is a judge for the one who rejects me and does not accept my words; that very word which I spoke will condemn him at the last day. For I did not speak of my own accord, but the Father who sent me commanded me what to say and how to say it."

Here Jesus speaks of a future day of judgment. He comes in grace. Indeed, he comes in grace to all of us. This is the day of grace. He offers himself as the Savior. But Jesus does not mince words when he says that if you reject him now, you are going to face his words in a future day that will not be a day of grace but will be a day of judgment, and that in that day you will be required to answer for everything you have done and said. You will have to answer for all your rebellion. Is that not significant—that there is a future day, that the future day is a day of judgment, and that the words of Jesus will judge us in that day?

Some time ago, when I was speaking at a theological conference, a professor in one of our theological seminaries stood up and said, "We have got to get it into our heads that nothing in life is ever going to change. Things are as they are today, and they are going to continue as they are indefinitely. The Lord Jesus Christ is never going to come back." Fortunately, the apostle Peter had warned me what to think about such a person, because he had said several thousand years ago that in the last times scoffers will come saying, "Where is this 'coming'? Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it did since the beginning" (2 Peter 3:4). Moreover, he had warned me to pay no attention to them, saying, "Do not forget this one thing. ...With the Lord a day is like a thousand years and a thousand years are like a day. The Lord is not slow in keeping his promise, as some understand slowness. He is patient with you, not wanting any to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (vv. 8-9).

Do you think that this world will continue indefinitely? A person has a right to his opinion, I suppose. But I believe the word of the Lord Jesus Christ who said that all things will not continue as they are, that a future day of judgment is coming, and that all men and women will in that day have to answer for what they have said and done.

How will you answer? What will you say when God asks you, "What right do you have to come into my heaven?" Will you say, "I have done many good things"? God will answer, "Not good enough; my standard is perfection." Or will you say instead, "I come not on my own merit but solely on the merit of the Lord Jesus Christ, who died for me. I have nothing in myself by which to commend myself to you. But Jesus died in my place. He paid the price of my sin. He bore the punishment for my transgression. Through believing on him I have received a new life." That is the only basis on which any man or woman will be saved.

So we must come to that now, to that commitment to the Lord Jesus Christ about which John speaks.

A Command to Believe

The last point is in verse 50: "I know that his command leads to eternal life. So whatever I say is just what the Father has told me to say." I find the word "commandment" to be most interesting. Jesus says that God's commandment is life everlasting. But what commandment is this? What command is life everlasting? Only this: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you will be saved." That is God's commandment.

Today, in much of our evangelism, we treat the offer of salvation as nothing more than an invitation—an invitation to come and believe on Jesus, to give one's heart to the Savior. This is true in one sense, of course. The Lord Jesus Christ did say, "Come to me all who are weary and burdened." But we must remember that this is not all that can be said. The offer of salvation is an invitation, but it is an invitation that is at the same time a command. When Paul preached at Athens he talked about the spiritual ignorance of the Athenians that, he said, God "overlooked" for a time, but now he "commands all men everywhere to repent" (Acts 17:30). In the same way, on the day of Pentecost, Peter said, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins" (Acts 2:38). This is not something to be toyed with; this is not something to be delayed. God is our master, and he orders us to turn from sin and to respond to him.

I do not want to seem harsh. Of course, the call to believe on Jesus is an invitation. It is out of love that the Lord Jesus Christ offers the command, speaks the words. It is out of love that God calls upon us to repent. But, at the same time, the matter of belief is not optional. It is required of us. Therefore, to fail to believe is not just a misfortune. It is sin.

Will you believe? Jesus says, "He who has seen me has seen the Father." He says, "I have come into the world as a light." Will you allow him to be your light, your Savior?

The Gospel of John, Volume 4

Peace in Storm (John 13-17)

by

James Montgomery Boice

© 1985, 1999 by James Montgomery Boice. Database © 2007 WORD*search* Bible Corp.

To him who,
having loved his own, loved them unto the end

Preface

The lengthy section of John's Gospel beginning with 13:1 and concluding with 17:26 contains probably the best-known and most-loved words of religious instruction ever uttered by any religious teacher. It is not hard to see why. For here, on the verge of his own horrible suffering and death by crucifixion, this one, who claimed to be God, speaks out of the peace he possessed to tell his disciples how to experience peace in tribulation.

It is not that Jesus was unaware of what lay before him or that he was unmoved by it. On the contrary, he had repeatedly foretold his crucifixion, saying that "the Son of man will be betrayed to the chief priests and teachers of the law. They will condemn him to death and hand him over to the Gentiles, who will mock him and spit on him, flog him and kill him. Three days later he will rise" (Mark 10:33-34). Again, Jesus had said of his pending death, "Now my heart is troubled, and what shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'? No, it was for this very reason I came to this hour" (John 12:27). No, Jesus was not unaware of the suffering that was to come, nor was he unmoved by it. It is simply that he had found the secret of peace in storm, or rather that he was himself the peace in whose shelter those who believed in him might cluster.

This is the message of these famous and final discourses of Jesus of Nazareth, and hence also of this, the fourth volume in my five-volume expository commentary on John's Gospel. The questions it asks are:

"Do you want peace?" and "Are you willing to receive it at the point where alone Jesus indicates it may truly be found?"

As has been my pattern in the other volumes in this series, I have occasionally deviated from a strict exposition of these chapters to deal at somewhat greater length with a subject suggested by them. In earlier volumes this procedure has been followed by a study of witnessing, baptism, the Sunday-versus-Sabbath question, the Scriptures, Christ our Good Shepherd, and death. In this volume I devote three special studies to the doctrine of heaven, eight studies to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and seven studies to the marks of the church enumerated by Jesus in his great high-priestly prayer recorded in chapter 17.

For those who have purchased the earlier studies, I point out that the five-fold division of the Gospel introduced in volume 1 is still being followed. Volume 1 deals with the coming of the light of the Lord Jesus Christ into this world (chapters 1-4). Volume 2 deals with the growth of hostility toward him on the part of the religious leaders of the day (chapters 5-8). Volume 3 deals with the words of the Lord in beginning to call out a people to himself from among Israel, beginning with his call of the man who had been born blind (chapters 9-12). This volume, volume 4, deals with the final discourses of Jesus and their message of peace in storm, as has been indicated (chapters 13-17). The final volume, number 5, deals with the last events of Christ's earthly life, culminating in his resurrection (chapters 18-21).

One of the much-appreciated blessings that I have experienced in the course of my ministry is the active support of the congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, to whom these messages were originally preached. These dear people encourage me to spend a significant amount of my time in serious Bible study and exposition in order to prepare such messages. Also, Miss Caecilie M. Foelster, my secretary, has assisted me in the editing and proofing of this material, as she has in the preparation of the numerous other books I have written. I am especially thankful to her.

The book bears the dedication: "To him who, having loved his own, loved them unto the end." May this work serve to glorify him, and may he alone be glorified. Amen and Amen.

James Montgomery
Boice
Philadelphia,
Pennsylvania

Chapter 164.
Love Letters from the Lord

John 13:1

In 2 Timothy 3:16-17 the apostle Paul writes that "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for instruction, for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work." But having acknowledged that this is indeed true, that all Scripture is God's gift to us and is of inestimable value, we nevertheless recognize that for one reason or another some sections of the Bible are particularly valuable and are therefore especially prized and loved by God's people. We come to such a section in this volume.

To many persons the Gospel of John, as the most intense and spiritual of the Gospels, is the "holy place" of Scripture. But if this is so, then these chapters, 13 through 17, which contain the final discourses of the Lord with his disciples just before his crucifixion and which conclude with his great high-priestly prayer on their behalf, are the "holy of holies." Nowhere in the entire Bible does the child of God feel that he is walking on more holy ground. For here, more than in many other portions of Scripture, he hears the voice of Jesus leading him into a greater understanding of his new place before the Father and consequently also of his new position in the world. These chapters contain teaching about heaven, the new commandment, the person and work of the Holy Spirit, the mutual union of Christ with the disciples and the disciples with Christ, and prayer.

To what can we compare these chapters? They can only be compared to love letters, in this case love letters from the Lord. For here the One who is the great and faithful Bridegroom of the church speaks to those who are themselves the church and assures them of his special and enduring love for them.

Not for Everyone

This means that the truths contained in these chapters are not for everyone. They are for the Lord's people only. We have one evidence for this in the fact that they were spoken only to the Twelve in the upper room and not more widely. This irritates some people, of course, for it suggests partiality on the part of God, and in their view partiality is both unjust and despicable. But such people do not recognize the nature of the partiality that is found here, nor do they recognize how much they practice partiality themselves, in some cases even with justification.

We can immediately see the justice of these chapters not being for everyone if we simply extend the idea of these being the Lord's love letters. What would we think of a man who, for instance, is married to one woman but who writes intimate and endearing letters to many other women whom he knows? We would call that man a philanderer, a hypocrite, a liar. We recognize at once that while he may rightly have friendly contacts with many persons, including other women, nevertheless the most intimate things, those that belong in a marriage, deserve to be spoken only between husband and wife. Marriage is a private relationship. Consequently, it must be partial. In the same way Jesus has taken unto himself a special people, the church. These are his bride. It is entirely fitting and even expected that he should have special, loving, and touchingly tender words for them only.

Is this partiality? Not at all! It is grace. For it is God, of his own sovereign will, choosing those whom he thus determines to save and bless abundantly. This has nothing to do with any supposed merit in God's people, for there is none. It is simply that when men had rejected God, choosing to go their own way, God out of infinite mercy still elected to save and bless some. If he had not done so, not one soul would have been saved. That he has done so, is tremendous.

The World

It is not surprising in view of the special nature of these chapters that the verse that begins them makes the contrast between those who are Christ's own and those who are not, sharper than any other comparable passage in the Word of God. It is true that Paul does much the same thing in Romans 9 and 10. A similar contrast is found in Ephesians 2, and many times in the Old Testament. But nowhere is the contrast clearer and the categories involved more absolute. For here, in the first verse of John 13, we are at once introduced to those who are Christ's own, whom he loved faithfully until the end.

The verse says, "It was just before the Passover Feast. Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father. Having loved his own who were in the world, he now showed them the full extent of his love."

Who are Christ's own? The answer has already been given many times in John's Gospel. They are those who have been given to Christ by the Father (6:37, 44). They are those for whom Christ was about to die (10:11, 15). They are those who were born, "not of natural descent, nor of human decision or of a husband's will, but born of God" (1:13). They are those to whom Christ gives eternal life, who shall never perish, and who therefore shall never be plucked from Christ's hand (10:28-29). What is the world? The world is the human race out of which Christ called them.

It is worth considering this term "world," for, as we pointed out in one of the studies toward the end of John 4, this is one of the most important concepts in the fourth Gospel. There are several Greek words that are translated "world" in our Bibles, but the one we are interested in is kosmos, from which we get our word "cosmopolitan." Kosmos means "world." Politēs means "citizen." So a citizen of the world is a cosmopolitan. The Greek word kosmos occurs 185 times in the New Testament. But what is extremely interesting is that of these 185 occurrences of the word kosmos, 105 are in the books traditionally ascribed to John. There are 78 occurrences of the word in the Gospel, 24 in the Epistles, and 3 in the Book of Revelation. Moreover, the importance of the word in John's Gospel is made even more obvious when we compare its 78 occurrences to the 8 times it occurs in Matthew and the merely 3 times each it occurs in Mark and Luke.

What does kosmos mean? The answer to the question is a complex one, for the word is old and therefore in time has acquired multiple meanings. The word originally meant "an ornament," that is, a decorative object, the unique feature of which was its fine proportions or beauty. This meaning is preserved in our English word "cosmetic," though in this case the meaning has shifted from what is beautiful in itself to that which is used to improve features that perhaps are not. In time the word was applied to the universe or world globe, as the well-proportioned ornament of God. This meaning occurs in John 1:9 and 10, which tell us that the Light "that gives light to every man was coming into the world" and that "the world was made by him." Even here another meaning is also present, however, for verse 10 goes on to say that "the world [that is, the people in the world] did not recognize him."

Since kosmos was used to describe the "world globe," it was natural that it next came to denote
"the world of human beings." In this second sense we might also translate it as "the human race." It is said of the world in this sense that God loved it and gave his only Son for it (John 3:16), that it is the object of his saving purposes (John 3:17), that Jesus died for it (1 John 2:2), that he is its Savior (John 4:42; 1 John 4:14). It must be understood of this use of the word that it refers to the human race collectively and not necessarily to each individual, otherwise the verses cited would imply a universal salvation of all men that is clearly repudiated elsewhere.

The third and major use of the word kosmos is the one that occurs in our text and that comes to dominate the remaining chapters of John's Gospel. This usage also signifies the world of human beings, but with the additional thought that this world stands in rebellion against God. At times we may translate this use of kosmos as "the world system," including the world's values, pleasures, pastimes, and aspirations. It is said of the world in this sense that the world does not know God (1 John 3:1), that it rejected Jesus (John 1:10-11), and consequently that it also does not know and therefore also hates his followers (15:18-21; 17:14). This sense of the word is involved in every instance in which Christ's own are distinguished from the world. For example, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first" (15:18). Or again, "I have given them your words and the world has hated them, for they are not of the world any more than I am of the world" (17:14).

In summary we may say that, in the first sense, Christians are to receive the world and be thankful for it, for it is God's gift. In the second sense, they are to love the world and seek to evangelize it, for God also loves the human race. In the third sense, however, believers in Christ are to reject the world and then by God's grace also order their lives according to an entirely different set of values.

All Things for Some

The difference between God's relationship to the world and his relationship to his own has sometimes been stated in this way. God has done some things for all men, that is, everyone in the world. He has created them, sustained them, kept them from the worst that is possible, even tolerated them and thus kept them for a time from hell. On the other hand, God has done all things for some men. These are his own. They do not lack and will never lack any good thing.

What has God done for his own? In one sense the chapters we are to study are themselves the full answer to that question. The answer will come in fullness only as we study them. But as we stand at the threshold of these chapters cannot avoid at least a partial answer by way of expectation. The answer has at least six parts.

1. The first and greatest teaching of these chapters is that Jesus specifically loved those who are his own. This is how the section begins: "Jesus ... having loved his own who were in the world ... showed them the full extent of his love" (13:1). It ends with: "I have made you known to them and will continue to make you known in order that the love you have for me may be in them and that I myself may be in them" (17:26). It is not necessary to say at this point that there is no love of God for the world in general. There is a sense in which the love of God extends to all people. It is only necessary to say that the love of which we are speaking here is a special, saving love as a result of which those who are Christ's own become his own and are kept by him. For having loved them, "he showed [and continues to show] them the full extent of his love."

While this undoubtedly gives some special privileges to those who are his own, it also gives them equally special obligations. For if they are loved, they also are to love. In this lies the basis for Christ's new commandment. "A new command I give unto you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another" (13:34).

2. The second great teaching of these chapters is that Jesus has gone to prepare a place known as heaven for his people. We are not told a great deal about heaven or what awaits us there. But we are told that in it there is a place for us who believe in him, and we are also promised that he will return one day to guarantee that we get there. "In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me, that you also may be where I am" (14:2-3). Even if heaven did not exist, the love of the Lord that we have come to experience here on earth would be wonderful in itself. But, in addition to this, there is heaven. In this promise we learn that the fact that the Lord loved his own "to the end" does not merely mean "to the end of Christ's life" or even "to the end of our lives." Rather, it means "to the very end," "to the uttermost." His love for us will never end; it is eternal.

3. During these last discourses, the disciples were naturally troubled, for they had been told that the Lord, whom they loved, would be leaving them in order to return to the Father. In this context, Jesus' words about heaven were a source of great comfort. But there is another source also, and in this is found the third of Jesus' teachings. He tells the disciples, and therefore also tells us, that he is going to send a replacement for himself; that replacement, the Holy Spirit, would come and dwell within those who belong to Jesus. "And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth. The world cannot accept him, because it does not see him or know him. But you know him; for he dwells with you, and will be in you" (14:16-17).

It is also the work of the Holy Spirit to lead the apostles into all the truth concerning Jesus, bringing it to their remembrance (14:26; 16:13), and to convict the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment (16:8-11).

4. The fourth teaching of the Lord concerns his commissioning of the disciples to a special work, indeed a different work in each individual case. We find it in the fifteenth chapter. "You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit —fruit that will last" (v. 16). According to this verse, each of us has a spiritually fruitful work to perform. The promise of the Lord is that all we will accomplish in this area will remain.

5. We are told in these chapters that the Lord intercedes or prays for us. Here the seventeenth chapter is itself one long example. It is encouraging; for in these verses the Lord prays that his own might be kept from the evil that is in the world, that they might have his joy fulfilled in them, that they might be sanctified by means of the Word of God, that they might be one, and finally that they might be with Jesus in heaven. Can God turn his back on a request made by his own dear Son? Of course not! We rightly sing,

The Father hears him pray, His dear anointed One;
He cannot turn away The presence of his Son.

So these requests are already fulfilled or are in the process of being fulfilled. They carry the same weight as direct promises. We shall be kept from evil. We shall have joy. We shall be one. We shall be with Jesus in heaven.

6. Finally, just as Jesus has prayed for us, so he invites us to pray, describing this as a new and blessed privilege. "I tell you the truth, my Father will give you whatever you ask in my name. Until now you have not asked for anything in my name. Ask and you will receive, and your joy will be complete" (16:23-24).

These are the themes that are developed fully in this important fourth section of John's Gospel.

Perhaps the best comment about them is that of Paul in the great eighth chapter of Romans: "What, then, shall we say in response to this? If God is for us, who can be against us? He did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" (vv. 31-32). God has indeed given us all things. But to whom much has been given, much shall also be required. May God use our study of John 13-17 to help us become increasingly his obedient and therefore also his exceedingly joyous children.

Chapter 165.

Having Loved, He Loved

John 13:1

In the previous study of the first verse of John 13 we saw that, while God has done some things for all men, he has, in addition to this, done all things for some. This is a tremendous truth. But, like all great truths, it almost cries out for an explanation. Fortunately the explanation is in our text also. For having distinguished between those who are of the world and those who are Christ's own, the verse goes on to say, "Having loved his own who were in the world, he showed them the full extent of his love." Love is the explanation. Jesus loves his own; he loves us. This is the entire explanation of why God has done all things for those who are his spiritual people.

No Explanation

When we say this, however, we must immediately recognize that love itself is unexplainable. For if we go on to ask, "But why did God love us? Why does Jesus love us?" there is just no answer to be given.

Obviously we are not loved because we are lovable, for we are not. It is true that some of us may be lovable to some others of us, but this is only when we look at the matter from a human perspective. From God's perspective there is nothing in us to make us even remotely desirable. He is holy; we are unholy. He is just; we are unjust. He is loving; we are filled with hatred and all forms of sin. In short, we are sinful and in willful rebellion against him. Yet he loves us. In fact, this is so great a marvel that God even uses it to commend his love to us. He says, "You see, at just the right time, when we were still powerless, Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrated his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:6-8).

God has not loved us because we first loved him; he is not merely returning our love. We did not love him. On this point the apostle John writes clearly, "This is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins" (1 John 4:10).

Again, the Lord did not love us because of anything that we could do for him, for we had nothing to offer. He does not need praise; the angels praise him. He does not even need spiritual children; for, as Jesus said, he is able of stones to raise up children to Abraham. Even our numbers are not an asset. So why does God love us? The only answer is the one he gave Moses concerning the children of Israel. "The Lord did not set his affection on you and choose you because you were more numerous than other peoples, for you were the fewest of all peoples. But it was because the Lord loved you and kept the oath he swore to your forefathers" (Deut. 7:7-8). The reason God loves us is that he loves us. Beyond that, his love is unexplainable. It is without reason, at least without reason known to us.

Empirical Data

If we were to stop at this point, I suppose that in that thought alone we would have enough to keep us pondering on the love of God for eternity. But there is more. For the verse that tells us that God loves without reason also tells us that God loves without variation and without end. His love is eternal. The verse says, "Having loved his own who were in the world, he showed them the full extent of his love."

We want to come back to that phrase, "the full extent." But before we do so we need to see the reasons God gives why we should believe that his love is eternal. We cannot see into the future; therefore, rationally at least, the future lends no evidence. Why should we believe in this everlasting quality of God's love? The answer is an empirical one. It has to do with observable data, particularly data from the past and present. First, there is the past: "Having loved." Second, there is the present: "he showed." This second occurrence is a past tense (an aorist); but the sense is present, for it refers to what Jesus was then doing and was about to do.

In other words, the verse calls our attention to the observable past and present love of Christ, and it is asking us to reason on that basis. Is not love his nature? Will not he who loved in the past and loves in the present also love in the future? If he loved his disciples to the end, will he not love us similarly?

Past and Present Love

What do we know about the love of God the Father and of the Lord Jesus Christ in the past? Obviously that is a big question, the answer to which can never fully be given. But we can suggest some areas in which the answer can be seen.

First, we can see the love of God in the creation of ourselves and other human beings. We refer at this point, not merely to the fact of our existence, for our existence in itself might prove nothing. We refer rather to the fact that in creating us God created us with a spiritual vacuum within that can be filled only by himself. In other words, he created us, not to a meaningless existence but to an existence that is the highest existence possible for any created object, namely, communion with the One who created it. So it is as Augustine said, "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in Thee." The fact that we can know God and are restless until we do know him is proof of his love.

Second, God's love is seen in the fact that he, by the Holy Spirit's regenerating power has called us to himself. We have seen this several times in John's Gospel. We are told, on the one hand, that no one can come to God unless God draws him. In this fatal inability we measure the extent of our depravity. But then, on the other hand, we are told that God does draw some to himself and that none of these can be lost. In this we see God's love, for apart from the sweet drawing of that love, no one would ever come to him.

Third, we see God's love in Jesus' death for his people. This, if you will, completes the trinitarian formula, for in creation we see the love of the Father. In the effectual calling of God's people we see the love of the Holy Spirit. In the act of redemption we see the love of Jesus Christ, the Son.

The love of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for us may be illustrated by the following story as told by Harry Ironside. Many years ago, Czar Nicholas I of Russia knew a young man for whom he cared a great deal. He was the son of a good friend of his. Because of his interest in this young man, Nicholas had him assigned to a border fortress of the Russian army and caused him to be given charge of the money used for paying the soldiers. The young man started well. But he fell into bad habits, took to gambling, and eventually gambled away not only his own wealth but also a great fortune taken from government funds. He had taken just a few rubles at a time, but these had mounted up and become prodigious. One day he received notice that on the following day an official would be coming to inspect the books. The young man knew he was in trouble. So he took out the records to find out how great his debt was. He totaled the amount. Then he went to the safe, took out his own small amount of money, and counted it carefully. He subtracted the lesser from the greater. The debt was astronomical. As he sat looking at the final figure, the young officer picked up his pen and wrote in large letters, "A great debt; who can pay?" Then, because he did not see how he could face the terrible dishonor the next day held, he determined to kill himself with his revolver at the stroke of twelve.

The night was warm and drowsy. So as he waited for the midnight hour, in spite of himself the young man's head dropped lower and lower and he fell asleep.

It happened that Nicholas, who was in the habit of sometimes putting on the uniform of a common soldier and visiting the troops to see how they were getting on, did so this night, coming around to the halls of the very fortress in which the young officer was sleeping. Most of the lights were out, as they should have been. But when Nicholas got to the door of this one room he noticed a light shining under it. He knocked. No answer! He tried the latch and opened the door. There was the young officer, whom he recognized, asleep. He saw also the books and the money. The whole thing became clear in a moment. His first thought was to awaken his young friend and place him under arrest. But as he read the young man's note, his heart went out to him. "A great debt; who can pay?" Moved by a generous impulse, the Czar leaned over, picked up the pen that had fallen from the hand of the sleeping officer, wrote just one word, and tiptoed out.

For an hour or so the young man slept. Then he suddenly awoke and, seeing that it was long past midnight, reached for the revolver. As he did so his eye caught sight of his note—"A great debt; who can pay?"—and under it the one word that had not been there before: "Nicholas." He was astonished. Dropping his gun, he raced to the files where the signature of the Czar was available. He pulled this out and carefully compared it with the signature on his note. It was the real signature. He said to himself, "The Czar has been here tonight and knows all my guilt; yet he has undertaken to pay my debt; I need not die." So instead of taking his life, he rested upon the word of Nicholas and was not surprised when, early the next morning, a messenger came from the palace bearing precisely the amount of money needed to satisfy the deficit. Later, when the inspector came, everything was found to be in order.

Thus did Jesus love us and pay our great debt. We are sinners. There is no possible way for us to atone for that sin. But Jesus has paid that debt. He has signed his name to our bankrupt account. No wonder we sing:

Jesus paid it all,
All to him I owe;
Sin had left a crimson stain—
He washed it white as snow.

That is the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for us as seen in the past. It is that to which God points us and directs our eyes. Thus has he loved. Who then can doubt that he will continue to love us unto the end?

Full Extent... unto the End

The phrase "the full extent" brings us to the second half of our text. The King James Version says "unto the end." It raises the question: Unto the end of what? There are several answers.

First, it means "unto the end of the earthly life of Jesus Christ." Even the context suggests this, for the verse is given to us at the start of those chapters that tell of Christ's final ministry to his disciples prior to his crucifixion. We must admit that we are not always appreciative of this, for we take Christ's love for granted. Yet, if we would think of the possible hindrances to love both on his part and on the part of the disciples during these days, we would be more sensitive.

On his part there were great hindrances, as the verse indicates. It says, 'Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father," thereby indicating that Jesus knew clearly that he was about to die. So if we were to read that in those moments his thoughts turned from his own to himself so that, at least for a time, he ceased to love them or think about them, who could blame him? Yet knowledge of his impending death did not deter him. There were also hindrances on the part of the disciples. They were worldly, for instance. He thought spiritually. But every time he tried to teach them spiritual things, they interpreted his words on a worldly level. Moreover, they were dull. He explained great truths to them, and they did not understand. In fact, he had been explaining that he was to leave them to go to the Father, but they could not understand even this. Not one of the disciples was a fit companion for the Lord Jesus Christ. So if he had said to himself, "I have thought about these men long enough; I have done everything for them that I know how to do; it is time I thought of myself," who could blame him? No one!

Yet he loved them, fully and unselfishly, to the end of his life.

Second, he obviously also loved them to the end of their lives. True, he was to be the first to die. He died before Peter, James, John, or any of the others. But then he rose, and as the risen Lord he returned to bestow his own Spirit upon the disciples and then guide them and preserve them until the time when each would go to be with him in glory.

Finally, the phrase also means "to the very end," that is, "to the end of ends" or "without end," "forever." In Greek the word is telos, which literally means "perfection." Jesus, having loved his own who were in the world, loved them perfectly. So we sing:

> The love of God is greater far
> Than tongue or pen > can ever tell; It > goes beyond the > highest star, And > reaches to the > lowest hell.
> Oh, love of God, how rich and pure!
> How measureless and strong!
> It shall forevermore endure—
> The saints' and angels' song.

Such love is indeed forever. Having loved his own who were in the world, he loves them to the end.

Love Others, Love Him

How shall we apply these truths? On the one hand, we must apply them to believers, and, on the other, to those who are not yet believers. The word to those who believe on Christ is this: If this is the way in which God has loved us, then should we not love one another, and also fervently love him? We will never in this life love as he loved, but we can begin to try to love as he loved—unselfishly, without discrimination, without wavering. We should also serve him. For, as the hymn declares:

> Love so amazing, so divine,
> Demands my soul, my life, my all.

Again, there is a word for those who have still not become true Christians. If you are not yet a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, let me ask you a question that flows from everything I have been saying. If God loves like this, how can you afford to be without such a great love? There is no love on earth like it. Your husband or wife will not love you like this. Your children and parents will not love you like this. Your neighbors and friends will not love you like this. Only Jesus Christ loves with a perfect and everlasting love! Moreover, one day you must stand before the judgment seat of his Father, whom you have offended by your ungodly conduct and by your rejection of his great grace. What will you do in that day—if you refuse the love of the Lord Jesus Christ? What will you do without having him to stand by you and say, 'This is one of my own; this is one for whom I died; this is one whose debt I undertook to pay; this is one I love unto the end"? Without such love you will be lost forever. Fortunately, the day of God's grace is still present; you may yet come to Jesus Christ as your Savior.

Chapter 166.
Love on Its Knees

John 13:2-15

Actions speak louder than words." This expression is not always true, but it is sometimes true. And in some instances it is only actions that speak at all. The need for action in some instances reminds me of the farmer who was stuck in the middle of the road with his donkey. The donkey had planted his feet firmly on the ground and would not move no matter what the farmer did. So the man stood there shouting at the donkey, kicking him and getting angrier all the time. While this was going on another farmer came down the road and immediately sized up the problem. "Do you want help?" he asked.

"I sure could use it," the first farmer answered. "But I don't think it will do any good. I've been shouting at this stupid donkey for half an hour, and he just won't budge."

"I can fix that," the second man answered. He went over to the side of the road, picked up a club, and then came back and hit the donkey between the eyes. After that he stood back and said "Gee haw!" in a normal tone of voice, and the donkey started off.

"I don't understand it," said the owner. "I yelled at him, and he acted as if he didn't even hear me.

You spoke in a normal tone of voice, and he moved off."

"That's true," said the second man, "but first I got his attention."

The right action is valuable in many circumstances, of course. It applies in child rearing, for instance. I have saved many useless words with my children by a well-timed use of a related attention-getting mechanism. Or again, it applies in teaching. Sometimes a gesture or an object lesson gets the point across faster and better than any number of words. True, on his last full night with his disciples just before his crucifixion, when he wanted to teach them many things, Jesus began his teaching, not with words that might have been missed by them but with two significant actions. The first was the washing of the disciples' feet, recorded in John 13:2-11. The second was the giving of the bread to Judas, recorded in John 13:21-30.

Why did Jesus perform these actions? The answer is that the disciples were preoccupied. We have already been told that they were terrified of the Jewish leaders; they suspected that Jesus was about to be arrested, and they were afraid that he would die and that they would die with him. Or, even if that were not the case, it might be that he would be taken and they be left. Nothing in their present circumstances had prepared them to hear his teaching. So Jesus acted boldly in order to get their attention.

Judas and Jesus

The first action we have in John 13 is that of Jesus washing the feet of the disciples. But as John tells the story, he draws our attention, first of all, to the contrast between Judas, who was moved by Satan, and Jesus, who was motivated solely by love and by his knowledge of God the Father and his unique relationship to him. John writes, "The evening meal was being served and the devil had already prompted Judas Iscariot, son of Simon, to betray Jesus..." (vv. 2-3).

As we read these verses, stopping at that point, we can hardly miss the fact that John wishes to contrast the action of Jesus, who gave himself for his disciples, with that of Judas. We have here the humility of Christ, who washed the disciples' feet, versus the pride of Judas. There is faithfulness to the end, versus treachery and betrayal. Then, lest we miss the most important point, John also mentions the devil so we will see that the basic contrast is between Satan and God.

Satan's way, described vividly in Isaiah 14:12-14, is simply personal advancement at the expense of others, in this case at the expense of God. "How you have fallen from heaven, O morning star! You have been cast down to the earth, you who once laid low the nations! You said in your heart, 'I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High.'" The consequence of this satanic desire is destruction. For the passage goes on to say, "But you are brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit" (v. 15).

On the other hand, there is the way of God, which is described in the case of Jesus in Philippians 2:5-8. "Your attitude should be the same as Christ Jesus: Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, bring made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross." The result of this course of action is honor for Jesus and blessing for those who are his own. 'Therefore, God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (vv. 9-11).

Satan, like Judas after him, said, "I will think first of myself; and the first thing I will seek is my aggrandizement." God says, "You will actually go down to defeat." Jesus said, "I will surrender my life for my brethren." God says, 'Therefore, you will be honored and will be a great blessing."

Christ's Motivation

The second thing we notice is Christ's motivation in washing the disciples' feet. Verse 3 goes on to say, 'Jesus knew that the Father had put all things under his power, and that he had come from God and was returning to God...." Here we are told three things about Jesus' state of mind as he performed this action. First, he knew that "the Father had put all things under his power." This speaks of Christ's authority. Second, he knew that "he had come from God." This speaks of his divine origin. Third, he knew that he was even then on the verge of returning "to God." This speaks of his future glory.

We notice that it was not in forgetfulness of who he was and where he was going, then, that Jesus washed the disciples' feet, but rather in full consciousness of it. It was not that he forgot he was God and so humbled himself. It was because he was God and wished to act as God that he did it.

A Parable

At this point we can begin to appreciate the significance of what Jesus did when he washed the disciples' feet, for he was obviously not giving just an example of humility. Still less was he instituting an additional sacrament, as some have imagined. What he was doing was giving a dramatic illustration of his entire ministry. In a recent book, entitled Secrets of the Spirit, Ray C. Stedman spells this out clearly. He writes, 'There can be little doubt that here Jesus was deliberately working out a parable for the instruction of his disciples. He was dramatizing for them the character of his ministry. He was showing them by this means what he had come into the world to do, and what he would send them out to do."

We can easily follow the meaning of the parable by comparing the verses from Philippians that I cited earlier with the events that John records. First, John tells us that Jesus rose from supper. This had already been done in a far greater way when he rose from his throne of glory prior to his coming into this world. Second, he laid aside his garments. Paul in Philippians says that when he came into the world he laid aside that glory which was his so that he could appear as a true man and not blind with his celestial glory those who looked upon him. Next, he took a towel and girded himself. This was the garb of a servant, a role that, Paul says, he took upon himself. Finally, he poured water into a basin and began to wash the disciples' feet, just as in a few short hours he was to pour out his blood for the washing away of human sin by the atonement.

To see the end of the parable we need only skip over to verse 12, as Stedman notes. For there we read, "When he had finished washing their feet, he put on his clothes and returned to his place...."
In the same way, Christ is even now highly exalted. Or again, as the author of Hebrews writes, "After he had provided purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven" (1:3).

There is another way in which the spiritual nature of this parable is evident, and that is in the exchange between the Lord and Peter. Jesus had laid aside His clothes and had begun to go around the table washing the disciples' feet, presumably in an atmosphere of stunned silence, for this was the work of a slave and not that of a distinguished rabbi. However, when Jesus came to Peter, the impulsive Peter could stand it no longer so he blurted out, "Lord, are you going to wash my feet?"

Jesus replied, "You do not realize now what I am doing, but later you will understand."

Peter, who was humble enough to feel the incongruity of having his feet washed by Jesus but not humble enough to refrain from telling his master what not to do, replied, 'You shall never wash my feet."

Jesus said, "Unless I wash you, you have no part with me."

At this, Peter did an about-face and declared that in that case he wanted to be washed all over: 'Then, Lord, not just my feet but my hands and my head as well!"

Jesus replied in conclusion, "A person who has had a bath needs only to wash his feet; his whole body is clean. And you are clean, though not every one of you." Here the somewhat confusing dialogue clears up, at least partially; for it is evident that Jesus is talking, not about physical dirt but about sin and the need to be cleansed from it. He is explaining that Peter (not Judas) is a justified person and therefore needs only cleansing from the contaminating effects of sin, not pardon from sin's penalty.

The image involved is of an oriental who would bathe completely before going to another person's home for dinner. On the way, because he would be shod in sandals and because the streets would be dirty, his feet would be contaminated. When he arrived at his friend's home, his feet would need to be washed, not his whole body. In a parallel way, those who are Christ's are totally justified men and women, but they do need constant cleansing from their repeated defilement by sin in order that the fellowship they have with the Father and with the Son might not be broken.

Jesus is telling Peter that he does not need to be born again and again and again. To be born again once is enough. Nevertheless, as regenerated people, we do need to come to Christ for cleansing.

Our Example

After the conversation with Peter, Jesus, we are told, resumed his place at the head of the table and began to explain to the disciples what he had done. He said, "Do you understand what I have done for you? You call me 'Teacher' and 'Lord,' and rightly so, for that is what I am. Now that I, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also should wash one another's feet. I have set you an example that you should do as I have done for you" (vv. 12-15).

What does this mean? Does it mean that we should go out and institute a new sacrament to be known as the sacrament of foot washing? Not at all, though some have done this. What Jesus is talking about is humility and the need for God's people to take a servant role. He is simply saying, "If I, your Master, have played the servant role, you who are my servants should certainly play the servant role with one another." We are to care for those who can no longer care for themselves—our aged parents, the poor, orphans. We are to get close to those who are suffering and do everything in our power to alleviate their suffering. We are to open our homes to the lonely. Above all, we are not to take the first place in Christian gatherings but are to take a lower place that someone else might be honored.

Moreover, we are even to fulfill Christ's example in regard to spiritual defilement and cleansing, for this is what the parable is about. According to Christ's words to Peter, the cleansing of the feet symbolized the spiritual cleansing of Christians who have, nevertheless, fallen into specific sin. So if we are to follow Christ's example at this point, we must do as Paul admonished in writing to the Galatians: "Brothers, if someone is caught in a sin, you who are spiritual should restore him gently. But watch yourself, or you also may be tempted" (6:1).

How do we seek to restore a brother who has fallen into some sin? How do we seek to wash the feet of such a person? We are to take the Word of God, with which we are all to cleanse our ways, and then gently, ever so gently, apply it to our brother that he might respond to it by the grace of God.

Notice the word "gently." In his commentary on these verses Harry Ironside points out that if we are going to wash another's feet, we ought to be careful of the temperature of the water. You would not go to anyone and say, "Here, put your feet into this bucket of scalding water." Nor would you ask him to place his feet in a bucket of ice water. It is just as bad to be too hot in approaching another person as it is to be too cold and formal. Stedman points out that in trying to cleanse others, some Christians do without water at all. They try to dry-clean feet. They scrape them free of dirt and unfortunately sometimes take the skin with it. Instead of this, we who are spiritual are to approach the other person meekly and in love.

Chapter 167.
A Clue for Finding Happiness

John 13:16-17

I do not know what you consider to be the number-one desire of most people today, but I suspect that if I were to conduct a poll, in one form or another the answer that would come highest on the list would be "happiness." Above all else most people want to be happy. It is true that they do not always see this clearly; they even express it in different terms. Some might say that most of all they would like to be rich. Others might wish to be famous. Some might want to be loved. But basic to all these replies would be the desire to find happiness, however it might be supposed to come.

The difficulty, however, is that happiness is not easily attainable. We seek for it. Indeed, in this country the privilege of seeking for happiness is even declared to be one of our inalienable rights. But no one can guarantee happiness itself. So our founding fathers wrote wisely when they defined those rights as "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Liberty can be guaranteed. So can life, up to a point. But not happiness. Only the right to pursue happiness can be guaranteed to any individual.

But how do we pursue happiness, and in what direction? One man thinks that he will be happy if he can save ten thousand dollars. So he saves all he can; he gets his ten thousand. But he still is not happy. He thinks in terms of fifty thousand, then a hundred thousand. If he is able, he earns a million dollars, but still happiness eludes him. Why? Because happiness does not come through amassing a fortune. A Texas millionaire once said, "I thought money could buy happiness. I have been miserably disillusioned."

Some persons try to find happiness through fame, but fame does not guarantee happiness either. If it did, we would not hear of so many of the world's famous people committing suicide. Still other persons think that they will be happy with power. They run for a local political office and win. Next they aspire to the mayor's chair. If they become mayor, they want to be state senator. After this they think in terms of national politics. But still they are not happy. One of the world's greatest statesmen once said to Billy Graham, "I am an old man. Life has lost all meaning. I am ready to take a fateful leap into the unknown."

Knowing and Doing

If you are one who desires to find happiness (as most of us do) and if you have not been able to find it in any of the ways I have just listed, or others, then you should be interested in these words spoken by the Lord Jesus Christ nearly two thousand years ago. They are our text, and they contain a clue for finding happiness. "I tell you the truth, no servant is greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him. Now that you know these things, you will be blessed if you do them" (13:16-17).

As we read these verses we notice at once that Christ's clue for finding happiness has two parts. The first part consists in knowing certain things. The second part consists in doing them. Obviously both are important.

Several years ago I was talking to a man who has approximately half a million dollars invested in the stock market. I asked him, "Did the recent market decline affect you greatly?" "It surely did," he answered.

"Did you have any idea that the market might go down?"

"That's the funny thing," he said. "About two months before the market tumbled, when the Dow Jones average was still high, we were having a meeting of a number of us who sometimes invested together. I remember saying in that meeting that the market simply could not continue as it was. I said that it would have to go back down. Surprisingly, everyone agreed. When I said that we ought to sell now, they agreed to that too. But, you know, nobody did it. None of us sold. So when the bottom dropped out, all of us were left with losses."

Obviously it is the combination of knowing and doing that makes for success. Or, to put this in spiritual terms once again, it is the combination of knowing and doing certain spiritual things that leads to true happiness.

Jesus Is Lord

So what is it that the one who would truly be happy should know? These are short verses, but in spite of their length they suggest a number of important things. The first is that Jesus Christ is Lord. Jesus alludes to this when he says, "No servant is greater than his master (lord), nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him."

The problem that most of us have in finding happiness begins right here, for if we are honest, even as Christians, we must acknowledge that we frequently have the whole thing inverted. Jesus says that he is Lord and that we are his servants, but in actual fact, we act as if we are the Lord and he is the servant. Examine your prayers sometime and see if the greater part of your prayers does not consist of your telling Jesus what he should do for you and the far lesser part your asking what you can do for him. We say that Jesus is Lord. But in practical terms we want to make our decisions, choose our own way of life, and set our own courses of action.

When we do this, what we are actually doing is setting ourselves in the center of our own spiritual universe. And the difficulty is that we are not adequate as the center. Take this example from astronomy. In the early days of astronomy, before Copernicus, all work was done on the basis of the Ptolemaic system according to which theory all things revolved around the earth. The earth was the center of the system. The Ptolemaic system was not all bad. In fact, it was better than most people living today imagine. It could predict sunrise and sunset. It could predict new moons. To some extent it could even predict the course of the planets. But the difficulty with the Ptolemaic system is that it was not always accurate, particularly in charting the course of the planets. In attempting to provide numerous adjustments for the erratic planetary movements the system eventually broke down. Besides, the Ptolemaic system did not allow for progress. New discoveries always went against it, and certain other discoveries were not even possible. What was wrong? The difficulty was not in the conclusions, for some of these were right. The difficulty was at the heart of the theory; for the sun, not the earth, was at the center of the solar system.

There is a close parallel in spiritual terms. Those who make themselves the center of the spiritual universe do get certain results. If they are selfish enough, they get most of what they want. If they are ruthless enough, they can keep others from taking it away from them or taking advantage of them. But in spite of such apparent success, the system is never quite accurate. Therefore, the happiness that is supposed to follow these devices eludes them. Moreover, there is no progress. In fact, things get worse and worse. Life gets straightened out only when by the grace of God we get ourselves out of the center and the Lord Jesus Christ in. For he is Lord, and it is only he who can give order to the system.

The second truth we find in these verses is that Jesus took a servant role. He is Lord, the Lord of glory. Still he divested himself of his lordly prerogatives in order to be made like his brethren and serve them, even to death. This is what the episode of the foot-washing is all about, of course. On the one hand, it shows Jesus in a servant role. On the other, it is a parable of his entire ministry in which the dominating thought is service. "The Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many," Jesus said (Matt. 20:28).

Ourselves, His Servants

The first two truths that the man who would be happy must know pertain to Christ: his position as Lord, and his role as servant. The next three truths pertain to ourselves.

To begin with we are not greater than Jesus. We acknowledge this verbally, but in actuality we often deny it by our actions. We say, "Of course we are not greater than Jesus." But we act out the opposite belief whenever we prefer our judgment to his judgment or think that we can manage without him. Jesus reminds us of the true nature of things when he declares, "No servant is greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him." We need to learn that we can do nothing without him.

The fourth truth in these verses is that what is proper for Jesus is proper also for us. How shall I live? What shall I do with my life? What shall my values be? Where shall I place my energies? We find the answers to these questions by looking to Jesus to see how he lived, what he did with his life, what his values were, and where he placed his energies. In other words, he is our example, as he said in the previous verse.

The fifth point is the climax of this argument. We have seen that Jesus is Lord, that he took a servant role, that we are not greater than Jesus, that what is proper for him is proper also for us. It follows, therefore, that we also should be servants. That is, we should all be ministers, for that is what the word "minister" means. It is the word diakonos, from which we get our word "deacon"—"servant." This is the clue for finding happiness.

As we read the other Gospel accounts of these last hours in which Jesus and his disciples were together, we soon discover that service was the issue of the moment. To begin with, in Matthew 20, which tells of the events of just a day or two before this, we read of the mother of James and John going to Jesus with the request that when Jesus came into his kingdom he would choose her sons to sit closest to him, one on his right hand and the other on his left. Obviously, these two disciples wanted the most prominent positions. But Jesus had to reply that this was not the nature of his ministry. He spoke of the cup that he was to drink and the baptism that he was to be baptized with. Then he said, "You know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their high officials exercise authority over them. Not so with you. Whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant, and whoever want to be first must be your slave—just as the Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:25-28).

We would think perhaps that after that episode and lecture the disciples would have learned the lesson, and that the desire for the chief place among them might be forgotten. But this was not so. Apparently the conflict intensified and continued even into the upper room. For, if Luke is giving us an accurate chronology of this evening, we learn that even after the institution of the Lord's Supper "a dispute arose among them as to which of them was considered to be the greatest" (Luke 22:24). It was at this point perhaps that the Lord divested himself of his clothing and performed the foot washing.

If we can learn from the disciples, we should learn that the desire to be foremost is so great in us that we can be maneuvering for prominence even as we come to the communion service. We should learn that taking the servant role is a great clue for finding happiness.

Our Commission

There is one more thing that we should know; it too is suggested in these verses. It is that we are sent to be servants. That is, so far as God is concerned, the servant role for us is not optional. It is our assignment, just as it was also the task of the Lord Jesus Christ. Notice that in the second half of verse 16 the Lord uses the verb "send" twice. In Greek these are different words: apostolos, from which we get the word "apostle" (it denotes a specially commissioned spokesman and representative of the Lord) and pempsantos, which is the word Jesus uses of his own commissioning by the Father. Both words occur in John's version of the Great Commission, in which Jesus says, "As my Father has sent me, I am sending you" (20:21). We are to be servants primarily because it is for this that God has called us, just as he called Jesus. If he has done this, we will not be fully happy in any other role.

Amen and Amen

We now come to the most neglected part of all. Up to now we have been talking about the first part of Christ's clue for finding happiness: knowing certain things. We have looked at six of them: (1) Jesus is Lord, (2) he took a servant role, (3) we are not greater than Jesus, (4) what is proper for him is proper also for us, (5) we also should be servants, and (6) we are sent to be servants. The second part, which is based upon these things, is that we should do them. "Now that you know these things," said Jesus, "you will be blessed if you do them" (v. 17).

We notice, of course, that this is more than mere knowing. Knowing is important, as we have seen. You cannot do unless you know. You must begin with knowing. Nevertheless, knowing is not enough; for many people know how to succeed and yet fail just because they do not exercise their knowledge.

Moreover, the second part of this clue for finding happiness is not knowing these truths in order that others might do them. Some of us use our knowledge in this way, that is, as a club or lever to get others to measure up to our standards and serve us. Husbands know just what their wives should do to make them happy. Wives know exactly what is wrong with their husbands. Young people are sure they know what their parents and everyone else should be doing. But this is not what Jesus says. In fact, in one sense it is even the opposite of what he says. For if this is the way you are thinking, I can guarantee that the results will be the opposite of what you want. The other person will not conform to your wishes, and you will not find happiness. Happiness comes not from knowing alone or from getting the other person to do what you know he or she should do but rather from knowing these truths and then doing them yourself.

Why is this so? Because in taking this role you will inevitably develop the kind of character that God himself can bless. We find such character in the Beatitudes of Matthew 5:3-12. Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit... blessed are those who mourn... blessed are the meek... blessed are they who hunger and thirst for righteousness... blessed are the merciful... blessed are the pure in heart... blessed are the peacemakers... blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake."

We say, "But that does not make sense." Everything within us tells us that it is not the poor in spirit, the meek, the merciful, the peacemakers, or any similar type who is happy. We say, "Happy are the winners, the dominant, those who are waited upon." But we are wrong. Our way does not work. It is the words of the Lord Jesus Christ that should be trusted.

These verses begin with the words. "I tell you the truth." These words are translations of the words, "Amen, amen," and they mean 'Truly, truly." They mean, "Pay attention to this; it is true." The interesting thing about these words is that we frequently find them on the lips of Jesus, and every time we find them on his lips they precede the statement. That is, Jesus first calls attention to the truth of what he is about to say and then says it. On the other hand, we also frequently find these words on the lips of normal men and women. But in this case the words always come at the end of the statement, as they do, for instance, in our prayers. In our usage the words are therefore an acknowledgment of the truth of God. They are our way of saying, "So be it; let God be true and every man a liar." Jesus says, "I tell you the truth, no servant is greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him. Now that you know these things, you will be blessed if you do them." Can your heart add, "Amen, amen," and then do them?

Chapter 168.
A Classic Prophecy

John 13:18-20

In the Reformation period of church history it was common to speak of the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ under a threefold division of prophet, priest, and king. The word "prophet" referred to Christ's role in speaking for God and as God. It dealt with revelation. The word "priest" referred to Christ's role in giving himself as the perfect sacrifice for sin, and also in interceding for his own with the Father. "King" referred to his rule both in heaven and in his church through the Holy Spirit.

This is a particularly interesting division in light of the functions of the Lord during his last days upon earth. Within twenty-four hours after the events recorded in John 13, which we are studying, Jesus was to die. That is, he was to exercise his priestly role by offering up himself as a perfect sacrifice for human sin. Within another three days he was to be raised from the dead and then ascend into heaven, from which he was to rule his church as King. In this chapter, as if to make the trilogy complete, Jesus speaks as a prophet. Moreover, this is not just in the sense of speaking for God, as he had indeed been doing all along, but in the full sense of the word; that is, by actually foretelling what was to come to pass. In these verses he says that one who for three years had been a member of the apostolic band was to betray him.

This is a classic prophecy. It takes only three verses, verses 18-20, but within these three verses is found all for which prophecy is given and what it normally does. The verses have three parts:
(1) the prophecy itself, (2) the explanation of why the prophecy is given, and (3) an encouragement lest those who heard the prophecy should be discouraged by it.

The Prophecy

The prophecy concerning Judas is given to qualify what had been said a bit earlier. Several verses before this, after Jesus had told Peter, "And you are clean," he hastened to add, "though not every one of you." In this section, having spoken of the man who can be happy through knowing and obeying Christ's commandments, Jesus in a similar way qualifies his remark by adding that he does not speak of each one. His actual words are, "I am not referring to all of you; I know those I have chosen. But this is to fulfill the scripture: 'He who shares my bread has lifted up his heel against me'" (v. 18). The quotation is from Psalm 41:9.

"Even my close friend, whom I trusted, he who shared my bread, has lifted up his heel against me."

Nothing in this psalm identifies the person about whom the author, David, was speaking. But it seems most likely that he was referring to Ahithophel, his most faithful counselor, who nevertheless sided with Absalom at the time of Absalom's rebellion. It is a tragic story as it unfolds in 2 Samuel 15-17. The revolt of Absalom had caught David unaware, and he and his mighty men had been forced to flee from Jerusalem. Ahithophel remained behind. When David heard that Ahithophel was with Absalom, David was greatly concerned, for Ahithophel gave wise counsel. David prayed, "O LORD, turn Ahithophel's counsel into foolishness" (2 Sam. 15:31). God answered David's prayer, not by causing Ahithophel to give bad counsel to Absalom, for Ahithophel continued to speak wisely, but by causing his good counsel to be disregarded. The story concludes by saying, "When Ahithophel saw that his advice had not been followed, he saddled his donkey and set out for his house in his hometown. He put his house in order, and then hanged himself. So he died and was buried in his father's sepulcher" (2 Sam. 17:23).

The fact that Ahithophel hanged himself is excellent evidence that it is probably to him that Christ (and therefore also David) is referring in the forty-first psalm, for Judas also went and hanged himself. But the point of the story is not in Ahithophel's or Judas's end but in the fact that one who had been close to Jesus would betray him. Ahithophel had eaten at David's own table.

So had Judas eaten with Jesus. Ahithophel had betrayed David. So Judas would betray the Lord of glory.

In his commentary, William Barclay stresses the sheer cruelty of Judas's betrayal, noting that "in the east to eat bread with a person was a sign of friendship and an act of loyalty. Second Samuel 9:7, 13 tell how David granted it to Mephibosheth to eat bread at his table, when he might well have eliminated him as a descendant of Saul. First Kings 18:19 tells how the prophets of Baal ate bread at the table of Jezebel. For one who had eaten bread at someone's table to turn against the person to whom by that very act he had pledged his friendship was a bitter thing. This disloyalty of friends is for the Psalmist the sorest of all hurts. 'For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have borne it; neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself from him: but it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine acquaintance. We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company'

(Ps. 55:12-14)."

Jesus was prophesying that one who had been with him for the entire three years of his earthly ministry would betray him, and that is sobering. It is sobering because we reason that if one could have been among the company of the Twelve for all those years, during which time he not only heard the Lord Jesus Christ but also witnessed the miracles he did, if one who had experienced all that could betray him, then it is certainly possible for a person to be in the company of God's people today, in a context in which the Word of God is faithfully preached, and yet not actually be a child of God.

We should stop at that point and ask the question: Am I really a child of God or am I just in the company of God's people? If the latter is true of you, if you are just in the company of Christians, then this passage should have a special urgency for you, and you should not rest until you have actually come to believe in him whom to know is life eternal.

Faith in Himself

In the second of these three verses the Lord gives the reason for his prophecy. It is, he says, "that when it does happen you may believe that I am he" (v. 19). The prophecy is given so that the fulfillment, when it comes to pass, might be received as evidence that Jesus really is who he claims to be—the unique Son of God, Jehovah.

I am impressed with the fact that in the Old Testament, particularly in Isaiah, this is the primary reason offered for the giving of prophecy. We usually think of prophecy being given to satisfy our curiosity or, at the very least, being given to warn us and allow us to prepare for what is coming. But the reason the Bible gives is that, when the prophecy comes to pass, we might know that God, who gives the prophecy, is the true God, for only he can see the future and guarantee its outcome. This is clear in the central chapters of Isaiah, for instance. In chapter 40, which begins this discussion, God contrasts himself with the idols of the pagans who, he says, cannot even stand upright by themselves, let alone move about. "To whom, then, will you compare God?" he asks. "What image will you compare him to? As for an idol, a craftsman casts it, a goldsmith overlays it with gold and fashions silver chains for it. A man too poor to present such an offering selects wood that will not rot. He looks for a skilled craftsman to set up an idol that will not topple" (vv. 18-20).

Then, in chapter 41, the argument continues. "'Present your case,' says the Lord. 'Set forth your arguments,' says Jacob's King. 'Bring in your idols to tell us what is going to happen. Tell us what the former things were, that we may consider them and know their final outcome. Or declare to us things to come, tell us what the future holds that we may know that you are gods. Do something, whether good or bad, so that we will be dismayed and filled with fear. But you are of nothing and your works are utterly worthless; he who chooses you is detestable'" (vv. 2124).

By contrast God can tell the future and therefore should be believed. "I foretold the former things long ago, my mouth announced them and I made them known; then suddenly I acted, and they came to pass" (Isa. 48:3).

This is the same argument employed by the Lord Jesus when he says, "I am telling you now before it happens, so that when it does happen, you may believe that I am he."Just as God argues in the Book of Isaiah, so also does Christ argue in John 13. And the conclusion is the same. Jehovah is the true God. Jesus is the true God. Jesus is Jehovah. Jesus argues that he is not just a spokesman for God, though he is that also. He argues that he is God. Whatever he has prophesied he brings to pass.

Faith in the Scriptures

The clearest reason why Christ gives the prophecy concerning Judas is that the disciples might find their faith in him strengthened. But as we read this in the context of the quotation from Psalm 41, we can hardly miss the truth that the same knowledge will also strengthen faith in the Scriptures. How? By showing us that they, no less than the Lord himself, may be trusted. Why? Because, like the Lord himself, they are eternal. Jesus said, "Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away" (Matt. 24:35). Or again, "Until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished" (Matt. 5:18). The fulfillment of prophecy helps us to believe this and to alter our lives accordingly.

Why do we cherish the Scriptures? Why do we memorize them? It is because these words, having come to us from God and therefore also bearing his nature, are eternal and so will not pass away. Everything else that we know will pass away, sometimes well within our lifetimes. The ideas and viewpoints that your children are being taught today in grade school will be changed before they reach high school. What they are taught in high school will be altered by college. College outlooks will change by the time the young man or woman enters his or her profession. Even then professions change so quickly that unless the person reads to keep up he or she will soon be behind in the field. Nothing we learn is permanent, nothing we see is eternal— except the Scriptures! They are permanent; they are absolutely trustworthy. That is why we memorize them and teach them to our children.

If you are a parent, have you ever thought that there is nothing you can leave your children that will not pass away in time except the truths found in this Book? Some parents think they have served their children well if they have left money to them. But money can disappear overnight. Sometimes the children even reject it. Other parents think their legacy to their children will be a fine education or, perhaps, their own values. But these change also, and even education is not valued as highly by many as it was formerly. Only the Word of God remains valuable and without change.

Do not be foolish enough to neglect this Book when you are trying to give your children the best. Do not neglect it yourself when you are sorting out your priorities.

In his youth John Newton had been brought up in a Christian home in England. But his parents died when he was only six years old, and he was sent to live with an unbelieving relative. In the relative's home he suffered great abuse. At last, to escape this ill treatment, Newton ran away to sea, as boys often did in those days, and joined the navy. Unfortunately, he fell into gross sin and eventually abandoned the navy and fled to Africa. In Africa sin gained a terrible hold on him, and he sank to utter degradation and misery. At last he left Africa and got on a ship going back to England. On the return journey the ship ran into a terrible storm, and Newton, who was part of the ship's crew, was sent down into the hold of the ship to pump water. Newton was terrified. The ship seemed to be sinking, and he knew that, if it sank, he would most certainly go down with it. For days and nights he pumped, thinking himself to be abandoned both by God and man. But as he pumped water out of that hold and began to cry to God to save him, verses that he had learned in the home of his parents before he was six years old came back to his memory. The Holy Spirit showed him what those verses meant. He believed on Christ, and was born again. Later, when the storm had passed and he was again safe in England, he went on to become a highly gifted preacher and teacher of the Word of God.

What had happened? The Word of the living God had remained with him and had become the vehicle by which the Holy Spirit brought forth new life.

I would like to insert one more word here for parents. It concerns two great principles for communicating the Bible's content. First, the Word must be communicated a bit at a time, so that what is learned at one time may be added to and built upon in later lessons. Isaiah expresses it best when he writes, "For it is: Do and do, do and do, rule on rule, rule on rule, a little here, a little there" (28:10). In other words, do not think that you have taught your child or even yourself when you have been to church just once or even a dozen times, or when you have read the Bible just once. Learning is a lifetime process. So you must keep at it. It must be a precept here and a precept there, here a little and there a little.

Second, you must memorize the Bible. We have a great resistance to memorizing anything today, but David tells us what is needed when he declares, "I have hidden your word in my heart, that I might not sin against you" (Ps. 119:11). It is the memorized word that stays with us and is available when we need it.

An Encouragement

We come finally to the third of these verses. It is a verse of encouragement. It says, "I tell you the truth, whoever accepts anyone I send accepts me; and whoever accepts me accepts the one who sent me" (v. 20). When we first read that verse it seems disconnected from what has gone before, but a little thought soon shows the connection. In the previous verses Jesus had been encouraging his disciples to follow the example he had given them through the foot washing, but as he had done that he had begun to speak of Judas and of the fact that he would betray him. Were they discouraged at this point? We do not know. But if they were, we could certainly have understood their dismay. They may have thought that if these things were so, then none of them would ever be capable of serving the Lord. They would have thought that they were all a total loss and that any possibility of future usefulness to Jesus was ended.

But this was not so. One would betray him. Yet in spite of this, Jesus had chosen them, the others, to be his representatives in an ungodly world. And they would be his representatives, so much so that whoever received them would be accounted as having received Jesus, and whoever received Jesus would receive God.

This is a great encouragement, for ourselves as well as for the first apostles. There is much to discourage us in the Christian life. There really are betrayals. We see it within our churches. We see it in our seminaries, in professors who deny the God who bought them. "But," says Jesus, "I know that. It is not new. It has always been that way. Nevertheless, in the midst of betrayals I still have my ambassadors, whom I will use and who will be a blessing." We are such ambassadors, if we believe on Jesus and speak for him as we are instructed to do.

Chapter 169.
Journey into Night

John 13:21-30

In a book that is in some sense an autobiography, Eugene O'Neill writes of his Long Day's Journey into Night. It is a story of increasing despair and darkness. The same title may be chosen for the incident recorded in John 13:21-30, for these verses record the departure of Judas from the company of him who is the light of the world so that he could go out into eternal darkness. The passage begins with the announcement of the traitor: "I tell you the truth, one of you is going to betray me." It ends with the somber sentence: "And it was night."

These verses may also be introduced by pointing out that within them the Lord Jesus Christ performs the second symbolic action of this chapter. The first was the foot washing in which he vividly illustrated the nature of his ministry and admonished those who followed him to assume a servant role. That action was visible to all the disciples and was remembered with clarity, as the great number of references to that event, both direct and indirect, throughout the New Testament, would indicate. The second symbolic action, the one recorded in these verses, was the giving of the bread to Judas, by which he was identified as the traitor. Unlike the foot washing, this act was not made clear to everyone. True, they all saw it, but the nature of the act was such that only John and possibly Peter understood it, and even they did not realize the betrayal was imminent. The incident ends when Judas, leaving the little band, goes to carry out his betrayal, an action that would eventually end in the deaths of both himself and his master.

There are three parts to this section. First, there is the announcement of the betrayer. Second, there is a contrast between Judas, who was reclining on one side of the Lord, and John, who was reclining on the other side. Finally, there is a disclosure of Judas's fate.

A Troubling Announcement

"After he said this, Jesus was troubled in spirit and testified, 'I tell you the truth, one of you is going to betray me.' His disciples stared at one another at a loss to know which of them he meant."

These verses tell us that Jesus was deeply disturbed. Sometimes, as we look upon Christ in his deity and forget his humanity, we assume that he was unbothered by the things that bother us. We assume that he had resources that we do not have and, therefore, was above life and untroubled by it. But this is not the teaching of the Word of God. The teaching of Scripture is that he was "tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin" (Heb. 4:15). So if we know discouragement, we may know that he knew discouragement. If we know distress, we may know that he knew distress. If we know sorrow, we may know that he knew sorrow. Here in the upper room, during the last hours he had to spend with his disciples before his crucifixion, Jesus was increasingly troubled by all that was coming.

We know that by the time the Lord got to Gethsemane he was troubled, so much so, we are told, that he sweat as it were great drops of blood. He was troubled by the fact that he was about to go to the cross and would be separated from the Father as a judicial punishment for our sins. Here he was undoubtedly also troubled by the thought of the impending betrayal and of the one who would prove traitorous, one who had lived with him in the closest communion for three years. Yet at the end of that time was willing to sell his master for the price of a slave.

Three Lessons

There are great lessons in the fact that Judas was among the disciples and yet was not a bornagain man.

First, the situation teaches us that fallen man needs more than an example if he is to be saved. What better example could Judas have had than the Lord Jesus Christ? Jesus had chosen Judas three years earlier. Judas had been in the company of the Twelve and had been instructed by Jesus. He had heard the Beatitudes. He had heard the Sermon on the Mount and the parables. Judas had heard all the other teachings. Indeed, he had been given on-the-field experience, because when the Twelve and the seventy were sent out, Judas was undoubtedly among them. Besides all that, Judas had seen a perfect example of all the Lord was teaching during the threeyear ministry. When the Lord said, "Blessed are the meek," Judas saw perfect meekness in him. When Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers," he saw the perfect peacemaker. When the Lord said, "Be holy as your Father in heaven is holy," he saw that holiness. Above all, Jesus was filled with the love of God. Judas saw all that, and yet was unsaved.

That is why we must pray and ask the Holy Spirit to do the work of regeneration in the lives of men and women. Examples are not enough. Even the example of the Lord Jesus Christ is not enough. If we think that men and women are going to be converted by the way we live, we are going to be disappointed. If we think that they are going to be converted even by bringing them into our congregations and exposing them to the teachings of Scripture and allowing them to see who Jesus Christ is and what he did, we are going to be disappointed. That is not enough. What is required is regeneration, and that is the work by which the Holy Spirit brings forth new life in the heart of an individual so that these things become real to him and he becomes able to respond to the Lord Jesus Christ as Savior.

There is a second lesson in the presence of Judas among the Twelve: the difficulty of discerning God's elect. We who stand in the Reformed tradition and make a great deal of God's election sometimes have errors of our own. And one of the errors is to imagine that we can determine those who are elect and those who are not. That is false. We cannot.

Scripture tells us that people look on the outward appearance but that God (and only God) looks on the heart. Moreover, because the outward appearance of an unbeliever can be much like that of a believer, we are forever mixing up the two. We tend to see someone who does something that we do not like and that we think is unspiritual, and we say to ourselves, "Well, that one is certainly not saved." On the other hand, we see someone who measures up to our particular standards of morality, and we say, "He is a Christian." That is not necessarily so. Appearances are important, but they are not incontestable evidence of the presence or absence of the divine life. If we need an illustration by which we can measure the difficulty of discerning the elect, we need only turn to Judas and recognize that here in the Twelve was one who had lived with the other disciples for three years and yet was totally unknown to them in his true character.

I suppose that this says something about Judas too. Judas, I am convinced, was not just a mistaken individual. He was a deceiver, a devil, a hypocrite par excellence. Judas lived with the others and pretended that he was one with them, while deep in his heart he was rebelling against everything that Jesus Christ taught; and in the end he would betray him. Judas was certainly a hypocrite. But the point is that the disciples were unaware of this. Moreover, even when the Lord pointed out that one of their number would betray him, not one of them understood who this one was until Jesus revealed the matter to John.

Once Jesus told the story of a farmer who planted a field of wheat and of an enemy who sowed weeds among the wheat. After the enemy had sowed his weeds, the servants, who knew about it, came to their master to ask what to do. "Shall we root up the weeds and get rid of the enemy's work?" they asked. The master replied, "No, because in doing that you tear up the wheat also. Let them grow up together. In the end we will harvest the entire field, collect the wheat, and then cast the weeds into the fire where they will be burned."

As we apply that story to the church in our age, we recognize at once that it teaches that since (1) some of God's people are so much like weeds and (2) some of the devil's people are so much like wheat, we cannot tell the difference between them. So in essence Jesus says, "Do not worry too much about having a pure church. Be as pure in doctrine as you can, but do not worry too much about weeding out all unbelievers. "Because," he says, "if you do, I am afraid you are going to lose some of my people doing it." We cannot discern the elect, and it is good that we cannot. We must leave that in the hands of the Lord.

There is a third lesson here also. It is the patience of the Lord Jesus Christ. Have you ever thought what marvelous patience the Lord had in order to tolerate Judas? He knew that the Scriptures said that one of the Twelve would betray him. He knew that Judas was that one. Yet throughout the years of his ministry, so far as we can tell, not only was Jesus patient with Judas, he was so patient that not one of the disciples ever detected any telltale differences in Jesus' dealings with him that might cause them to be suspicious of him. That is the marvelous grace, the patience of our Lord. You say, "But that is beyond anything we see on earth." That is true; it is. Yet that same patience of the Lord Jesus Christ extends to all who are truly his, as he sees us disobey him, persist in our own way, and offend him constantly in thought, word, and deed.

John and Judas

The second part of the story has to do with the contrast between John and Judas. "One of them, the disciple whom Jesus loved, was reclining next to him. Simon Peter motioned to this disciple and said, 'Ask him which one he meant.' Leaning back against Jesus, he asked him, 'Lord, who is it?' Jesus answered, 'It is the one to whom I will give this bread when I have dipped it in the dish.' Then dipping the piece of bread, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, son of Simon."

As I reconstruct the seating arrangement in the upper room, it seems to me (indeed, it has seemed this way to most commentators) that John must have been on Jesus' right side and that Judas must have been on Jesus' left. They did not sit around a table the way we do today, the way Leonardo da Vinci showed it in that great painting of the Last Supper that hangs in Milan, Italy. They reclined, usually on their left side so that their right arm would be free to feed themselves. This meant that each man would have his head against the chest of the man to his left. John, on the right side of Christ, simply leaned back to ask his question. Jesus reached around to his left to give the bread to Judas.

So Judas was on one side of Jesus. John was on the other. Both were near Jesus, but John was close to his heart.

Who would you rather be? Notice that John was in a good place to ask questions. When you are close to the heart of the Lord you can always ask questions. In fact, that is the best place in the world to ask questions. We are not always so close to the Lord, however. Sometimes we are farther away. Sometimes we are very far away. Moreover, the thing that keeps us away is our sin, because sin is an offense to the Lord, and we sense it, even in our sinful state. So we turn our backs to him; we move away; we try to get out of his visual range. Then either we catch the gaze of Christ, confess our sin, and return to the place of blessing, or we go determinedly on in our sin and suffer the inevitable results.

To be near the heart of the Lord is the best place in the world to ask questions. But notice also that it is the best place to get answers. Some answers we always have. The Bible gives them. But there are other answers that are not given publicly, some that the Lord will not shout. For these we must be close to him. Such answers are heard only as we look up into his face, as we see it reflected in his Word, and hear the still, small voice of the Holy Spirit as he whispers to us.

And It Was Night

We miss the importance of this event unless we recognize that Jesus was honoring Judas until the end. The seat at the Lord's left was the place of honor, and this was where Judas was. As the disciples went into the upper room, we know that they were disputing about who should have the highest place (Luke 22:24). In those circumstances the Lord must have said, 'Judas, I would like you to sit next to me this evening. I would like you to be here where you and I can converse." We are not told what the Lord said to Judas, but I cannot imagine that they went through the entire meal without the Lord speaking graciously to him, showing his love in every gesture and in every inflection of his voice. Furthermore, the giving of the bread was an honor, and to receive it was to make a pledge of loyalty. So at this point in the meal, in spite of the fact that Jesus had both loved and honored him, Judas hardened his heart and received the bread, saying in effect, "Thank you, Master. I am yours." He lied. He played a role.

Jesus, who knew it, said to him, "What you are about to do, do quickly." At this, Judas understood, I suppose, that he was found out. He left immediately, and, John concludes by noting, "It was night."

Light and darkness are important symbols in this narrative. In the earliest verses of the Gospel, John, speaking of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, says, "In him was life, and that life was the light of men." Then, in the eighth and ninth chapters, Jesus is quoted as saying, "I am the light of the world." We know, as we turn to the other Gospel accounts of the crucifixion, that during the time Jesus was on the cross, darkness came over the land from noontime to about three in the afternoon. Each reference makes the point obvious: Jesus is the light. So the converse is that to leave Christ's presence is to go into darkness; and not just the darkness of a physical night either but spiritual darkness, which means death and damnation.

There were times when the disciples were to go through dark hours. The Lord was going to be crucified. When that occurred, they were going to feel forsaken and would begin to scatter. He who had been the center of their life was to be taken from them. But their darkness, however deep, was not to be compared with the darkness that engulfed Judas Iscariot. They knew darkness; yet he lived who was their light. The resurrection was coming, and in his presence they were once more to see light. But Judas? Judas went his own way. He turned from Christ and so found that darkness that endures forever.

Jesus is lovely. Jesus is holiness, love, truth, grace, patience, mercy, peace, and everything else good that we could ever imagine. Indeed, not only is he all of these qualities in himself; he is the source of them for all believers. How foolish it is, then, to turn from him to that which is the absence of these good things! God grant that our hearts may be made right before him and that the Holy Spirit, who applies these truths, may make the Lord Jesus Christ central in all that we do and say.

Chapter 170.
Christ Glorified Now

John 13:31-32

When he was gone, Jesus said, "Now is the Son of Man glorified and God is glorified in him. If God is glorified in him, God will glorify the Son in himself, and will glorify him at once."

Have you ever been in a place where a number of friends were gathered, all of whom wanted to discuss something that was important to them but who were unable to because someone who was not really with them in spirit was present? If you have, it may also be that you have noticed what happened when the unsympathetic person finally left the group. At once the conversation brightened up, and comments that had been bottled up came flowing forth naturally.

That was the situation in the upper room on the last night Jesus spent with his disciples before his crucifixion. Here were friends, all of them quite close. They had spent the last three years in one another's company. But in their midst was one who was not really with them in spirit: Judas. True, Judas was not known in his true character to the apostles. But Jesus knew his nature and understood clearly what it was that he was about to do. Judas was about to betray Jesus to his enemies. So, as long as Judas was there, Jesus was somewhat constrained in what he could say to the gathering. He acted in order to get their attention, once in the foot washing and once more in the giving of the bread to Judas, but he seems to have held back in his teaching until the traitor's departure. Suddenly Judas is gone, however, and at once the atmosphere is cleared. Now Jesus is perfectly free to speak and the disciples to listen. At this point, then, Jesus begins to speak of his coming glory, the new commandment, heaven, and the future outpouring of the Holy Spirit on his followers.

The text says, "When he was gone, Jesus said, 'Now is the Son of Man glorified and God is glorified in him. If God is glorified in him, God will glorify him in himself, and will glorify him at once'" (vv. 31-32).

Layers of Glory

It is interesting that the theme of the glorification of Christ (and therefore also of God the Father) comes first in this series of heart revelations. And it is interesting, too, with what intensity Jesus speaks of such glorification. The word itself (either "glorified" or "glorify") occurs five times in just these two verses, and a careful analysis will show that it has three distinct references and two meanings.

The two meanings correspond to the two major uses of the important Greek word doxa. Doxa (meaning "glory") is related to the ancient verb dokeo, which in the early days of the Greek language meant "to seem" or "to appear," and then later "to hold an opinion of" someone or something. In time the sense of the word changed to that of holding only a good opinion about someone, and at that point, the noun, which originally meant only "an opinion," came to mean "a good opinion" and consequently either "praise" or "honor." All these ideas are important in the biblical vocabulary. For to have a right opinion of God is to be "orthodox" (orthodox means "a right opinion"), and to ascribe right opinions to God is to praise or worship him. This can be put in a slightly different form by saying that God's glory consists of his intrinsic worth embodied in his character, and that the acknowledgment of this worth by those who are his people is worship.

There is also a meaning of the word "glory" which is largely external. This is the sense of glory which is associated with light. We have it, for instance, in every Old Testament reference in which God is described as dwelling in glory unapproachable. Such glory was veiled by the cloud that covered Mount Sinai, where God came down to talk to Moses and, as the result of which, Moses' face glowed with a transferred brilliance. The same idea is present at the transfiguration of Christ on the mountain in Palestine. In each of these events, glory is the outward brilliance appropriate to, and normally accompanying, a revelation of God.

These distinctions are necessary for understanding the verses before us, for wherever the present tense is used we must understand Jesus to be using the word in the first sense; that is, as a revelation of his own (or the Father's) true worth or character. In this case the reference is to the revelation of God's character through the crucifixion. Whenever the future tense is used, we must understand Jesus to be using the word in the second sense; that is, as a reference to that future glory that Christ received as a result of his resurrection and subsequent ascension into heaven.

Glory in Christ's Passion

The first reference to glory in these verses is in the present tense: "Now is the Son of Man glorified." When did the Lord say, "Now is the Son of Man glorified"? The answer is that he said it in the upper room while looking forward to his crucifixion, immediately after that event was set in motion by the departure of Judas. Jesus had said to Judas, "What you are about to do, do quickly. "Judas left to arrange for the betrayal of his Lord. Jesus, knowing that the final act of the drama was now underway, turned to his disciples, and said, "Now is the Son of Man glorified."

How is this so? How can the crucifixion be glorification? The answer is in what the crucifixion means.

First, although we may not think so and the world as a whole cannot understand so at all, the crucifixion is undoubtedly the central and most significant point of world history. Nothing that has happened in the world's history from the beginning of creation until now, or will ever happen before that day when all things will be wrapped up in Christ, is as significant as the crucifixion. Here that great drama, which God had planned from before the foundation of the world, was brought to its focal point and acted out. Men of all races, social status, and levels of understanding have been saved by it.

There is another way in which the cross is Christ's glory. At the cross, he reversed the conduct of the first Adam and thus turned the history of our race around. Paul works this out in detail in the fifth chapter of Romans, pointing out that "as the result of one [Adam's] trespass was condemnation to all men, even so also the result of one act of righteousness [Jesus'] was justification that brings life for all men" (Rom. 5:18). When Adam decided to disobey God, it was as if he fell over a cliff carrying the whole string of his descendants with him. Imagine a group of mountain climbers working their way up the side of a mountain. They are all roped together, and Adam is in the lead. Adam loses his footing and falls. Because of the rope, every one of the climbers is pulled over the edge of the cliff after Adam. The whole race follows him.

But there, at the end of the line, is the Lord Jesus Christ; and he stands fast. Because the Lord Jesus Christ does not succumb to temptation, because the Lord does not sin, because he is therefore able to offer himself up as the perfect sacrifice for human sin, and does so, he becomes the only stable and safe point of humanity. Consequently, those who are united to him by faith are saved by him. The fall of Adam, which led to destruction, is reversed in Jesus Christ. By his atonement, Jesus leads those who are his own to safety.

Finally, we find in Hebrews 2:14 that the death of the Lord Jesus Christ also reversed the power of Satan and so brought to an end the power of that wicked one. In this, Christ is glorified. "Since the children have flesh and blood, he shared in their humanity so that by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death—that is, the devil." The "sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law," Paul tells us in 1 Corinthians 15:56. But the Lord Jesus Christ provided an atonement for sin and thus broke the power of sin over those who are his own people.

God Glorified

The second reference to glory in this verse is also in the present tense, for the verse goes on to say that God is glorified in Jesus Christ. This is also significant, because once again Jesus is talking of the crucifixion. How is God glorified in Christ's crucifixion?

First, the justice of God is revealed. Paul works this out in Romans 3:26, where he says that through the death of the Lord Jesus Christ God proved himself to be "just, and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus." The argument goes something like this. Paul is acknowledging that throughout the entire Old Testament period those who looked forward to the coming of a redeemer were saved by God. That is, Abraham was a saved man; Isaac was a saved man; Jacob was a saved man. But the question could have been raised at that period, "How is God just in saving them?" He offers them forgiveness, that is true. He saves them from the penalty of their sin. But what of the sin? Where is it punished? God justified these men, but he does not seem to have been just in doing so. "But he was," says Paul. "He justified them on the basis of the death of Christ, which was still future." Consequently, when Christ died on the cross, sin was punished in him and God was seen to be just in his previous acts of forgiveness. At the Cross the justice of God in forgiving sinners was revealed, as it were, for the first time. Now people can look to the cross and say, "God is not only the One who justifies the ungodly; God is also the One who is just in so doing." So God is glorified in his justice through what Christ has done.

Second, God's holiness is revealed. On this point Arthur W. Pink writes wisely. "He is 'of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity' (Hab. 1:13), and when Christ was 'made a curse for us' (Gal. 3:13) the thrice Holy One turned away from Him. It was this which caused the agonizing Saviour to cry, 'My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?' Never did God so manifest His hatred of sin as in the sufferings and death of His Only-begotten. There He showed it was impossible for Him to be at peace with that which had raised its defiant head against Him. All the honour due to the holiness of God by all the holy angels, and all the cheerful obedience and patient suffering of all the holy men who have ever existed, or ever will exist, are nothing in comparison with the offering of Christ Himself in order that every demand of God's holiness, which sin had outraged, might be fully met."

There is a third way in which God is glorified at Calvary. The faithfulness of God is revealed there. In the Old Testament period we find God promising a deliverer. Adam and Eve are in the Garden. They have sinned. They have eaten of the fruit of the forbidden tree. When God comes to them in the Garden they hide from his presence. They are sinful; God is holy; and they cannot stand the sight of his holiness. The Lord asks, "What have you done?" and the whole story comes out. But God provides for them. He kills animals, clothing them with their skins. Then, in promised blessing, he points to the future and says, "The day is coming when the seed of the woman will rise and crush the head of the serpent." Genesis 3:15 contains this promise of a redeemer. But Adam and Eve died, and the Savior had not yet come.

Farther on in the Old Testament we find God appearing to Abraham. God says, "Abraham, I am going to bless you and all the nations through you. I am going to do it through your seed." Abraham believes that. He believes that at one particular time an individual will come who would be the world's Savior. Yet Abraham lived to an old age and died, and Jesus had not come.

We turn to the prophets and we find God speaking through them. We find him telling Isaiah that One is coming who would be "pierced for our transgressions" and "crushed for our iniquities." The "punishment that brought us peace" would be on him (Isa. 53:5). We find God telling Micah that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem of Judah (Mic. 5:2). He declares through Malachi that the Savior will come as "the sun of righteousness" risen with "healing in his wings" (Mal. 4:2). He says that this One will be preceded by a forerunner, who will appear like the prophet Elijah (Mal. 3:1-3; 4:5-6). God gave the prophets these and many other promises. Yet they all died, and the Savior had not come.

Had God forgotten his promises? Are God's people destitute of hope? Is God unfaithful? One day an angel appears to a virgin in Nazareth and announces that the Messiah is to be born at last. To Joseph he says, 'You are to give him the name Jesus; because he will save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). Thus the Lord Jesus Christ enters the world, goes through his ministry, proceeds to the cross, and there dies to accomplish the defeat of Satan that was promised back in the earliest pages of the Old Testament and reiterated many times thereafter. God is shown to be faithful, and he is glorified in that.

Finally, God's love is also revealed at Calvary. Nothing in all history reveals God's love as does the cross of Jesus Christ. In fact, so great is this revelation of his love that God appeals to it as proof of his love. Romans 5:8 says, "But God demonstrates his love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us." How do we know that God loves us? We know that God loves us because the Lord Jesus Christ gave his life to redeem us from sin. In this is God glorified.

O when we view God's grand design, To save rebellious worms,
How vengeance and compassion join In their sublimest forms.
Our thoughts are lost in rev'rent awe— We love and we adore;
The first archangel never saw So much of God before!
Here each Divine perfection joins, And thought can never trace,
Which of the glories brightest shines— The justice or the grace.

The Coming Glory

At this point of our study we might well wish to stop. But we cannot stop quite yet, for Christ's words go on to speak of glory one last time, on this occasion in the future tense. He says, "If God is glorified in him [at the cross], God will glorify him in himself, and will glorify him at once." This means that if God is glorified by the special nature of Christ's death, as he is, then he will immediately proceed to place a new and special glory upon Christ through his resurrection, exaltation, and ascension to power at the Father's right hand.

I think the Lord must have yearned for it all to be completed at this point. He was willing to go to the cross. He embraced it gladly because it meant our salvation. But he looked beyond the cross to that day when the Resurrection would take place and the power of the cross would be evident, to that moment when he would ascend once again to his Father and would there minister for us as our great high priest, having presented the blood of his sacrifice as the atonement for our sin (see Heb. 9:11-14).

If Christ is glorified now, as he is, and if he is going to return one day in glory, I wonder how you will respond to him when you see him in his splendor. Will you look upon him as One whom you have spurned? Will you see him as One whom you said had no bearing upon your life, no word for your situation, One whose death means absolutely nothing and whose glorification is meaningless? Or will you receive him as One whose death means everything to you and whom you have sought to glorify by your obedience? I trust that it will be the latter—it should be—and that you will indeed serve him until your life's end.

Chapter 171.
The New Commandment

John 13:33-34

"My children, I will be with you only a little longer. You will look for me, and just as I told the Jews, so I tell you now: Where I am going, you cannot come.

"A new command I give you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another.

The Gospel of John has been given many fine titles in the long history of its exposition, but none are more fitting than those that identify it as the Gospel of God's love. It has been called "God's love letter to the world." But if this is so, then it is probably also true that either John 3:16 or the verses to which we come now are its heart. They are those in which the Lord Jesus Christ speaks to his disciples out of his great love for them, reminding them of that love and encouraging them to love one another.

The Preface

Verse 34 is the key verse of this section, but it is nevertheless significant that it is preceded by another that is, in some sense, its preface. The preface says, "My children, I will be with you only a little longer. You will look for me, and just as I told the Jews, so I tell you now: Where I am going, you cannot come" (v. 33). As I read the various commentators on this Gospel I find a discussion of why the disciples could not follow Christ and of the difference between their inability and the inability of the Jews. (The same words were spoken to the Jewish leaders earlier.) But I do not find an explanation of the connection between this verse and the great verse following. Yet it is in this connection that the importance of the verse lies.

What is its significance? It is along two lines. First, it is evident that since the Lord Jesus Christ was about to depart from the world, the only example of true love that the world had ever known was about to be taken from it. Jesus was himself love, for he was God and "God is love" (1 John 4:8). He was about to prove that love by dying on the cross. Yet in the very act of dying, which was to be followed by his resurrection and ascension into heaven, he was to be taken from humanity. How, then, were men and women to know what true divine love is? How were they to see love demonstrated when he was about to be taken from them? The answer is that they were to see it in those who are Christ's disciples. Jesus is being taken, but now the disciples are to love as he loved. It is as if Jesus had said, "I am going; therefore you must be as I have been in this world."

The second way in which the preface is important is in its transference of the love the disciples felt for him to one another. There is no doubt that each of the disciples (Judas excluded, who by now, however, had left the upper room) loved Jesus. Whatever he said they would do. Several had just prepared the upper room for this last dinner. Peter is about to say that he will die for Jesus if necessary. It is true, of course, that their love was not as strong as they thought it was. Peter would not die; in fact, he would deny his Master. The others would scatter at the moment of the arrest in Gethsemane. Nevertheless, they did truly love him. And yet, just as certainly as they loved him, so is it certain that they did not really love one another with anything even approaching that intensity. On the contrary, they were actually jealous of one another. They were disputing over who should be greatest. They would not wash the others' feet. In this situation Jesus, who is about to be taken from them, points out that now it is precisely one another whom they must love.

The vertical love of disciples for the exalted Christ must be expressed horizontally in their love for all other Christians. Moreover, the horizontal love, which can be seen by everyone, is proof of the vertical dimension.

Things New and Old

In the thirteenth chapter of Matthew, in a section of Christ's teachings dealing with the kingdom of God, Jesus speaks of a teacher of the law being like an "owner of a house, who brings out of his storeroom new treasures as well as old" (v. 52). At this point he is himself like that teacher, for he follows his preface by the giving of a command that is at once both new and ancient.

The command to love is old in that it existed before Christ's coming. In its simplest and bestknown form it is found in Leviticus 19:18, which says, "Do not seek revenge or bear a grudge against one of your people, but love your neighbor as yourself. I am the LORD." This is the verse to which Jesus referred when he was asked his opinion concerning the first and greatest commandment. He said that the greatest commandment was that recorded in Deuteronomy 6:5— "Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength." The second was Leviticus 19:18.

But if the commandment was an old commandment, as it must have been if it is recorded in one of the first five books of the Old Testament, in what sense is it new? Indeed, how can Christ call it "a new command"? The answer is that it was raised to an entirely new level and given an entirely new significance by Jesus. We can say that it is given a new object; it is to be exercised according to a new measure; it is to be made possible by a new power. Each of these is involved in Christ's saying.

In the first place, the command to love received a new object. It is true that the verse from Leviticus declares that the Jew is to love his neighbor as himself. But the neighbor involved is a Jewish neighbor only. The first half of the verse makes this plain, for in a parallel sentence the reader is told that he is not to hold a grudge against any of "your [also his] people." This is a physical, family relationship. In Christ's command, by contrast, the relationship is spiritual, for the neighbor is any believer in Jesus.

Something else about this new object is very important. Jesus says that the disciples are to love one another and that this is to be a witness to the unbelieving world. However, it is obvious from Christ's own example and from his teaching elsewhere that this is not to be a love that is held back from unbelievers. Even the very nature of the relationship makes this clear, for if the relationship involved is spiritual, then obviously there is no way of knowing who might be included in the company of believers should God so move. When the relationship was physical, the limits were obvious. One was supposed to love other Jews. Gentiles were not to be loved. They were sinners, those whom God obviously wished to destroy. But when the relationship became spiritual, the whole matter was broadened. This spiritual, Christian brotherhood is created by God's drawing together those of all races and languages. Consequently, the Christian is to love every individual—everyone; for anyone can be a special one for whom Christ died.

Alexander Maclaren, that great preacher of another generation, speaks of the newness of such love as it battered the ancient world's societies. "When the words were spoken, the then-known civilized Western world was cleft by great, deep gulfs of separation, like the crevasses in a glacier.... Language, religion, national animosities, differences of condition, and saddest of all, differences of sex, split the world up into alien fragments. A 'stranger' and an 'enemy' were expressed in one language by the same word. The learned and the unlearned, the slave and his master, the barbarian and the Greek, the man and the woman, stood on opposite sides of the gulfs, flinging hostility across. A Jewish peasant wandered up and down for three years in His own little country, which was the very focus of narrowness and separation and hostility, as the Roman historian felt when He called the Jews the 'haters of the human race'; He gathered a few disciples, and He was crucified by a contemptuous Roman governor, who thought that the life of one fanatical Jew was a small price to pay for popularity with his troublesome subjects, and in a generation after, the clefts were being bridged and all over the Empire a strange new sense of unity was bearing breathed, and 'Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free,' male and female, Jew and Greek, learned and ignorant, clasped hands and sat down at one table, and felt themselves 'all one in Christ Jesus.'"

The commandment of Christ does not only have a new object. It also is to be exercised according to a new measure. What was love before this, after all? A vague feeling of good will? A sense of pride in one's race? A need to defend a neighbor or to free a family member who had become a slave? Yes, this and perhaps a bit more. But it was not that measure of love seen in the fact that the God of the universe would take human form, suffer, and die for those who were ungodly in order that, almost in spite of themselves those who hated God and had tried to turn from him might be redeemed from the chains of sin and brought into glory. "This is love," writes John in the fourth chapter of his magnificent first letter, "not that we loved God [because we did not], but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins" (v. 10).

The measure of this love is the standard found in 1 Corinthians 13. "Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil, but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always perseveres. Love never fails" (vv. 4-8). This is the love Jesus brought, and it was a new thing in this world.

Third, the command to love is also new in that it is made possible by a new power. The power is the power of the Holy Spirit, the very life of the Lord Jesus Christ in each believer. How much we need this! Without it we cannot love as Christ loved; for such love cannot be achieved by human energy.

Our Great Example

There is one more point to be seen in these two verses: Jesus is himself our example as we obey his command. He indicates this in the second half of verse 34, in which he says, "As I have loved you, so you must love one another." It is not just that we are to love. It is that we are to love as he loved us. His love is to be the full measure of our love for one another.

How can we speak about this practically? One way is to return to the verses from 1 Corinthians cited earlier. When they were quoted before they were quoted exactly as they are printed in our Bibles. This time read them with the word 'Jesus" substituted for the word "love." 'Jesus is patient, Jesus is kind. He does not envy, he does not boast, he is not proud. He is not rude, he is not self-seeking, he is not easily angered, he keeps no record of wrongs. Jesus does not delight in evil, but rejoices with the truth. He always protects, always trusts, always perseveres. Jesus never fails." Clearly, the substitution of 'Jesus" for "love" is quite proper, for Jesus is obviously the embodiment of such love. Our hearts acknowledge it to be so, and we rejoice in the fact.

Now make another substitution. We are told in our text that we are to love as Christ loves. But since 1 Corinthians 13 reveals the way that Christ did love, we (if we love in that way) should be able to substitute our name for his. We should be able to put "I" where "love" is printed. "I am patient, I am kind. I do not envy, I do not boast, I am not proud. I am not rude, I am not selfseeking, I am not easily angered, I keep no record of wrongs. I do not delight in evil, but rejoice with the truth. I always protect, always trust, always persevere. I never fail." When we read it this way the result is humbling, for we recognize that we do not love as Jesus loves. We do not even understand such love. And we find ourselves praying, "Oh, Lord Jesus, teach me to love others as you love."

When we pray this way God will help us, and we will begin to grow in the love and knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Let Us Love

We should get more out of this command than the disciples did on the first occasion on which it was spoken. We think that they must have been struck by these great words and have remembered them vividly, but this was not the case. On the contrary, not one of them really heard the command or understood what it meant.

We know this because of the course of the discussion that follows verse 35. We remember that Jesus had begun his discussion of the new command by informing the disciples that he was going to leave them and that they would not be able to follow him in his departure. They heard this, and it filled them with dismay. It crowded all other thoughts from their minds. Next, Jesus talked about his new command, but they did not hear him, for he had barely finished talking about it when Peter broke in to ask, "But, Lord, where are you going?" Peter had been thinking about Christ's earlier announcement and was returning to it. Jesus stopped to deal with Peter's questions, and before he could get back to the subject of the new commandment Thomas responded, "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?" Jesus answered Thomas, and he never did get back to the great command.

Jesus is not frustrated by human preoccupation, however. So, after many years had passed, the Holy Spirit spoke to John the evangelist, who was present on the earlier occasion, and caused him to write a book which is in one sense an exposition of the new commandment. The book is 1 John, and it expounds the new commandment completely.

In all, the new command is talked about in four separate passages: 1 John 2:7-11; 3:11-18; 4:721; and 5:1-5. But the key passage is 4:7-21, in which the words "love one another" occur three times. In each case a different reason is given why this exhortation must be heeded.

The first reason why we should love one another is that love is God's nature. John says, "Dear friends, let us love one another, for love comes from God. Everyone who loves is born of God and knows God. Whoever does not love does not know God; for God is love" (1 John 4:7-8). John's argument is that, if we truly are God's children, we will bear the characteristics of our Father.

Second, John tells us that we should love because love led to God's gift. In these verses John reminds us that we were spiritually dead men and women before God the Father sent his Son to die for us. Being dead we were not able even to understand what he had done. But when Christ died for us, and when by the work of the Holy Spirit we were made alive spiritually, we were able to believe on Christ and recognize the love of God in Christ, which stood behind the sacrifice. Consequently, having thus come to know love and take the measure of love, we are to love. John's way of putting it is: "This is how God showed his love among us: he sent his one and only Son into the world that we might live through him.... Dear friends, since God so loved us, we also ought to love one another" (vv. 9, 11).

Finally, we are told that we should love one another in that love is God's present and continuing activity. God is not creating the world today; he has already done that. He is not sending Jesus to die; Jesus has already died. What God is doing is working in Christians through love in order that others who do not yet know him might see him through such divine activity. John writes: "No one has ever seen God; but if we love one another, God lives in us, and his love is made complete in us [and, thus, men see him]" (v. 12).

Do those who are not yet Christians see God in you? It is a breathtaking thought. But this verse teaches that they can and will, if you will love others. Will you? Remember, this is not a divine invitation, as if Jesus had said, "Won't you please love others?" It is not even one of a series of steps to successful living, as if he had said, "You will be happier if you love one another." It is Christ's new command. Love one another! God grant that we shall and that, in doing so, we may truly be his disciples.

Chapter 172.
Marks of a True Disciple

John 13:35

Once when I was working for the evangelical thought journal Christianity Today, I heard Carl F. H. Henry, then the editor, say that he wished Christians in our day could have an easily identifiable mark that would at once distinguish them as Christians. "Something like an armband," he said. That was some time ago. Since then, the Jesus Movement gave us the sign of an upraised index finger, meaning "One Way." I have noticed that now even evangelicals are often wearing crosses and other religious symbols. But for some reason, Henry's remark has stuck with me through the years, and it has made me notice "signs" or writings about signs that I might not have noticed otherwise.

One important essay was entitled "The Mark of the Christian" by Francis Schaeffer. It appeared first as a small booklet and then as a final postscript in the volume The Church at the End of the 20th Century. That study was based on John 13:35, "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." According to Schaeffer, love is "the mark that Jesus gives to label a Christian not just in one era or in one locality but at all times and all places until Jesus returns."

Another piece along the same lines is a chapter in the book The Love Life by Donald Grey Barnhouse. It is entitled "Art Not Thou Also One of His Disciples?" and is based on the text I have already mentioned, John 13:35, plus two others: John 8:31 and John 15:8. In this study I want to take these three texts and, using what has been written about them, explore the essential features of one who would be Christ's true disciple.

There is a popular use of the word "Christian" by which many would claim to be Christians who are, nevertheless, not disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ at all. Barnhouse points out that the word "Christian" originally came about because those who believed in Christ at Antioch followed him so closely that those who observed them wanted to identify them by the name of their Master.
The people of Antioch said, "These are followers of Christ. They are Christ-ones, Christians.
They follow him. They are his." Today, by contrast everyone calls himself a Christian. By some, America is called a Christian nation. Anything that has even the vague flavor of Western religion or culture about it gets the name. But few who call themselves Christians actually follow Jesus.

Obviously, there is a kind of Christianity that is like this, but it is not discipleship. True discipleship is far different. What is it? It is expressed well in 2 Corinthians 8:5, "They gave themselves first to the Lord and to us in keeping with God's will." Discipleship is giving oneself wholeheartedly to Jesus.

Continuing in Christ's Word

The three texts in John's Gospel I have just mentioned show the marks of a true disciple. The first of these is John 8:31. "To the Jews who believed him Jesus said, 'If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples.'" The first mark of a disciple is continuation in the word that Christ has spoken.

Two things are necessary if we are truly to do this. First, we must hear that Word; this means that we must read it, study it, memorize it, and continually put ourselves in a place where it is faithfully taught. The trouble with the discipleship of many begins right here. The Word is taught, but they do not want to hear it. The Word is available, but they do not like what it says. So they hide from it. What are such Christians like? They are like the man Harry Ironside tells about in one of his writings. The man had come to church occasionally with his wife, but he was very irregular in his attendance. So Ironside asked the wife about it. "Doesn't your husband like coming to church?" he asked.

"I think he does," she said. "But he has difficulty with your sermons. He hears the teachings, but he doesn't like them. So he stays home. He says that if he comes one Sunday, it takes him weeks to get over it."

That is true for many. And that is one reason why people who used to be seen around your church are not seen there so often. They know what the Word of God says, but they do not want to heed it. So they refuse to listen, and eventually they reject even their Christian friends. It is interesting that in this same chapter of John there is a verse in which Christ speaks to his enemies, saying, "Why is my language not clear to you? Because you are unable to hear what I say" (v. 43). Here were unbelievers who, lacking the Holy Spirit, were unable even to hear Christ's speech. No wonder they misunderstood him. But what are we to think of those who claim to possess the Holy Spirit, who should be able to understand Christ's words, but who refuse to hear them?

The second thing that is necessary, after we have heard Christ's word, is to continue in it. This means to continue to hold to it by faith, even though we may not understand it fully. The disciples were doing this. We remember as we read this chapter that Jesus had been preaching some startling truths to those who would listen to him, and as a result people were overflowing with questions. "How can a man be born again when he is old?" "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" "What does he mean, 'You will look for me and not find me and where I go you cannot come?'" These were the questions that were raised by his teachings. But we notice that they were raised by the people at large and not by the disciples. The disciples followed him and, therefore, although they certainly did not know all the answers, they believed what they understood and continued in it faithfully.

Barnhouse, from whom I am borrowing much of this material, tells the story of an eight-year-old girl who was joining a church. One of the elders asked her, "Have you read the Bible?" 'Yes, I have."

"Do you understand it?"

"Yes," she said, "all of it!"

Well, that is very nice. For her age and mentality, she had understood what she had read. Moreover, it had spoken to her heart, and she had heeded it. This is what the disciples were doing. It is what each of us should do. We may not understand all that is in the Bible. Indeed, we do not. But we can understand what we know and follow in it. Barnhouse writes: "Obviously the disciples did not understand everything, but they believed what they knew and they continued in His doctrine. As soon as they learned more, they believed that also; for that's the method in Christian life. We are not born again with the full content of doctrine neatly stored in categories in our brain cells, but we go on as babes. We walk as children, desiring the sincere milk of the Word that we may grow thereby." Unquestioning faith is the first mark of a true disciple.

Love One Another

The second mark of a disciple is found in the verse to which we have come in our study of John 13, verse 35. "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." It is this verse that is the basis of Schaeffer's study.

There is a unique quality in this verse that sets it off from the others we are considering. It is Christ's reference to the world. In the first verse (John 8:31), Jesus says that continuing in his word will make those listening to his word be his disciples indeed. But there is no reference to how this will affect the world. In the verse to which we come next (John 15:8), Jesus says that a disciple is one who bears "much fruit." But the content refers to the fact that the bearing of fruit will glorify God, not that it will affect humanity, although, of course, it does. It is only in this second verse (John 13:35), with its emphasis upon observable love, that the world is taken into serious consideration. Why is this so? It is so because of what Jesus says about love. Jesus says that it is the mark by which his disciples are to be known as Christians, not only to him or to one another, but to everyone.

Schaeffer says that this is frightening, and he is right. For it is as if 'Jesus turns to the world and says, 'I've something to say to you. On the basis of my authority, I give you a right: You may judge whether or not an individual is a Christian on the basis of the love he shows to all Christians.' In other words, if people come up to us and cast in our teeth the judgment that we are not Christians because we have not shown love toward other Christians, we must understand that they are only exercising a prerogative that Jesus gave them.

"And we must not get angry. If people say, 'You don't love other Christians,' we must go home, get down on our knees, and ask God whether or not they are right. And if they are, then they have a right to have said what they said."

What kind of love must we show if the world is to look at it and conclude that it is explainable only by the fact that we are Christians? Obviously it must be a special kind of love. What are its characteristics? How does such a special love operate? Fortunately, the answer to these questions is given to us in 1 John, a book that, as suggested in the last study, was written in some measure as a commentary on the new commandment.

In one sense, nearly everything in 1 John deals with the new command, for even its other two great themes (righteousness and sound doctrine) relate to it. But to be concise, it is possible to find a rich and fully rewarding answer in just three verses, 3:16-18. These verses say, "This is how we know what love is: Jesus Christ laid down his life for us. And we ought to lay down our lives for our brothers. If anyone has material possessions and sees his brother in need but has no pity on him, how can the love of God be in him? Dear children, let us not love with words or tongue but with actions and in truth." These verses teach that one aspect of Christian love is its action. Moreover, they show that such love is to be exercised at personal cost, if need be, and that it is to be shown to anyone who is needy.

One thing John says is that "we ought to lay down our lives" for one another. Obviously, it is not often the case, at least today, that Christians are called upon to lay down their lives in the literal sense. But just because this is so, we should not pass over the idea too quickly. True, we do not often have opportunities to literally die for someone else. But we do have opportunities to "die to self or, as we could also say, to "sacrifice our own interests" continually.

The gospel of God's love in Jesus Christ has never been taken to anyone but that some Christian has sacrificed for it to happen. Even if it only means crossing the street to bear a simple witness, some Christian has thought about it, prayed about it, and then ventured to do it (sometimes with great fear and trembling), risking the loss of the friendship or even ridicule. Farther afield the sacrifices are greater. Parents sacrifice their children to allow them to go to distant lands where they may even die in God's service. Individuals send money to support these children and to underwrite other works. Some give their time to Christian social service projects, all at some (and sometimes even great) personal sacrifice.

Another place for sacrifice is the home. Today's culture glories in self-satisfaction, teaching that if one is not personally and fully satisfied, he or she therefore has a right to break off the marriage relationship. But this is not God's teaching. God's teaching is that we are to die to self in order that the other person might be fulfilled and that it is only as this begins to happen that we ourselves find satisfaction. Do you show observable Christian love in your home? Can unbelievers tell that you are a Christian by the way you treat your wife or your husband?

John's words in verse 18 are a true conclusion. "Let us not love with words or tongue but with actions and in truth." It is when we love sacrificially and by deeds that we show ourselves truly to be Christ's disciples.

Fruit-bearing

The third mark of a true disciple is found in John 15:8. "This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples." Fruit-bearing is the third mark of being a disciple.

The context of John 15 gives the steps for successful fruit-bearing, and the first is to recognize our own inability to produce it. Three verses before this, in verse 5, Jesus says, "Apart from me you can do nothing." Does it say, "Apart from me you cannot do the big things. Apart from me you cannot do much"? No, that is not it at all. It says, "Apart from me you can do nothing." So the first step toward successful fruit-bearing is to recognize our own nothingness and so start with Christ. Activity is no substitute.

Barnhouse tells a story in which he discusses this problem. A man came to him once, after he had given a portion of his life to Christian work, and said, "It's all been fruitless." "How did it begin?" Barnhouse asked.

The man sadly told the following story. "I remember so well," he said. "I was in my room studying, and as I was looking at the Bible, the Holy Spirit started to speak to me. He was putting His finger on things in my life that shouldn't have been there. It made me restless and I closed the Bible, got up, and went out into the other room and picked up the telephone. I called another Christian and said, 'You know, I am greatly moved at the need for such and such a thing; couldn't we start a Christian work for them?' Well, we got together and we started a Christian work, and we gave ourselves to that great activity—work, work, work—and nothing ever came of it." The reason why there was no fruit-bearing was that there was no true discipleship.

Then there is the second step for successful fruit-bearing, and this is to remain in Jesus. To recognize that we can do nothing is connected with remaining, of course; for when we know our need we are encouraged by that very knowledge to abide in Jesus. Nevertheless, the two are not the same. To recognize our nothingness is negative. To remain is a positive thing. It is to draw near when the Spirit begins to speak through the Word (as he did in Barnhouse's story), and to change our way of living accordingly (as the man did not). "Remain in me, and I in you," said Jesus. For "no branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me" (John 15:4). To remain in Christ is to allow him to work through us for Christ's glory.

Are You a Disciple?

John 13:35 is followed by three verses in which Jesus foretells his denial by Peter. When Jesus was arrested Peter was unwilling to go home without knowing the full outcome. So he followed afar off and eventually saw Jesus taken into the courtyard of the high priest. The soldiers undoubtedly shut the large door after them. But there was a smaller door, kept by a maid; and John, who knew the house and had access, went to this door and called Peter. As Peter passed through the entrance, the maid who kept the door asked, "Are you not one of this man's disciples?"

Unfortunately, Peter forgot the protestations he had made earlier and, so, denied his Master. "I am not," he said. Then, while warming himself by the fire that warmed Jesus' enemies, he denied him twice more. The incident shows that even one of the inner band of the apostles may yet fail in discipleship.

Are we Jesus' disciples? Are you? Am I?

No doubt most of us will answer gladly, 'Yes, I am his disciple." But as we think about it, let us think about discipleship according to the definition Jesus himself gave to it. Jesus defined a disciple as one who continues in his Word, loves the brethren, and bears much fruit. Do we do each of these? Jesus said, "If you hold to my teaching, then you are really my disciples." He said, "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." He said, "This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples." God grant that we may do each of these things as we drop all lesser loyalties and draw ever closer to him.

Chapter 173.
Darkness before the Dawn

John 13:36-38

John 13, which concludes with Jesus' warning to Peter that he would deny him, has two main characters other than the Lord himself: Judas and Peter. Judas betrayed his Lord. Peter denied him. Looking at the matter from the outside, as we sometimes do, there seems to be little difference between the two acts; each was a failure to stand by Christ in his hour of apparent need. Yet, by looking more closely we see there is a world of difference. One act was that of an antagonist. The other was a momentary failure by one who at heart was still a great friend and disciple of the Lord.

William Barclay puts the contrast like this: 'Judas' betrayal of Jesus was absolutely deliberate; it was carried out in cold blood; it must have been the result of careful thought and careful planning; and in the end it deliberately and callously refused the most poignant appeal. But there was never anything in this world less deliberate than Peter's denial of Jesus. Peter never meant to do it. He was swept away by a moment of weakness."

We would add to Barclay's analysis that the reason for the difference is that Judas, unlike Peter, was not a true believer in Christ. Consequently, when John gets to the end of Judas's story, telling how he left the company of the Twelve to conspire to give his master over into the hands of his enemies, he concludes, "and it was night." This is the night of eternal darkness brought about by a separation from God. By contrast, the prophecy of Peter's denial is at once followed by Christ's words of reassurance, "Do not let your heart be troubled" (John 14:1).

The story of Peter's denial is not as depressing as that of Judas' betrayal. Yet it is hardly encouraging either. For if Peter, the acknowledged leader of the Twelve, fell, so can any of us.

Anyone Can Fall

This is really the first lesson of these verses, and it should not be passed over quickly. It needs to be made often. Paul makes the point in the first half of 1 Corinthians 10:13, a verse about temptation. "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it."

As we read that verse we notice that the first half indicates that temptation will come to everyone, for this is "common to man." This is not Paul's main point. It is only a secondary one. Paul's main point is that God has provided a way for his children to escape temptations. When temptations come, they are not to think that they are experiencing something extraordinary and therefore despair, but rather they are to know that they are only experiencing what others have experienced before them and so turn to God, who has delivered others and can deliver them. This is Paul's main point. But basic to it is the truth that temptations do come to everyone and that anyone can fall into them.

One of the devil's tricks in temptation is to get us to think that the temptation is somehow extraordinary and, thus, that we cannot possibly be expected to resist it. But if that fails, he would like us to think instead that we are beyond temptation.

Sometimes we get to thinking that we are too old, that the battle has passed us by, that we are on vacation (or some such thing), and that we therefore do not need to be on guard against sinning. If that is the case, we need to learn from David in regard to his great sin with Bathsheba. How old do you suppose David was when he sinned with Bathsheba? We tend to think of sexual sins as being sins of youth, of the time when a young man is supposed to sow his wild oats. But this was not the case with David. David must have been at least fifty years old. He had served for some time under Saul, followed by years in hiding, followed by a reign of seven and a half years at Hebron (beginning when he was thirty years old), followed by a reign in Jerusalem during which time he subdued most of Israel's enemies. It was only at the end of this period, when he had made the mistake of staying home from one of the battles, that he saw Bathsheba bathing on a roof near the palace, invited her over, and committed adultery with her.

On the other hand, we look at Peter and find him to be in the prime of life. Moreover, we find him well aware of the dangers that faced both himself and the others at this time in Christ's ministry. He is as prepared to face them as anyone could be. Peter had heard Thomas say, as the little company was about to go up to Jerusalem for the last time, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (John 11:16). He knew that danger threatened. Besides, he had bought a sword. We know this because, when the enemies of Christ came to arrest him in the Garden of Gethsemane, Peter drew the sword and went after the man who appeared to be leading the column.

Finally, we notice that Peter (unlike David) had even been warned of what was coming. This is what our text is about. Jesus had foretold his own departure, and Peter had objected, saying, "Lord, why can't I follow you now? I will lay down my life for you."

Jesus replied, "Will you lay down your life for me? I tell you the truth, before the rooster crows, you will disown me three times" (vv. 37-38). This is ironic, of course, for it was actually the Lord who was about to lay down his life for Peter. Nevertheless, in these words Peter had a prophecy of the danger that awaited him. He had only to remain faithful until morning, until the cock should crow. Yet in spite of the fact that he understood the danger, was prepared to meet it, and was forewarned by the Lord's own solemn prophecy, he fell.

David was not prepared for temptation, so he fell. Peter was prepared, yet he also fell. The point is that anyone can fall. Temptations come to anyone, at any age, at any time, and anyone can fall into sin as a result of them.

Steps of Peter's Fall

The second truth we should notice as we study these verses is that there were steps to Peter's fall. When a fall comes, it seems to come suddenly, without warning. But it is seldom the case that a fall is without some sad preparation.

A number of years ago, Philadelphia television stations showed a film recording the spectacular demolition of the Hotel Traymore in Atlantic City. The Traymore was one of the grand old resort hotels, constructed of great blocks of stone, to which generations of Philadelphians had gone for vacation during the hot summer months. It was an Atlantic coast landmark. Yet it had become obsolete and was sold to make way for newer construction. Many people knew of the sale, but few were prepared for the suddenness with which the old hotel would come down. One minute it was there on the television screens; the next, there was a blast and the old hotel simply gave way and settled into the rising clouds of dust. The whole demolition took only one or two minutes. Someone looking at this might be amazed at how this could happen. "How could the hotel be destroyed so suddenly?" he might ask. But a person who knew what was involved could explain that for months the demolition experts had been working within the hotel to place explosives within the main support columns and to wire the charges so that they would detonate together. It seemed the work of a moment. It was actually the result of a long process of careful preparation. It is the same with temptation. The fall seems sudden; but it is prepared by numerous steps, as the fall of Peter indicates.

The first step in Peter's fall was overconfidence. This is evident in every part of the story, but particularly from the questions Peter asked. The Lord had told Peter that he was going away and that Peter could not follow him, and Peter had asked, "Lord, where are you going?" In this context, the question is not as straightforward as it seems to be. It is actually a protest against Jesus' having told him that he, Peter, could not come after him. It really means, "I will follow you wherever you go. Tell me where you are going, so I may prove it." Then, when Jesus had replied by repeating that Peter could not follow him now but that he would hereafter, Peter had protested, "Lord, why can't I follow you now? I will lay down my life for you." This was little short of a direct contradiction of the Lord's words, for Peter was implying that he could follow Christ, in proof of which he was prepared to lay down his life for him.

What are we to think of Peter's audacity? We cannot condemn it completely, for it obviously flowed from love for Christ and from a desire to abide with him always. But it was also ignorant, and it flowed from overconfidence. What did "following" Jesus mean? Peter did not really know what was involved. Moreover, he had not yet learned the truth of Christ's statement recorded just a chapter later: "Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5).

In his overconfidence Peter failed, not at his weakest point, but at his strongest. He was no coward. He was ready to die for Jesus; yet, he trembled at the innocent question of a serving maid. How is this to be explained? Pink answers, "Only on the ground that [God permitted it] in order to teach him and us the all-important lesson, that if left to ourselves, the strongest is as weak as water. It is in conscious weakness that our strength lies (2 Cor. 12:10)." Pink adds correctly that we often look down on others in their sin and imagine that what they are doing we could not possibly do. But we are wrong in thinking that way. For the "seeds of every sin are latent in our hearts, even when renewed, and they only need occasion, or carelessness, or the withdrawal of God's grace for a season, to put forth an abundant crop."

We need to know this, for if we would conquer temptation, we must begin with the knowledge that, unless Christ holds us, we are bound to fall. Elsewhere I have told the story of a friend of mine who once had a job of stringing wires at a summer camp. To do this he had to climb a telephone pole. I was there as he was taught. "In order to climb the pole you have to lean back," he was told. "Lean back on the broad leather belt that surrounds you and the pole. It will hold you. You need to lean back or else your spikes will not press into the wood and hold, and you will slip." My friend listened and then tried it. But he was afraid to lean back. So his spikes would not enter the wood, and he got nowhere at all. At last he got the idea. He leaned back, the spikes took hold, and he began to climb. Unfortunately, when he was about three feet off the ground he got worried about falling and thought that he could improve things somewhat if he just pulled himself closer to the pole. But when he did that the spikes came out, and he slipped back down, getting covered with splinters in the process.

It is the same spiritually. God has ordered life in such a way that we cannot climb spiritually without leaning on him, trusting him to hold us. If we do not lean on Jesus, God will allow us to slip (as Peter did) and get covered with splinters. He will allow this so that we will come to trust him and not ourselves.

A Downward Path

The next step in Peter's fall was a failure to pray. This is a connecting failure, of course; for being confident of his own ability, Peter did not feel his need of God and so failed to ask him for help.

Again, this should never have happened. For if we read the parallel accounts of this evening's activities, we find that Jesus had explicitly warned the disciples to pray. "Pray that you will not fall into temptation" were his words. In all, he said this three times. He said it when he and the disciples had first entered the Garden of Gethsemane and he was about to withdraw to pray privately (Luke 22:40). He said it a second time to Peter after he had returned and found the disciples sleeping (Matt. 26:40-41; Mark 14:37-38). He said it a third time just before the multitude arrived to arrest him and Judas kissed him as the mark of identification (Luke 22:46). Peter was told to pray three times. Yet so great was his confidence, or drowsiness, which is much the same thing, that he let his opportunity pass by and was unprepared when the temptation to deny Jesus eventually overtook him.

Do you pray lest temptation overtake you? Do you "pray without ceasing," as Paul admonished those at Thessalonica to do (1 Thess. 5:17)? I know that it is hard work. At times it is terribly difficult. But there is no time when we need more to pray than when we feel too tired to do it or when the cares of the world press in upon us, depress us, or dull our thinking.

There was a third step to Peter's fall. Luke tells us about it, saying that, when they had arrested Jesus and were leading him to the house of the high priest, "Peter followed at a distance" (Luke 22:54). Under the circumstances, we can understand how it happened. At the moment of the arrest the disciples scattered in panic, most of them apparently making their way back over the Mount of Olives in the darkness to Bethany where they had been spending each evening of the Passover week. The psychology of the narrative indicates that they would flee away from Jerusalem, where the danger lay, to Bethany, rather than in the direction in which the Lord was taken. But Peter apparently did not run, or else hid for a time or stopped running, with the result that he saw Jesus being led away and followed after him, while being hidden by the darkness. It is understandable. It is what I would have done. But where is the bravery of that one who said he would die with Jesus if that should be necessary? Where is Peter's courage now? Peter was caught off guard; he was not praying as Jesus was. So fear had suddenly conquered his heart, and he was hiding lest he be detected.

What Peter did on this occasion is characteristic of too many Christians. They want to be followers of Jesus, but they follow afar off for fear of the consequences. They know rightly that the focus of the warfare is where Jesus stands. So they think they will be safer if they are not so close to him. Are they safer? Of course not. The only safety for any disciple is to follow closely behind Jesus.

Then, finally, toward the end of the story, we find Peter warming himself at the fire in the courtyard of the high priest. He is in the company of Christ's enemies and is benefiting from them. This is not to be taken as meaning that we should forego all contact with the world, for we should not. Jesus himself said that he was leaving us in the world rather than taking us from the world so that we might be a witness to the world. But it does mean that we must not profit from the activities of those who would do Christ harm. Moreover, we must avoid becoming too chummy with them, for we lose our integrity in that way and then cannot stand for Jesus. Peter failed to guard himself at this point. Consequently he fell into an incognito role and soon denied his Lord—at the last, we are told, even with oaths and cursings (Matt. 26:74; Mark 14:71).

Is this to be our path? Temptations will come, and we can succumb to them. We can be like Peter in his downward path. Or we can resist. To resist we must do the opposite of what Peter did on this occasion. First, rather than being overly confident, we must be underconfident. Or, to speak more correctly, we must refuse to have confidence in ourselves at all. Second, we must pray regularly and earnestly. Third, we must follow closely behind Jesus, not afar off as Peter did. Finally, we must be careful not to profit from the activities of those who are really Christ's enemies.

Not Cast Off

At this point our study of Peter's denial could properly stop, for we have learned enough to profit immensely. But we should not only see that anyone can fall and the steps that led to Peter's fall, which we have seen. We should also see the activity of Jesus on Peter's behalf, knowing that he was about to fall. What did Jesus do? He warned Peter, that is true. But that is not all he did. We are also told: (1) that Jesus prayed for Peter, and (2) that he later came to Peter in order to recommission him to service.

First, Jesus prayed for Peter. And, as we might expect, his prayers were answered. Luke tells us about it in his Gospel. In this account Jesus is speaking to Peter and says the following: "Simon, Simon, Satan has asked to sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for you, that your faith will not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:31, 32). Put in language that we can better understand, this means that Satan had come to Jesus boasting that Peter was nothing but a bag of hot air and that if he, Satan, were allowed to blow on him, Peter would sail away like chaff when the wind separates it from the grain at threshing time. Jesus answered that there was indeed a great deal of chaff in Peter but that Satan was wrong in thinking that Peter was nothing but chaff. "My grain is in Peter," he said. "Consequently, I will let you blow on him; but when you are done all you will have succeeded in doing is blowing away some of the chaff. Peter will be stronger than before." Here Jesus announced Peter's victory even before it happened. But he added that he would pray for Peter that his faith would not fail. Peter would fail to pray, but the Lord would pray for him.

Second, the Lord appeared to Peter after Peter's fall and after his own resurrection to recommission him. The story is found in the postscript to John's Gospel. Peter had denied three times. The Lord asked three times, "Simon, son of John, do you truly love me?"

Three times Peter answered, "Yes, Lord, you know that I love you."

Jesus replied, "Feed my sheep."

Did Jesus cast off Peter? He had every reason to do so. Peter had denied him. He might have judged Peter unfit for further service or even for salvation. But this is not the Lord's way. He came again to recommission Peter to service. Did God cast off Abraham after he had left Ur of the Chaldees for the Promised Land but had stopped at Haran? No. God came to Abraham a second time with the identical promise of great spiritual blessing. Did God cast off Moses after Moses had decided that he could free his people by his own strength, killed an Egyptian, and then had to flee from Egypt to Midian? No. God came to Moses with a new revelation of himself, one that contained a promise to do what Moses had attempted but had found himself unable to do. Did God cast off Jonah after Jonah had fled from him, falling so deeply into sin that he declared he would rather die than go to Nineveh? No. God came to Jonah a second time also.

So God comes to us a second, third, fourth, even a hundredth or thousandth time, if necessary, that we might fellowship with him. Moreover, none of us would be where we are at this moment if God had not so operated with us. We are unfaithful; yet he abides faithful. He loves each of his own "to the end" (John 13:1). Do we deserve it? No. But we can respond to it, saying, as did Isaac Watts,

When I survey the wondrous cross
On which the Prince of glory died,
My richest gain I count but loss, And pour contempt on all my pride.
Were the whole realm of nature mine, That were a present far too small:
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my soul, my life, my all.

When we think that we are standing, we are about to fall. But when we conquer our pride and lean upon Jesus, we find him to be all we need. We love him, and we find his love sufficient for each emergency.

Chapter 174.
Calm Words for Troubled Hearts

John 14:1-3

What is a Christian to do when the world he knows falls in? What is he to do in the day of great trouble?

This is not an idle question because, although we do not always like to think about it, life is filled with troubles. Disappointment is a trouble, and there are many disappointments. We are disappointed with ourselves, for we are not always what we want to be. We want to be strong, but we are weak. We want to be successful, but we experience many failures. We want to be liked, but often people are at best indifferent to us. We are also often disappointed with other people, with a husband, wife, son, daughter, friend, employer, partner, employee, or whatever the case may be.

Circumstances, too, are a source of troubles. In some cases we can do something about the circumstances, and we try to; but this is not always so. Poverty cannot always be changed, and poverty is troubling. The loss of a loved one is also beyond our control, and this is devastating. So is loss of a job, sickness, or even uncertainty about the future, the last of which is particularly unsettling in these times.

And what about spiritual troubles, when it seems as though the Lord's presence is withdrawn and we are plunged alone into what has well been described as the "dark night" of the soul? What are we to do in such circumstances? What are we to do with despair? The answer is that we are to take ourselves in hand and by a deliberate exercise of mind strengthen our faith in God. We are to think of him and so overcome trouble by reminding ourselves of the power and promises of God and by trusting in him.

Our text is a call to us to become strong Christians, not the kind who weep and wail and expect everyone to pity them, but rather the kind who are of great stature in faith and who are a source of strength to others. The text says, "Do not let your hearts be troubled" (John 14:1).

Cause to Be Troubled

There are two important things about this text, and the first, quite paradoxical in view of what I have just said, is that frequently we have cause to be troubled.

It would not be necessary to make so much of this point if it were not that there is a kind of Pollyanna Christianity in our day that seeks to deny it. It is the kind of Christianity that pretends that there are no troubles for any truly surrendered child of God. This view of life takes Romans 8:28 to mean that only good things come into the life of one who truly loves God ("And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him"), rather than seeing that the verse actually says that evil will indeed come but that God will nevertheless accomplish his own good purposes in spite of it. This view is unrealistic and uninformed, for evil does exist. Troubles do come. Death is an enemy. So, rather than denying these things, we must begin by a realistic recognition of them.

Obviously, it was this that prompted Christ's saying, for it was clear to him that from a human viewpoint the disciples, to whom he was speaking, had cause for deep agitation.

For one thing, he himself had been troubled. We know this because we are told about it in the previous chapter: "After he had said this, Jesus was troubled in spirit" (v. 21). Was this not unusual and troubling in itself? Was it not a cause for dismay that he who had been their stay in every troubled sea, their refuge in every hostile crowd, should be troubled? Moreover, he had also indicated that he was about to be taken from them. He had said it before, but they had not fully understood him. Now the message got through, and they were in turmoil. He was their life. For him they had left family, home, and occupation. What would they do once he was gone from them? What could fill the void left in their aching and anxious hearts?

Nor is this all. If there were nothing more, the disciples might have comforted themselves with the thought that, regardless of what might happen, still they loved him and would be faithful to him or to his memory forever. But they were really not free to think this, for he had told them that one of their number, Judas, should betray him, and that another, Peter, should deny him three times before morning.

Did the disciples have cause to be troubled? Certainly they did! From this we learn that it is not wrong to honestly recognize and even analyze our problems.

We may add another point also. It is also not wrong to recognize and openly acknowledge things that trouble others. Here is a useful principle in counseling. Sometimes when a person comes to us with a problem, as people do to me constantly, we want to minimize their problem. We want to say, "But that is not so bad. Think how things could be worse." We may even want to tell stories of those we know who were in even worse circumstances. But we must not do this. Nothing is gained by minimizing the problems. Instead, we must hear the troubled soul out, and we must acknowledge that in many, if not all, cases there is that which rightly troubles him. Indeed, we must even "mourn with those who mourn," as Paul says in the great ethical section of the letter to the Romans (12:15).

More Cause Not to Be

So Christians are realists. They are realists about all life's problems. At the same time, however, we must add that they are realists about the power of God and his promises. And this means that although there is cause to be troubled, nevertheless, there is even greater cause not to be. This is the second important point. Regardless of what there may be to cause us to be troubled as Christians, there is more cause not to be troubled.

What are the reasons why we should not be troubled? In these verses there are five of them. First, we know Jesus. He is God. He knows about us and our circumstances. He is able to deal with them. Therefore, there is every reason to trust him. Jesus indicates this when he issues the challenge, "Trust in God, trust also in me."

Frankly, there are a number of ways in which these lines may be taken, due to the fact that in both parts of the sentence the verb "trust" may be in either the indicative ("You trust") or the imperative mood ("Trust!"). In Greek the two forms are identical. Thus, there are four ways to translate the sentence: (1) "You trust in God; you also trust in me"; (2) "Trust in God! Trust in me!" (3) "You trust in God; trust in me also"; and (4) "Trust in God, as you trust in me." Of these four, the first may be rejected because it is nothing more than a statement, and an exhortation of some kind is demanded by the context. The last may also be rejected because it suggests a backward relationship. The disciples were obviously not to begin with their faith in Jesus and then work up to faith in God, for it is a need for faith in Christ that is indicated. So possibilities two and three are left: "You trust in God; trust also in me" and 'Trust in God; trust in me!"

To be sure, there is not a great deal of difference in these two translations, and both make good theology. Still, in spite of the great weight of many recent versions, it seems to the writer that the translation of the older, Authorized Version is preferable. Why should the disciples be urged to believe in God in this situation? True, it is always good to be urged to believe in God, but in this situation the problem is that Jesus was about to be taken from the disciples and that they were troubled by thoughts of this parting. They did not really doubt that God would take care of them in some far off, general sense. But they did not understand how Jesus could go, how he could apparently be abandoning them. So what does Christ say? In these circumstances it is as though he turns to the disciples and says, "Look, I know that you trust God; trust me also, precisely in these circumstances. Believe that I know what I am doing, that I am going away for a purpose, that the purpose will be accomplished, and that I will again return to you so that we can be together." This he said in the face of his own execution.

Here was the first reason why the disciples were not to be troubled. They knew Jesus, and they had every reason to trust him.

So do we. In fact, we have even more cause than those first disciples, for they stood on the far side of the resurrection and did not know, as we do, that the cross of Christ was our salvation or that the resurrection was to follow it. Did Jesus know what he was doing? Of course he did! Could he be trusted? Certainly! Then let us also trust him. Whatever the circumstances, whatever the hardship, let us believe that he has a purpose in those circumstances and is most certainly working them out for our own spiritual good.

A Home in Heaven

The second reason Jesus gives why we should not be troubled is that there is a place prepared for us in heaven. "In my Father's house are many rooms," he said; "if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you" (v. 2).

For many people, talk of a home in heaven smacks of escapism, as if in the face of trials the Christian is to turn his back upon life and live only for glory. It is the "pie-in-the-sky" philosophy. This has been true in some cases. Some have indeed turned from life when they should have been living it victoriously. Some have been escapists. But there are also circumstances where those who are not escapists have nevertheless gained great comfort and strength from these promises.

I think of one example. Not long ago I visited a member of my congregation who had been confined to a home for incurables because of crippling arthritis. She was always in constant pain and had wasted away in this home for many years. At this time this poor woman, who never complained and who never talked about herself or her condition unless someone asked about it, was near death. As we talked, I asked her, "Ida, do you still love Jesus?"

Her eyes glowed through her suffering as she replied, "Yes; oh yes! And I do long to be with him. I am so anxious for him to take me home." The death of a Christian is not like the death of an unbeliever, for the Christian knows where he or she is going. He is sure of his heavenly home.

Moreover, the life of a Christian is not (in most cases) like the life of an unbeliever. For, knowing his destiny, knowing that he will again see Jesus in that heavenly home, the faithful Christian follows him now and lives for him. Paul indicated this when he wrote: "Join with others in following my example, brothers, and take note of those who live according to the pattern we gave you.... But our citizenship is in heaven. And we eagerly await a Savior from there, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3:17, 20). John also speaks of this when he writes, "Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (1 John 3:2-3). To know our destiny is a great incentive, not only for the enjoyment of peace in the midst of turmoil but for godly living as well.

Our Personal Dwelling

The third reason Jesus gave the disciples why they should not be troubled is that he was going to prepare a place for them. On the surface this seems to be much the same point as before; that is, that there is a heavenly home and that there are many abiding places in it. But it is not really a repetition. It is something more. There is a place called heaven. Jesus was going there. But in addition to this he tells them that there is work that he is going to do for them once he gets there.

What did Jesus refer to when he said that he was going to prepare a place for his disciples? I am not sure that there is a full answer to that question, because I do not know of any passage of the Bible that bears directly upon it. As I think about it, I wonder if the fact that we ask that question does not hide the verse's true meaning. We read the verse "I am going there to prepare a place for you" and focus on the word "prepare."

What if we were to focus on the words "for you" instead? In that case, the emphasis would not be upon whatever architectural alterations the Lord may be making in heaven, but rather upon the fact that it is for us as individuals that he is altering it. In other words, it would be the promise that in that great home of the Father's there is a place being prepared particularly for us.

Have you ever decorated a room for someone special? If you have, you know what it is to make a room suit one particular personality. If it is a daughter, you make the room pretty. You hang up her pictures. You make a place for her hobbies. If it is a son, the room might have airplanes or model cars. If it is for Grandma, the room might have her favorite books; and it might be far from the playroom or the children's bedrooms. We take care in such preparation. Are we to think that Jesus will take less care for those whom he loves, who are to spend eternity with him?

With Jesus

The fourth and fifth points may be taken together. They are: first, that Jesus is returning again for those whom he has left behind and, second, that from that point on they will be with him forever. He said, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am" (v. 3).

There have been those who have identified this coming of the Lord Jesus with the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost spoken of later. But this is not right. In the case of the Spirit, Jesus comes to the believer and the believer receives him. In this verse, Jesus receives the believer so that the believer may be with him in heaven. Clearly, this is what Paul describes so vividly when he says, "For the Lord himself will come down from heaven, with a loud command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet call of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first. After that, we who are still alive and are left will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. And so we will be with the Lord forever" (1 Thess. 4:16-17).

There is comfort in that. Indeed, there must be; for Paul immediately follows this with the admonition; "Therefore encourage each other with these words" (v. 18).

We Can Do Something

At this point we return to the question asked at the beginning of this study: "What is a Christian to do when the world he knows falls in? What is he to do in the day of great trouble?" The answer once again is that he is to take himself in hand and by a deliberate exercise of mind, in which he brings such great truths as these to remembrance, increase his faith in God. He is to remind himself of and then meditate upon God's great strength and promises.

There are those for whom this does not sound spiritual at all and who, therefore, prefer to grope around in the dark, waiting for some great shaft of light to break through. But this was not Christ's teaching. He did not say, "Mull over your problems." He did not even say, "Tell me about them," though, of course, we are free to do that. He said, "Do not be troubled; do not let your present troubled state continue." So if Jesus says, "Do not let your heart be troubled," then our hearts need not be troubled. We can be victorious if we will remind ourselves of what we know of him and trust him.

Chapter 175.
A Place for You

John 14:2-3

"In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am."

One reason why those who believe in Jesus Christ should not be troubled by adverse circumstances is that they have a home in heaven. However, as soon as we begin to talk about heaven we create a problem, for in the thinking of most people heaven is not an interesting subject. This was not always so. There was a time in the history of the western world when thoughts about the life to come were popular. But ours is a secular and scientific age. Thus, in today's world, thoughts about heaven seem to be either a form of escapism or mere speculation.

Thoughts of Heaven

We suffer from this purely secular outlook, as will be shown. But as we begin to study about heaven, let us take note that heaven should be far more interesting to us than we naturally imagine. For one thing, we should recognize that heaven is likely to become increasingly interesting to us as we grow older. D. L. Moody tells of a man who testified that in his youth he thought of heaven largely as a great shining city, filled with vast walls, domes and towers, and populated by millions of angels, all of whom were strangers to him. But then his little brother died. After that he thought of heaven as a great shining city, filled with vast walls and towers and unknown angels, but now also with one little fellow he knew. When a second brother died there were two he knew. Acquaintances died. In time one of his children went to be with Jesus; this one was followed by another and then still another. By this time the man seldom thought of walls and towers. He thought of those residents of the Celestial City whom he knew, and his interest in heaven intensified. Toward the end of his life so many of his acquaintances had gone to heaven that it sometimes seemed to him that he knew more persons in heaven than he did on earth. And, of course, his thoughts fixed increasingly on that distant place.

Moreover, it is not only as we grow older that we should find heaven interesting. To be sure, when we are younger the emotional ties that bind an older person to those who have gone ahead are lacking. But we are going there some day, if we are Christians. Should we not be interested in the place where we will spend eternity?

I remember the great interest my wife and I had when, in the early days of our married life together, we determined to go to Europe where I was to pursue my graduate studies. Our destination was Basel, Switzerland, about which we knew virtually nothing. Were we disinterested? Not at all! I remember how we poured over maps and books containing geographical and other information, for we wanted to know what Basel was like. How big was Basel? What was the climate? Was it an old city or a new one? What was its history? What belongings should we take with us? Most people will recognize our interest in Basel to have been a proper one. How much greater should a Christian's interest be in that place to which Jesus has gone, which he is preparing for us.

Should we not have a great interest in these verses in which the Lord himself talks about heaven? Do we not want to ponder the words: "In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am" (vv. 23)? I think we do. Therefore, although we have studied these verses once, we are going to deal with them again in this and the following study.

A Real Place

As we look closely at these words, the first thing we notice is that, according to Jesus, heaven is a genuine place. When we say this, we do not mean that we are therefore able to visualize it adequately, even with the help of biblical symbols. For example, we read in the Bible of a city whose streets are paved with gold. But we are not necessarily to think that these streets are like our streets or that the gold is what we identify as the seventy-ninth element on the atomic charts. Streets speak of permanence, gold of something precious and valuable that does not rust or deteriorate. In the same way, we do not think that there are necessarily literal crowns in heaven, although there may be. There may not be harps as we conceive of them. These things are symbols; so, while they point to reality, nevertheless they may not themselves be reality.

Yet none of this is to be taken as meaning that heaven is therefore anything less than a real place, as real, perhaps even as localized, as New York or San Francisco. On the occasion of his address in the upper room Jesus did not describe heaven, but he did call it a place to which he was going, from which he would return, and to which he would one day take all whom the Father had given him.

The word "heaven" is used in three different ways in the Bible. It is used of what we would call the atmosphere, the heaven of birds and clouds. It is used of those great spaces in which the planets and stars are found. This is sometimes also called "the firmament." Finally, it is used of the heaven of heavens, which is the home of God. It is this—a place just like the other places— about which these verses are speaking.

All this presents difficulties for some persons, and for two reasons. First, there are those who observe that God is described as being pure spirit—that is, as having no bodily form—and who therefore conclude that heaven is the abode or state of pure spirits. But the idea that heaven is merely a state and therefore everywhere and nowhere is not according to Scripture. True, God is a spirit; he does not have a concrete, visible form. But Jesus does. He has become man for all eternity. The angels also have bodies. So do we, not only in this life but also in the life to come. If this were not so, the teaching about the resurrection of the body would be meaningless. These bodies must be somewhere. As I read the accounts of Christ's postresurrection appearances, I recognize that the heavenly body of Christ (after which our heavenly bodies are patterned) possesses qualities that we do not yet have. His body could move through closed doors, for instance. It could vanish and then reappear. Still, it is a true body and must be localized. Heaven is the place where our bodies shall be, though we will presumably be able, like Jesus, to move freely.

The second reason why some people have difficulty thinking of heaven as a genuine place is linked to scientific considerations. These people are aware of the vast distances of our universe as well as the fact that no one using any of the gigantic telescopes of our time has ever seen anything like heaven. They say, "If Jesus had ascended into heaven beginning in A.D. 30 and if he had accelerated until at last he was traveling at the speed of light, he would not yet have reached the farthest star, let alone heaven, wherever that may be located. How then are we to imagine that heaven is a real place, that Jesus went there, and that he is coming again to take us to be with him?"

This is an important problem. For if there is no material, spatial heaven, then the Lord Jesus Christ did not ascend into it in his body. And if this is so, then we must abandon the idea of a bodily resurrection of the Savior and all that goes with it, which is most of Christianity. Indeed, we will find ourselves in the position described by Paul when he declared that "if Christ has not been raised, your faith is futile; you are still in your sins" (1 Cor. 15:17). But why, on the other hand, must we thus limit the Creator? On one occasion, when Donald Grey Barnhouse was asked a question about ascending at the speed of light, he replied, "Why do you wish to slow the Creator to the speed of light? He who created the universe is able to move with the speed of thought, and it is possible to think from here to the remotest point of the universe as quickly as it is to think down to the corner drugstore." We readily admit that we do not understand how this operates; we cannot think clearly beyond known physical laws. But God is not bound by the laws he has created. Consequently, all things—literally, all things—are possible to him.

Our Heavenly Home

There is a second thought in the phrase we have been considering, "a place for you." For it tells us that heaven is not only a place; it is a home. This is the import of the last two words, "for you."

As I have thought about this phrase I have been helped by the Swiss doctor Paul Tournier, who has taken the words as the title of one of his books on counseling. In that book, A Place for You, he deals with the idea of a place and of the need we all have for it. For instance, at the beginning of the book he tells of a young man whom he had once counseled. The young man had been born into an unhappy home, had developed a sense of failure—first failing to reconcile his parents and then in an inability to settle down into any one area of life—and at last had come to see Tournier. Together they explored the young man's problems. On one occasion, as he was trying to look at himself objectively and put what he saw into words, the student looked up at his counselor and said, "Basically, I'm always looking for a place—for somewhere to be."

This, says Tournier as the book unfolds, is a basic desire of the human heart. It is the desire to have a genuine place of our own, a home, a place where we belong and know ourselves to belong. The problem, says the counselor, is that many people apparently never find this place and so spend much of life wandering.

Tournier is not insensitive to the need that we have to find a home spiritually. Here we think of Adam and Eve and of their expulsion from their garden home in Eden because of their sin. We think of Cain, who, because he killed his brother, was condemned to a life of wandering. He had no home. In Genesis 11 we find men trying to create a city in which homes will be established. But the men of Babel are in opposition to God, and so God scatters them. Again they are made homeless. Here, then, is a great motif of Genesis. Sin brings alienation, and one aspect of alienation is that men lose their home.

With the coming of Abraham we find a new and heartening element. To be sure, God's first dealings with Abraham are to take him from his home, for it is a sinful place filled with idols and idol worshipers. But in return for the place he has lost God promises him a new home—"a land I will show you" (Gen. 12:1). What is more, God gives the boundaries and indicates the specific territory involved. It is "from the river of Egypt to the great river, the Euphrates—the land of the Kenites, Kenizzites, Kadmonites, Hittites, Perizzites, Rephaites, Amorites, Canaanites, Girgashites and Jebusites" (Gen. 15:18-21). The names are concrete. These are real names. They occur in real history. Thus they show God's awareness of the fact that the men and women he has created need a real place to be.

When we turn to the New Testament, we find Abraham praised, not because he fixed his hope on an earthly home (important as that is), but because he looked for a heavenly home. The Bible says, "For he was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10). This means that although earthly homes are necessary and valuable, they are nevertheless and at best not permanent and that, consequently, the basic need for a home (going back to Eden) is fully met only when the Lord Jesus Christ himself prepares a home for us in heaven. Now we are in a strange land, even in an enemy's country. But in that day we shall be in the Father's house and shall be home. This is our destiny.

Can anyone still feel that thoughts about heaven are otherworldly and therefore improper for Christians? Does anyone think that thoughts like these are escapism? This reality is anything but escapism.

Here again let me illustrate from Tournier's psychology. Take a child. Who is the child who spends a lifetime wandering about, always unable to find a place where he can belong and can make a sure contribution? Is it the child who has a home or the child who does not? Obviously, it is the child who does not have a home. Writes Tournier, "When the family is such that the child cannot fit himself into it properly, he looks everywhere for some other place, leading a wandering existence, incapable of settling down anywhere. His tragedy is that he carries about within himself this fundamental incapacity for any real attachment." On the other hand, "The child who has been able to grow up harmoniously in a healthy home finds a welcome everywhere. In infancy all he needs is a stick placed across two chairs to make himself a house, in which he feels quite at home. Later on, wherever he goes, he will be able to make any place his own, without any effort on his part. For him it will not be a matter of seeking, but of choosing."

It is the same spiritually. Who are those who seek to escape from this world? It is not those who are certain of a home in heaven. The ones who try to escape from this world are those who have no sure, spiritual mooring and who are therefore still searching. They may study theology and even write books about it, but they are lost. They have no sure foundation, and their views and interests shift constantly. Those who do not try to escape are those who have their home. They may not be in it as yet. They may not even understand what it is like precisely, for they look through a glass darkly. Still, it is a home for them; and, therefore, because they have this home, they are at home anywhere. They can form friendships. They marry for life. They can commit themselves to a Christian work or even a secular work and labor for years without being restless and unfulfilled.

The world needs such satisfied men and women. It needs people who can be at home here—in spite of the world's evil—precisely because they have a home in heaven.

Do You Have a Home?

The final point is in the form of a question. Do you have a home? Are you one for whom Jesus has gone to prepare a place in heaven?

At the beginning of this chapter you read a story that was often related by that great evangelist D. L. Moody. Here is another. There was a man who had great wealth. He was dying. When the doctor told him he could not live, the lawyer was sent for to make out his will. The dying man had a little girl who was about four years old. She did not understand what death meant. But when her mother told her that her father was going away, the little child went to the bedside and looked into her father's eyes and asked, "Papa, have you got a home in that land you are going to?" The question sunk deep into the man's soul, for he had spent his time and energy accumulating great wealth. In this life he enjoyed a grand home, but now he had to leave it.

I would ask that of you. It is certain that you are going away, for it is appointed unto man once to die. Have you a home where you are going? Has the Lord Jesus Christ, your Savior, gone to prepare it for you?

If you want to be able to say yes to that question, all that is necessary is for Jesus to become your Savior, for he says that he has gone to prepare a place for all who trust him. Apart from his work no one can enter heaven. Heaven is a place of holiness, and none but holy ones can dwell there. On the other hand, for all who trust his work, who believe that he is indeed the Savior from sin, that he died for them particularly, and who receive him as that Savior and promise to follow him as his faithful disciples until their life's end—for these heaven is that certain and blessed home that we have even now but that, nevertheless, still awaits us at our journey's end. If you have never believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, do so now. Receive him as your Savior, and know the joy of possessing a place prepared for you by his own skilled hands.

Chapter 176.
Heaven

John 14:3-4

Many human beings are anxious about whether or not they will recognize their friends in heaven. They are Christian people. Often they have no doubt that they will be in heaven; for, as they point out, "to be away from the body [is to be] at home with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8). Still they are confused about what is to happen in the life to come and wonder whether or not they will recognize those who have gone on before them. "Do you think I will know my Bill?" "Will I recognize Sally?" These are the questions they ask me, and I think that I understand them. For obviously, if we will not recognize our friends and family, then heaven inevitably loses much of its attractiveness for us. And—let us put it frankly—it is hard to see how we can really be happy there, regardless of how dazzling the streets or how beautiful the music of the angels.

On the other hand, there is also a sense in which I do not understand these questions. The reason I do not understand them is simply that the Word of God is so explicit about our mutual recognition. We will know each other. Bill will know Sally. Sally will know Bill. We will know parents and children, friends, and those who have died in the Lord before us. This truth is suggested in our text. Therefore, I want to look at it again before we move on to other subjects.

We Will See Jesus

The place to begin in this discussion, however, is not with our recognition of each other and enjoyment of each other but with the fact that we will see Jesus and enjoy him. We begin here as a simple matter of priority, for we will want to see him even more than a departed husband, wife, parent, child, or grandparent. But we begin here for another reason also. We begin here because, if we begin with Jesus, then our reunion in heaven becomes (as it will be) a truly spiritual and godly reunion. If we forget this priority, then in our minds our reunion with loved ones becomes something only a little removed from a family get-together with all the failures of such a human affair.

This is what will make heaven a real home to us. True, having our loved ones there will be a part of it. But the thing that will make heaven a true home is being with Jesus. On this point D. L. Moody used to tell of a child whose mother became very sick. While the mother was sick one of the neighbors took the child away to stay with her until the mother should get well again. But instead of getting well, the mother grew worse and died. The neighbors thought that they would not take the child home until after the funeral was over, and that they would not tell her about her mother being dead. So after a while they simply brought the little girl home. At once she went to find her mother. First she went into the sitting room to find her mother; then she went into the parlor to find her mother. She went from one end of the house to the other, but she could not find her. At last she asked, "Where is my mama?" When they told her that her mama was gone, the child wanted to go back to the neighbor's house again. Home had lost its attraction for her since her mother was not there any longer. Moody writes, "It is not the jasper walls and the pearly gates that are going to make heaven attractive. It is being with God."

To know that we are going to heaven is a wonderful thing. But more wonderful still is the fact that we shall see Jesus and shall be able to express to him that praise and love he deserves for having left heaven to come to earth and here die for us sinners. Of this truth Fanny Crosby once wrote:

Some day the silver cord will break, And I no more as now shall sing;
But O, the joy when I shall wake
Within the palace of the King!
And I shall see him face-to-face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace;
And I shall see him face-to-face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace;
Some day my earthly house will fall— I cannot tell how soon
'twill be;
But this I know—my
All in All Has now
a place in heav'n for me.

This expectation of the redeemed child of God is a glorious theme, the reality of which makes heaven a true home for us. Indeed, heaven becomes a proper home only when we have the first priority.

A Reunion

But the point at which we began is not whether or not we will see and recognize Jesus but whether or not we will see and recognize each other. Will we recognize each other? Of course, we will. What is more, there are many indications in Scripture that this will be so.

One very encouraging indication comes from the Old Testament in a phrase often used in connection with the death of the patriarchs. It is the phrase "and he was gathered to his people." It occurs in texts like these:

"Then Abraham breathed his last and died at a good old age, an old man and full of years; and he was gathered to his people" (Gen. 25:8); "Altogether Ishmael lived a hundred and thirty-seven years. He breathed his last and died, and he was gathered to his people" (Gen. 25:17); "Then he [Isaac] breathed his last and died and was gathered to his people, old and full of years. And his sons Esau and Jacob buried him" (Gen. 35:29); "When Jacob had finished giving instructions to his sons, he drew his feet up into the bed, breathed his last and was gathered to his people" (Gen. 49:33); "Aaron will be gathered to his people. He will not enter the land I give the Israelites" (Num. 20:24); and "Then the LORD said to Moses, 'Go up this mountain in the Abarim range and see the land I have given the Israelites. After you have seen it, you too will be gathered to your people, as your brother Aaron was" (Num. 27:12-13).

Many Old Testament scholars regard the phrase "and he was gathered to his people" as being nothing more than a conventional way of saying that he died. It is to be explained, so they say, by the thought that the individual was being placed in the same graveyard as those who had died before him. But this is hardly satisfactory in the case of the Bible stories involved. When Abraham died he was buried in a cave at Machpelah in the land that was to become Israel, but it was not the burial place of his ancestors. They had been buried back in Ur of the Chaldees, and his father had been buried at Haran. Moreover, in reading the account of his death, it is hard to overlook the fact that Abraham is said to have been gathered to his ancestors in verse 8 of Genesis 25, but to have been buried only in verse 9. Consequently, the phrase "gathered to his people" cannot refer to the burial but must refer to the death itself as a result of which Abraham joined those who had gone before him.

The same thing is true of Moses, who died by himself in the mountain. The Book of Deuteronomy even tells us that "no one knows where his grave is" (Deut. 34:6).

The comment of David upon being told of the death of Bathsheba's child is also important, for it shows that David believed in a personal reunion with departed loved ones in the life to come. God struck the child so that it became sick and died. While it lay languishing David, who understood that he was to blame, prayed for the child and fasted, lying all night upon the earth. So great was his grief and concern that when the child died, those who were close to David were afraid to tell him lest his grief should know no bounds. David detected the change in their attitude, however. He asked, "Is the child dead?" When they told him that the child had died, David surprised them by rising from his place of mourning, washing himself, dressing, and resuming his duties as leader of the nation.

The servants asked about his change of attitude, since they could not understand it. David explained, "While the child was still alive, I fasted and wept. I thought, 'Who knows? The LORD may be gracious to me and let the child live.' But now that he is dead, why should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I will go to him, but he will not return to me" (2 Sam. 12:22-23). This last comment does not mean merely that David would eventually die himself. For the point of the story is that David comforted himself (and Bathsheba) after the child's death, and there would be no comfort unless David believed that, although he could not bring the child back, nevertheless, one day he would see the child again in heaven.

If we turn to the New Testament, we find an additional indication of these same truths in the events that took place on the Mount of Transfiguration. On this occasion the Lord Jesus Christ took three of his disciples, Peter, James, and John, with him into the mountain and was transformed into a form showing his celestial glory. Moreover, Moses and Elijah, two other glorified saints, appeared beside him. Luke calls them "men"; that is, not disembodied spirits, and he reports that Peter and presumably also the others recognized them. Peter said, "Master, it is good for us to be here. Let us put up three shelters—one for you, one for Moses and one for Elijah" (Luke 9:33). Here both Moses and Elijah had retained their identities and were recognized by the three disciples.

Christ's story about the rich man and Lazarus makes a similar point, for the Lord told how the rich man went to hell and, being in torment, lifted up his eyes and saw "Abraham far away, with Lazarus by his side"

(Luke 16:23). Here is a case that involves recognition of the departed, not only as they appear in this life, but as they appear to each other in the life to come.

Finally, there is a fine text from the lips of Jesus in which he speaks of many Gentiles joining with believing Jews in a great reunion in heaven. We read, "I say to you that many will come from the east and the west, and will take their places at the feast with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 8:11). This is a great promise, but it is not possible unless there is to be a full recognition of all who have died. Clearly the patriarchs are to know each other at this holy reunion, and so will all those who have died in Christ and who will be gathered to the reunion from the far corners of the earth. In that day we may well be surprised to see many in heaven whom we do not expect to be there. And we will be just as surprised not to find many there whom we thought would be present.

Many of us have lost believing loved ones. Or, if we have not lost them and yet live long enough, we will lose them. But we have not lost them ultimately, for they are with Jesus, and we will yet be reunited with them.

All We Are Meant to Be

It has been pointed out, first, that we shall see Jesus and, second, that we shall see and recognize each other. The third point is that we shall see each other, not as we are now or have been but as we are meant to be. This truth is conveyed in the text mentioned earlier, which says that we shall see Christ face to face. It says, "Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2).

Until recently, every time I read that verse I focused on the word "we" and read it as if it said "I." I read that "I will be like him" and took comfort in that. But now I am impressed with something else that is also true. It is not only that I shall be made like Jesus. It is that we all shall be like him. As a result, the sin, ignorance, anger, hate, weariness, and perversity that so often mar our relationships now will be eliminated. In that day we will have a fresh view of each other, for we will see each other, not as we have come to know each other here below, in our sin, but rather as we were meant to be.

Moreover, we will see each other rewarded for faithful service in this life, for the Bible speaks of crowns that will be given to those who are faithful. The Lord himself has said, "Behold, I am coming soon! My reward is with me, and I will give to everyone according to what he has done" (Rev. 22:12). I am sure that there is a wrong way of thinking of rewards. If we are serving only for what we can get out of the arrangement, we are no more than hirelings. Again, if we are working for rewards in this life—for money or the praise others may (or may not) give us—we are not fit to be Christ's servants. On the other hand, there is a right way to think about rewards, for the prospect of rewards is set before us as one reason why the patriarchs and other biblical characters were faithful. They had much to discourage them. Often there were severe trials, hardships, beatings, pain, and ridicule. But they endured because they were "looking ahead to [their] reward" (Heb. 11:26).

One of our great hymns, written by Heinrich Schenk early in the eighteenth century and translated into English by Francis Cox, speaks of these rewards:

> Who are these like stars appearing, These before God's throne who stand?

Each a golden crown is wearing; Who are all this glorious band?
Alleluia! Hark, they sing,
Praising loud their heavenly King.
Who are these of dazzling brightness, These in God's own truth arrayed, Clad in robes of purest whiteness,
Robes whose lustre ne'er shall fade, Ne'er be touched by time's rude hand?
Whence come all this glorious band?
These are they who have contended For their Savior's honor long,
Wrestling on till life was ended,
Following not the sinful throng;
These, who well the fight sustained, Triumph through the Lamb have gained.

In the day of our heavenly reunion we shall have those rewards, if we are faithful. And we shall rejoice in the triumphs of other Christians. Do you not think, since this will be true, that you could rejoice with them now? We tend to be critical of one another; and, of course, sometimes there are grounds for it. We do sin; we are unfaithful. But by God's grace we are also, at times, faithful, for which we shall be rewarded. If only we could see this, we would regard one another differently. We would rejoice in the triumphs, rather than bemoan the faults. We would pray for one another fervently.

So let us pray and work. Let us do so until the day when the entire ransomed church of God is raised to be with Jesus and is made like him.

Chapter 177.
"I Am the Way and the Truth and the Life"

John 14:5-6

There are many offensive things about Christianity, at least for some people, but the chief offense of Christianity is its founder and his extraordinary claims. It is true that the claims of Jesus of Nazareth often are not spoken of or taken at face value; when that happens it is possible to present Jesus as the lovely, indulgent rabbi who was everyone's friend. But sooner or later his claims about himself become known, and the offense emerges.

Not long ago I was talking with a Hebrew Christian whose work is in Jewish evangelism. He talked about the various approaches being made to Jewish people today, some of which go to great lengths to avoid the offense I have been talking about. He pointed out that in some HebrewChristian organizations the word 'Jesus" is not used. Instead, members of the group speak of Yeshua or ha Mashiach ("the Messiah"). Moreover, he explained that he had done this recently himself, to a great degree. But then he added, "I have found out that in the end this does not always accomplish a great deal. For whether you speak of Yeshua or ha Mashiach or the Messiah, eventually, if you are giving a true Christian witness, it is still Jesus you are talking about, and the offense remains."

I found my friend's words interesting, for they expressed in one area what I had already found to be true in others. Eliminate the true Jesus of Nazareth with his exclusive claims, substitute another Jesus, and Christianity will be popular. But preach the true Jesus, and some will inevitably be offended.

A Threefold Solution

Our expository study of John's Gospel has brought us to what is probably the most exclusive (and offensive) of all Christ's sayings. Indeed, it is probably the most exclusive statement ever made by anyone.

This is not to say that Jesus' other sayings, if properly understood, are not also exclusive; for in all his teaching he spoke with a sense of supreme authority and not as the other teachers before him (Matt. 7:29). Still, this saying is one of a number of exclusive claims given special prominence in John's Gospel, and even within this unique body of material it is exceptional. The sayings I am referring to are the "I am" statements of the Gospel, five of which have already been studied in our verse-by-verse exposition. The first was John 6:35—"I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never be hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty." This is a claim to be able to fulfill the deepest spiritual hungers of our race. The next four "I am" sayings were: "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5); "I am the gate" (10:7, 9); "I am the good shepherd" (10:11, 14); "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25). Each of these is a categorical and exclusive saying, as is the one yet to come—"I am the true vine" (15:1, 5). But none is as comprehensive and therefore also as objectionable as the one to which we come now.

In this verse Jesus says categorically, "I am the way and the truth and the life." Then he adds, lest anyone should misunderstand him, "No one comes to the Father except through me" (14:6).

At the same time, we must acknowledge that if these words are true, as Christians believe they are, then, although they are indeed exclusive, they ought not to be offensive, for they are actually what we most need as human beings. They should be received with joy and thanksgiving. Before sin entered the world, Adam and Eve, the first people, enjoyed a threefold privilege in their relation to God. First, they were in communion with God. Second, they knew God and the truth that flowed from him. Third, they possessed spiritual life. However, when they disobeyed God and fell into sin, they lost this privilege. Instead of enjoying communion with God, they experienced alienation from him. Instead of knowing the truth, they fell into falsehood and error. Instead of possessing life, they began to know death. For God had promised, "When you eat of it [that is, of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil] you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17).

This is our human condition. We are alienated from God, ignorant of the truth, and condemned to spiritual and eventually physical death. The glory of Christ's claim is in its being a divine answer to our problem on each of these three levels. Instead of alienation, there is "the way" to God. Instead of ignorance and error, there is "the truth." Instead of death, there is "the life." So this text is actually the gospel, the good news of God.

All in Jesus

And it is all in Jesus; for the point of the verse—indeed, we can hardly miss it—is that Jesus is the answer on each of these three levels. This point is also reinforced by the context. As he spoke these words, Jesus was about to be crucified, and his disciples were aware, at least in part, that his soul was troubled about it. They realized that the approximately three-year relationship between them and him was coming to an end.

In their confusion the disciples began to ask questions, four of which occur in the immediate context of Jesus' claim to be the way, the truth, and the life. Peter asked the first one. Jesus had said that he was going away from the disciples; so Peter asked, "Lord, where are you going?" (13:36). A few moments later Thomas asked the question in a slightly different way. "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?" (14:5). Philip asked, "Lord, show us the Father" (14:8), that is "Won't you give us a theophany?" Finally, the Judas who is usually called Jude demanded, "Lord, why do you intend to show yourself to us and not to the world?" (14:22). These four questions from four different men all arise out of the same situation and betray the same interests. Moreover, in each case Jesus answers them in virtually the same way. In one sense, he seems not to answer them directly at all. Yet, in another sense, he answers them on a most profound level; in each case he directs the thoughts of the disciples toward himself.

Jesus tells Peter that, although he cannot understand where Jesus is going now, one day he will follow him there. He answers Thomas's question about the way by saying, "I am the way." He tells Philip, "He who has seen me has seen the Father." To Jude's question about how Jesus will show himself to his own disciples, he replies by teaching about the future indwelling of his Spirit within every believer. In each case, Jesus is the answer to the problems involved. Is it alienation from God? He is the way. Is it a need for illumination? He is the truth. Is it death? He is the life.

The Way: Reconciliation

Each of these is important, of course; so each must be taken in its turn. The first to be considered is "the way." A way supposes two points, for it is the path from one point to another. In this case it is the way from man's total ruin in sin to the Father.

What do we mean by man's total ruin in sin, from which we need to be led by Christ to the Father? First, we mean the guilt of sin. The problem we deal with is how such sin can be put away. We are sinners in God's sight. God declares it, and our consciences concur with God's judgment. But what shall be done? Reformation will not do; for payment of a future debt can never discharge a past debt, and it is our past especially that haunts us. Some hope simply for God's mercy. But an act of mercy that does not also satisfy the claims of justice is unworthy of the great God of the universe. Besides this, God's mercy is already freely offered in Christ.

What shall be done? How shall sin be removed? The only way is that which God has already revealed in Jesus. God has sent his own Son, made a man, to enter into a covenant union with his people so that he becomes one with them and eligible to bear their sin upon himself. He undertakes to be their substitute, dying in their place, bearing in his own body God's just wrath against sin, and then by his death removing the guilt and punishment of that sin forever. As a result of Christ's death in place of his people, sin has been blotted out as by a thick cloud (Isa. 43:25; 44:22), removed "as far as the east is from the west" (Ps.

103:12), placed behind God's back (Isa. 38:17), cast "into the depths of the sea" (Micah 7:19). Our sins are forgiven (Col. 2:13) and forgotten (Heb. 10:17). They are gone.

Would you escape from your sin and the guilt that goes with it? Jesus is the way. He is the perfect and only way.

Besides this, Jesus is also the way from the power of sin to the Father. This too is our concern; for we do not wish only to be justified, we wish to live a life pleasing to the Father. How is this done? It is done through Jesus and the knowledge of our position in him. Charles Haddon Spurgeon once spoke of this in these words: "Whenever I feel that I have sinned, and desire to overcome that sin for the future, the devil at the same time comes to me and whispers, 'How can you be a pardoned person and accepted with God while you sin in this way?' If I listen to this I drop into despondency, and if I continued in that state I should fall into despair, and should commit sin more frequently than before; but God's grace comes in and says to my soul, 'Thou hast sinned; but did not Jesus come to save sinners? Thou art not saved because thou art righteous; for Christ died for the ungodly.' And my faith says, 'Though I have sinned, I have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and though I am guilty, yet by grace I am saved and I am a child of God still.' And what then? Why, then the tears begin to flow, and I say, 'How could I ever sin against my God who is so good to me? Now I will overcome that sin,' and I get strong to fight with sin through the conviction that I am God's child."

Doubts and fears drive the Christian farther into sin, for they obscure God. Faith in God leads to holiness; for this causes us to stand against sin and go on knowing that the way is forever open for us into God's presence.

The Truth: Illumination

The second of Christ's claims is to be "the truth," especially the truth about the Father, which includes all other truth. He did not say, "I have come to tell you the truth about the Father." Nor did he say, "I have come to point to the truth about the Father." He said, "I am the truth." "I and the Father are one," said Jesus (John 10:30). "He who has seen me has seen the Father" (John 14:9).

What do we see in Jesus about God the Father? What do we learn about reality? First, that God is personal. He is a person. He is not an impersonal force in the universe, a force that has merely set the world in motion or governs it impartially through the abstract laws of matter and motion. The existence of a god like that might explain some scientific phenomena, but it would not explain self-conscious life, such as that possessed by animals or man. God is not impersonal. God is one who, with the full traits of personality, desires to communicate with persons and wants them to know him. Through Jesus, we know that he wants that.

In him we also see that God is holy. We cannot learn that God is holy from looking in any other direction. In the world we see both good and evil, order and disorder, and often the two are mingled. In the heavens we see impartiality at best, if not rather cold indifference or hostility. If we were to judge from what we see in the world or in the heavens, we could only conclude that God is amoral or that he does not care about evil. But Jesus is holy. He is without sin. He has declared that God is like himself in his holiness.

Jesus also reveals that God is a God of mercy. He is a God of love. So we are told, and indeed we see it demonstrated, that God is not deaf to the cries of mankind. Even while requiring justice, God came to people, willing to die for them, in their place, and thus provide peace, joy, goodness, self-control, and all other blessings of the Christian life. A personal, holy, loving God—that is what Jesus has to tell you about him.

The Life: Regeneration

The third part of Christ's claim is to be "the life"—for all who believe on him, the emancipator from death. On this point, Arthur W. Pink writes: "The whole Bible bears solemn witness to the fact that the natural man is spiritually lifeless. He walks according to the course of this world; he has no love for the things of God. The fear of God is not upon him, nor has he any concern for His glory. Self is the center and circumference of his existence. He is alive to the things of the world, but is dead to heavenly things. The one who is out of Christ exists, but he has no spiritual life. When the prodigal son returned from the far country the father said, 'This, my son, was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found' (Luke 15:24)." Christ can make such persons alive. Indeed, he promises to give life to all who will come to him.

This makes for great encouragement in the living of the Christian life, for if the life Christ gives is God's life, then that life is eternal life. And the Christian can no more perish than can God the Father. This is what is taught in John 3:16, that verse that so many know. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life."

Does it really mean everlasting life? Yes, it does. And in case we are still inclined to doubt it, Jesus adds just a few chapters later, "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (John 10:27-28).

Will You Come?

Christ came that you might have life. Will you come to him right where you are? You can come. You can come now. Jesus does not require you to do anything. What could you do, even if you wished to do something? Would you seek to find the way to God and then walk in it? How can you? He is the Way, and he has come to you rather than making you come to him. Would you study to find out the truth before you believe in God? How can you do that? He is the truth; Scripture presents him fully to your eyes. Would you attempt to awaken yourself out of your spiritual lethargy by self-effort? How can you do even that? He is the life you need; he offers himself to you freely.

There is nothing to do, except to receive him by faith. There is nothing to achieve, no improvements to be made, no lessons to learn. Just believe on Jesus. Accept him for what he claims to be—the way to God, the truth about God, the life of God. Jesus did not say, "I am one of an indefinite number of equally valid ways to God, an aspect of truth, or a phase of life." He said, "I am the way and the truth and the life; no one comes to the Father except through me."

Chapter 178.
The Only Way Home

John 14:6

The exclusive claim of the Lord Jesus Christ to be "the way and the truth and the life" is wrapped up in three phrases. He claims to be the way to God, indeed, the only way; he claims to be the truth about God, himself the truth; and he claims to be spiritual life, not merely the way to life. We would think, as we read that phrase, that it has said all that needs to be said. Yet, as we read the Lord's own words, we find that immediately after saying, "I am the way and the truth and the life," he says the whole thing over again in different words, lest we misunderstand it. He says, "No one comes to the Father except through me." If the Lord stated this a second time, lest we misunderstand it, then we should look at it a second time also.

Only through Jesus

Taken together, these phrases mean that Christianity makes an exclusive claim. People sometimes suggest that we are narrow-minded as Christians when we say that Christ is the only way to God, and we have to confess that this is precisely what we are at this point. We are as narrow as the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord said—this is the emphasis of the verse—that he is the only way to God. There is no other way. So while it would be nice for us to equivocate on this point and say, in order to win friends and influence people, that other ways have some value— though we would like to say this, we are nevertheless unable to do so. Rather, we find ourselves affirming with the Lord Jesus Christ and with all the biblical writers that there is no salvation apart from Jesus.

Many verses teach it: 1 Corinthians 3:11—"No one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ"; Acts 4:12—"Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men, by which we must be saved"; 1 Timothy 2:5—"For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."

If you are one who is rejecting all this, if you are one who perhaps is interested in Christianity but not exclusively, if you think that perhaps Jesus Christ is a way to God but not the way to God, I want to stress that, according to his teaching, he is the only way and that any attempt to find another way is folly, is bound to produce despair, and is perverse. The tragedy is that apart from the grace of God folly, despair, and perversity characterize each one of us. We are fools because we seek another way. We despair because there is no other way to be found. We are perverse because God has told us that there is only one way. Therefore, in turning from him to try to find another way we dishonor him.

The Fool Has Said

First, there is the folly of trying to find another way. Why is it folly? It is folly because, if a way to God has been provided, it is nonsense to look for another. Who would seek for a second cure for cancer if a perfect cure had been found?

Yet this is the folly of the human heart in spiritual things. Jesus told about it in a parable that concerned a rich man. This man thought the way to life was through material possessions, so he spent a lifetime accumulating worldly goods. He was a farmer. He had produce. His wealth was in the storage of his barn. When the barn became too small for what he was accumulating, he said, "I'll tear down my old barn and build a bigger one that can hold my possessions." The Lord's comment on that man's life was: "You fool! This very night your life will be demanded from you. Then who will get what you have prepared for yourself?" (Luke 12:20).

It is not the preacher who calls the unbeliever a fool. If that were the case, it would mean little indeed. The unbeliever could simply say to the preacher, 'You are the fool for believing as you do." No, God is the one who calls men fools, fools for refusing to come to him in the way he has provided.

If we explore a bit deeper to find out why this is so, we find that it is because we are determined to provide for ourselves. During World War II, my father served as a doctor in the air force in the southern part of the United States. When he was released from military service he and the family began to drive northward to the family home in western Pennsylvania. It was only a few days before Christmas. So it was no surprise that on the way we ran into an early blizzard in the mountains of Tennessee. The storm got worse and worse and eventually halted our progress. At one point, however, before we had stopped for the night and as we were going uphill in a little mountain area with a dangerous precipice at our right, a car up ahead stopped. My father realized that, if the car ahead stopped, he would have to stop and, if he stopped, he would immediately begin to slide over the precipice. So he grabbed a blanket, jumped out of the car, ran around to the back wheels and stuck the blanket under one of them to stop our descent. We were stopped. But there we were, stranded in the blizzard on the mountainside.

My father was an Irishman, and at this point two things characterized him: first, pride in his achievement and, second, determination to bring off another. He had saved us from going over the precipice. Now he was going to get us up the mountain. So he began to work, shoveling snow and placing boards and blankets under the tires. He worked for about an hour, but without much success. All the time my two sisters and I, my mother, and my aunt were in the car, getting colder and colder. We were very depressed. Suddenly a truck with wonderful traction came by. This truck moved ahead of us and stopped. It was obvious that the driver knew he could get going again. He got out, came back to my father and said, "I have a chain. Would you like me to hitch onto your car and take you up the mountain?"

Do you know what my father said? He said, "No, thanks. We're doing fine." And he did do fine! But it was about sixty cold and gloomy minutes later!

God says that we are exactly like this spiritually, except for the fact that it does not matter whether we spend an hour, two hours, a year, or a lifetime. We are never going to get ourselves going up the road to salvation. So Jesus says, "Look, I've come to provide the way to salvation. I am the way. Don't be so foolish that you turn your back on me out of pride."

No Exit

Second, you are not only foolish, you are also on a trip to despair. If Jesus is right when he says, "I am the way... no one comes to the Father except through me," then no other way can be found. The Father is the source of all spiritual blessings. The way to the Father is through Jesus. If you are trying to find another way, you are never going to get those spiritual blessings. To go in any other way is to embark upon a road that has no exits and no destination.

Paul spells it out in the Book of Romans, pointing to the different ways men and women try to reach God. There are three categories. First, there is the way of natural theology. This is the way of the man who goes out into the field at night and says, "I am going to commune with God in nature." It is the man who says, "I worship God on Sunday afternoon in my golf cart." Paul says that this is a dead end, because you cannot find God in nature. No man has ever found God in nature. You can find things about God in nature, but these condemn you.

Romans says that nature reveals two things about God. It reveals the "Godhead" of God, that is, his existence, and it reveals his "power," because obviously something or someone of considerable power stands behind what we observe. That is all that can be known of God in nature. So if you think you are going to find God in nature, you are destined to emptiness in your search. You cannot worship an eternal power; you cannot worship a supreme being; you cannot worship a law of nature. Moreover, says Paul, "You don't even try!" Because when you say to yourself, "I'm going to worship God in nature," what you are really doing is using nature as an excuse to avoid God. Actually you do not want to be with Christian people, nor do you wish to be under the preaching of the Word. You find it disturbing. What you are really trying to do is to escape from God into nature. If you worship anything at all, it is nature you worship; and the worship of nature is idolatry.

Some years ago, after I had given a message along these lines, a woman said, "I found that to be true in my work with the beach crowd in California."

I asked, "What do you mean?"

"Well," she said, "we used to have meetings on the beach, and I used to witness to the surfers. When I would speak to them about God, they would reply that they worshiped God in nature. At first I didn't know what to say, but after a while I caught on. I learned to ask, 'And what is God?' They would reply, 'My surfboard is my god.'" At least that is honest, but it is paganism and idolatry.

Second, there are people who try to find God in the way of human morality. They say, "God certainly likes good men and women; therefore, I'll be good, and I'll get to him that way." Paul says that this line will lead you to despair also. Why? We see the answer when we reason as follows. If God loves good people—and it is true that he does—how good do they have to be? The answer is that they have to be absolutely good, perfect, because God can settle for nothing less. But no one is perfect. So Paul says, "When you start like that, when you start thinking that you are going to please God by getting better and better, you fail to see that even if you could achieve the maximum goodness possible to anyone in this world, you would never get to God in that way because it would not be good enough.

We have a strange situation in the church today. The church has a message to proclaim; it begins with the total depravity of man. But this is offensive to most people. So the church gets cold feet at this point—ministers do, of course—and it backs off from preaching these things. Ministers say, "We admit that the Bible does say that all are sinners; it does say that all are dead in trespasses and sins; but it does not really mean that. It is hyperbole. What it really means is that we just need a little help. People are really pretty good underneath. So if we just appeal to their natural goodness, they'll come and be Christians. Besides, they'll join our churches and give us money."

Does the world congratulate the church for congratulating the world? Not at all! The world knows that this is not true. So you have people like Jean Paul Sartre and other existentialists leaping to their feet to say, "If the church is not going to tell the truth, we are going to tell the truth! We know that when you scratch beneath the veneer of mankind, when you get rid of the social conventions, when you get rid of the desire to be acceptable with other people by matching up to certain preestablished patterns of behavior, what you find beneath the surface is garbage. You find a sewer of corruption." The existentialist does not have the answer. The despair of the existentialist is proof of what lies at the end of his road. But at least he speaks out; he is not silent.

Then, in Romans 2:17-29, Paul says that there is a third way that people try; it is the way of religion, a sort of formalism. This person says, "If I cannot be righteous, at least I can do things that God likes. I'll be baptized. I'll be confirmed. I'll go to communion." Paul says that this leads to despair also. Why? Because it is based on a false conception of God. It suggests that God will settle for externals. Does he? No! People may settle for externals, but not God; he looks on the heart. God sees that although you can go through the rite of baptism, it does not mean a thing if your heart is not cleansed. He sees that although you may come to communion, it does not mean a thing unless you have first fed on Jesus Christ by faith and have drunk at that stream that he provides.

An Insult to God

To say that one is a fool for looking in another direction than Christ sounds insulting. To say that it leads to despair sounds grim. But there is worse to come. For seeking a way other than Jesus is not only foolish and leads to despair, it is perverse. It is insulting to God. How is it insulting? It is insulting because Jesus said, "I am the way and the truth and the life; no one comes to the Father except through me." So if you go another way, it is not merely that you are doing something for yourself, and it is certainly not the case that you are doing something praiseworthy. What you are really doing is saying to the Lord Jesus Christ, "Lord Jesus Christ, you are a liar!"

Do you think that God is going to be proud of you for trying to find your own way? Do you think that God is going to admire you for that, love you for that, praise you for that? God is going to regard this for what it is, an insult to the Lord Jesus Christ his Son, because that is the equivalent of saying, 'You, Lord Jesus Christ, you in whom the Father is well pleased, cannot be trusted."

Furthermore, to seek another way is not only an insult to Christ, it is an insult to the love of God who planned the way of salvation out of his great love for the sinner. What the Lord Jesus Christ did was in fulfillment of the desires of his Father. He said, "I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do your will, O God" (Heb. 10:7). It was God's will that Jesus Christ, his Son, should die in your place. So it is an insult to God to ignore it. Do you think that it was easy for God to send Jesus Christ to die for you? I am asking you fathers: Would it be easy for you to give up your son or your daughter, to see that son or daughter killed, in order that someone else might be saved? I ask you mothers: Would it be easy for you to have a son or daughter killed in your sight, to turn your back when you could save that son or daughter, in order to have someone else saved? Of course not! You who are brothers: Would you give up a sister? You who are sisters: Would you give up a brother? If it is not easy for you, why should you think that it would be easy for God? Yet that is what God did for you.

Do you think it was easy for the Lord Jesus Christ to stand with his disciples on the verge of his crucifixion and say, "I am the way"? He knew what it meant to be the way. It meant that he had to go to the cross; he had to die; he had to suffer; he had to have the Father turn his back on him while he was made sin for us; he had to have the wrath of God poured out upon him. That is what it meant when the Lord Jesus Christ said, "I am the way... no one comes to the Father except through me." Yet he said it.

Come ... Come

So I ask: Is it anything but sinful, obstinate perversity for someone to say, 'That is all very nice, but I am going to go another way"? To go another way is to condemn yourself to hell! For there is no other way. 'There is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5).

How foolish it would be, how much despair is involved, how perverse on your part to go away, saying, "Well, that is all very interesting, of course; but I'm going to look a bit farther." Today is the day of salvation! This may be the last opportunity you will ever have! I cannot promise that you will ever hear the gospel again. I cannot promise that the Holy Spirit will ever speak to your heart again, if he is speaking at this moment. Heed the invitation and come! The Bible says, "The Spirit and the bride say, 'Come!' And let him who hears say, 'Come' Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take the free gift of the water of life" (Rev. 22:17).

Chapter 179.
How to See God

John 14:7-11

An the fourteenth chapter of John's Gospel, in the midst of the last discourses, one of Christ's disciples makes a request with which most Christian people can identify. The disciple was Philip. The request he made was, "Lord, show us the Father." It was the request to see God.

There are times when each of us earnestly wishes that the experience Philip asked of the Lord Jesus Christ could be possible. We know, of course, that God does not possess a tangible form. We even know that this is only what we ought to expect and that it is desirable. But still there are times when God seems so remote, so untouchable, that we earnestly wish we could see him. We would like to gaze upon God and hear his voice in words that actually strike our eardrums. In such moments we believe that if we could have this experience, then we should find it easier to live for God in the midst of this world. And—we must be honest here—we sometimes imagine that God is holding out on us, making it more difficult for us by denying this experience. Have you ever had these thoughts? If you have, then the words of the Lord Jesus Christ to Philip in the upper room should be of great interest to you.

Knowing God

We must notice, however, before we begin to look at Christ's answer, that Philip's question arose in the context of Christ's teaching about knowing God, so that in this case Jesus actually provoked his disciple's question. A moment before Jesus had taught that he was the sole way to God. "No one comes to the Father except through me," he said. Then he went on, "If you really knew me, you would know my Father as well. From now on, you do know him and have seen him" (v. 7). What do you think of that statement? Do you think that it is easily comprehensible? Do you grasp its meaning at once? This statement makes one stop and ponder. However, if it does that for us now, at this point in history, I am convinced that it most certainly had that effect upon the disciples and was therefore spoken by Jesus precisely for that purpose.

In other words, it is apparent from the nature of the statement, and the context, that Jesus spoke as he did in order to provoke a discussion on this subject. He was about to leave his disciples. He knew that when he should be taken from them they would be plunged into a dark and melancholy despair. In their despair God would seem extremely remote. Consequently, he introduced the subject in order to teach them that they had already seen God and were therefore to know him from this time forward, whether they realized it or not.

"From now on, you do know him and have seen him," he said. Philip fixed his thoughts upon the idea of seeing, as we often do, and demanded, "Lord, show us the Father and that will be enough for us" (v. 8).

Limitations of Seeing

As Philip asked this question he was probably thinking of those Old Testament examples in which a person or group of persons is said to have seen God. Moses was one. He had asked to see God's glory, and God had replied, "I will cause all my goodness to pass in front of you, and I will proclaim my name, the LORD, in your presence" (Exod. 33:19). Then the Lord placed Moses within a cleft of rock, covered the space with his hand, and passed by. Elijah had a similar experience when the Lord caused a great wind, an earthquake, and a fire to pass before his prophet, though the Lord was not in the wind, the earthquake, or the fire. He was in the still small voice that Elijah heard afterward (1 Kings 19:11-12). There is also a verse that tells us that Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel "saw the God of Israel.
Under his feet was something like a pavement of sapphire, clear as the sky itself" (Exod. 24:10).

None of these passages mean that the persons involved actually saw God as he is in himself. God had told Moses, "You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live" (Exod. 33:20). Still, the experience of the others was something great, and this was good enough for Philip, whatever it was. He therefore asked Jesus, whom he believed could do anything, for a theophany.

But how did the Lord reply? Instead of granting the request or even attempting to explain why Philip's desire was unwise or impossible, Jesus began to teach what it really means to see God, and how to see him. The point with which he began was the limitation of the kind of seeing Philip had in mind.

To understand this point we need to see the contrast implied in Christ's next statement. Philip had said, "Lord, we would know God if we could just see him." But Jesus says, making the contrast, "It is strange that you say that, Philip. For I have been with you three years. You have seen me throughout that period, and yet you do not know me. Why then do you think that seeing would help you know God?" This is the meaning of the statement, "Don't you know me, Philip, even after I have been among you such a long time?" (v. 9). Obviously, the kind of seeing that Philip had in mind does not lead to a true knowledge of anyone.

A Right Kind of Seeing

The Lord Jesus Christ did not stress merely the limitations of the kind of seeing Philip envisioned, however. He also talked about the right kind of seeing, a seeing centered entirely in himself. He is the object of it. Jesus continued, "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father. How can you say, 'Show us the Father'? (v. 9). True, there is a seeing that is inadequate. But, on the other hand, there is a seeing that is altogether right. In this seeing, the sequence is obviously: (1) seeing the Lord Jesus Christ with understanding, (2) coming to know Jesus as a result of that seeing, and (3) coming to know God through knowing Jesus.

But what kind of seeing is this? The seeing involved is illustrated by the story of Peter and John's trip to the tomb of Jesus, recorded just six chapters farther on in John's Gospel. In that story three different words are used for "seeing," though each is translated by the identical word "see" in our Bibles. The first is blepō. It is used of John who, having outdistanced Peter in the race to the tomb, stooped down "and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying." This is the simplest word for "see." It merely means that the image of the graveclothes within the tomb had impressed itself upon the retina of John's eyes. In a few moments Peter arrived. Since he was not one to stand around doing nothing, Peter pushed John aside and actually entered the tomb. Here he had opportunity to observe the graveclothes; so, in this case, a different word for "see" is used. The word is theōreō. It means to "puzzle over" or "scrutinize." In this case, Peter needed to puzzle over the fact that the clothes were there but the body was gone. If the body had been taken away, why were the graveclothes not taken away with it? Or, on the other hand, if the bands had been removed, why were they not scattered about the tomb and the spices spilled? Instead of this, the bands were exactly as they had been when they were wound around the body, and the head cloth was set off by itself just as it had been when it was around the head of the Master. At this point John tells us that he entered, saw what Peter saw, and believed. Only now the word is not theōreō or blepō. It is oraō, which means "to see with understanding." That is why John says that he "saw and believed." He saw that the only thing that would account for the arrangement of the graveclothes was a resurrection.

That is precisely the word used in John 14, where Jesus says that the one who has "seen" him has "seen" the Father. He means that the one who perceives who he is perceives God.

The point can be made in another way also. Notice that Philip had asked to be "shown" the Father. This is the verb deiknumi, which, in effect, calls for a demonstration. Jesus replied that what was needed was not so much a demonstration as an apprehension. It is not a seeing but a perceiving that is important.

This has great bearing for us, of course, for if seeing physically is the important thing, we are deprived. Not only can we not see God; we cannot even see Jesus, which was at least Philip's privilege. Jesus is simply not here. We cannot observe him. On the other hand, if perceiving is the true seeing, then we are not deprived at all, for we can perceive Jesus and, perceiving him, can perceive and know God. Indeed, we can know him as well and in exactly the same way as he was known by these believing contemporaries of the Lord Jesus.

Believing Is Seeing

To speak of the Lord's "believing contemporaries" leads us to the final section of these verses, for it can hardly escape the notice of any careful reader that the discussion of knowing and seeing, which fills the first half of the paragraph, gives way to a discussion of belief (or faith) in the second. In the first half, the word "know" occurs four times and the words "seen" or "show" five times. In the second half (including verse 12), not one of these three words can be found.
But the word "believe," "believed," or "believes" is repeated four times over.

Why? It is no great mystery. It is merely another example of the New Testament teaching that in spiritual things belief must come first, after which true seeing will follow. Earlier in the Gospel, Jesus had said of the people of his day, "Unless you people see miraculous signs and wonders, you will never believe" (4:48). This was a true description of the thinking of vast numbers of men and women in his time, as we pointed out when we studied that verse. It is the old philosophy, "Seeing is believing," upon which the world operates. But Jesus inverts it. On the occasion on which the words I have just quoted were spoken, Jesus instructed a nobleman, who had come to him for the healing of his child, "You may go. Your son will live" (v. 50), as a result of which the nobleman believed and then saw the thing he had requested. In the same way, in chapter 11, just before he is to raise Lazarus from the dead, Jesus turns to unbelieving Martha and asks, "Did I not tell you that if you believed you would see the glory of God?" (v. 40).

If this is only a human matter, the suggestion that we should believe without sight is absurd. Who wants to believe without sight? No one. And no one does. On the other hand, in spiritual matters it is entirely reasonable to do this, because in this case we are dealing not with a mere man but with God. Jesus is God. To believe him is the most logical act in the universe.

Faith's Object

The matter of seeing God stops with believing on Jesus, but we are not to suppose by this that belief is therefore some subjective, intangible thing, as if we are to work ourselves up to faith by wishful thinking. This is not the biblical idea at all. Consequently, Jesus goes on to talk about belief in two things or, as we might also say, on two levels. The first level is belief in his words; the second is belief in his works. In other words, belief is as objective and tangible as the words and works of Jesus. Jesus does not call for blind faith. He calls for a thinking faith. He here challenges faith by asking us to test his claims on the basis of the things said and the deeds done.

Have you tested Christ's words? In one of his writings Charles Haddon Spurgeon tells of an old unbeliever who was dying. A great Scotch preacher by the name of Innis, came to see him. He inquired of his faith in Christ and was told, "Mr. Innis, I am relying solely on the mercy of God; God is merciful, and he will never condemn a man forever." When he became worse and was nearer death, Mr. Innis went to him again. This time the man said, "Oh, Mr. Innis, my hope is gone; for I have been thinking that if God is merciful, God is just too; and what if, instead of being merciful to me, he should be just to me? What would then become of me? I must give up my hope in the mere mercy of God; tell me how to be saved." The minister then told him of Christ's words and deeds. He told him how Christ had come into the world to save sinners. He told him how he had promised to do this by going to the cross to die in their place, how this had been done, and how Jesus had promised that none of those who had been given to him by the Father should ever be lost. "Ah," said the infidel, "Mr. Innis, there is something solid in that; I can rest on that. I have found that I cannot rest on anything else." There is nothing else. Belief is meaningless unless it rests on the words and works of Jesus.

Little Faith

But perhaps even now you feel that your faith is too small and that you will therefore never come to see God. If this is the case, notice that before he moves on to other subjects Jesus stops to say a word just to you. You may not be able to believe on the basis of his teaching alone, he argues. But you can surely believe on the basis of what he has done.

"Believe me when I say that I am in the Father and the Father is in me; or at least believe on the evidence of the miracles themselves" (v. 11). To believe on the basis of the miracles is not the best kind of faith, but it is true faith regardless. It is better than no faith at all.

Better than thinking about faith itself is to think on faith's object.

Some time ago I came upon this illustration from the works of Donald Barnhouse. Barnhouse had been in Palestine and had been taken to the great hall of the Sanhedrin. In that hall there is a window which looks out over the wailing wall, at the base of which stand groups of rabbis, slowly beating their breasts in sorrow for sin while repeating phrases from the Book of Lamentations. As Barnhouse looked he saw that above their heads, along the high expanse of the wall, grew the long trailing plant identified as the hyssop of the Bible.

Barnhouse asked about the plant and learned that it has a remarkably shallow root. Often it is not over a half-inch long. But with this root the hyssop clings to the surface of the rock, drawing its sustenance from the air, wind, rain (when there is any), and small particles of nourishment in the rock itself. From that tiny root the plant flourishes, sometimes growing to a length of twelve or fourteen feet. "What a great plant to grow from such a slender root," thought Barnhouse. What a symbol of the faith God calls for!

In itself faith is worthless, just as worthless as the root if it should become unattached. If one grasps the branch and pulls the root away from the rock, the branch will soon die. To be of value the root must cling to the rock. Thus, faith, which is nothing in itself, becomes the key to life when it clings to the Lord Jesus Christ, the Rock of Ages. It is through faith in him that we see God.

Chapter 180.
Greater Things Than Jesus' Things

John 14:12

It is unlikely that any of us has ever been offered a million dollars. But if we can imagine how breathlessly overwhelmed we would be by such an offer, we can begin to appreciate what our reaction should be to the promise of Jesus in John 14:12.

Jesus has been attempting to comfort his disciples, for they were distressed and dispirited at the announcement that he was going away from them. He had promised that he was going to prepare a home for them in heaven and that he was going to return for them so that they could be with him. Then, after dealing with a question raised by Philip, he added solemnly, but obviously also to provide comfort, "I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father."

Greater works than Jesus' works! That is the promise. But when we think of it the promise seems unrealistic, if not totally incredible. Jesus had healed the sick, calmed the troubled sea of Galilee, fed thousands with a few small loaves of bread and several fishes, raised the dead. These were great works, probably the greatest miracles we can imagine! We cannot do them. But if that is the case, how could Jesus have said what he did say?

What Kind of Works?

There are only two approaches to this verse other than saying that Jesus was simply mistaken. The first takes it as referring to miracles but then either limits the reference or seeks to explain why such miracles are not done today. The second refers it to a different work entirely.

Some who take the verse as referring to miracles find a supposed qualification in the word "faith." The promise is only for those who have faith in Jesus, such interpreters say.
Consequently, since no one does such works today (at least no one we know), we clearly do not believe enough. Our faith is lacking. It is enough to reply to this viewpoint that since we are to do greater works than Jesus' works, it would be necessary for us, according to this interpretation, to have greater faith than his, which is clearly impossible. Besides, Jesus does not say, "Anyone who has faith in me with a sufficient degree of faith" or even "Anyone who has intense faith." He merely says, "Anyone who has faith in me," and that would include not just the strong in faith, but any Christian.

Others recognize these truths but seek to limit the verse by applying it to the apostles only. They did miracles. Consequently, this was a fulfillment. Arther W. Pink is one who apparently holds this view, at least as regards the first half of the verse. He writes, "Some have understood this to refer to all the genuine followers of Christ. But this is manifestly wrong, for there is no Christian on earth today who can do the miracles which Christ did—cleanse the leper, give sight to the blind, raise the dead.... We submit that 'He that believeth on me,' like the expression 'them that believe' in Mark 16:17, of whom it was said certain miraculous signs should follow them, refers to a particular class of persons, and that these expressions must be modified by their reference and setting." Pink shows that the verse was fulfilled in the early miracles performed by the apostles, as Hebrews 2:4 seems to indicate—"God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will."

This may be part of the story. But one may wonder, even then, if the disciples for all their miracles may be said to have matched, let alone exceeded, Jesus' miracles. If this is a valid objection, the answer should be sought in a different direction entirely.

Spiritual Works

Here we are helped by the knowledge that God does not look at things as we do and, therefore, certainly does not share our view of what constitutes greatness. Why, for instance, should the physical miracles be considered "great" at all? Why should this be the thing Jesus refers to? One clue that it is not comes from Luke 10, in a passage that gives Christ's response to the disciples after they had returned from their first successful preaching mission. They had returned, we are told, "with joy and said, 'Lord, even the demons submit to us in your name'" (v. 17). In other words, they were thrilled that they had been able to cast out devils. But Jesus replied, "I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions and to oversome all the power of the enemy; nothing will harm you. However, do not rejoice that the spirits submit to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (vv. 19-20).

Here Jesus explicitly weighed the value of physical miracles over against the value of having passed out of spiritual death into salvation and chose the spiritual miracle without hesitation. If that is so in Luke 10, why should it not be so also in our text from the last discourses?

Leon Morris is one who sees the verse in this light: "What Jesus means we may see in the narratives of the Acts. There are a few miracles of healing, but the emphasis is on the mighty works of conversion." H. A. Ironside concurs: "He was not speaking of miracles. His chief work was not performing miracles but revealing the Father, bringing knowledge of the Father. It was that of which He was speaking. As a result of His three-and-a-half years of ministry, when He left this scene He said good-bye to a group of about five hundred disciples. There were, doubtless, a few more scattered about but not very many. Very few saw in Him the revelation of the Father. But go on a few days—fifty days later. Ah, then Peter and the rest of the eleven stand up on the day of Pentecost and the third Person of the Trinity comes upon them in power and they are prepared to witness for Him. They preached a crucified and risen Christ, and what happened? Three thousand believed! Probably more in that one day than in all the three-and-ahalf years of our Lord's ministry.... When you realize that when Jesus left this scene, committing His gospel to a little group of eleven men in order that they might carry it to the ends of the earth, at that time the whole world, with the exception of a few in Israel, was lost in the darkness of heathenism. But in three hundred years Christianity closed nearly all the temples of the heathen Roman Empire, and numbered its converts by millions. These were the greater works, and down through the centuries He still carries on this ministry. " Let us summarize what this verse means:

1. The works Christ refers to are spiritual works, primarily the work of regeneration that takes place when the gospel is proclaimed through the power of God's Holy Spirit. This is suggested by two characteristics: first, that the word "things" rather than "signs" or "miracles" is used, and second, that in the phrase "and greater things than these shall he do" the word "things" does not actually occur. There is no word at that point, so the literal translation would simply be "and greater." The point is that Christians will do something greater even than the works of Jesus.

2. The reference in the verse is to every Christian, for this is the only possible meaning of the phrase "Anyone who has faith in me." This does not mean that every Christian will have the ability to be a great evangelist. There is a diversity of gifts. But it does mean that a testimony that leads to the conversion of any individual is greater, in the Lord's sight, than any physical miracle and that the combined efforts of all God's people, leading to the conversion of millions, is tremendous.

3. Finally, there may also be a sense in which the verse applies to all works of compassion, healing, and progress, which, although not miraculous in a supernatural sense, nevertheless in a nearly miraculous way have followed almost inevitably upon the preaching of the gospel.

4. # The Conditions

The promise of Jesus in John 14:12 is a great promise. It is a thrilling promise, if only because it applies to each one of us personally. Great works! Greater works than Jesus' works! We shall do these, if we are Christ's disciples. And yet, we must not get carried away, for as we look at the text more closely we discover that there are four conditions to actually enjoying Christ's promise.

First, we must have faith in Jesus. This is found in John 14:12 itself, for Jesus begins the sentence by saying, "Anyone who has faith in me." That is as much as to say, "If anyone will believe in me" or "What I have to say now is for my followers." Do you believe on Jesus? I do not mean, "Do you believe that he existed?" I do not even mean, "Do you believe that he is who he claimed to be; namely, the Son of God and the world's Savior?" I mean, Is he your Savior? Have you trusted him as such? Have you let go trusting in your own strength, particularly in spiritual things, and have you allowed him to be your Savior from sin and your Lord? Without the fulfillment of this previous condition, none of the promises mentioned are for anyone.

Second, we must pray. This is the first of three additional themes discussed in the next verses (vv. 13-18), all of which are important. The verses on prayer are themselves a great promise: "And I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. You may ask me for anything in my name, and I will do it" (vv. 13-14). Obviously, praying is itself a condition for doing the mighty works that Jesus talks about earlier. Unfortunately, many of us are like those spoken of in James, who, we are told, "do not have, because they do not ask" (4:2).

Do you ask God specifically to see those you know and for whom you are concerned converted? I do not mean, Do you pray generally? I mean, Do you pray specifically and expect God to answer you? R. A. Torrey tells of one case that could be repeated a thousand times over. One Sunday the mother of the most difficult boy he had ever known came up to him after the service and said, "Do you know_____(calling her boy by name)?" Torrey replied, "Yes, I know him." Indeed, everyone knew him.

'You know he is not a very good boy," said the mother.

"Yes," Torrey answered, "I know he is not a very good boy." That, of course, was a decidedly euphemistic way of putting it; in point of fact, he was the terror of the neighborhood.

This heavyhearted mother then said, "What shall I do?"

Torrey replied, "Have you ever tried prayer?"

"Why," she said, "of course I pray."

"No," said Torrey, "I don't mean that. I mean have you ever asked God definitely to regenerate your boy and have you expected him to do it?" "I do not think I have ever been as definite as that."

"Well," said the preacher, "you go right home and be just as definite as that." Torrey then reports that she did go home and was just as definite as that, and that it was probably from that very day, certainly from that week, that the boy was transformed and began to grow up into a fine young man.

We need not believe—we must be honest here—that in every case the prayers we make will have such immediate and striking results. Obviously many do not. On the other hand, we can believe that any prayer that is truly inspired by Christ and in the name of Christ will be answered. The point, however, is not in the time God chooses to take in answering our prayers, but simply that we are to pray. The "greater things" are for those who, first, have believed on Christ, and second, pray.

Third, they are for those whose lives are marked by a love for Christ expressed in obedience. This can be seen in the verse that says, "If you love me, you will obey my commands" (v. 15). It is interesting that these two things go together—love for Christ and keeping his commands—and it is clear why this is so. If we do not keep Christ's commands, we cannot really say that we love him; for what we call love is mere sentimentality and affection.

Some time ago I heard a missionary to Nepal talk about spiritual motivation. His name was Thomas Hale, and he and his wife were serving in the remote village of Amp Pipal, about one hundred miles from Kathmandu. He had shown slides of his work, including beautiful panoramas of the surrounding mountains, the fabled Hindu Kush. There were spectacular shots of Mt. Everest. But then the slides were turned off, and he turned to the group and said quietly, "Those are beautiful views, but you must remember that they are taken during the mere ten percent of the time when the mountains are not covered by clouds. Nor do they show the cold, poverty, dirt or disease. Beauty like that will take you to Nepal. But only love for Christ and obedience to his command to evangelize the world will keep you there." He was right. If we are to do great works for Christ, we must have a fervent love for Christ; and we must determine to keep his commandments.

Finally, we must be empowered by Christ's own Spirit, the Holy Spirit. This is spoken of in verses 16 and 17, in which Christ says, "And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth. The world cannot accept him, because it neither sees him nor knows him. But you know him, for he lives with you and will be in you."

In one sense, the presence of Christ's Spirit is involved in all we have been speaking of previously, for we cannot believe without the Spirit. We cannot pray without the Spirit. We cannot love or obey without the Spirit. In another sense, however, this is also a separate point, for in mentioning it, Jesus reminds us that we can do nothing without him. Earlier he had said, 'The words I say to you are not just my own. Rather, it is the Father, living in me, who is doing his work" (v. 10). Now it is as if we should say, echoing his teaching, "The words that we speak to you, we do not speak on our own; but the Spirit who dwells in us does the work." Can we say that? It is certain that we will never do the works that Jesus has for us to do until we can.

Words of Jesus

Do you hear Jesus speaking? Do you hear him calling you? He is saying, "I know that you are often discouraged. I know that the world seems harsh and unresponsive to the gospel. But remember this: I have ascended to the right hand of my Father in heaven, from which place I now rule. All authority in heaven and earth has been given to me; and it is on this basis, the basis of my authority, and in my strength that I send you forth to be my disciples. I am Lord over sin, death, hell, and the devil. You shall be lords over these forces also.

"When I was here on earth, I was in weakness. I performed only a few and very small works: I healed the sick, fed the hungry, raised the dead. Finally I let myself be crucified and put to death. Now I am the risen Lord, and it is my pleasure to do greater works than those I have mentioned. I want to do them through you. I have promised to draw people to myself as the gospel is preached. I call you to preach it. I commission you to go into all the world and teach people all that I have commanded you. I promise to go with you, to bless the message, and to overthrow strongholds of wickedness through your proclamation. You, Peter; you, James; John (George, Mary, Susan, Robert—whoever you may be), I promise to bless your witness to the extent that those who hear your message will either have to accept it or else, by rejecting it, complete their own spiritual destruction."

What do you say to that commission? Do not say, "Well, that is nice; but, of course, the Lord doesn't really mean it. There is nothing I can do." Rather say, 'Then so be it; I am nothing, but by the grace of God I will do all things, through the strength of my Lord."

Chapter 181.
Praying in Jesus' Name

John 14:13-14

It is probably impossible to have a greater promise by the Lord Jesus Christ than that recorded in John 14:12, the verse we looked at in our last study: "I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father." But if there was a promise that could be considered greater, it would probably be the one that follows immediately afterward: "And I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. You may ask me for anything in my name and I will do it" (vv. 13-14).

This promise was given to the disciples as one part of Jesus' attempt to comfort them in view of his pending departure. He was going to be taken from them. So he promises, first, that his going will not mean the end of his work on earth—they will continue it (v. 12)—and, second, that it will not mean the end of the communion they have enjoyed with him (vv. 13-14). He will be in heaven and they on earth. But prayer will remove all sense of distance and, indeed, be the key for their doing the "greater things" he promised.

There is comfort in this verse then, but it is not really comfort that makes the verse so striking or, as in the preceding promise, that so nearly takes our breath away. What is most striking is the scope of the promise, for it is not merely that those to whom he was speaking should have the privilege of prayer, nor even that he would hear their prayers and from time to time grant what they should ask. It is that Jesus would hear their prayers and grant their requests always.

There is an idea in vogue today, as Torrey points out in his book entitled The Power of Prayer and the Prayer of Power, that prayer does not mean that we are to get what we ask but that it is nevertheless good somehow. That is, we may not get our requests, but we will get something— something just as good as that for which we ask, and perhaps even better. It is no doubt true that many of us do not get what we pray for; for we pray foolishly and selfishly, and God often does not grant what we ask. It is good that he does not, for we would bring many troubles on ourselves if all our requests were granted. At the same time, however, we have to say that this view is not the doctrine of prayer taught in the Bible, nor, to be specific, is it the doctrine of prayer taught here. The doctrine of prayer, according to the Bible, is that "there are certain people who can pray in a certain way and who will get not merely some good thing, or something just as good as what they ask, or something even better than what they ask, but they will get the very thing that they ask for." It is the promise that if these will ask anything in the name of Jesus, they will have it.

"In My Name"

We realize as we say this that there are certain conditions to be met, and the first of these is obviously contained in the words "in my name" or, as we must understand it, "in the name of Jesus." What does this mean? What does it mean to ask something of God in Jesus' name?

It means several things. The first thing it means is that we come to God as those who are identified with Jesus by faith, that is, as Christians. This is very important, for we must begin any teaching about prayer or any study of prayer by realizing that prayer is for Christians only. This is clear from these verses in two ways: (1) the word "you," which refers, not to the world generally, but to the disciples and to those who should follow them in faith; and (2) the phrase "anyone who has faith in me," found just one verse earlier. These phrases limit the verses to Christians. Besides, as we must note, the Bible never promises that God will hear and answer a non-Christian's prayer.

We should add at this point, however, that God sometimes does answer the prayer of a nonChristian. This is what the old Puritan theologians called God's "uncovenanted blessings." But God does not promise to do so. He may hear an unbelieving prayer and answer it, particularly if it is by one in whom he is beginning to work and whom he intends to lead to full faith in Jesus Christ. But for Christians this otherwise fortuitous event is not just a possibility; it is a promise. It is the promise that the one who meets the condition of having believed on Jesus Christ (and the other conditions that will come in a moment) will have his prayers answered.

No Other Name

The second thing meant by the phrase "in my name" is that the one approaching God is approaching him on no other basis than on what the Lord Jesus Christ has done. Right here, of course, we have trouble, even as Christians, for often when we pray and do not get what we ask, it is because we have prayed, not in Jesus' name (though we may have said those words), but rather in our name imagining that we have some claim upon God.

R. A. Torrey, whom I mentioned earlier, tells a story that illustrates this point. He had been in Melbourne, Australia, for a series of meetings. One day as he went up onto the platform to speak, a note was thrust into his hands, which read, "Dear Dr. Torrey: I am in great perplexity. I have been praying for a long time for something that I am confident is according to God's will, but I do not get it. I have been a member of the Presbyterian Church for thirty years, and have tried to be a consistent one all the time. I have been superintendent in the Sunday school for twenty-five years, and an elder in the church for twenty years; and yet God does not answer my prayer and I cannot understand it. Can you explain it to me?"

Torrey took the note to the platform with him and read it. Then, because he had rightly detected something in the letter's tone, he answered like this: "It is perfectly easy to explain it. This man thinks that because he has been a consistent church member for thirty years, a faithful Sunday school superintendent for twenty-five years, and an elder in the church for twenty years, that God is under obligation to answer his prayer. He is really praying in his own name, and God will not hear our prayers when we approach Him in that way. We must, if we would have God answer our prayers, give up any thought that we have any claims upon God. There is not one of us who deserves anything from God. If we got what we deserved, every one of us would spend eternity in hell. But Jesus Christ has great claims on God, and we should go to God in our prayers not on the ground of any goodness in ourselves, but on the ground of Jesus Christ's claims."

At the close of the meeting a gentleman came up to Torrey and said, "I am the man who wrote that note. You have hit the nail square on the head. I did think that because I had been a consistent church member for thirty years, a Sunday school superintendent for twenty-five years, and an elder in the church for twenty years, that God was under obligation to answer my prayers.

I see my mistake."

Many people make the same mistake. They imagine that because they have done certain things for God they therefore have a claim upon God. But no sinful human being has any claim upon him. Only the Lord Jesus Christ has a claim. To pray in the name of Jesus is, therefore, first, to come to God as a Christian, having believed on Jesus, and, second, to come humbly, recognizing that we have no claims upon him but that Jesus himself does and that we can approach God solely on that basis.

In Raws's Name

Even at this point I suppose there are some who still think that praying in the name of Jesus is like waving a magic wand over our own desires in order to cause them to be granted. Such persons may admit that one must certainly be a Christian in order to pray effectively. They will even admit that we cannot come on the basis of our own merit. Indeed, that was the great Reformation principle! Every Christian knows that! Still, they persist in regarding the name of Christ as an incantation to get their desires. We need to add a third point, therefore. To pray in Jesus' name is to pray as one who lives the life of Christ. Consequently, it is to pray as he would pray and for what he desires.

Ralph L. Keiper had an excellent illustration of this point. He used to point out that at the Keswick Bible Conference grounds at Keswick, New Jersey, there is a work for alcoholics known as the Colony of Mercy. Through this colony, under the direction of its founder William Raws, son Addison C. Raws, and a grandson William A. Raws, men who have been ruined by drink are introduced to the Savior and are restored to society as they allow the Lord to be the remedy for their ruin.

Let us suppose, as Keiper suggests, that one of the men becomes tired of the rules of the colony and so leaves it for the nearby town, where he heads for the nearest bar. He enters and says to the bartender, "Give me a shot of gin in Raws's name."

The bartender is about to fill the order when the owner steps around the corner and asks, "What did you say you wanted?"

"I want a shot of gin in Raws's name!" answers the man as he places his right foot on the bar rail.

The owner of the saloon begins to question the customer. "Do you mean Addison Raws of the Colony of Mercy, the man whose father founded the Colony, and whose work it is to take a bum like you and make a man of him? Is this the Raws you mean?"

"You're right as a rabbit, Mister," says the derelict. "He's the very man."

The face of the owner clouds over with sternness. "You are a liar!" he says. "How dare you charge this drink to Raws? If you were really coming in his name, you would have passed this place by, or, if you had come in, you would be looking for someone like yourself to take back to the Colony. Dr. Raws is not a drinking man, and those who name his name are not customers of mine."

Keiper wrote, 'To pray in the name of Christ is a serious matter, not to be taken lightly. We ask for many things without regard for our Lord, because we would please ourselves instead of Him. Wives would have husbands saved for the sake of having an inexpensive chauffeur to drive them to 'meetings,' or so they no longer would need to be embarrassed by the ladies of the church who find drinking, unsaved men wretched. Husbands, too, find their prayers unanswered because they continually criticize their wives in private, as well as public, forgetting that Christ never criticized His wife—the Church (1 Peter 3:7). A consistent, Christ-like conduct convinces us that God can trust us with His blessings. God will never waste a blessing or a kindness on a careless, selfish saint."

God Glorified

There is one more requirement. Thus far we have looked at the phrase "in my name" and have found that it means the following three things: (1) that we must be Christians, (2) that we must approach God on the basis of Christ's merit and not on the basis of any supposed merit of our own, and (3) that we must pray as Christ would pray while at the same time living a life consistent with his desires. But there is also a second phrase in our text, and that is "that the Son may bring glory to the Father." This is very important, for having said that our prayers must be consistent with the desires of our Lord, we immediately go on to ask, "And what is it that the Lord Jesus Christ desires?" The answer, in its shortest form, is in this phrase. It is that God may be glorified. The application is that, if this was Jesus' desire, then it should obviously be our desire too.

This is a new thought for many people, for we are so filled with the idea that prayer is getting something from God, that we rarely consider that prayer is actually a means by which God gets something from us. What he wants from us is glory, a glory that will lead others to trust him.

Here I wish to draw upon another illustration by Ralph Keiper. Ralph, as those who knew him are aware, suffered from limited vision. What we can see at 100 feet he could see at 10. So obviously there were many times in his early life when he complained to God of his affliction. "Why should I suffer from this limitation? God could do something about it if he wanted to," he reasoned. He prayed about his problem and got nowhere. Moreover, he could not even see the reason for God's delay. He had tried to please the Lord as best he knew how. Why was God silent?

Then one Saturday afternoon, when as a young theological student he was idling over his books, the Holy Spirit began to speak to him and ask several questions: "What is the chief end of man?" "To glorify God, and to enjoy him forever!" Ralph replied.

"Do you wish to glorify God?" the Holy Spirit countered.

"Of course!" the young student hastened to assure him.

"If you had the choice, what would you rather do, glorify God or have perfect vision?"

Ralph paused for a long while. His "of course" began to weaken. For, as he points out, sight is a very precious commodity, especially to those who do not have it. He had to be honest because the Holy Spirit was watching and knew his heart. He knew that sight was far more precious to Ralph than God's glory. The struggle within was bitter, but Ralph was a victim of grace.

"There is only one answer," he said finally, "and that choice is to glorify God."

The Holy Spirit insisted on continuing his probe. "Do you really believe that God's glory is more important than your vision?" He did not push for an answer, but waited quietly.

At last Ralph surrendered. "My vision, or lack of it, is not worthy to be compared to the glory of God!"

"Do you really wish to glorify God?" the Holy Spirit asked again.

'Yes, I do!"

"If you do, why worry about the method which God chooses for you to glorify him?"

The goal of prayer is not the fulfilling of our own requests; it is the glorification of God. But do we really know that? Remember that while he was here on earth the Lord Jesus Christ glorified the Father. He said in his great priestly prayer of John 17, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (v. 4). But the way Jesus did this was not by any way that we would call glorious. Jesus was a wandering preacher who, as he himself said, had nowhere to lay his head. He was misunderstood. He was ridiculed. His own disciples did not understand him. Eventually one betrayed him while still another denied him. All deserted him. Then he was arrested, tried, cruelly beaten, and executed. This was not what we would desire, either for Jesus or for ourselves. Yet this was God's will for Jesus, and it was precisely in these things that God was glorified.

Do we really know what that means? If we do, it will not be a matter of indifference; rather it will transform our lives. As life goes on we will undoubtedly suffer many of the things that are common to the life of mankind. We will get sick. Friends will get sick and pass away. Many disappointments will come in our homes, work, and other areas. Eventually we will die. How will you and I react in these circumstances? Will we complain and blame God? Or will we receive these circumstances from his hand and seek to glorify him in them? If we choose the latter, we will be able to demonstrate the reality of God's great grace and peace, produced by God's sovereign choice in suffering Christians.

When sorrows come the world panics. It has no answer in the face of disappointments, no hope in death. We have hope. Moreover, we have the privilege of coming to God in prayer in order that our will might be made increasingly conformable to his will and that others might therefore be led to glorify him through our testimony.

Chapter 182.
"Keep My Commands"

John 14:15

It is hard to imagine a more wonderful series of promises than those from the middle of John 14. One promise is that those who are Christ's shall do even greater works than Jesus' works. Another is that whatever we shall ask by prayer in Jesus' name he will do. In all honesty, however, we must admit (as we have done in our earlier studies of these two promises) that they do have qualifications and that we are often unable to enjoy the full scope of the promises simply because we are unwilling to meet the conditions.

The condition that we now look at is the third in a series of four, as a result of which Jesus will do even greater works in us than he himself did while on earth. It is the condition of obedience flowing from love. But we want to note, as we begin this study, that obedience and love are not only conditions for our doing "greater works" than Jesus' works, though that is true. They are also conditions for the exercise of effectual prayer, mentioned just a verse or two earlier. In these verses Jesus had expressed the conditions of effectual prayer as being prayer "in his name" and "that the Son may bring glory to the Father." Now it is as though he elaborates upon those thoughts, adding that it will also mean love for himself and obedience to his commands. If we do not desire these two things above all, all other petitions will remain unanswered. If we do desire them, they will be answered. As John later says in his first letter to the churches of Asia: "[We] receive from him anything we ask, because we obey his commands and do what pleases him" (1 John 3:22).

Having said this, however, we may also note that this verse rightly stands alone and therefore conveys lessons of itself. In particular, it teaches us about the proper relationship between love for Christ and Christ's commandments, and what the possession of both of them proves.

If We Love Jesus

The first lesson is the obvious lesson of the verse. It is that if we love Jesus, we must (and indeed will) keep his commandments. This truth is important, for it strikes at once at any perversion of the Christian faith by antinomianism.

Antinomianism is an unfamiliar word to most people, but it is not hard to understand. It is the view that the commandments of the Word of God have no proper place in Christianity. Usually the expressions of this view contrast law with grace in a way that eliminates the value of law entirely. Thus, in the name of grace the God of grace, who is also a God of holiness and justice, is eliminated. People are told that law is an enemy of grace, that the God of Sinai is a stern and unlovable deity who is rightly banished from the pages of the New Testament and that today the only possible guide for any ethical system is love. As might be expected, in this system outright disobedience to the commands of God is countenanced. Thus, marriages may be broken up, adultery sanctioned, contracts broken, parents rejected, worldly goods coveted, and countless other things eagerly embraced—so long as the actions do not "hurt" anyone and "love" remains the underlying motivation.

But this is a travesty. We admit, of course—indeed, we must proclaim it widely—that salvation is never by works, that it is always by grace. At this point law and grace are opposites. The Book of Galatians stands as a commanding witness to that fact. We will even admit that the proper way to live the Christian life is not by imposing a list of rules (even God-given rules) either upon ourselves or others. To do this may assure an outward conformity to a certain external expression of Christian character. But it does not change the heart. That is why love, not law, must lie at the heart of Christian ethics. In this, the exponents of situation ethics, or the new morality, are right. But having said this, we must immediately go on to add that any love that does not express itself in conformity with the commands of Christ is not the kind of love about which Christ was speaking. Indeed, it is a pseudo-love, a love that is false in itself and that deals falsely with the one espousing it.

A number of years ago, when the so-called "new morality" was at the crest of its popularity, a number of theologians met at one of our prestigious eastern seminaries to discuss it. Most were in favor of the new morality. So the discussion centered on the value of being free from rules and regulations, including those found in the Bible. "But there must be some guidelines," someone said. This was discussed, and at length it was decided that the only acceptable guideline was love. Anything that flowed from love was permissible. Anything was allowed so long as it did not hurt anyone.

While the discussion was progressing along these lines, a Roman Catholic priest, who had been invited to the discussion and who was in the room, became very quiet. At length his silence was noticeable. So the others turned to him and asked, "What do you think? Don't you agree that the only limiting factor in any ethical decision is love?"

The priest replied, "If you love me, keep my commandments." He was right. Love may be a valuable guideline, but only if it is love in conformity with the love of God and therefore also in conformity with the commandments he has given.

This does not devalue love, however, for the two go together. In fact, only love will succeed in moving us to keep the commandments. Here Maclaren has written wisely, "The principle that underlies these words, then, is this, that love is the foundation of obedience, and obedience is the sure outcome and result of love.... That is exactly what distinguishes and lifts the morality of the gospel above all other systems. The worst man in the world knows a great deal more of his duty than the best man does. It is not for want of knowledge that men go to the devil, but it is for want of power or will to live their knowledge. And what morality fails to do, with its clearest utterances of human duty, Christ comes and does. The one law is like the useless proclamations posted up in some rebellious district, where there is no army to back them, and the king's authority from whom they come is flouted. The other law gets itself obeyed. Such is the difference between the powerless morality of the world and the commandment of Jesus Christ. Here is the road plain and straight. What matters that, if there is no force to draw the cart along it? There might as well be no road at all. Here stand all your looms, polished and in perfect order, but there is no steam in the boilers; and so there is no motion, and nothing is woven. What we want is not law, but power, and what the gospel gives us, and stands alone in giving us, is not merely the knowledge of the will of God, and the clear revelation of what we ought to be, but the power to become it.

"Love does that, and love alone. That strong force brought into action in our hearts will drive out from thence all rivals, all false and low things. The true way to cleanse the Augean stables, as the old myth has it, was to turn the river into them. It would have been endless work to wheel out the filth in wheelbarrows loaded by spades: turn the stream in, and it will sweep away all the foulness. When the Ark comes into the Temple, Dagon lies, a mutilated stump, upon the threshold. When Christ comes into my heart, then all the obscene and twilight-loving shapes that lurked there and defiled it, will vanish like ghosts at cock-crowing before His calm and pure Presence. He, and He alone, entering my heart by the portals of my love, will coerce my evil and stimulate my good. And if I love Him, I shall keep His commandments."

By This We Know

There is a second lesson in this verse. It comes from the reverse of what we have been saying. Thus far we have said that if we truly love Christ, that is, if we love him with the kind of love about which he is speaking and with which he loves us, we will keep his commandments. But we may also say (for the proposition is reversible) that if we keep his commandments, we will love (and can know that we love) Jesus. This reversal is valid, for Jesus makes it himself just a few verses later: "Whoever has my commands and obeys them, he is the one who loves me. He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I too will love him and show myself to him" (v. 21). John also makes this point in his first letter: "We know that we have come to know him if we obey his commands.... But if anyone obeys his word, God's love is truly made complete in him. This is how we know we are in him" (1 John 2:3, 5).

But how does this happen? How can we be assured by obedience that we really are Christ's own?

The answer is in the nature of man. In their natural state, men and women are in rebellion against God. Consequently, it is not within them to want to obey God. This is precisely the point Maclaren was developing in the quotation that was given earlier. When a man or woman begins to obey God, first in responding to his offer of salvation in the Lord Jesus Christ and then in a growing desire to live a Christlike life, this is evidence of a divine and supernatural working in his or her life. It is proof that God is present and that he has already begun a regenerative work within the individual.

So take heart, Christian, and be assured of God's saving work in your life. None of this means that we therefore obey God completely, just because we are his. We still sin. That is why John writes, "If we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us" (1 John 1:8). But it does mean that if you detect within yourself a new yearning to please God, if sin begins to disturb you, if you increasingly long to be like Jesus, then God is at work; and you should rejoice in the truth that "he who began a good work in you will [keep on performing] it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:6).

Love One Another

There is a third truth in this verse, and it is also evident. If we read these words—"If you love me, you will obey what I command"—and then ask, as we must, "But what are Christ's commandments?" we are immediately led back to that greatest of all commandments, found in John 13: "A new command I give you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another" (v. 34). In other words, if we love Jesus, we must (and will) love other Christians. Do you love others? You must not be too quick to answer, for in the New Testament the love about which Jesus is speaking is very practical. It means at least three things.

First, it means service. This is evident from the context in which the new commandment was given. Jesus had just divested himself of his clothing, girded himself with a towel, and then had washed the disciples' feet. The disciples undoubtedly thought this was improper. Peter actually objected, saying, "You shall never wash my feet" (13:8). But Jesus corrected Peter and then taught them all: "You call me 'Teacher' and 'Lord,' and rightly so, for that is what I am. Now that I, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also should wash one another's feet. I have set you an example that you should do as I have done for you" (vv. 13-15). That is the picture Jesus gave of true Christianity. It is the attitude that divests itself of its own prerogatives in order to serve others.

Second, the practice of love means sacrifice. This means that we are not called to serve only when we can do so conveniently and at no cost to ourselves. It means that we are called to serve at our cost when we would much rather do something else. Jesus did this obviously; for his parable of service, washing the disciples' feet, was completed only when he had gone to the cross and there made the atonement by which alone they could be washed from the contamination of sin.

Finally, the practice of love also means sharing, sharing of ourselves, on the one hand, and sharing the gospel of God's grace in Jesus Christ, on the other. Jesus said, "Go into all the world and preach the good news to all creation" (Mark 16:15). He said, "Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you. And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:19-20). How can we claim to love Christ if we disregard this great commandment?

If We Love Others

The final point is a reversal of the third, just as the second point was a reversal of the first. It is this: if we love others, then we can know that we truly love Jesus and are one of his own. John says it clearly, "Do not be surprised, my brothers, if the world hates you. We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love our brothers. Anyone who does not love remains in death" (1 John 3:13-14). According to these words, we can be assured that we are truly born again if, in obedience to Christ's commands, we find ourselves beginning to love and actually loving others for whom he also died.

Jesus Loves Me

At this point we must return to the phrase with which our text began: "If you love me." Once again it raises the question: Do we? Do we really love Jesus? Some will hear this question and reply, humbly but nevertheless honestly, "Yes, I do; I really do love him." If that is the case, here is the way to show it—by loving others (as well as himself) and by doing what he desires.

Some will not be able to say this, though they may actually love Jesus more than they are aware they do. If you are one who would like to love him but who has not been able to do it, at least to your satisfaction, let me assure you that you will never learn to love by imposing it upon yourself as a duty. You will never love by saying, "I will love, I will love, I will love," any more than you can stop coughing by saying, "I will not cough." There is only one way in which you will come to love God, and that is by coming to know and believe in his love for you. Love provokes love. His love calls forth yours. Consequently, the way to love God is to learn that he loved you so much that he gave his only begotten Son for your salvation.

Torrey tells of a little girl who came to the great English preacher Mark Guy Pearse one day and, looking up into his face quite wistfully, said, "Mr. Pearse, I don't love Jesus. I wish I did love Jesus, but I don't love Jesus. Won't you please tell me how to love Jesus?"

The preacher looked down into those eager eyes and said to her, "Little girl, as you go home today keep saying to yourself, 'Jesus loves me. Jesus loves me. Jesus loves me.' And when you come back next Sunday I think you will be able to say, 'I love Jesus.'"

The next Sunday the little girl came up to him again, this time with happy eyes and a radiant face, and exclaimed, "Oh, Mr. Pearse, I do love Jesus, I do love Jesus. Last Sunday as I went home I kept saying to myself, 'Jesus loves me. Jesus loves me. Jesus loves me.' And I began to think about his love and I began to think how he died on the cross in my place, and I found my cold heart growing warm, and the first I knew it was full of love to Jesus."

That is the only way any of us ever learn to love Jesus. We begin by learning to believe what the Bible says when it tells us that we are the vilest of sinners but how, nevertheless, Jesus died in our place, the just for the unjust. It tells us that he has "borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows." It shows how he was "pierced for our transgressions" and "bruised for our iniquities," how "the punishment that brought us peace was upon him," how "with his stripes we are healed." We begin by believing on him as the Bible portrays him. Next we see his love and come to love him. Then, because we love him, we keep his commands.

Chapter 183.

That Other Comforter

John 14:16-18

The Christian church reaffirms its faith in the Holy Spirit every time it recites the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the Holy Ghost." But beyond this rather formal acknowledgment, in large sectors of the church one would be hard pressed to find a reference to the Third Person of the Trinity at all.

J. I. Packer has written of this ignorance: "Christian people are not in doubt as to the work that Christ did; they know that He redeemed men by His atoning death, even if they differ among themselves as to what exactly this involved. But the average Christian is in a complete fog as to what work the Holy Spirit does. Some talk of the Spirit of Christ in the way that one would talk of the Spirit of Christmas—as a vague cultural pressure making for bonhomie and religiosity.

Some think of the Spirit as inspiring the moral convictions of unbelievers like Gandhi, or the theosophical mysticism of a Rudolf Steiner. But most, perhaps, do not think of the Holy Spirit at all, and have no positive ideas of any sort about what He does. They are for practical purposes in the same position as the disciples whom Paul met at Ephesus—'We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost' (Acts 9:2)."

Why is this? It is hard to say why. But one thing is certain: It is an abnormal situation. It is abnormal from the viewpoint of Christ's teachings, for Christ clearly taught about the Holy Spirit. He did so in the verses we are studying in order to provide comfort to his disciples and to all who should follow them throughout the church age. Knowledge of the Holy Spirit and dependence upon the Holy Spirit are necessary conditions of doing those "greater things" that he mentions in verse 12. Ignorance of the Holy Spirit's work is also abnormal from the viewpoint of the author of the fourth Gospel, for he has shown his interest by including many verses about the Holy Spirit in the last discourses.

Personality or Power?

The first point we must settle in our minds in regard to the Holy Spirit is whether the Holy Spirit is a real person, whose work it is to get hold of us and use us, or whether the Holy Spirit is merely some vague power we are to get hold of and use to our benefit. This is important as a mere matter of truth; for either the Holy Spirit is a real person, or he is not. But it is also important on a practical level. If we think of the Holy Spirit as a mysterious power, our thought will continually be, "How can I get more of the Holy Spirit?" If we think of the Holy Spirit as a person, our thought will be, "How can the Holy Spirit have more of me?" The first thought is entirely pagan. The second is New Testament Christianity.

Reuben A. Torrey, who has written an excellent book on the Holy Spirit, carefully spells this out: "The conception of the Holy Spirit as a Divine influence or power that we are somehow to get hold of and use, leads to self-exaltation and self-sufficiency. One who so thinks of the Holy Spirit and who at the same time imagines that he has received the Holy Spirit will almost inevitably be full of spiritual pride and strut about as if he belonged to some superior order of Christians. One frequently hears such persons say, 'I am a Holy Ghost man,' or 'I am a Holy Ghost woman.' But if we once grasp the thought that the Holy Spirit is a Divine Person of infinite majesty, glory and holiness and power, who in marvelous condescension has come into our hearts to make His abode there and take possession of our lives and make use of them, it will put us in the dust and keep us in the dust. I can think of no thought more humbling or more overwhelming than the thought that a person of Divine majesty and glory dwells in my heart and is ready to use even me."

We see this difference illustrated in the pages of the New Testament, as we might expect. On the one hand, there is the case of Simon the magician, whose story is told in Acts 8:9-24. He apparently believed in Christ through the preaching of Philip at Samaria, for we are told that he "believed... and... was baptized" (v. 13). But he knew little about Christianity and therefore fell into the mistake of thinking that the Holy Spirit was a power to be purchased. He actually offered the disciples money in order to receive "it." To this, Peter, who was also in Samaria at the time, responded, "May your money perish with you, because you thought you could buy the gift of God with money! You have no part or share in this ministry, because your heart is not right before God. Repent of this wickedness and pray to the Lord. Perhaps he will forgive you for having such a thought in your heart" (vv. 20-22).

The other example is from the beginning of the missionary movement involving Paul and Barnabas. Of this we are told that "while they were worshiping the Lord and fasting, the Holy Spirit said, 'Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them'" (Acts 13:2). In the one case, an individual wanted to get and use God, whom he imagined to be merely a power. In the second case, God got and used two individuals.

Words or Reality?

We must admit that when we begin to talk about the Holy Spirit as a person, we are attempting to put into words something that is actually larger than words. What we are saying is that the Holy Spirit is one member of the Trinity, equal in all ways to both the Father and the Son. But we are not saying that there are three gods, which the term "member" or even "person" seems to imply. There are three persons; but in a way which is beyond our understanding these three are also one. We also confess as the Old Testament does, "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one" (Deut. 6:4).

In these verses Jesus speaks of the Holy Spirit saying, "And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth. The world cannot accept him, because it neither sees him nor knows him. But you know him, for he lives with you and will be in you." This is a great promise, but it is great precisely because of the personality of the Spirit. If the Spirit were only a power, the promise would be in the nature of a compensation—"I am going to be taken from you, but I will give you something to make up for my departure." This is not what this verse is talking about. It is not a thing that is being given, but rather another divine personality that is being sent. This one must have knowledge, for he will know of the disciples' distress. He must have feelings, for he will identify with them in their distress and comfort them. He must have will, for he will determine to carry out this commission.

The personality of the Holy Spirit is evident from the Scriptures in other ways also. One commentator has summed up the evidence in the following six propositions:

1. The personal actions ascribed to the Holy Spirit prove his personality. An example is John 14:16-18, for there he is promised as a Counselor for Christians. One other example is 1 Corinthians 12:11, in which he is said to be at work in Christians, imparting those spiritual gifts necessary for the well-being of the church.

2. His distinction from the Father and Son and his mission from both prove his personality. Jesus indicates this relationship by saying, "When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me" (John 15:26).

3. The coordinate rank and power that belong to the Holy Spirit equally with the Father and the Son prove it. All trinitarian benedictions make this point clearly. Thus, "Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28:19). Or again, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all." (2 Cor. 13:14).

4. The appearance of the Holy Spirit under a visible form at the baptism of the Lord Jesus Christ and on the day of Pentecost proves it. Of the former event it is written, "And the Holy Spirit descended on him in bodily form like a dove. And a voice came from heaven: 'You are my Son, whom I love; with you I am well pleased'" (Luke 3:22). Of the second instance it is written, "They saw what seemed to be tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of them" (Acts 2:3).

5. The sin against the Holy Spirit proves it, for this implies offense against a personality. It is mentioned in Matthew 12:31-32.
6. The way in which the Holy Spirit is distinguished from his gifts also proves that he is a person and not merely a spiritual force or power. Thus, in 1 Corinthians 12, after having enumerated the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, faith, healing, miracles, prophecy, the discerning of spirits, tongues, and the interpretation of tongues, Paul writes, "But all these are the work of one and the same Spirit, and he gives them to each one, just as he determines."

Here are six separate and conclusive lines of argument showing that the Holy Spirit is a person. But the problem we have is still probably not so much the doctrine itself as our attitude toward him. Theoretically we probably do believe that the Holy Spirit is a person, the third person of the Godhead. But do we actually think about him in this way? Perhaps we do what a woman did who had attended a series of messages on the Holy Spirit at a Bible conference years ago. She listened carefully and then came up to the speaker to thank him for his teaching. She said, "Before your messages I never thought of it as a person." Apparently she was not thinking of him as a person even then.

Is He God?

The first point that the Lord Jesus makes in his teaching about the Holy Spirit is that he is a person, as we have seen. But what sort of a person is he? Is he an angel? Is he a being superior to an angel but inferior to both the Father and the Son? Or is he equal to the Father and the Son? Is he God? Actually, we have already begun to answer these questions in talking about the personality of the Spirit, but the answer is also taught in the verses that constitute our text.

Here the Lord speaks of the Holy Spirit as "another Counselor." It is important in understanding

Christ's words to notice that there are two different words for "another" in the Greek New Testament. One word is allos, the word we have here; it means "another just like the first one." The second word, heteros, means "totally different." Since there are these two words with two meanings it is always important to know which one is used whenever the word "another" occurs in the English text. It is the first word, the word meaning "another exactly like the first one," that is used when Jesus speaks of sending the disciples "another Counselor."

Who is the first Counselor? It is obviously Jesus himself. Therefore, the second Counselor is to be just like him. That is, he is to be another divine being living with them and in them.

Once again, as in the matter of the personality of the Holy Spirit, other parts of Scripture reinforce this teaching. We may summarize the points thus:

1. Divine attributes are ascribed to the Spirit. The word "holy" is itself a divine attribute, at least in its most exalted sense. So also are the attributes of omniscience (1 Cor. 2:10-11; John 16:1213), omnipotence (Luke 1:35), and omnipresence (Ps. 139:7-10).
2. Works that are exclusively the works of God are attributed to the Holy Spirit. Creation is one example. In the Book of Job we read, "By his breath the skies became fair" (26:13) and 'The Spirit of God has made me" (33:4). The Holy Spirit is described as the One who imparts life, another divine work (John 3:6; Rom 8:11). He is the One responsible for the giving forth of the Word of God, the Bible. "For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21).
3. The Holy Spirit is ranked coordinate with God the Father and God the Son. The benedictions cited earlier are examples of this.
4. The name of God is indirectly given to him. The clearest example of this is in Acts 5:3-4, where Peter says to Ananias, "Ananias, how is it that Satan has so filled your heart that you have lied to the Holy Spirit?... Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God."

Practical Theology

Does it really matter that we know and constantly recognize that the Holy Spirit is divine? Yes, it does, for if we know and constantly recognize his deity, we will recognize and rely on his work. If we do not, then we will foolishly rely on our own limited wisdom, love, strength and other resources, and forfeit that which he alone can provide.

In his writings on the Holy Spirit to which I referred at the start of this study, J. I. Packer asks these pertinent questions: "Do we honour the Holy Spirit by recognising and relying on His work? Or do we slight Him by ignoring it, and thereby dishonour, not merely the Spirit, but the Lord who sent Him? In our faith: do we acknowledge the authority of the Bible, the prophetic Old Testament and the apostolic New Testament which He inspired? Do we read and hear it with the reverence and receptiveness that are due to the Word of God? If not, we dishonour the Holy Spirit. In our life: do we apply the authority of the Bible, and live by the Bible, whatever men may say against it, recognising that God's word cannot but be true, and that what God has said He certainly means, and will stand to? If not, we dishonour the Holy Spirit, who gave us the Bible. In our witness: do we remember that the Holy Spirit alone, by His witness, can authenticate our witness, and look to Him to do so, and trust Him to do so, and show the reality of our trust, as Paul did, by eschewing the gimmicks of human cleverness? If not, we dishonour the Holy Spirit."

The personality and deity of the Holy Spirit, as well as other truths about him, are practical teachings. What remains is that we take them down off the shelf of high theology and put them to work in our lives.

Chapter 184.
The Role of the Holy Spirit

John 14:16-18

"And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth. The world cannot accept him, because it neither sees him nor knows him. But you know him, for he lives with you and will be in you. I will not leave you as orphans; I will come to you."

There are many things we may want to learn about a person when we are first getting to know him or her. But in most cases our first questions are two: first, Who are you? and, second, What do you do? The first can be answered by a name, followed by a brief description of where the person comes from and to whom he is related. The second generally deals with the person's occupation. We may follow a similar procedure in these introductory studies to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the last study we asked: "Who are you?" We saw that the Holy Spirit is a divine being, equal to God the Father and God the Son in all respects. Now we want to ask what the Holy Spirit does.

Christ Glorified

In one sense the question is nearly unanswerable, for if the Holy Spirit is God, as he is, then all that God the Father does and God the Son does, the Holy Spirit also does. Thus, it is proper to say that the Holy Spirit created the universe, planned the great work of redemption, was active in the entire ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ, raised him from the dead, called forth and is directing the church, and will one day bring all things together in subjection to him who is the Father of all. Indeed, there are verses in the Bible that make these points, as we have seen.

On the other hand, we must also recognize that the Bible emphasizes different activities for each of the three members of the Godhead, according to which it is possible to say, for example, that the Father is principally active in the work of creation and that the Son is principally active in the redemption of our race. Therefore, although it is almost impossible to say all that the Spirit does in the first sense, it is possible to speak of the primary emphasis of his ministry in the second.

So what does the Holy Spirit primarily do? Some would answer by saying that the Holy Spirit is active most of all in the sanctification of Christians or in the inspiration of the Bible or in giving specific gifts to individuals within the church. These things are true, but they are not the best answers. The best answer is found in John 16:13-14, in which the Lord Himself says of the Spirit's work, "But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you." These verses tell us that the role of the Holy Spirit is primarily to glorify Christ. Indeed, when they are correctly understood, all the other activities that might be mentioned—sanctification, inspiration, the imparting of gifts, even the work of creation—are included within this one great and overriding purpose.

So we can learn a lesson from this, right at the beginning. We are told that the Holy Spirit will not speak of himself, but of Jesus. Therefore, we may conclude that any emphasis upon the person and work of the Spirit that detracts from the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ is not the Spirit's doing. It is the work of another spirit, the spirit of antichrist, whose work it is to detract from Jesus (cf. 1 John 4:2-3). Important as he is, the Holy Spirit is never to preempt the place of Jesus in our thinking. On the other hand, wherever Jesus is exalted—in whatever way— there the Third Person of the Trinity is at work.

Spirit of Truth

How specifically does the Holy Spirit glorify the Lord Jesus Christ? He does so in four areas.

First, the Holy Spirit has glorified Jesus (past tense) by teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ in the Scriptures. This is deeply involved in the teaching of these last discourses, for one of the points Jesus makes is that after he would be gone, the Holy Spirit would lead the disciples into all the truth concerning Jesus, and as a result of this they would be able to preach the true gospel and record infallibly, in the pages of the New Testament, the teachings of Jesus and the meaning of his teachings and ministry. This is what he is talking about when he says, "When the Counselor comes ... he will testify about me" (John 15:26). Or again, "I have much more to say to you, more than you can now bear. But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all [the] truth" (16:12-13).

This is a tremendous word for the disciples. They knew, no doubt, that in the Old Testament period the Holy Spirit had come upon certain prophets, kings, and other leaders in order to speak through them in what eventually came to be the Old Testament. They might even have known— though they undoubtedly came to know it more fully after the resurrection—that the central message of the Old Testament was the promise of God to send a Redeemer, who was the Lord Jesus Christ. Now they are told that the same Holy Spirit, who inspired the Old Testament so that those living in the Old Testament period might anticipate the Messiah and look to him for salvation, is going to come upon them—indeed, be in them—so that nothing about Christ's work or teachings necessary for our salvation and the growth and ordering of the church might be lost.

That is precisely what happened. Some of the events and teachings they recorded were things they had heard and seen and that they remembered. Other points were revealed to them later for the first time. In both cases these men were led by the Holy Spirit. In fact, it was as true of them as Peter said it was of the Old Testament authors: "For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21).

In this work the Holy Spirit amply glorified the Lord Jesus Christ, for he prepared for his coming through the inspiration of the Old Testament that told men what to expect and when to expect him. Then he preserved the story of his coming and gave the only true interpretation of it through the inspiration of the New Testament books.

Born of God

Second, the Holy Spirit glorifies the Lord Jesus Christ by drawing men and women to him. This has been discussed so often in our exposition of John's Gospel that it does not need to be presented fully now. We need only to point out that apart from this activity of the Holy Spirit, irrespective of the inspiration of the Bible, no one would ever have come to Jesus.

The verses about the Holy Spirit that we are studying make this plain. Apart from the work of the Holy Spirit in leading men and women to Christ, no one can either see, know, or receive spiritual things. They cannot see because they are spiritually blind. As Jesus said, "Unless a man is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (John 3:3). They cannot know because the things of the Spirit "are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). They cannot receive either the Holy Spirit or the Lord Jesus Christ because, as Jesus said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (John 6:44).

The Holy Spirit opens blind eyes so that the unregenerate may see the truth. He unfogs their minds so that they may understand what they see, and then gently woos their wills until they come to place their faith in the Savior. Without this work there would not be a single Christian in the world. By means of it the Holy Spirit saves us and glorifies the Lord Jesus.

Reproducing Christ

Third, the Holy Spirit glorifies the Lord Jesus Christ by reproducing him in believers. He does this in three ways: (1) by leading the Christian to greater victory over sin, (2) by praying for him and by teaching him to pray, and (3) by showing him God's will for his life and enabling him to walk in it.

Here the meaning of the word "counselor" or "comforter" is of great importance. It is unfortunate from the point of view of our trying to understand this term that in the English language "comfort" has been watered down so that it now means little more than a half-hearted attempt to console someone, or that which consoles. It can, for example, be a Linus blanket. In fact, that is not far off linguistically, for one use of the word "comforter" is to describe a certain kind of quilt. That is often what we have in mind when we think of comfort. Comfortable! We think of rolling up in our blanket and consoling ourselves from the hard knocks of this world.

That is not what the word means in the Bible, though a certain measure of consolation is involved in it. To understand the biblical word, we need to go back to the Latin words that lie behind our word "comfort." There are two of them. The first is cum (which has had its vowel changed in the process of taking it over into English). It is a preposition meaning "with." The second is fortis, from which we get our words fortification, fortify, fortissimo (Italian), fortitude, and fortress. It means "strong" or "strengthen." Put them together, and you have the true meaning of "comforter." A comforter is one who is with you to strengthen you. He is, as one commentator writes, "a ramrod down your backbone to make you stand for the truth; to make you take the right side, even though it's the minority side. The Comforter gives you strength to stand up in face of something that is vile and evil."

This is what the Holy Spirit did with Peter. Peter had denied the Lord on the night of his arrest because he was afraid of a little girl who was only a doorkeeper. But on the day of Pentecost, after the Holy Spirit had come, Peter stood up to preach the gospel before the men who had crucified Jesus, saying, "Men of Israel, listen to this: Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him, as you yourselves know. This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross. But God raised him from the dead, freeing him from the agony of death, because it was impossible for death to keep its hold on him.... Therefore let all Israel be assured of this: God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:22-24, 36). The Holy Spirit gave Peter a backbone, making him like Jesus, and through him brought glory to the Lord.

Thus far, in trying to understand the word "Comforter" we have only dealt with the meaning of the English word, which comes from the Latin. When we go beyond the English word to the Greek word we find an entirely new, though related, area of meaning, which in turn teaches us more about the Spirit's ministry. The Greek word in this text is paraklētos. The first two syllables, para, are the Greek word meaning "alongside of." We have it in English words such as parable, paradox, parallax, and parallel. The second two syllables, klētos, means "called," as in the Greek word for "church" (ekklēsia) meaning the ones who are "called out." Paraklētos therefore means "one who is called alongside of another person as that person's helper.

Incidentally, in the Latin Vulgate the word is translated, not by any variation on our word
"comforter" but by the word advocatus, which gives us the word "advocate." Ad means
"alongside of." Vocatus is from vocare, meaning "to call." So advocatus also means "one who is called alongside of" another person as that person's helper. Advocate is Latin. Paraclete is Greek. But the meaning of the two words is identical.

This idea is further substantiated in 1 John 2:1, although in this case the word paraklētos is actually translated "advocate." There we read, "My dear children, I write this to you so that you will not sin. But if anybody does sin, we have one who speaks to the Father, in our defense— Jesus Christ, the Righteous One."

These two are working together for us. Moreover, they are praying for us. We know that the Lord Jesus Christ is praying for us, because in Hebrews 7:25 it says, "Therefore, he [that is, Christ] is able to save completely those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them." He is praying for us in heaven. We know that the Holy Spirit is praying for us and helping us to pray, because in Romans 8:26 we are told, "In the same way, the Spirit helps in our weakness. We do not know what we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express."

What should trouble us then? Nothing! We cannot be troubled about our salvation; Christ has purchased it for us, and the Holy Spirit has sealed it to our hearts. Moreover, they are both free to plead our case before the Father. "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies. Who is he that condemns? Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us" (Rom. 8:33-34). We cannot be troubled about our growth into the image of the Lord Jesus Christ either, for this is the goal of the Spirit's work within us. Paul says: "through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit" (Rom. 8:2-4).

Christian Service

The fourth way in which the Holy Spirit glorifies the Lord Jesus Christ is by directing Christ's followers into Christian service and sustaining them in it. This was to be true of the disciples, as most of the verses about the Holy Spirit in the last discourses indicate; he was to direct them in the future in precisely the way Jesus had directed them in the past. This is also true for those who have come after these early followers of our Lord.

One example is in the passage I mentioned briefly, and for another reason, in the last study: Acts 13:2 and the verses that follow. We read in those verses, "While they were worshiping the Lord and fasting, the Holy Spirit said, 'Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them.' So after they had fasted and prayed, they placed their hands on them and sent them off. The two of them, sent on their way by the Holy Spirit, went down to Seleucia and sailed from there to Cyprus" (vv. 2-4). It is clear from these verses that the Holy Spirit calls men and women into definite lines of Christian work and goes with them as they go forth into this work. That is, he not only calls them into Christian work in a general way; he calls in a specific way, pointing to a definite field of endeavor.

Has he led you in such service? Is he leading? If not, you need to begin by wanting that leading and then by seeking it, expecting the Holy Spirit to give guidance.

Chapter 185.
The Fullness of the Holy Spirit

John 14:16-18

In our last study of the Holy Spirit we saw that one of the reasons why the Spirit is given to Christians is to reproduce the character of Christ within them. That is the idea behind the word "Counselor" or "Comforter," for the Comforter is one who is called alongside the Christian to strengthen him or help him in his Christian walk. But this does not always happen, as we know.

What is wrong when Christians fail to live as Christ in this world? The answer given in Scripture is that they have not allowed the Holy Spirit to have his way in their lives. They have "quenched" the Spirit or "grieved" him (1 Thess. 5:19; Eph. 4:30). Consequently, these are urged to "walk" in the Spirit or "be filled" with him (Gal. 5:16; Eph. 5:18). This use of language suggests that, while in the matter of redemption the Holy Spirit works in utter sovereignty, choosing whom he will and rejecting whom he will, in the matter of Christian growth there is by contrast a large measure of human responsibility. True, we can no more sanctify ourselves than we can redeem ourselves. God must do both. But having been made alive by God first, we can nevertheless cooperate in or resist the Holy Spirit's subsequent prodding.

To understand these truths and profit by them it is important that we understand what the Bible is talking about when it speaks of the "filling" of the Holy Spirit and why this is a necessary and continuous experience for every growing Christian.

The Baptism of the Spirit

We must begin with a negative consideration, however; and the negative consideration is that the "filling" of the Holy Spirit is not the same thing as the "baptism" of the Holy Spirit. What is the baptism of the Holy Spirit? The only answer that can honestly be given to that question is the answer that the Bible itself gives, and for that we must look at passages where the term "baptism of the Holy Spirit" occurs. There are seven of them in the New Testament.

Five of these are prophetic in nature; that is, they look forward to the pouring out of God's Spirit upon his people in accordance with Old Testament prophecies such as Isaiah 32:15; 44:3 and Joel 2:28. The distinctive feature about them is that they are related to the ministry of Jesus Christ. Thus, on four occasions John the Baptist is quoted as saying, "I baptize you with water for repentance. But after me will come one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (Matt. 3:11; parallels in Mark 1:7-8; Luke 3:16; and John 1:33). In the fifth instance Jesus is himself quoted as telling the disciples to wait in Jerusalem for the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost: "For John baptized with water, but in a few days you will be baptized with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 1:5). In the Greek of these verses Jesus is called "the Baptist" or "the Baptizer" because it is a characteristic of his ministry to baptize with the Holy Spirit, just as John is called "the Baptist" because it was a characteristic of his ministry to baptize with water.

The sixth of the seven references to the baptism of the Holy Spirit is historic (Acts 11:16). It refers to the gift of the Holy Spirit to the household of Cornelius simultaneously with the belief of these people in Jesus as a result of Peter's preaching. The reference is significant because it shows that the Holy Spirit was to be given to Gentiles just as it had previously been given to Jews; in other words, there were not to be two levels or ranks of Christians within the church.

The seventh reference is the most important because it is didactic; that is, it is a teaching passage rather than just a descriptive one and, therefore, gives us the doctrine upon which the other passages are to be interpreted. This passage is 1 Corinthians 12:13, in which Paul writes, "For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body—whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free—and we were all given the one Spirit to drink." Two things immediately strike us about this verse. First, the emphasis is upon the unity of Christians. The Christians at Corinth had allowed their emphasis upon spiritual gifts to divide them, but Paul writes to stress that they are actually one. His key argument is that they have been baptized by one Spirit into the one body of Christ. This is an immediate and obvious rebuke to anyone who would allow an emphasis upon a so-called "baptism of the Holy Spirit," defined as a second work of grace, to divide Christians and destroy fellowship.

The second and related emphasis of this verse is upon the universality of this experience for all believers. Here the word "all" is decisive, for Paul writes that "we were all baptized" and "were all given the one Spirit to drink." In other words, the baptism of the Holy Spirit, rather than being something that is a secondary and special experience for some Christians, is actually the initial experience of all by which, indeed, they have become Christians in the first place.

John R. W. Stott, in a valuable study of these verses, summarizes the evidence like this: "The 'gift' or 'baptism' of the Spirit, one of the distinctive blessings of the new covenant, is a universal blessing for members of the covenant, because it is an initial blessing. It is part and parcel of belonging to the new age. The Lord Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant and the bestower of its blessings, gives both the forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Spirit to all who enter his covenant. Further, baptism with water is the sign and seal of baptism with the Spirit, as much as it is of the forgiveness of sins. Water-baptism is the initiatory Christian rite, because Spiritbaptism is the initiatory Christian experience."

The baptism of the Holy Spirit is for all Christians. In fact, if a person has not received it, he is not a Christian; for the baptism of the Holy Spirit is the same as being identified with Christ through saving faith. Moreover, in case we doubt this, we need to note that there is not a single instance in the New Testament in which any believer is urged or commanded to be baptized with the Holy Spirit for the simple reason that he cannot be urged to seek something that has already taken place in his life.

Filled with the Spirit

Having made this point, however, we must immediately go on to say that, although there is no command to be baptized with the Holy Spirit, there is, nevertheless, a clear command to be "filled with the Spirit," as I pointed out at the beginning of this study (Eph. 5:18).

At this point some will be saying that the distinction just made between being baptized with the Spirit and being filled with the Spirit is a meaningless one. "For what is the point of denying that we are to seek to be baptized with the Holy Spirit," someone might argue, "if in the next breath we admit that we are to be filled with the Holy Spirit, which is the same thing?" But are they the same thing? The point is that they are not and, moreover, that much of the false teaching we have concerning the Holy Spirit comes from failing to see this. For example, the baptism of the Holy Spirit has been closely linked to the experience of speaking in tongues, because the phrase is so often used of Pentecost where that took place. But this took place at Pentecost primarily to indicate that the new age had begun. By contrast, the filling with the Holy Spirit is associated with a wide variety of experiences (tongues being only one among many) and has a different emphasis entirely.

Here again we must go to the texts in which the words "fullness" or "filled with the Holy Spirit" occur. There are fourteen of them—four of them being descriptions of events or circumstances that took place before Pentecost and that are therefore more in line with Old Testament references and experiences, and ten, of events or circumstances after Pentecost. The first four are all in Luke. They refer to Christ (4:1), John the Baptist (1:15), Elizabeth, the mother of John (1:41), and Zacharias, John's father (1:67). Nine of the remaining ten are in the Book of Acts and are descriptive. The last is Ephesians 5:18, in which the command to be "filled with the Holy Spirit" is given.

In the nine verses from Acts, we notice that the company waiting in the upper room on the day of Pentecost was filled with the Spirit (2:4); that Peter received a special filling before speaking to the Sanhedrin (4:8); that the early Christians were filled with the Spirit on one occasion following prayer, as a result of which they began to speak "the word of God with boldness" (4:31); that the first deacons were chosen as being men "full of the Spirit" (6:3); that Stephen, the first martyr, being "full of the Holy Spirit," saw Jesus standing at the right hand of the Father and testified of this fact (7:55); that Paul was filled with the Spirit when Ananias placed his hands upon him, Ananias having been sent to Paul following his experience on the road to Damascus (9:17); that Paul was "filled with the Holy Spirit" on another occasion as a result of which he confronted Elymas, the sorcerer, on Paphos (13:6); and that Barnabas (11:24) and the disciples at Antioch (13:52) were also each filled with the Spirit in other instances.

What is characteristic of these nine descriptions? It is not any external or supernatural manifestation of the Spirit such as a speaking in tongues, for that is associated only with the one reference to the filling with the Spirit at Pentecost. The only thing that is characteristic of all nine passages is that in every instance the person or group of persons who received the filling immediately began to testify to the Christian gospel. That is, they began to bear witness to Christ. The 120 did so at Pentecost. Peter did so before the Sanhedrin. So did the early disciples mentioned in Acts 4. Stephen, Paul, Barnabas, and the disciples at Antioch are other examples. In fact, the only apparent exception is the reference to the first deacons. But, on closer examination, even this is seen to be not a true exception, for we are not told of a filling of the deacons by the Spirit. We are only told that they were men who gave evidence that their lives had already been filled by the Spirit. This was known, no doubt, by the fact that they already were active as witnesses. Moreover, the account of the choice of these deacons is immediately followed by the account of the death of one of them (Stephen), which contains a particularly effective witness.

So the first and most distinguishing mark of a filling with the Holy Spirit is that the person thus filled will be speaking of Jesus. He will not speak of his experience. He will not speak of the need for others to have his experience. He will speak of Jesus. At this point we inevitably come back to Jesus' own words in John 16:12-14: "I have much more to say to you, more than you can now bear. But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you."

We may conclude from this that a filling with the Holy Spirit is the secret of any successful witness of the church to Christ in any age.

Fruit of the Spirit

However, we need to correct what may be a misunderstanding. Some may notice the emphasis of these verses upon testimony and immediately come to the conclusion that the Spirit's fullness has to do only with words. That is not correct, for obviously words are ineffective unless there is a godly life behind them to validate them. Here the command to be filled with the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18) comes in; for when it is read in context, it has to do with Christian living.

To be sure, it also has to do with speaking. For no sooner has Paul said, "Be filled with the Spirit," than he goes on to add, "speak to one another with psalms, hymns and spiritual songs. Sing and make music in your heart to the Lord, always giving thanks to God the Father for everything, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (vv. 19-20). But it is ethical, too. Being filled with the Spirit is contrasted with being drunk with wine. That kind of filling, along with the debauchery associated with it, was characteristic of the culture in which the Ephesian Christians lived. Besides, the exhortation is immediately followed by much practical instruction, including the way in which husbands and wives are to live together within a Christian marriage, the necessity for children to obey their parents, the duties of servants, Christian warfare with Satan, and the ministry of intercessory prayer. The context leads us to think of the fruit of the Spirit as that is detailed for us in the letter to the Galatians: "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfullness, gentleness, self-control" (5:22-23).

We may divide the results of the fullness of the Spirit as portrayed in Ephesians 5 into two parts, as Stott does in his handling of the passage. There is the part directed toward God, which includes both worship and testimony, and there is the part directed toward man expressed in godly living and fellowship. Writes Stott, "It is in these spiritual qualities and activities, not in supernatural phenomena, that we should look for evidence of the Holy Spirit's fullness." He concludes by noting that this is always "the apostle's emphasis when he is dealing with the subject in the Corinthian, Galatian and Ephesian epistles."

How to Be Filled

Having distinguished between the "baptism" of the Spirit and the "filling" or "fullness" of the Spirit, and having described what the fullness of the Holy Spirit means, we come to the practical question: How then may I be filled with the Spirit? What is my responsibility? What are the steps? If we turn to the Bible for the answers, as we are wise to do, we find that there are three conditions for filling. First, we must not "put out the Spirit's fire" (1 Thess. 5:19). Second, we must not "grieve" the Spirit (Eph. 4:30). Third, we must "live by" the Spirit (Gal. 5:16). The first two are important, but negative. The third is the most important of the three.

No one can say how this will work out in every case, for God's people are different and function differently. But it will at least mean that you will want to keep short accounts with God. Perhaps you will begin each day with a brief thanksgiving for a good night's sleep and a request for guidance in the day's activities. Following the rush of breakfast you may review the day with God as you ride to your job or work in your home. As problems come up throughout the day, you will take these to him, sometimes in brief prayers (for we do not always have a great deal of time to pray when we are working), and you will ask for his direction and the ability to live as the Lord Jesus Christ would do in that situation. At night you will read the Bible and pray. If you are part of a family, you will pray together, talking about the events of the day in the light of God's Word. Finally, before you retire for the night, you will commit the day to God and confess known sin or shortcomings to him. Then you will rest, knowing that he will watch over you and your loved ones.

This means that you will walk with God the Holy Spirit as surely as if he were a visible person accompanying you throughout your day, and you will draw on his strength and counsel. If you will do this—yield to him, confess known sin, and obey him moment by moment—then he will fill you and make you a faithful witness to the Lord.

Chapter 186.
Gifts and Fruit

John 14:16-18

A number of years ago, when Christian bumper stickers had just become popular, a Christian drove up behind a car whose bumper had the sign: "Honk if you know Jesus." He had never seen a sign like this before but thought it was a cute idea. So he blew his horn, expecting the driver in front to wave, smile, or show a "one way" sign. Instead, the driver rolled down the window and shouted back. "Stop blowing your blankety-blank horn. Can't you see I'm waiting for a red light?"

The story is funny because we recognize that, if a person claims to be a Christian, then a certain standard of conduct may be expected of him. We do not expect him to be perfect, but we do expect him to show some of the fruit of Christian character exemplified so noticeably by the Lord Jesus Christ. Paul wrote of it in his letter to the Galatians: "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control" (Gal. 5:22-23). We are right to expect this, for one of the goals of the Holy Spirit of God, by whom one becomes a Christian, is to reproduce this character, the character of the Lord Jesus Christ, within us. We touched on this in our second study of the Holy Spirit, for there we saw that one way in which the Holy Spirit glorifies Christ is by reproducing the character of Christ within the individual believer. The subject is related to our third study also, for if we are filled with the Spirit, then we will not fulfill the lust of the flesh (Gal. 5:16); rather, the fruit of the Spirit will abound.

One Fruit

The most important thing that can be said about the fruit of the Spirit is that it is one fruit and that it is therefore to be present in its entirety within each Christian. That is why the word is singular ("fruit") instead of plural ("fruits"). This is not true of the "gifts" of the Spirit to which we come next, for they are given to one or another Christian by the Spirit as the Spirit wills. Thus, one may be a teacher, another a pastor, still another an evangelist, and so on. There are different gifts; no one possesses them all. By contrast, each and every Christian is to possess all the Spirit's fruit. The reason for this is in the nature of the fruit itself, for when we ask, "But what is this fruit?" the fullest answer is that it is simply the likeness of the Lord Jesus Christ in his followers. Christ cannot be divided, nor can the likeness of Christ. So if Christ is present within, the character of Christ will begin to show itself in its fullness.

1. It is appropriate that love should lead the list of the Spirit's fruit; for "God is love" (1 John 4:8), and the greatest of all Christian virtues is love (1 Cor. 13:13). Divine love gives this word its character; for God's love is great (Eph. 2:4), unmerited (Rom. 5:8), transforming (Rom. 5:5), and unchangeable (Rom. 8:35-39). God's love sent Christ to die for our sin. Now, because the Spirit of Christ, which is characterized by love, is implanted within the Christian, the believer is to show a great, transforming, sacrificial, and unmerited love both to other Christians and to the world. It is by this that the world is to know that Christians are indeed Christ's followers (John 13:35).

2. Joy is the virtue that corresponds in the Christian life to mere happiness. On the surface they are related. But happiness is dependent on circumstances—when fortunate circumstances are removed happiness is removed with them—while joy is not thus dependent. A Christian can be joyful, therefore, even in the midst of great suffering.

3. Peace is God's gift to mankind, achieved by him at the cross of Christ. Before the cross we were at enmity with God. Now we are at peace, God having made peace with us. We are to show the effects of that peace in all circumstances through what we would call "peace of mind" (Phil. 4:6-7). It is to reign in the home (1 Cor. 7:12-16), between the Jew and the Gentile (Eph. 2:1417), within the church (Eph. 4:3; Col. 3:15), and in the relationships of the believer with all men (Heb. 12:14).

4. Patience is the virtue of putting up with others, even when that virtue is severely tried. It is often used of God who shows great patience in his dealings with fallen and rebellious men and women.

5. Kindness is that attitude out of which God acts toward men. If the Christian is to be kind, he must act toward others as God has acted toward him.

6. Goodness is similar to kindness, but it is most often reserved for situations in which the recipient does not merit the goodness. It is linked to generosity.

7. Faithfulness is trustworthiness or reliability. This virtue involves truth which in turn is part of the character of God. It is the virtue that will make a servant of Christ die rather than renounce his profession or, to put it on a less exalted plane, will make him suffer great inconvenience rather than go back on his word. The one who is faithful will do what he says he will do; and he will not quit when the going gets tough. This word is also descriptive of the character of Christ, the faithful witness (Rev. 1:5), and of God the Father who always acts thus in regard to his people (1 Cor. 1:9; 10:13; 1 Thess. 5:24; 2 Thess. 3:3).

8. Gentleness is the virtue of the man who is so much in control of himself that he is always angry at the right time (as against sin) and never angry at the wrong time. It was the preeminent virtue of Moses, who is praised for being the meekest man who ever lived (Num. 12:3).

9. The final manifestation of the Spirit's fruit is self-control, the quality that gives victory over fleshly desires and that is therefore closely related to chastity both of mind and conduct. Barclay notes that it "is that great quality which comes to a man when Christ is in his heart, that quality which makes him able to live and to walk in the world, and yet to keep his garments unspotted from the world."

Fruitful Christians

What makes the difference between a fruitful Christian and a nonfruitful one or, as we may also say, between one who produces the fruit of the Spirit and one who exhibits only the works of the flesh? One answer to that question is suggested by the image of fruit bearing. Here we turn to John 15 in which the Lord Jesus Christ says to his disciples, "I am the true vine, and my Father is the gardener. He cuts off every branch in me that bears no fruit, while every branch that does bear fruit he prunes so that it will be even more fruitful.... Remain in me, and I will remain in you. No branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me. I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing" (vv. 1-2, 4-5). This answer has three parts.

First, in order to be fruitful, the branch, which bears the fruit, must be attached to the vine. That is, it must be alive and not merely a dead piece of wood. In spiritual terms this means that the individual must first of all be a Christian. Without the life of Christ within only the acts of the sinful nature are possible: sexual immorality, impurity and debauchery, idolatry and witchcraft, hatred, discord, jealousy, fits of rage, selfish ambition, dissensions, factions and envy, drunkenness, orgies,, and the like (Gal. 5:19-21). The fruit of the Spirit becomes possible when the life of Christ, conveyed by the Spirit of Christ, flows through the Christian.

Second, there must be cultivation. This is the point of the opening statement in which Christ terms the Father "the gardener." This means that God cares for us, exposing us to the sunshine of his presence, enriching the soil in which we are planted, and seeing to it that we are protected from spiritual drought. If we would be fruitful, we must therefore stay close to God through prayer, feed on his Word, and keep close company with other Christians.

Finally, there must be pruning. This can be unpleasant at times, for it means that things we treasure will be removed from our lives. Sometimes it may involve suffering. But there is a purpose in the pruning, and that makes all the difference. The purpose is to bring forth more fruit in our lives. William Fitch has written on this theme, "Pruning is an art which only a great master can really employ; and God is such an artist. He knows the branches in each bush that are not bearing fruit. He cuts them down. We should be grateful for such wonderful care. He never gives up. He is determined that his children should 'grow in grace' and that thereby they should manifest the fruit of Christian grace in all its purity and glory. So the heavenly husbandman works with us, cleanses us, prunes where necessary, and plants a crop. Do we flinch? Perhaps, but we do not lose courage when we know that there is a purpose in our pain."

Gifts of the Spirit

But God does more than simply work from within us as individuals. He also surrounds us with external helps, especially in the form of Christian ministries. These are the gifts of the Spirit. So the gifts of the Spirit (as well as the fruit of the Spirit) must be studied. There are three major New Testament passages in which these gifts are discussed: Romans 12:6-8; 1 Corinthians 12 (the gift of tongues is discussed more fully in chapter 14); and Ephesians 4:7-16.

The first thing we notice as we look at these chapters is that the gifts mentioned vary from passage to passage. For example, only two gifts occur in all three chapters: the gift of prophecy (meaning "proclamation") and the gift of teaching. These were obviously of crucial importance in Paul's thinking. The gift of being an apostle is mentioned in two places, in 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11. Some of the gifts may be different ways of speaking the same thing, as "contributing to the needs of others" (Rom. 12:8) and "those able to help others" (1 Cor. 12:28). But aside from these few repetitions and possible exceptions, all the gifts—there are at least twenty of them—are different. In other words, the emphasis of the passages is not upon a certain list of gifts that are always to be present within the church at any period of its history or in any given locality, but rather upon the fact that the Holy Spirit will give whatever gifts the church needs at whatever period of its history.

Obviously, some of the gifts will always be present, the gifts of evangelism, teaching, faith, wisdom, and helps, for example. They are involved in the nature of what the church is to be. A second class of gifts, like the gift of apostleship, will cease. Still others, like the gifts of healing or tongues, may or may not be present. The list is not the most important thing. The point rather is that we can be sure that the Holy Spirit will give what the church needs.

The second thing we notice as we read these chapters is that, although not all persons have the same gifts, nevertheless each believer has at least one. This is not as clear as the fact that the gifts vary; but it is true nevertheless, as a careful reading shows. Thus, Paul writes to all the believers at Rome, saying, "We have different gifts, according to the grace given us. If a man's gift is prophesying, let him use it in proportion to his faith. If it is serving, let him serve; if it is teaching, let him teach..." and so on (12:6-7). The implication is that we each have a gift and are to use it. Similarly, in 1 Corinthians Paul writes, "Now to each one the manifestation of the Spirit is given for the common good" (12:7). Again, "All these are the work of one and the same Spirit, and he gives them to each one, just as he determines" (v. 11).

This truth is of great importance, for it introduces us to our personal responsibility. If the gifts of the Spirit were not given to every Christian, we might be permitted to take our ease, assuming that we have not been given a gift and thus are not needed. But since this is not true, since God has given each a gift, we obviously are needed; and the work that God intends to be done will suffer if we neglect to use what has been entrusted to us.

The third emphasis of these three chapters dealing with the gifts of the Spirit is upon the unity of the church. Gifts that are truly God-given and are being exercised in the service of good will unite rather than divide Christ's body. This emphasis is clear in every passage, but especially in 1 Corinthians 12 where it occurs throughout. It is stressed there because an unspiritual emphasis upon certain gifts was tending to divide the church at Corinth.

The fourth emphasis is upon the major purpose of the gifts, which is to build up the church and to equip it for service. Here the Ephesians text is most explicit: "It was he who gave some to be apostles, some to be prophets, some to be evangelists, and some to be pastors and teachers, to prepare God's people for words of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:11-13). The church is a complex organism. It needs many things to grow and be healthy, just as our bodies need many kinds of food and exercise to grow strong. If a body receives only starches, it will get fat. If it gets only physical exercise, the muscles will grow strong but the mind will be a pygmy by proportion. The body has a variety of needs, and a balance of services is indicated. In the same way, the body of Christ has varied needs. And God, who cares for that body, has seen to it that the necessary variety of gifts is distributed among the Lord's followers.

It is always sad when everyone in a particular church wants to be an evangelist, or a Bible teacher, or an administrator. At times one of these may be more greatly needed than at another, and many may be raised up to meet that need. But in a normal situation many gifts are present and in a balanced proportion. So we must not try to have the other Christian's gift, if we do not have it. We must simply try to be faithful in exercising our own gift and in helping others use what God has given them.

God Pleased

Years ago, when I was just a small boy and there were only two grandchildren in my grandmother's family, this grandmother (who lived in Florida) planted two small orange trees in her front yard. One was for me, and the other was for my cousin. I seldom saw those trees, for my family lived up north. But every year at Christmastime my grandmother would send me a bushel of oranges from my tree to me and another bushel of oranges from the other tree to my cousin. She said it was to show how nice the weather was in Florida and to encourage us to come and visit her. Well, I cannot adequately tell you what an interest I had in my tree. It was mine, and thus I was very interested in the number and the quality of the oranges it produced. I was proud when they were good oranges. I was disappointed when the tree began to produce fewer oranges (as it did in later years) and also when the oranges were stunted by frost or some other hindrance to their proper development.

In the same way, I am convinced that God the Father looks upon us, his children, with special concern, and is particularly pleased when we are really fruitful. God has provided for us amply in all we need. We must determine to yield to him and walk in the Spirit.

Chapter 187.
What about Tongues?

John 14:16-18

The verses from John 14, which have been our jumping-off place for these studies of the Holy Spirit, do not say a word about tongues as one of the Spirit's gifts to the church. This in itself is significant. But it is almost impossible to speak about the Holy Spirit today without giving at least some consideration to the tongues question. What are we to think of the tongues phenomena? Is it of God? Of the devil? Or is it merely self-induced by those who claim to have had the experience? If it is not of God, what shall we do about it? If it is, what should be its place within the life and experience of the Christian and of Christian churches? Obviously these questions are of great importance if only because of the great increase in the influence of Pentecostalism in twentiety-century Christianity. In some form or other, Pentecostalism has always been with us, but the modern movement arose from an experience with tongues by Charles Parham, dating from a New Year's Eve service in the year 1900. Following his experience, Parham became an evangelist of the Pentecostal message, and the movement spread rapidly, as a result of which the Pentecostal Assemblies, the Assemblies of God, and the Churches of God were founded. These denominations proclaimed a strong dose of biblical theology and grew continually. Today they are rightly recognized as a "third force" in Christendom; in some areas, such as South America, they are dominant. The new element, since 1950, has been the surprising impact of Pentecostalism on mainline churches.

A Sovereign God

What are we to say of this phenomenon? The one thing we must always say is that the sovereign God of the Bible can do anything he chooses and that, if this means "tongues," so be it. We cannot say that (because "the age of tongues has ended," for example) God cannot give the tongues gift today.

Some have tried to say this on the basis of 1 Corinthians 13:8 which reads: "Love never fails. But where there are prophecies, they will cease; where there are tongues, they will be stilled; where there is knowledge, it will pass away." But to do this is to misuse the text. If the verse is to be taken to mean that the gift of tongues must cease in this current church age, then obviously the gift of knowledge must cease too, for the verse says equally emphatically, "Where there is knowledge, it will pass away." Actually, the verses are looking ahead to the time of Christ's return and are warning that all limited experiences of this present day shall pass when, in that day, we are made like Jesus. This is the point of 1 Corinthians 13:10: "But when perfection comes, the imperfect disappears." Nothing in this passage can be taken to say that tongues have been ruled out by God, with the result that anything passing for the gift of tongues today is either a self-induced psychological phenomenon or demonic.

At the same time we must also say that just because God can do anything does not mean that he has therefore done it, at least in every situation. Or, to put it in slightly different terms, it does not mean that everything that claims to be of the Spirit of God is therefore of God.

1 Corinthians 12, 14

Here we must turn to Scripture, for it is the explicit teaching of the Word of God, not experience (however valid or invalid), which must govern our thinking. On this question, the obvious passages are those from 1 Corinthians in which the apostle Paul deals at length with the issue. Significantly, we notice that he does not condemn the phenomenon. He might have, for the practice of speaking in tongues had proved divisive and Paul was obviously trying to overcome this tendency. Yet he does not condemn it. In fact, he acknowledges that he himself had spoken in tongues, adding "more than all of you" (1 Cor. 14:18).

In reading through these important chapters of 1 Corinthians (chapters 12 and 14) we notice six principles.

The first principle can be seen in 1 Corinthians 12:1-3. It is the principle that the gift of tongues can be counterfeited. That is, there is a genuine gift; but there is also a duplication of that gift by other spirits, whether the spirit is of Satan or merely the spirit of the individual. This is certainly what Paul is talking about when he reminds the Corinthian Christians that before their conversions they were "led astray to mute idols," and warns them that it is necessary to test the spirits on the basis of their confession or lack of confession of Christ: "No one who is speaking by the Spirit of God says, 'Jesus be cursed,' and no one can say, 'Jesus is Lord,' except by the Holy Spirit" (v. 3). Apparently the Christians at Corinth had been fooled by the ecstatic utterances of pagan priests before their conversion to Christ. Now they were being fooled by some who professed to speak in the power of the Holy Spirit but were not actually empowered by him.

It is worth noting that in many parts of the world, glossolalia (speaking in tongues) is known in non-Christian circles even today. Buddhist and Shintoist priests speak in tongues when in a trance. The phenomenon exists in much of South America, India, and Australia in a variety of non-Christian environments. So the mere speaking in tongues is in itself no proof of the Holy Spirit's presence.

An example may be of help here. In his excellent book on the Holy Spirit, William Fitch reports the experience of Raymond W. Frame, a member of the Overseas Missionary Fellowship in China. A gifted Chinese preacher had come to Shanghai where, because of his gifts, including his fluency in speaking in tongues, he made quite an impression. Some of his utterances, together with an interpretation by another Chinese Christian, had been recorded, however. And it seemed, as Mr. Frame studied the recordings, that some of the statements in the interpretations were contradictory. He decided to "test the spirit" in line with Paul's admonition in 1 Corinthians 12:3. Thus, when the Chinese preacher was again giving his message in an unknown tongue, the missionary asked, "Thou spirit, speaking in an unknown tongue, do you confess that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh?"

At first the spirit in the preacher seemed to disregard the question completely. But as the question was repeatedly pressed, a note of clear irritation came into the speaker's voice. At last there was an angry outburst in a dialect of Chinese that was understandable: "Why do you not believe? Do you not know that I have come to do a great work?" Then there was a burst of laughing. Not once did the spirit in the preacher confess Christ. As a result of this test, the preacher was branded a false prophet and put out of the church. He was also discredited among the other churches of Shanghai.

The second principle that Paul lays down is that there are many different and valuable gifts of the Holy Spirit and the gift of tongues is just one. He says this in verses 4-11 of chapter 12, stressing that there are different needs in the church and that it is the prerogative of the Holy Spirit to meet those needs by giving the necessary gifts to those whom he has called to work in those areas. "To one there is given through the Spirit the message of wisdom, to another the message of knowledge by means of the Spirit, to another faith by the same Spirit, to another gifts of healing by that one Spirit, to another miraculous powers, to another prophecy, to another distinguishing between spirits, to another speaking in different kinds of tongues, and to still another the interpretation of tongues. All these are the work of one and the same Spirit, and he gives them to each one, just as he determines" (vv. 8-11).

Why does Paul stress that it is by the one Spirit of God that the gifts are given? Apparently, to forestall pride. For if it is true that the Holy Spirit gives a gift to each Christian ("each one," v. 7) and that for his own purposes, then obviously we are unable to take pride in our particular gift over that given to another. The fact that Paul later minimizes the gift of tongues indicates that pride was a particular danger for those who possessed this gift at Corinth.

Growth and Unity

The third of Paul's points is that these gifts are for the edification and unity of the church (12:1227). It follows from this that if a particular exercise of the gift of tongues does not promote growth or, worse yet, if it leads to schism, then either the gift is not of God or it is being exercised in a way contrary to God's purposes for it.

A young man came to me with an interesting story. Two summers before, he had been active in a summer music camp sponsored by one of America's large universities. As a Christian he had longed for some effective Christian witness to the music students. So he was glad when, through the help of other Christian students and with the permission of the university officials, he was enabled to begin a Bible study group and a Sunday worship service. In his judgment these were quite effective. At any rate, a few of the students became Christians.

The following summer the work was begun anew and with high expectations, for the students had learned that the new conductor of the student orchestra was also a professing Christian. The young man who was telling me the story indicated that he had invited the conductor to the Bible study and the services and had asked him to take part. Unfortunately, the conductor did more than take part. He took over! Then he turned the meetings into an expression of worship in which many so-called "charismatic gifts" were evident. The effect, far from being good, was divisive. The fellowship of the Christians was destroyed. Many open doors were closed. Eventually, because of the excesses, university officials banned all Christian meetings from the summer campus. The conductor felt that he had been persecuted; and when the young man protested that he had carried on a Christian work for the whole preceding summer without any harassment, he was told that this was because he had not been sufficiently bold or spiritual in his testimony.

I was in no position to say that the efforts of the orchestra conductor were of the devil. They probably were not. But the gift, if it was a genuine gift of the Holy Spirit, was at least not being exercised properly. It was divisive and far from edifying. By contrast, says Paul, the gifts of the Spirit are given to strengthen the church and unify it.

Fourth, Paul indicates (perhaps in this case to humble those who were boasting of their gift of tongues) that if the gifts are to be listed in the order of importance, tongues will always come relatively low on the list (12:28-14:12). This is most marked in 12:28, where Paul actually numbers the gifts: "And in the church God has appointed first of all apostles, second prophets, third teachers, then workers of miracles, also those having gifts of healing, those able to help others, those with gifts of administration, and those speaking in different kinds of tongues." In this list the gift of tongues falls in category five, and even in that category it is listed after healings, helps, and governments. A second way in which Paul makes this point is by his extensive emphasis upon the supreme importance of love. So great is his concern for this that he interrupts his discussion of the problems of gifts to give his great hymn on love, which is chapter 13 in our Bibles. Finally, he concludes that if any of the gifts are to be sought after, it is the gift of prophecy (by which he means the ability to preach and teach the word clearly) rather than the gift of tongues that is desirable (1 Cor. 14:1). He declares from his own case that, although he too speaks in tongues, he would rather speak five words in an intelligible language than ten thousand in an unknown tongue (14:19).

In our case, this would mean that it is far better to be able to present the gospel clearly to a person who is inquiring about it than be able to do any number of supposedly miraculous things that are not edifying.

Dangers and Safeguards

Paul's fifth principle is that the gift of tongues is fraught with particular dangers and must therefore be exercised with safeguards. He discusses these in verses 13-38 of the fourteenth chapter.

The first danger is the danger of confusion, or disorder. Paul does not want this, for he seems to regard it as a disgrace or at least an unprofitable thing for God's work to be done in a disruptive way. Here he lays down guidelines. First, do not allow everyone to speak in church at the same time; they should speak one at a time. Second, do not allow everyone to speak, but at the most two or three. Third, do not permit even these to speak in tongues unless there is someone present who has the gift of interpretation and interprets them.

The second danger is the danger of a Christianity without content, which Paul counters by insisting on interpretation. Then as now, Christianity was threatened by an outlook that made experience central and content minor. In this approach the emotional "high" was everything. We see this often today in a kind of emotional Christianity in which experience is all that matters. In facing this, we must, as did Paul, emphasize content and then content again. Francis Schaeffer writes, "We must stress that the basis for our faith is neither experience nor emotion but the truth as God has given it in verbalized, propositional form in the Scripture and which we first of all apprehend with our minds—though, of course, the whole man must act upon it." John R. W. Stott argues similarly against what he terms "mindless Christianity."

There is one last point in Paul's discussion of tongues; we need to take note of it too. It is simply that, notwithstanding the dangers of this gift, no Christian should forbid its exercise. Specifically he says, 'Therefore, my brothers, be eager to prophesy, and do not forbid speaking in tongues" (14:39). If tongues is not your gift, you are not to desire it—at least not more than any other gift, particularly the gift of prophecy. But, on the other hand, if another has been given the gift, you are not to forbid its exercise. Who are you to tell him that he cannot use what God has given? On the contrary, if God has truly given it, to forbid it would be to the church's impoverishment and hurt.

To Each a Gift

One final question: Can the exercise of tongues ever be wrong? The answer is yes, in several situations, including whenever Paul's guidelines in 1 Corinthians are disregarded. The practice is wrong when it is said that speaking in tongues is an essential evidence of the Spirit's presence. It is wrong when Christians are told that, after their conversion, a further Spirit baptism is necessary. It is wrong when it is said to be essential to the fullness of God's work within an individual Christian. Above all it is wrong whenever it diverts attention from Jesus Christ, for it is the Spirit's work to point to and exalt him above all (John 16:13-16).

On the other hand, the dangers and errors in the exercise of this gift should not be an excuse for those who possess other gifts to neglect their exercise. That is a smugness and error of its own. What is your gift? Whatever it is, you are to use it. Is it prophecy? "If a man's gift is prophesying, let him use it in proportion to his faith." Is it ministry? "If it is encouraging, let him encourage; if it is contributing to the needs of others, let him give generously; if it is leadership, let him govern diligently; if it is showing mercy, let him do it cheerfully" (Rom. 12:6-8). It is only as we do this that the church is edified, unbelievers won, and Christ fully glorified.

Chapter 188.
Four Promises

John 14:19-24

If you often have opportunity to comfort a child who has hurt himself while playing, you will readily understand the motives of the Lord Jesus Christ in this passage. Imagine that a child has injured himself and that he has come to you for comfort. The fact that he has come to you means much. Your presence is important. But beyond that there are also several practical things you can do. You can show love. That is, you can kiss the child and hold him in your arms. You can provide information, saying, "There, there, now. It is not really too bad. Look, it is not bleeding. It is only bruised." Or if it is serious, you can get him to the hospital. Finally, you can promise that things will be better. You can say, "Let's put some cold water on it. After that it will stop hurting.

Tomorrow it will be as good as new." Anyone who has ever comforted a child knows that in its proper place each of these three things is valuable and that, at least in many cases, the promises seem to be the most valuable of all.

In some sense this is what the Lord has been doing with his disciples in the chapter we have been studying. He had announced that he was departing from them in order to return to the Father, and this had upset them greatly, for he was everything to them. They were downcast, troubled, yes, even afraid. So he began to comfort them—by reassuring them of his love, by providing information, and by giving them some blessed promises. Probably it is the promises more than anything else that make this chapter such a favorite with Christian people.

What are these promises? There has been the promise that Jesus would prepare a place for his own in heaven and that, having prepared it, he would return again for them. He promised that his departure from them would not mean an end to Christian work. For if they truly believe on him, they will be able to carry on his works and, in fact, do even greater works than Jesus has done. He promised that he would answer prayer. And then, perhaps greatest of all, he told of the Holy Spirit whom he would send and who will abide with us forever. In the verses that follow, the verses that are our text, Jesus gives four more promises, all of which relate to his future relationship to the disciples.

The first is a fact: the resurrection. The second is a consequence of that fact: sure knowledge of him and of who he is. The third is a promise of a further revelation: he will manifest himself to them. Finally, there is an explanation of how that further revelation will be possible: by a mutual indwelling.

A Double Resurrection

The first of these promises is a promise of the coming resurrection, but it is cast in such language that it suggests a resurrection on several very important levels. For one thing, it obviously speaks of the resurrection of Jesus himself, for the promise is set in the context of the world no longer seeing him (that is, because he will die) but of the disciples continuing to see him (that is, not only at the present moment but also after the resurrection). Jesus says, "Before long, the world will not see me anymore, but you will see me. Because I live, you also will live" (v. 19).

It is not only the resurrection of Jesus that is spoken of, however, for the last phrase, "you also will live," clearly speaks of their resurrection too. Moreover, since the verses go on to speak of the knowledge that they will have of him following the resurrection and that he will come to dwell within them, it is probably also true that Jesus is suggesting, not merely that they will be raised from the dead physically in some future day, but that they will also enter into the experience of resurrection life now. In other words, the promise is that they are to "come alive" in a new sense following Christ's resurrection.

This was a great promise, particularly to these who were so soon to be confronted with the cruel horror of Christ's death. What were they to think in that hour? They had placed their faith in Christ as the One who was indeed God's Messiah, the salvation of his people. But they had never understood the nature of the cross. With Jesus gone their hopes would be dashed. We would be right to think of them as disappointed, disillusioned, even cynical men. I catch a glimpse of that spirit in the reply of the Emmaus disciples—"We had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel" (Luke 24:21)—and in the vigorous disbelief of Thomas—"Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe if (John 20:25).

Each of these statements arises out of cruel disillusionment, but it was to these men, soon to be struck by death's horror, that Christ makes this promise. "Death is not the end," he says, "not for me, not for you. Moreover, you do not even have to wait until the next life for the promise, for you will begin to enter into the reality of that life now."

Sure Knowledge

The second promise is the promise of certain knowledge of Christ based upon that double resurrection. It is because Jesus has been raised and because we have been given new life that we know him as being who he is. This is what he means when he says, "On that day you will realize that I am in my Father" (v. 20).

The content of this knowledge is that Jesus of Nazareth was God incarnate, that is, that he was fully divine. All else flows from this. And the basis of this knowledge, without which we do not and cannot know, is this double resurrection. On the one hand, it is based upon Christ's own resurrection. Without this there would have been no faith and no knowledge that he was indeed who he claimed to be. He claimed to be God. But if he had died only, no matter how selflessly or courageously, without the resurrection he would rightly be regarded as no more than a selfless and sincere man. He would have been a good teacher, a friend. But faith and knowledge would have stopped at that point. It was only when Christ was raised from the dead that his life was seen to be fully extraordinary and his daring claims vindicated. This is why Paul can refer to the resurrection as the greatest of all Christian evidences in the opening chapter of the Book of Romans, noting that Christ "was a descendent of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (1:3-4).

On the other hand, apart from a corresponding resurrection of spiritually dead men to spiritual life, even this great miracle is insufficient for bringing us to know who Christ is. It is only when God plants his own life within us, thereby enabling us to understand his truth and respond to Christ, that we truly know Christ and embrace him joyfully as the ground of our salvation.

Further Revelation

The third promise is a particularly important one, for it concerns Christ's continuing revelation of himself to those who have believed on him. He says, "Whoever has my commands and obeys them, he is the one who loves me. He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I too will love him and show myself to him" (v. 21).

This is a step beyond the promise of sure knowledge of who he is, as a careful reading will show. The fact of his historical resurrection and of his gift of the Holy Spirit to us so that we can understand the gospel and believe on him is first in order and is important. But, having come to know who Jesus is and having believed on him, the Christian will then want to know him more fully. In this case, the knowledge will be not so much a knowledge about him, leading to faith, but rather a deep knowledge of him in which the disciple comes to experience the Lord in the fullest and most personal way. How would this be possible if it were not that Christ himself provides it? There would be no way in which we could know him fully as a living person and close friend. He is not here for us thus to know him. We cannot know him unless he reveals himself. But reveal himself is precisely what he does. The verses that come at the end of this section even go on to say that in the future period of the Spirit's full activity the disciples would come to know Jesus better even than in the days of his physical presence among them.

In what way does the Lord promise to manifest himself to the disciples and to those who follow them? Not bodily, obviously, for the entire point of the discourse is to prepare them for his physical departure. He is not going to manifest himself to them through visions either, for nothing in the Gospel would suggest this. How, then, would he be seen? The answer is that he would be seen in a spiritual sense, as through the revelation of himself in the Bible and through the Holy Spirit's witness to that revelation within the hearts of the disciples and of those who follow them, he is made vividly real. This sounds like fantasy to those who are not born again. But to those who have been made alive by God's Spirit the presence of Christ is more real than anything they can see physically, more real even than their own hands or feet.

"But I am a Christian, and yet Jesus is not that real to me," someone says. Yes, that may be true. But notice that, in the same verse in which Jesus gives the promise of a further revelation of himself, the Lord also gives the conditions upon which that continuing revelation will be given. The conditions are (1) the keeping of his commandments and (2) love.

Have we met those conditions? We suppose, quite often I imagine, that it is possible to enjoy the fullness of the Christian life without a fervent love for Christ, or that it is possible to love without obeying him. We imagine that having been "justified by faith" we thereafter have no need for an obedient walk. But this is not true, and this verse alone should refute it. True, we are saved by faith, and we are to walk in the Christian life by love. But true love as well as true faith will inevitably express themselves in obedience. If they do not, they are not the love or faith about which we read in the Bible. What does it say in James? "Faith without works is dead" (James 2:17). What does 1 John say about this? "This is love for God: to obey his commands" (1 John 5:3). Only when these elements are fully present does Christ fully reveal himself to his disciple.

Here Arthur W. Pink writes wisely, "This manifestation of Christ is made only to the one who really loves Him, and the proof of love to Him is not by emotional displays but by submission to His will. There is a vast difference between sentiment and practical reality. The Lord will give no direct and special revelation of Himself to those who are in the path of disobedience. 'He that hath my commandments,' means, hath them at heart. 'And keepeth them,' that is the real test. We hear, but do we heed? We know, but are we doing His will?"

Many Christians would be willing to do spectacular things if by that means they could come to know Christ better. But they are unwilling to do the commonplace things that are involved in simple obedience. Will you do them? If you will, you will most certainly grow in God's grace. If you obey, Christ will increasingly unveil his heart to you. You will come to know him and not just about him. On the other hand, if you fail to obey, he will cease to reveal himself to you, and your own love for him will weaken.

Christ Within

Christ's final promise is found in verse 23. It is the promise of his own personal presence in the Christian through the Holy Spirit. He says, "If anyone loves me, he will obey my teaching. My Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him" (v. 23). The meaning of this is found in his earlier reference to the ministry of the Holy Spirit in which he promised that the Spirit would come to live within each Christian (v. 17).

This was something entirely new at the time Christ promised it. The idea that the Spirit of God would be with God's people was not new, for that had been true through all the centuries of the Old Testament dispensation. The Holy Spirit was with Noah in his day, because Peter tells us that the Spirit enabled him to preach while the ark was being prepared (1 Peter 3:18-20). The Spirit was with each of the Hebrew patriarchs. He was with the people of Israel during the days of their wandering in the wilderness. David prayed, "Take not your Holy Spirit from me"—a prayer that was proper for his time but that is not appropriate for a child of God during the church age. In each of these cases the Spirit of God was with his people. But now Jesus declares that the One who had been with them in the past was, in a much better way, to be in them in the future. Moreover, since he would be in them it is proper to say that the Father and Son would be in them also.

The presence of the Lord within his people is the glorious distinctive of the present time. Therefore, in this age we do not need to go to God and ask that the Spirit be given. He has been given to each of Christ's followers. Rather, it is for us to recognize his indwelling and then allow him to have his way with our lives.

Judge or Savior

Here are four great promises: that we will be made alive spiritually and will be raised as Jesus was raised, that we will know him as God, that we will receive an increasingly full revelation of him (if we continue to obey him and grow in his love), and that he will come to dwell within us by his Holy Spirit. Some of these promises are more or less automatic; that is, they are the product of pure grace and are fulfilled in us regardless of our response or obedience. One promise, the promise of a fuller revelation of Christ, is contingent; it depends upon our obedience and growth in love. What then? Shall we accept the three promises and neglect the one? Shall we neglect the one that is costly? Or shall we rather determine to pursue that promise at all costs, knowing that as we do we will be coming to know that One who is altogether lovely and who out of his great love gave himself for us? To do anything less would be ingratitude and folly. It would be to exchange our spiritual birthright for a mess of worldly pottage.

To those who are not yet Christians, it must be said that although Jesus speaks of an age, this age, when the world will no longer see him, it is nevertheless true that the world will yet see him one day when he is exalted on his throne to render judgment on all because of their misdeeds. You will see him as judge, if you will not see him now. If you see him as judge, it will be to receive his just punishment upon you for your sins. Why wait for his judgment? How much wiser to run to him now, while he is still offered to you as the ground of salvation, and say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I confess my sin; I want you to be my Savior."

Chapter 189.
The Holy Spirit As Teacher

John 14:25-26

John 14:26 is the shortest of those sections of the final discourses dealing with the Holy Spirit, yet it is probably true that it gives us the fullest definition. The Holy Spirit is described as the "Counselor." We have already seen what this means in our discussion of verses 16-18. He is described as being "holy"—the Holy Spirit. Finally, he is described as being a "teacher." Here are three definitions: the Counselor, Holy One, and Teacher. Yet when the verse is looked at closely, it is undoubtedly the last of these, the fact that the Holy Spirit is a teacher, that is emphasized. The role of the Holy Spirit as Counselor is emphasized in the earlier verses. The matter of holiness is emphasized in 16:7-11. But here (as also at 15:26-27 and 16:12-15) the special ministry of the Spirit as teacher is brought forward.

When the Lord says that the Holy Spirit is to "teach you all things," the reference is primarily to the apostles. These were those whom Jesus had chosen to be authoritative spokesmen for the truth he had revealed. They were to remember it and then record it in the pages of what has become the New Testament. Moreover, this teaching was to become normative for the church. This same idea is clear in that verse in which the Lord says, "When he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all [the] truth." Jesus did not mean that all that could possibly be known would be revealed to them. All things that can possibly be known are known only to God. But he did mean that the Holy Spirit would reveal to them the full truth of the gospel centered in Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. And this he did. This was a unique ministry of the Holy Spirit to the apostles.

At the same time, however, there is a secondary sense in which these words apply to Christians who are living today. The Holy Spirit teaches us as well, and the Holy Spirit is the One who brings these things to our remembrance.

Need for Teaching

We need to look at the disciples first, however. Clearly, here were men who needed to be taught. They had been with the Lord Jesus Christ for three years. One might think that they would have understood the essence of his ministry and the gospel. He had spoken to them about these things. But the truth is that, although he had spoken to them about this, nevertheless they had not understood him. It is significant that verse 25 says, "All this I have spoken while still with you." He had spoken to them, but that is not quite the same thing as saying that he had taught them. Obviously he had tried to teach the disciples, and had taught them many other things, but they had not yet really learned the great truths of the gospel. Actually, they were confused men who needed the Holy Spirit's teaching.

They also had a particular problem with learning in this instance, for the Lord had announced his departure to them, and this had so seized upon their minds that they were not really hearing what he was saying. He had spoken about another Counselor, but they were not interested enough in the other Counselor even to learn about him. All they could grasp was that Jesus was to be taken from them.

So the Lord tells the disciples, "You need teaching; you really do. You have heard a lot, but you do not understand it. You need to be taught. I am going. Nevertheless, the Holy Spirit is coming, and one of his roles (a very important role) is to teach you."

The second interesting thing about the teaching of the Holy Spirit is that God himself earnestly wanted to teach the disciples. We see this in the fact that the entire Trinity is mentioned in this verse: "But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you." In other words, the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ is sending the Holy Spirit to teach the disciples, so much is he interested in having them come to the knowledge of the truth concerning Jesus.

I suppose that if we had been the Lord Jesus Christ, we might have said at this point, "Oh, these dull, dull disciples!" We could even have boasted about the quality of our instruction. We could have said, "It is impossible to imagine a better teacher than they have just had. Furthermore, they have gone through an entire seminary course in three years and have combined formal teaching with on-the-field experience. They have had the advantage of a first-class example. So if they still do not get it, I will flunk them." We might have said that. But this is not the attitude of God. The God who recognizes, on the one hand, that the disciples needed teaching, is the same God who, on the other hand, sends the Holy Spirit in order that they might be taught.

If we ask at that point, "Were they taught?" the answer is yes; of course they were. The proof of it is our Bible. Furthermore, once the Holy Spirit had come, they began to get it quickly, because on the day of Pentecost, Peter, who on an earlier occasion had said when the Lord announced his crucifixion, "Far be it, Lord, that such a thing should happen to you," who did not understand Jesus at all, this same Peter stood up and announced with great understanding that what had occurred in Jerusalem six weeks before had been by the foreordination of God. In other words, the crucifixion of Christ had fallen out in accordance with God's perfect plan and was the heart of redemption. Then Peter preached Christ to the very men who had crucified him, and the Holy Spirit blessed the message so that many came to faith on that occasion. The disciples did learn through the Holy Spirit. Moreover, the Holy Spirit guided them to write these things in the books that became our New Testament.

These books record what the Lord Jesus Christ said and did, explain it, and draw conclusions. In this sense the critics are right when they say that these books are not pure biography, that is, objective historical biography. They are biography with an interpretation attached. But the interpretation, as well as the biography, is that which the Holy Spirit gave.

Our Teacher Too

All this applies primarily to the disciples, but it also comes down to us in a much closer way. For we need to be taught also, and the Holy Spirit, who taught the disciples, is our teacher as well.

Paul writes about it to the Corinthians. He talks first of the fact that in ourselves we are unable to understand spiritual truth, even when it is recorded in the pages of Scripture. But he tells us in addition that the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of truth, who inspired the Bible, speaks from its pages to bring us understanding. "As it is written, 'No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love him'—but God has revealed it to us by his Spirit. The Spirit searches all things, even the deep things of God. For who among men knows the thoughts of a man except the man's spirit within him? In the same way no one knows the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God. We have not received the spirit of the world but the Spirit who is from God, that we many understand what God has freely given us. This is why we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words" (1 Cor. 2:9-13).

Here the ministry of the Holy Spirit as teacher is explained. It was exercised, in the first instance, when God revealed truth to the apostles and they recorded it in what would later become canonized as the pages of the New Testament. It is then exercised, in the second instance, when this same Holy Spirit teaches us from the truths that they have recorded.

Remembering

The first part of John 14:26 speaks of the teaching ministry of the Holy Spirit, but there is a second part that speaks of remembrance. "But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you all things and remind you of everything I have said to you." Why, if they were taught all things, does anything need to be brought back to mind? As we begin to reflect on this word, we see that a ministry of the Holy Spirit in helping us remember is necessary because of what we are like and because of the inability of our minds to retain important teachings. It is possible to be well taught, even brilliantly taught, and still forget; or, in the disciples' case, to be taught the meaning of Christ's ministry but forget that upon which it is based.

The Lord's emphasis on remembering teaches us two separate truths. First, it teaches us that the wisdom of God is not a new thing. It is that which God has revealed in the past and that is the same because he is the same. We have a tendency, especially in America and in our age, always to be inventing theology. Churchmen speak about "process theology" today. It means "evolving" theology. But this is not the outlook of the Scriptures. Some of our contemporaries seem always to be searching the Bible in the light of newspapers and popular books in order to come up with something that no one has ever heard before. When they do and when they write a book about it, they get a hearing. This is the nature of The Passover Plot, The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross, and some other popular religious books. People buy them and say, "We never heard that before! Therefore, it must be true!" But it is not true, nor is it a product of the Holy Spirit's ministry. The Holy Spirit does not give us new doctrines. Rather, he brings old truths to our remembrance.

So what we preach is not new doctrine but the old doctrine once and for all delivered to the saints. It is the doctrine of man's total inability to help himself spiritually, God's grace in Jesus Christ, the ministry of the Holy Spirit who takes these truths and brings them home to our hearts and minds so that we understand them, and God's unfailing perseverance with his people. We preach that God does not abandon us, that God who has begun to save us in such a marvelous way, giving us a new spirit and creating a new soul, will persevere to the end, at which time he will give us a new body and make us like the Lord Jesus Christ forevermore. These are not new doctrines. They are old doctrines. They are the doctrines that the Holy Spirit brings to our remembrance.

The second truth the word "remind" teaches is that we tend to forget these doctrines, even though we have heard them many times. The history of the church is the history of great blessing through the Holy Spirit, a time of reformation and revival, followed by a gradual forgetting of the message. This happens again and again; so one of the jobs of the minister is to remind the congregation of the old truths. One of the jobs of Christian people is to remind each other of them, and one of the jobs of the Christian church is to remind the world of these old doctrines, even though the world may reject them.

He Shall Testify of Me

This verse also says something else, and we do not want to miss that either. It says that the object of the teaching is Christ. This is true in this text: "He will remind you of everything I have said to you." It is also true in the verses about the Holy Spirit in John 15 and 16: "When the Counselor comes, whom I well send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me. And you also must testify, for you have been with me from the beginning" (15:26-27). "I have much more to say to you, more than you can now bear. But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you" (16:12-14).

We have a danger, even as evangelical people, of making the Scriptures an end in themselves. We study the Bible as we would a textbook. We memorize the data. But we are always in danger of forgetting that the purpose of the Scriptures is not to exist as an end in themselves, though they will endure forever—"heaven and earth will pass away, but my word will not pass away"— but to reveal Christ to the seeking heart and mind.

God's Power

There is a final point that belongs with what we have been saying. The Holy Spirit is also the One who enables us to teach these truths to others. Teaching spiritual truths cannot be done in the power of the flesh. Paul writes about it in 1 Corinthians in the verses that come just before the ones cited earlier. "When I came to you, brothers, I did not come with eloquence or superior wisdom as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God. For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified.... My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power" (2:1-2, 4).

Three things are necessary if God's truth is to be properly communicated. First, there must be the revelation of the truth to the apostles by the Holy Spirit. This has been done. Second, there must be the teaching of the Holy Spirit to our hearts, so that, as we read their words, we come face-toface with the Lord Jesus Christ about whom they wrote. Third, there must be the continuing work of the Holy Spirit to take our testimony concerning this Word and carry it home to the hearts of those who have not yet heard or understood it. Three stages!

But there can be error in each. There are some who do not begin with the Scriptures. They consider the Bible to contain the words of men rather than the very words that the Holy Ghost taught to the apostles.

Having thrown out the base, they have nothing on which to stand, and their theology becomes mere speculation. There are others who accept the Bible as the Word of God but who do not allow the Holy Spirit to teach them. They study the Bible in an academic way. Although they may have a high doctrine of Scripture, they do not strive to see the Lord Jesus Christ in its pages. Then there are those who accept the Bible as the Word of God and who do meet with Jesus Christ, but they testify in their own power in a way that brings glory to themselves, and few are won.

We do a farmer's work. First, we prepare the soil. Then we take a seed and plant it. We water it, and we wait for it to grow. But we do not give life to the seed. The seed already has life in it. Moreover, we can scratch a furrow and put the seed in it, but the ground must have the nutrients that God has placed there. And even then the work of God is not finished, for the seed will not grow unless the sun shines upon it. The Holy Spirit must be the sun in our witnessing. We must be faithful in scratching the furrows, watering, even pulling out weeds. But we must look to God to give life.

Chapter 190.
Peace Casting Out Fear

John 14:27-31

In a sense John 14:27-31 introduces us to an entirely new subject, for this is the first mention of peace in Christ's final discourses. Still, it is not totally unexpected. For one thing, peace is a natural result of the coming of the Holy Spirit to Christ's followers, a matter of which he has just spoken. The apostle Paul tells us that one aspect of the fruit of the Spirit is peace (Gal. 5:22). Furthermore, it is—like Christ's promise of a place prepared for his own in heaven, his return, the fact that his work in them and through them would continue, his pledge to answer their prayers, and the sending of the Holy Spirit to be with them forever—a great reason why they should be comforted. These words even pick up the opening theme of the chapter, reading in this case, "Do not let your heart be troubled and do not be afraid" (v. 27).

This final reason why the disciples are not to be troubled is that Jesus is leaving his peace with them. And if this is so, peace is presented somewhat as Christ's dying bequest to his followers. It is his legacy to them. He is not leaving them destitute or without comfort. True, he is leaving, but he is leaving his peace behind.

Peace in Storm

The beautiful nature of the peace that Christ bequeaths becomes apparent only when we notice the troublesome circumstances out of which these words were spoken and the condition of those to whom Christ's peace was given. It was not a situation marked by outward peace. Christ spoke on the verge of his violent execution. Nor did he speak to those who were already at peace or who were untouched by his imminent arrest and crucifixion. On the contrary, they were already deeply distressed and fearful. Troubles without! Troubles within! It was in this situation that the legacy was given.

The story has occasionally been told of a contest in which artists were to submit paintings and sculptures portraying their understanding of peace. Some showed beautiful sunsets, others pastoral scenery. But the prize went to an artist who had painted a bird in its nest, attached to a branch protruding from the edge of a thundering waterfall. This is the idea involved in Christ's legacy. In times of outward peace anyone can be at peace, or at least many can. But it takes an exceptional peace, a supernatural peace, to prevail in the midst of great outward trouble and inner distress. Christ's peace is just that, exceptional and supernatural. As he explains in these verses, it is a peace that is to be present in his own in spite of the vacillating nature of the world around them, his own absence, and the vigorous activity of the devil and evil persons.

A Vacillating World

The peace that Christ gives is peace in spite of the world's vacillation. We see it in the contrast between the way in which the world gives and the way in which Jesus gives. He spoke of it saying, "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give you."

What is it that characterizes the world's gifts, whatever they may be? Insincerity characterizes them. People give, but seldom with motives as high as the gift is supposed to represent. Sometimes the gift is presented only because the gift is expected. Impotence also characterizes our giving. That is, even when we are sincere about something, we are nevertheless generally unable to do all that we might like to do. If we wish someone peace, our wish is at best still merely a wish; it does not in itself accomplish anything. The world also gives scantily. That is, it always gives less than it could give. This is particularly evident in giving to charitable causes. The world gives with a selfish motive. Sometimes this is to be well thought of. Sometimes it is to receive a favor back again. Most objectionable of all perhaps is that the world gives, for the most part, to those who do not need or do not want the gift. Most giving is to one's friends, who already have what they need, or to those who are imagined to be rich or important. In addition to all these characteristics, it is also often the case that the world gives but then takes back again.

This is not like Christ's giving. He gives sincerely out of a genuine love for his own, effectively, bountifully, at great personal cost (for his gift of peace cost him the cross), and above all to those who clearly need his gift. In the Bible peace is a positive blessing, particularly a right relationship with God from which all other good things follow.

Harry Ironside used to tell this story. At the close of the Civil War, a troop of Federal cavalry were riding along a road between Richmond, Virginia, and Washington, D.C. Suddenly they saw a poor wretch of a soldier, clothed in the ragged remnants of a Confederate uniform, coming out of the bush. He called to the captain of the cavalry unit who drew in and waited for him. "Can you help me?" the soldier called out. "I am starving to death. Can you give me some food?"

"Starving to death?" questioned the captain. "Why don't you just go into Richmond and get what you need?"

The soldier explained, "I do not dare go into Richmond because if I did I would be arrested. Three weeks ago I became so discouraged because of our losses that I deserted from the southern army, and I have been hiding in the woods ever since, gradually making my way north, hoping for a chance to break through to Federal lines. If I should be caught by southern soldiers, I would be shot for deserting the army in time of war." The captain asked, "Haven't you heard the news?"

"What news?"

"Why, the war is over. Peace has been made. General Lee surrendered to General Grant at Appomattox two weeks ago. The Confederacy is ended."

"What!" said the soldier, "Peace has been made for two weeks, and I have been starving in the woods because I didn't know it?"

This is what it means to have peace with God. It means that the Lord Jesus Christ made peace nearly two thousand years ago for those who are given to him by the Father. They do not have to make their peace with God. Indeed, they could not do it even if they tried. They could not atone for their sins. But Jesus has provided the one perfect atonement so that all who will believe on him may come boldly to God knowing that the ground of hostility has been removed and that they may now find all they need in the storehouse of the Father's great bounty.

But that is only one half of the story, for, having found peace with God, these may now enter into the peace of God in abundance. What is this peace of God? It is the personal peace that Jesus had himself enjoyed while here on earth. Two things are characteristic of it. First, it is a peace based upon one's intimate knowledge of God, a God who is in control of all things. Second, this peace is entirely independent of circumstances. Circumstances raged around Jesus, but he was totally unruffled by them. His enemies foamed with rage in their passionate desire to kill him. But still he went his way, knowing that his life and times were in the hands of a loving, wise, and allpowerful heavenly Father.

"My peace I give you." Have you received that peace? If not, you may ask God for it even as you lay your burden at his feet.

An Absent Christ

The peace about which Christ speaks is also to be present in spite of Christ's physical absence. This is the connection of verses 28 and 29 with the verse that precedes them, for Jesus now speaks of the fact that he is being taken from the disciples. "You heard me say, 'I am going away and I am coming back to you.' If you loved me, you would be glad that I am going to the Father, for the Father is greater than I. I have told you now before it happens, so that when it does happen you will believe."

There are two reasons why the disciples should be at peace even though Jesus was himself physically absent from them. First, because it would be better for Jesus. It would be better for him because he would again be with the Father. This, incidentally, is the true meaning of that sentence at the end of verse 28—"For my Father is greater than I." This has become a favorite verse with Unitarians, Jehovah's Witnesses, and other cultists, who deny the deity of Jesus and who would therefore make him to be less than the Father. They use this sentence to teach that Jesus here confessed himself to be a lesser, created being, although an important one. But while this is the apparent meaning if the verse is looked at only on the surface, it is clearly not the meaning if it is looked at in context. The key word is the conjunction "for." Jesus has told the disciples that they should rejoice in view of his departure and in their love for him. He now gives the reason. "For," he says [that is "because"], "my Father is greater than I." In other words, in the days of his incarnation Jesus had been below the Father in terms of his outward glory and official position. But now he was returning to the Father to assume that great glory and position he had possessed originally. The disciples should rejoice in the exaltation of their Lord that was now in view.

This verse is really a parallel statement to that of Paul, recorded in Philippians 2:5-11. These verses speak of an original, fully divine glory and equality with God the Father possessed by Jesus that, however, he laid aside temporarily in order to become man and die for our salvation. "Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him a name that is above every name, that at the name of Jeus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (vv. 9-11). The disciples should recognize that it was better for Jesus that he go.

We ought to apply this to all who die in the Lord. It is true that they will not assume the same glory as Jesus—he is God and they are not—nevertheless, their death will mean their exaltation and perfection. For us their passing is loss. We miss them and are poorer for their death. On the other hand, we rejoice that they have completed their race and are now with Jesus, having been made like him.

The second reason why the disciples were to be at peace even though Jesus was to be taken from them is that the arrangement would be better for themselves. They could not really imagine anything better than having him physically with them. But Jesus repeatedly taught that it would be better for them to have him depart and have the Holy Spirit replace him. Why? Because then they would "believe" (v. 29). At the time he spoke these words the disciples undoubtedly thought they believed. At least they believed all they understood. But they did not understand the reason for his death. They did not understand that his death would be followed by his resurrection. They did not understand that the gospel of salvation founded upon these two great truths was to be preached throughout the whole world until Jesus should come again. It was the work of the Holy Spirit to lead them into an understanding of these great truths and cause them to believe them. Only when this had taken place would they become strong in the faith and be able to carry this same gospel to others.

This should be our faith also. Jesus was telling the disciples that whatever was coming, no matter how tragic it appeared, it was for their own good—for their growth in faith and for blessing in their lives and the lives of others. So must it be for us all. Whatever disturbs us is sent by God for our good. So we should have peace, even in the most adverse circumstances.

An Active Devil

The last two verses of chapter 4 also relate to peace, for they indicate that the peace of Christ should be present even in the face of Satan's activities. Neither a vacillating world, an absent Christ, nor an active devil should upset us. Jesus is speaking of the latter when he announces, "I will not speak with you much longer, for the prince of this world is coming. He has no hold on me, but the world must learn that I love the Father and that I do exactly what my Father has commanded me" (vv. 30-31).

What did Jesus mean when he said, "For the prince of this world is coming"? The prince of this world is the devil (John 12:31; 16:11). Since it says he is coming, Jesus is undoubtedly referring to the activity of the devil in moving Judas to betray him to his enemies, which he was probably doing at that very moment (13:27, 30). In the person of Judas, Satan was literally coming to initiate Christ's arrest and crucifixion. But this did not trouble Jesus, for he had peace even when confronted by Satan's activity.

Satan could do nothing to Christ because "he has no hold on me." This is a hard phrase to render idiomatically in English, but we probably catch the sense of it best if we say that there was no sin in Christ for Satan to latch onto like a handle. He would do his best to destroy Christ. But Jesus would slip through Satan's grasp just as he had earlier slipped through the most hostile crowds. So shall we if we are in Christ. We cannot say, as he did, 'The prince of this world... has no hold on me." He has plenty in us all. But if we are in Christ, then we may stand with him and achieve the victory over the enemy.

Kept in Peace

The Lord has left a great legacy, a legacy of peace. But have we entered into that legacy? In order to do so, we must be those to whom the gift is bequeathed; we must be Christ's own, his followers. But even if we are, it may still sometimes be true that, just as in terms of a material legacy, one thing or another may keep us from a full enjoyment of it.

In earthly terms physical distance, illness, or incapacity of another kind may keep us from the enjoyment of an inheritance. In spiritual terms other things may do it. Temptation and consequent trials may keep us from peace. We can be so wrapped up in the temptation that we forget the gifts of God. Ignorance will keep peace from us. If we do not know that God is sovereign and that he works all things according to his perfect plan, then our God will be too small for us and we will tremble for him and for ourselves. Sin will also destroy our peace, for we cannot have full fellowship with God when we are willfully sinning. Unbelief will destroy it. All these items will keep our legacy from us. But if, on the other hand, we do what Isaiah refers to in the twenty-sixth chapter of his prophecy, we will know that peace fully. Isaiah speaks in perfect confidence when he says, "You will keep in perfect peace him whose mind is steadfast, because he trusts in you" (v. 3). What is the necessary ingredient? Trusting in God! The staying of the mind upon him! If we look at the churning waves around us, like Peter we will begin to sink. If we focus on Jesus, we will find ourselves walking even on the stormiest seas.

Chapter 191.
"I Am the True Vine"

John 15:1-5

There have been many guesses about what may have occasioned Christ's parable of the vine and its branches, which extends over the first half of John 15, but it is impossible to be certain of the cause. Since the preceding chapter concludes with the words, "Come now; let us leave," it would seem that the Lord and his disciples left the upper room at this point and began that quiet walk across the city of Jerusalem down into the Kidron Valley that brought them to the Garden of Gethsemane on the Mount of Olives. If that is the case, they may have passed the great golden vine that decorated the door to the Holy Place of the temple or else the vines that grew close to the great walls of the city and stretched along it. This is not certain, however, for the party may have lingered in the upper room even after Christ's statement. Some, who have felt this way for other reasons, have suggested that the vine on the temple may have been visible through a window of the room or that a real vine may have been nearby.

As I say, we do not know the occasion for this parable. We only know that vines were visible everywhere in Judea and that the image of the vine had already been widely used in reference to Israel. "I am the true vine," Jesus said. He then went on to teach about the nature of the church and its fruitfulness, which was to be the result, not of any human achievement, but of its spiritual union with himself. "In me ... in me ... in me!" That is the theme of this parable and of the great "I am" saying with which it is launched.

The True Vine

The first point of this parable is the "I am" saying itself, and the obvious emphasis is upon the word "true." "I am the true vine," says Jesus. This does not mean that he is true as opposed to that which is false but, rather, that he is the one, perfect, essential and enduring vine before which all other vines are but shadows. The word is used in precisely this sense elsewhere where Jesus is declared to be the "true light" (1:9), the "true bread" (6:32), and the "true tabernacle" (Heb. 8:2).

But there is an even more immediate reference, which almost certainly would not have escaped the disciples. The vine is the preeminent symbol of Israel. Thus, over and over again in the Old Testament Israel is portrayed as God's choice vine or God's vineyard. Isaiah had written, "I will sing for the one I love a song about his vineyard: My loved one had a vineyard on a fertile hillside. He dug it up and cleared it of stones and planted it with the choicest vines. He built a watchtower in it and cut out a winepress as well. Then he looked for a crop of good grapes, but it yielded only bad fruit.... The vineyard of the LORD Almighty is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah are the garden of his delight. And he looked for justice, but saw bloodshed; for righteousness, but heard cries of distress" (Isa. 5:1-2, 7). In a similar vein, Jeremiah recorded, "I had planted you like a choice vine of sound and reliable stock. How then did you turn against me into a corrupt, wild vine?" (Jer. 2:21). Ezekiel 15 compares Israel to a vine also, as does Ezekiel 19, "Your mother was like a vine... : it was fruitful and full of branches" (v. 10). Hosea wrote, "Israel was a spreading vine; he brought forth fruit for himself" (10:1). One of the best-known passages is from the Psalms: "You brought a vine out of Egypt; you drove out the nations and planted it. You cleared the ground for it, and it took root and filled the land. The mountains were covered with its shade, the mighty cedars with its branches" (Ps. 80:8-10).

The vine was well known, then, as a symbol of Israel. Indeed, a bunch of grapes from the vine is a symbol seen in Israel even today. But the truly extraordinary thing about the use of this image in the Old Testament is that it is always brought forward as a symbol of Israel's degeneration, rather than her fruitfulness. The point of Isaiah's reference is that the vine has run wild, producing sour grapes. "What could have been done more to my vineyard, than I have not done in it?" God asks. Yet it brought forth "wild grapes" (v. 4). Jeremiah terms Israel a "degenerate" and "strange" vine. Hosea calls her "empty," that is, run to leaves. The eightieth psalm is set in the context of a plea for God's renewed favor after the vine has been burned and the hedges broken down.

So here is a vine planted by God to be fruitful but which is not fruitful. And here also, by contrast, is the Lord Jesus Christ who is the true vine. He came from dry ground, but still he grew up before the Lord as "a tender plant" (Isa. 53:2). He was despised of men, but he was perfect and beloved of the Father who, indeed, declared him to be his "beloved Son" in whom he was "well pleased" (Matt. 3:17; 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:35). Jesus is the One who, by his very nature as the true vine, brings forth fruit unto the Father.

The Gardener

There are two things that the Father is said to do in his care of the vine. First, he is said to "cut off every branch that does not bear fruit. Generally this has been understood to be a purging away of dead branches in precisely the same sense that branches are said to be "thrown into the fire" and "burned" in verse 6, but I am convinced that most translators have missed the true meaning of the term "cut off in this instance. Undoubtedly, their translation has been made to conform to what they know or believe is coming in verse 6, but the translation is not the best or even the most general meaning of the Greek word aim which lies behind it. The word airo has four basic meanings, which are, proceeding from the most fundamental to the most figurative:
(1) to lift up or pick up, (2) to lift up figuratively, as in lifting up one's eyes or voice, (3) to lift up with the added thought of lifting up in order to carry away, and (4) to remove. In translating this word by the verb "cut off the majority of translators have obviously chosen the fourth of these meanings, for the reason suggested above. But the verse makes better sense and the sequence of verbs is better if the first and primary meaning of the word is taken. In that case the sentence would read, "Every branch in me that does not bear fruit he lifts up," that is, to keep it from trailing on the ground.

This translation makes better sense of the passage in every way, and in addition it is much better theology. First, the emphasis of this opening section of the parable is, quite rightly, upon the care of the vine by the Father. It would be strange, granting this emphasis, if the first thing mentioned is the carrying away of unproductive branches. But it is not at all strange to emphasize that the gardener first lifts the branches up so that they may be better exposed to the sun and so the fruit will develop properly.

Second, this lifting up is precisely what is first done with vines, as any one who has watched them being cared for knows. Grapes are not like squash or pumpkins that develop quite well while lying on the ground. They must hang free. Consequently, any branch that trails on the ground is unproductive. It would be a strange gardener who immediately cuts off such a branch without even giving it a chance to develop properly. But it would be wise and customary for him to stretch the vine on an arbor or use some other means of raising it to the air and sun. This is, of course, precisely what vineyards look like, for the vines are always strung from pole to pole on wires.

Third, to translate the word airo by "lifts up" gives a proper sequence to the Father's care of the vineyard, indicated by the verb that follows. Thus, he first of all lifts the vines up. Then he cuts off the unproductive elements, carefully cleansing the vine of insects, moss, or parasites that otherwise would hinder the growth of the plant. This last item would have been the ancient equivalent of using insecticides, as is done today.

For these reasons the translation "lifts up" should be preferred. And if this is the case, then the first thing the Father is said to do is to lift the Christian closer to himself. To translate that into spiritual terms, it means that the Father first creates a sense of true devotion in the Christian.

Pruning

The second thing the Father is said to do in his care of the vine is to purge it or prune it. In Greek this word is katharizo, which means to cleanse, make clean, or purify. It has given us our English word catharsis. Normally this word would indicate the act of cleansing the vine of anything harmful to it—insects, moss, and so on. But since it is being used of a vine and its branches, it is hard to escape the feeling that pruning is probably also in view. At all events, here the Father is said to be doing a work of removal, removing everything that would prove detrimental to the most fruitful harvest.

In spiritual terms this obviously refers to God's work in removing that which is spiritually detrimental from a given Christian's life. It means to have our bad habits stripped away. It means to have our priorities reordered, our values changed. At times it may mean the removal of friends who are hindering rather than advancing our spiritual growth.

The order of these two activities of the Father are most important, because the reverse only produces hypocrisy. What happens when we go about lopping off so-called unspiritual practices without first being drawn closer to God in true devotion is that we imagine ourselves to be quite saintly, when actually we are not. We begin to look down on others who have not made the same denials. We consider them to be worldly and ourselves spiritual. Moreover, having eliminated these elements ourselves without first having our lives filled with Christ, we discover that we have a vacuum within and that it is easy for something else not at all Christian to fill it. We are like the man in Christ's story who threw one demon out of his house but then suffered greater loss when that demon and seven of his friends returned to repossess him.

What should happen is that we first of all draw near to God and become productive. After that, as the harmful things begin to be cut away, we hardly feel their going. It is a case of maturing, similar to a girl's giving up dolls. No one ever asks a girl to give up playing with dolls. When she is young she plays with them. But as she grows older she becomes interested in a young man, and after this the dolls are just "kid's stuff." The girl does not "give up" dolls. The dolls give her up, because she has grown into a higher sphere of experience. In the same way, as we grow close to the Lord Jesus Christ the dead wood and parasites fall away.

There is one more point connected with the matter of cleansing. It concerns the means by which we are cleansed—the Word of God. Unless we see that the Word must cleanse us, our ideas of purity are man-made and not of God's origin at all. What is more, they are ineffective. David asked the question, "How can a young man keep his way pure?" He answered, "By living according to your word" (Ps. 119:9). Similarly, Jesus says to his disciples, "You are already clean because of the word I have spoken to you" (John 15:3). Nothing will keep sin from us but a careful attention to and application of God's Word. Nothing else will cleanse us.

Remain in Me

The third point in Christ's parable of the vine and the branches is the secret of fruitfulness, which is abiding in Christ. Here Jesus says, "Remain in me, and I will remain in you. No branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me. I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing" (vv. 4-5).

The key sentence in these two verses can mean one of three things. It can be a simple declarative, with the sense, "You must remain in me, and I must remain in you." It can be a promise: "Remain in me, and I will remain in you." Or it can be a command meaning," Remain in me and, thus, see to it that I for my part also remain in you." Probably, as Leon Morris points out, it is the third of these that should be preferred. "Jesus means that the disciples should live such lives that He will continue to abide in them. The two 'abidings' cannot be separated, and 'abiding' is the necessary prerequisite of fruitfulness. No branch bears fruit in isolation. It must have vital connection with the vine. So to abide in Christ is the necessary prerequisite of fruitfulness for the Christian."

I am not a horticulturist, but I am told by those who know such things that a vine needs to be cultivated at least three years before being allowed to produce fruit at all. That is, it must be trimmed and allowed to grow, then be trimmed and allowed to grow again, and so on for a considerable length of time. Only after this does it become useful for bearing fruit. Similarly, there are times in our lives when we seem to go on for considerable periods, undergoing rather radical treatment at the hands of the Father and seeing little fruit come from it. In such times we doubt if there will ever be fruit. But that is only because we cannot see as God sees. We do not have his perspective. Do not get discouraged if that has happened to you. Instead, remember that Jesus promises fruit in due time if we truly remain in him in a close way. We can give our witness, live the Christian life, and, in a sense, refuse to be concerned about the outcome; for, ultimately, God is the One responsible for the vineyard.

You Can Do Nothing

The last sentence of this section introduces a warning, lest in our budding enthusiasm for bearing fruit for God we forget that it cannot be done without him. "Apart from me you can do nothing," says Jesus.

This statement may be applied in two ways. On the one hand, it may be applied to Christians; and if that is done, we have the following: (1) great work to be done, (2) the possibility of attempting to do it, but without Christ, and (3) the inevitable failure that must result from such effort. Spurgeon, who preached a marvelous sermon on just these words, observed, "Without Jesus you can talk any quantity; but without him you can do nothing. The most eloquent discourse without him will be all a bottle of smoke. You shall lay your plans, and arrange your machinery, and start your schemes; but without the Lord you will do nothing. Immeasurable cloud-land of proposals and not a spot of solid doing large enough for a dove's foot to rest on— such shall be the end of all!" It is good that it is so, for if it were not so, I am afraid that we would try to do it all without him. Nothing is what shall come of our efforts, if it is not Christ working.

On the other hand, there is also encouragement in this verse when we realize that it may be applied to those who are yet Christ's enemies. "Without Christ we can do nothing." That is humbling. But if that is true for those who are united to Christ by faith, in whom he nevertheless dwells, how much truer it is of those who are not at all united to him. They may try to do something against the gospel. They may try to destroy Christ's work. But all their efforts will come to nothing, for only the hand of man (and not that of God) is in them.

Chapter 192.
Remaining and Not Remaining

John 15:6-7

When the Lord Jesus Christ unfolded his parable of the vine and the branches he knew what he was talking about, for he wished to stress that his disciples must be fruitful, and it is a characteristic of the vine that it is good for nothing except fruit-bearing. If it does not produce grapes, it is worthless.

The reason for this is that the wood of the vine is too soft for any other purpose. A tree might be cut down, sawed into planks, and then used to construct furniture or build a house. But the vine is always gnarled and twisted and cannot yield planks. Besides, it is brittle. Anything built of it would soon break in the user's hands and be worthless. It is not even good for burning. William Barclay points out, in his commentary, that at certain times of the year it was stipulated by law that the people were to bring wood offerings to the temple to supply the fires for the sacrifices. But it was also laid down that the wood of the vine must not be brought, because it was useless for that purpose. It burned too quickly. The only thing that could be done with it, save letting it lie around, was to make a bonfire and destroy it quickly.

This, incidentally, is the basis of the fifteenth chapter of Ezekiel, for in that chapter the prophet is emphasizing the uselessness of Israel in her then-quite-unproductive state. He writes, "How is the wood of a vine better than that of a branch on any of the trees in the forest? Is wood ever taken from it to make anything useful? Do they make pegs from it to hang things on? And after it is thrown on the fire as fuel and the fire burns both ends and chars the middle [that is, it is burned up instantly], is it then useful for anything?" (vv. 2-4).

This is the image that Jesus uses of those who are joined to him in saving faith. So the question immediately arises: Are we who are joined to Christ fruitful? Are we useful to him? Or are we merely a lot of leaves and dead wood, fit for nothing but to be gathered up and burned.

Remaining in Christ

The verse we come to first contains the phrase, "He cuts off." But the place to begin is not with the negative. It is with the positive idea: with remaining. This is true because remaining in Christ is the major idea of this section of John's Gospel. The word "remain" occurs eight times in just seven verses (vv. 4-10), and the thought is alluded to even more often. It is also true because the negative—"does not remain" is bracketed between two positive statements. Verse 5 reads, "If a man remains in me," and verse 7 concludes, "If you remain in me..." Besides, we will hardly understand a failure to remain in Christ until we know what remaining means.

In the first place, then, remaining in Christ is for those who are in Christ already. That is, Christ's challenge is for those who are already Christians, who have believed on him as the Son of God and Savior and have committed themselves to him as Savior and Lord of their lives. Does this describe you? If so, you can go on to what Jesus is talking about in terms of a full and fruitful life. If not, you must stop at this point or else first come to him. Do not think that Jesus is giving a formula for a full and fruitful life to all men, regardless of their relationship to him. He is speaking to Christians, and he is giving this promise only to them. So come to him if you have not already done so. Say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I admit that my life is unfruitful and that I can never make it fruitful by myself. I need you. Accept me now, not on the basis of my own merit (for I have none), but on the basis of your death on my behalf. Accept me as one of your followers." If you can pray that prayer and mean it, you can be certain that he has already joined you to himself.

The second point is the remaining. It refers to conscious decisions or choices in living the Christian life. Ray Stedman writes of this passage, "When our Lord says: Abide in me he is talking about the will, about the choices, the decisions we make. We must decide to do things which expose ourselves to him and keep ourselves in contact with him. This is what it means to abide in him. We have been placed into Christ by the Holy Spirit. Now we must choose to maintain that relationship by the decisions we make—decisions to expose ourselves to his Word in order to learn about him, and to relate to him in prayer wherein we converse with him. Decisions to relate to other believers in Body Life experiences; that is, bearing one another's burdens and confessing our faults and sharing in fellowship with one another, wherein we learn about and see Christ in one another. All of this is designed to relate to him—Abide in me. If we do that, we are fulfilling this active, necessary decision of the will to obey his Word, to do what he says, and to stay in touch with him."

There is also a third point, found in verse 7. There Jesus says, "If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given to you." This is a point that we have seen earlier in other contexts. It is in chapter 14, for instance. There Christ speaks of love and the expression of love through obedience to his commandments. He says, "If anyone loves me he will obey my teaching. My Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him" (v. 23). Or again, even in this present chapter Jesus says, 'You are already clean because of the word I have spoken to you" (v. 3).

Some people imagine that they can have the person of Christ without the doctrine of Christ. They like the idea of Jesus, but they shy away from his teaching. Some even revolt against it. But their goal is impossible, for he has declared that he will come to none and make his abode with none except those who keep his commandments. Spurgeon once wrote on this theme, "We cannot separate Christ from the Word; for, in the first place, he is the Word; and, in the next place, how dare we call him Master and Lord and do not the things which he says, and reject the truth which he teaches? We must obey his precepts or he will not accept us as disciples. Especially that precept of love which is the essence of all his words.... If thou wilt not have Christ and his words, neither will he have thee nor thy words."

Not Remaining

In the midst of these encouraging instructions, there is a frightening note, for Jesus speaks of the opposite possibility, the possibility of not remaining in him. In this case, he says, "If anyone doe not remain in me, he is like a branch that is thrown away and withers; such branches are picked up, thrown into the fire and burned" (v. 6).

Here is a problem, a problem for all Christians (I am convinced) and not just Calvinistic ones. What is the problem? It is the language of the verse. Jesus does not say, notice, that if we fail to abide in him we will simply be unfruitful, though that is true. Nor does he say we will suffer the loss of all things and yet be saved, as Paul so clearly does in 1 Corinthians 3:15. Rather, he seems to say that if a man does not remain in him, he shall be cut off from the vine and shall wither and be gathered together with others who have also been cut off and shall be burned. The last verb makes one think of being burned in hell. So the text seems to teach the possibility, if not the fact, that some who were once saved will eventually be lost and be consigned to eternal suffering. Does it teach that? If not, how should verse 5 be taken?

Study of the interpretation of this verse shows that there are three basic views taken of it. The first—the one generally assumed by non-Calvinistic theologians and thinkers—is that its meaning is exactly as I have outlined it and that the doctrine of eternal security or perseverance must therefore be rejected as nonbiblical.

But is this valid? To answer that we must see all that is involved. Assuming that this is the meaning of this text (and perhaps of a few other texts), we are then immediately confronted with many other texts, by far the greater weight of biblical revelation, that contradict it. If we hold to this interpretation of John 15:6, we must reject Philippians 1:6, for instance, for how could Paul be confident that he who had begun a good work in the Philippians would continue it until the day of Christ, if they at any time might be cut off for failing to be fruitful? We must reject Romans 8, for in this case there would be something able "to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord." We must even, let us note, reject verses in the Gospel of John itself, for some of the clearest statements of the believer's security are found in this book. One example is John 10:27-29. "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand." We must reject all these verses if John 15:6 refutes the believer's security.

Moreover, I do not believe that the Christian can really accept this interpretation, at least after it has been carefully thought through. In response to John 10:27-29, Arminians usually say that although God will not allow anyone to pluck us out of his hand, he will, nevertheless, not prohibit us, of our own will, from jumping out, if that is truly our desire. But notice that this is not what John 15:6 is saying. John 15:6 is not saying that we can jump out of God's hand, if we choose to do so, but that God will himself thrust us out—more than that, cut us off from a living union with his own Son—not, we must note, because of some grave sin (blasphemy, murder, adultery, or something worse) but simply because we have ceased to be fruitful, and this by the same God who has pledged himself to defend us against all enemies.

I ask: Can any Christian really believe that? I do not believe he can, at least after he has thought it through clearly. If that were the nature of our God, then we would have been cast off long ago; and we would all be in hell. Instead of this, our experience teaches that God has actually born with our fruitlessness, yes, even with our sin and unbelief, and has out of his great love continuously worked to bring us on in the Christian life. Therefore, to adopt this first view is to slander the character of our God and to set the lie to our own experience.

The second interpretation of this verse is that it applies to those who are nominal Christians only. This, for the most part, is the view of Calvinistic writers—Matthew Henry, Charles Spurgeon, the Puritans, and others. These find support in the immediate context: first, in reference to Israel, the old branch, which, according to Paul's teaching in Romans 11 was cut off in order that the wild olive branches (symbolizing the Gentiles) might be grafted in; and then, second, in reference to Judas, who had apparently been cut off that very evening and was soon to be "burned." These interpreters point out that it is not the word "branch" that is used in verse 5, but rather "anyone"—"If anyone does not remain in me..."

The difficulty with this approach is that it is hard to believe that it is not true branches, believers in Christ, that are spoken of. For one thing, the argument regarding "man" versus "branch" does not hold up; for neither word is in the Greek of this verse. The Greek word is tis, an indefinite pronoun. The meaning, then, is "If anyone [that is, any of the preceding, the branches or true believers] does not remain in me, he is like a branch that is thrown away." Besides, there is nothing in the context to indicate that suddenly a new class of persons, those who have claimed to be Christians but who are not actually regenerate, is being introduced. We may point out that the situation noted by the Calvinistic expositors is a real one—there are those who profess to be Christians but who are not and who will eventually be separated from the true church and be lost—but that is not the point here.

According to the third view, it is the believer's works that are burned, if these works are not of Christ, and it is the Christian's role as a fruit-bearer and not his salvation that is discussed in the passage.

Several observations support this. First, it is fruitfulness rather than salvation that is in view throughout this section of the chapter. True, the matter of burning is often associated with hell and therefore the loss or nonpossession of salvation. But that does not mean that it is always associated with it or that it is associated with it here. On the contrary, burning is not always used of hell, as the passage in 1 Corinthians about works proves. And it is its association with the destruction of useless works rather than with the loss of salvation that is most appropriate in this passage. It is always dangerous to try to interpret a parable on any level other than that involved at its most basic point.

Another observation concerns the actual wording of the verse. It is, for example, "like a branch" that the one who is thrown away is thrown away. Therefore, it is not as a "son" that he is thrown away, but as a fruit-bearer. So far as that is concerned, he may indeed be useless to Christ and the Christian ministry though a Christian. Finally, we note that there is even a change of number between the first part of the sentence and the second. In the first part the important term is singular: "If anyone does not remain...." In the second part the key term is plural: "such branches are picked up, thrown into the fire and burned." The "them" and "they" may well be what issues from the "one" who is thrown away in terms of his usefulness. And if this is the case, then it is the Christian's works rather than the Christian himself that are destroyed.

Lot would be an example here, as Arthur W. Pink points out in his presentation of this evidence. "He was out of fellowship with the Lord, he ceased to bear fruit to His glory, and his dead works were all burned up in Sodom; yet he himself was saved!"

Fruitless Christians?

But shall we rejoice just because we are able to accept the third interpretation and therefore consider ourselves to be safe once again? Shall we relax just because we will not be condemned to hell for our fruitlessness? That would be horrible. Our reaction should be one of horror, rather, to think that it is possible to be saved by Christ, to be cultivated and cared for and coddled by the heavenly husbandman, to be preserved for heaven, and yet not to be fruitful in a proper heart response to the One who has done all this for us. Saved and yet fruitless? Far be it from any Christian to be content with that. It is our shame if we are.

And it is folly too, for if we fail to abide in Christ, we forfeit the two great blessings that are promised to us. The first is fruitfulness. Is it really wise to be fruitless? Does it make sense to be unproductive in the Christian life when we could actually be highly productive to the blessing both of ourselves and those around us? No true Christian can ever agree that this is a wise course of action. The second great blessing is the privilege of answered prayer. It is interesting that Jesus speaks of that explicitly in verse 7, saying, "If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given you." These are the two great spheres of blessing for those who abide in Christ—fruitfulness and the privilege of answered prayer. It is toward that divinely appointed sphere of operations that each who belongs to Christ should aspire.

Chapter 193.
God Glorified... in You

John 15:8-11

The connection between John 15:7 and John 15:8 is the connection that the glory of God has with prayer according to the will of God, a connection that we have already seen in John 14:1314 ("And I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father."). But here the emphasis is different. In John 14 the emphasis was upon prayer itself. That it was to be answered was to be a comfort to the disciples. In John 15 the emphasis is upon the glory of God. In this text the glorification of God is linked to four elements, each of which should be abundantly visible in the life of each Christian. The elements are: fruitfulness, love, obedience, and joy. Each one is linked to the central theme of the chapter, the need for Christians consciously to remain in Christ, and should receive careful attention.

Fruitfulness

The first of these ideas is fruitfulness, which Jesus highlights by saying, "This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples" (v. 8). The flow of thought is that if we are Christ's and remain in him, then we will be fruitful in the Christian life and God will be glorified in our fruitfulness. Moreover, the fact that we are fruitful will be a proof that we are indeed Christ's disciples.

At this point we should probably talk about the real meaning of fruitfulness, for if we fail to do that or if we define fruit wrongly, we are inevitably going to discourage some Christians, which we should not do. Let me explain what I mean. If we begin with a phrase like Paul's words of expectation in writing to the Romans—"that I might have a harvest among you, just as I have had among the other Gentiles" (Rom. 1:13)—and if we therefore identify the fruit of the Christian life with converts to Christ, then we will discourage any who, for whatever reason, do not see many come to the Lord. And we will discourage those who, because of sickness or old age or whatever unfavorable circumstances, are unable to do much and who are therefore made to feel they are useless.

It is true, of course, that these other items may be looked at as fruit in a certain sense. The Bible does so itself. But the real fruit is that listed in Galatians 5:22-23: 'The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control." This fruit is the fruit of Christ's own character within us. It is his love, joy, peace, and so on, within the Christian. Once we see this, we see that a fruitful life can belong to any child of God regardless of his age or circumstances. He or she need not be disheartened by advancing years or by suffering. In fact, the person may even be encouraged by them, for it is in such circumstances that the character of the Lord can shine brightest and others can best see that he is truly his Lord's disciple.

Do not think that in taking this approach I am denying the need for fruit in the sense of conversions. We obviously need these too. But the starting point, indeed the indispensable heart of the Christian's witness, is this divine character. Apart from it, the effort to save others is like an apple tree trying to produce other apple trees. It cannot be done in that fashion. First, the apple tree must produce apples. After that the apples, which contain apple seeds, will produce other apple trees.

Love

The second of Christ's emphases is love. This follows naturally since love is a fruit of the Spirit. In fact, it is the chief fruit, for "the greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13). Jesus speaks of it saying, "As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you" (v. 9).

As I look at that verse I see three parts to it. The first part is a declaration of love: "I have loved you." We know that these are wonderful words to hear at any time, if they are true. "I love you." "I have loved you from the moment I first set eyes upon you." "I will always love you." This is the basis of any good marriage, when the love expressed is the fullest measure of love. It is the basis of a Christian home in the love between parents and children. In a different sense it is the basis of friendship and certainly of fellowship within the church. But if this is true when the words are spoken by mere men and women, how much more wonderful they are when spoken by the Lord Jesus Christ, as here, and when we are the ones loved. This is an astonishing love, for there is nothing in us that could give cause for it. We are sinners. Jesus is holy. We have rebelled against God. Nevertheless, Jesus loves us.

The steps of the expression of his love are these. To begin with, he loved us with an electing love. This is the stage of love revealed in Deuteronomy 7 in relation to Israel: "For you are a people holy to the LORD your God. The LORD your God has chosen you out of all the peoples on the face of the earth to be his people, his treasured possession. The LORD did not set his affection on you and choose you because you were more numerous than other peoples, for you were the fewest of all peoples. But it was because the LORD loved you..." (vv. 6-8). He loved you because he loved you. That is the heart and full substance of it. As Spurgeon has written, "Election is based upon affection, and that affection is its own fountain."

Next, the Lord became a man like us, so great was his love for us. It is written of love in marriage, "For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). Thus did the eternal Son. He left his Father's home in heaven to come to earth to woo and wed his bride, the church. He redeemed her. The incarnation is Jesus becoming like us so that we might become like him.

Finally, having elected us in love and become like us in a human form, Jesus died for us. Jesus said, "Greater love has no one than this, that he lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13). That is true, and the greatest example of it is the death of Jesus himself. Said Spurgeon, "That laying down of life in our Lord's case was specially a proof of love, for he died voluntarily; there was no necessity upon him, as upon us, to die. Other men, if they died for us, would but pay the debt of nature a little before its time; but Jesus died who needed not to die, so far as he himself was concerned. He died also amid circumstances of pain, and shame, and desertion, which made that death peculiarly bitter. The death of the cross is to us the highest proof of our Savior's infinite love of us. He must die the death of a felon, between two thieves, utterly friendless, the object of general ridicule; and this he must do as bearing our sins in his own body. All this makes us say, 'Behold how he loved us!' O beloved! can we doubt Christ's love, since he laid down his life...?"

It is not only a sublime declaration of love that we have in this verse. We also have the measure of that love; for Jesus says, "As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you." I suppose that we would rejoice in the love of Christ for us even if his love were but a part-time or half-hearted thing. For him to love us at all would be remarkable. But this is not what he says; nor is it the case. Jesus says that he has loved us, not with an imperfect or even a "perfect" human love, but rather with the greatest love there is; namely, the love which has existed within the being of the Godhead from all eternity and which will exist to all eternity, the love of the Father for him and (we must obviously add) his love for the Father. Is there a greater love than that? It is impossible that there could be. This love is without beginning or end. It is without measure. It is without change. It is according to the measure of this great love, and consequently with that love itself, that Christ loves us.

One thing more. First, we saw Jesus' declaration of his love for us. Second, we saw the measure of that love. Third, we have the challenge of love, which is, in this case, to "continue" it. If we continue in his love, then we will be remaining in him and prove fruitful.

Obedience

The third word in this catalog of elements contributing to God's glory is obedience, though it is expressed in a challenge to keep Christ's commands, as has been done elsewhere. "If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love, just as I have obeyed my Father's commands and remain in his love" (v. 10).

Are we tired of this emphasis by now, this emphasis upon Christ's commands? I suspect that we are; but if we are, the fault is in us and not the commands. For, as John says in his first epistle, "His commands are not burdensome" (1 John 5:3). Jesus said, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light" (Matt. 11:30). Then what is wrong? I suspect that what is wrong with us is that we are not really as anxious to do Christ's commands as we would like to think we are; thus, the emphasis upon obedience (we have had it several times already in the last discourses, and we will have it several times more) exposes our halfhearted commitment to the will of Christ and so gives birth to feelings of true guilt.

What happens to us is precisely what happened to Peter when, following the resurrection, the Lord was recommissioning him to service. Peter had denied the Lord three times in the presence of the servants and soldiers in the courtyard of the high priest. So Christ recommissioned him with a threefold pattern. He asked him, "Simon, son of John, do you love me more than these?"

Peter was aware of his recent failure, but he did love Jesus. So he replied in what I believe to be an air of genuine humility, "Yes, Lord; you know that I love you."

Jesus said, "Feed my lambs."

After a short time Jesus asked Peter again, "Simon, son of John, do you love me?" Peter replied that he did.

Again Christ gave the commission, "Feed my sheep."

Finally the Lord asked Peter the third time, "Simon, son of John, do you love me?" This time we are told, "Peter was grieved because he asked him a third time, 'Do you love me?' And he said to him, 'Lord, you know all things; you know that I love you.'" Jesus said, "Feed my sheep" (John 21:15-17).

Why was Peter grieved? He was grieved because the third repetition reminded him of his threefold denial and hence awakened grief and true guilt for what he had done. Moreover, the questioning had suggested that perhaps, just perhaps, Peter's first effusive answer, "Yes, Lord, you know that I love you," could not be taken at quite its face value. Peter was always prone to blurt something out, but did he really mean it? Did he mean it enough to take a servant's role in caring for Christ's sheep? Did he mean it enough to continue to fulfill this or any other command of Christ until his life's end? Ah, that was quite a different matter. And Peter, like us, did not enjoy being reminded of his weakness.

We need to be reminded anyway. That is the point of the repetition. "If you love me, obey my commands" (14:15). "Whoever has my commands and obeys them, he is the one who loves me" (14:21). "If anyone loves me, he will obey my teachings" (14:23). "If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love" (15:10). "You are my friends if you do what I command you" (15:14). The point is obvious. We must keep Christ's commands if we are to be Christ's disciples and grow in his love.

Let us note one thing further. It is true that we are reminded to obey all that Jesus has given us by way of instruction. But even as he tells us this, Jesus points out that he is asking of us no more than he has already asked and given of himself. 'Just as I have obeyed my Father's commands and remain in his love" is his comparison. We can be encouraged by this, knowing that the One who instructs us has himself set the pattern and will give us strength to do as he requires.

Joy

In the last verse, Jesus introduces the fourth and final element that is to be in us and by which the Father shall be glorified. It is joy. Christ adds it, I am sure, to indicate that his commands actually lead in precisely the opposite direction from being grievous. They lead to the fullness of that joy that is of God and that is rightly listed as the second virtue in the list of the Spirit's fruit in Galatians. Jesus says of this virtue, "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (v. 11).

This sentence speaks of the Christian's joy in three senses: joy attained, joy abiding, and joy abounding. Joy is to be attained as a result of the things Jesus had been teaching. This is the reason why the Christian must abide in him, so that the views, outlook, and aspirations of the Master will be those of the disciples as well. This is the reason for the twofold repetition of the word "joy"—"my joy" and "your joy." The joy of Jesus is to be the joy of the disciple. His joy was a wonderful thing, for it was not deterred by suffering or any other circumstance. In fact, it rejoiced in hardship; for we read that Jesus "for the joy that was set before him endured the cross" (Heb. 12:2). Where did he find that joy? The answer is in his intense desire to do the will of his Father: "I have set the LORD always before me. Because he is at my right hand, I will not be shaken. Therefore my heart is glad and my tongue rejoices" (Ps. 16:8-9).

Second, the verse speaks of joy abiding—that "my joy may be [remain] in you." The point of this phrase is that joy does not necessarily remain. Many things can destroy it. Sin can destroy it. So can disobedience or unbelief. David confessed this in the great fifty-first psalm, crying out to God, "Restore to me the joy of your salvation" (v. 12). It was not that his salvation was lost, only that the joy had evaporated. This always happens when we become separated from Christ in the sense of having the fellowship that once was ours broken. In contrast to this, we must abide in him; for when we abide in him the joy abides also.

Finally, the verse speaks of abounding joy. This is the meaning of the clause "and that your joy might be complete." I wish that all Christians were more joyful, and, as I read this verse, I sense that the Lord desires this too. Unfortunately, there are many long faces and dour looks. There is too much defeat, too much unhappiness. It does not need to be that way. Rather we should be able to rejoice in Christ, even in the face of arrest, beatings, crucifixion, and death, as he did.

When joy, linked to fruitfulness, love, and obedience, is found in the life of a Christian, all can see it and know that the source is divine. We can never produce these things. We cannot produce the Spirit's fruit. We cannot produce love. We cannot produce joy. But Jesus can do it as we abide in him.

Chapter 194.
No Greater Love

John 15:12-14

There is something charming about the word "friend" or "friendship." It is due partly to our desire for a close friend or friends and partly, too, to our remembrance of them. We look to our past and can almost mark the major periods of our lives by friends we have had. We think of the friends who went to grade school with us and of the things we did with them. Perhaps at the point of going into high school we made different friends, and we think sometimes, not only of the friends, but of the adventures we had—sometimes adventures that the teachers or other authorities did not entirely appreciate. We have had college friends and those we have acquired later in life. We value friendship and know that we would be much impoverished if we had no friends at all.

It is this awareness that probably gives the verses to which we now come their special appeal, for in them the Lord Jesus Christ, the great incarnate God of the universe, speaks of friendship in terms of our relationships to him. He calls us friends, saying, "Greater love has no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends. You are my friends if you do what I command you."

Human Friendship

When Jesus says, "You are my friends," it is evident that he is speaking to us on the human level in terms we can clearly understand. And he is doing so—we cannot fail to see it—so that we might contrast his friendship, which is great and perfect, to even the best of the other friendships we have known.

The best known of the biblical examples is the friendship between Jonathan, the son of King Saul, and David, the young hero of Israel. Jonathan was in line for the throne. But David was so evidently blessed of God that the people were saying that he should be the next king. Here was cause for great antagonism, antagonism between the apparent rights of the one and the supposed aspirations of the other. But there was no antagonism. Instead there was a great and beautiful friendship. It was a case in which each sacrificed in order to put the other's interests ahead of his own.

Sometimes the love that exists between one friend and another leads to the ultimate sacrifice, to death. A friend of mine tells that as he was growing up he knew a man who in a sublime moment of self-sacrifice gave his life to try to save his grandson. The two were out in a boat on the Monongahela River in West Virgina, and neither of them could swim. The child, for one reason or another, fell overboard and was drowning. So the man jumped in after the child. Both drowned. But afterward when they found the bodies, the grandfather still had the young child clutched in his arms. He had been so anxious to save his grandson that he had not even opened up his arms to attempt to swim to save himself.

When we hear a story like that we tend to become silent, for we know that we stand before something sublime. It is the ultimate sacrifice, the sacrifice of one's life. Because of such sacrifices we understand what the Lord is saying when he declares in clear reference to his own self-sacrifice: "Greater love has no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends."

Friend of Sinners

On the other hand, it is not really fair to talk about Jesus' sacrifice in merely human terms, for his death surpasses anything we can imagine. It may not happen often, but sometimes one human being will voluntarily die for another; still, this gift never equals or even parallels Jesus' sacrifice. We see this when we reflect on Jesus' death.

First, when we begin to reflect on Jesus' death we recognize that his death was exceptional if only because Jesus did not have to die. That is not true of us. We are mortal. We must die. But Jesus was immortal and therefore did not have to die. Indeed, he was life itself; for he said, "I am the way and the truth and the life" (John 14:6). He could have come into this world, performed a full and varied ministry, and then have returned to heaven without ever having experienced death. On the other hand, of us it is said, "Man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment" (Heb. 9:27). What does this mean in terms of self-sacrifice? Merely this. If you or I were to give our lives for someone else, while that would undoubtedly be a great and heroic sacrifice, it would nevertheless at best be merely an anticipation of what must eventually come anyway. We would simply be dying a bit sooner than normally. The Lord did not need to die under any circumstances.

Second, the death of the Lord Jesus Christ is exceptional in that he knew he would die. Again, this is not usually the case when a mere man or woman gives his or her life for another. Few who die in this way do so knowing in advance that they will die. Rather, it is usually the case that although the act is a risk and death is possible, they nevertheless think they may escape death while yet saving their friend. People take calculated risks and sometimes die, but they do not often die deliberately. Jesus by his own testimony deliberately went to the cross to die for our salvation.

There is another area in which the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for his friends shines brighter than any love of which we are capable. The text says that we are Christ's friends and that he was going to give his life for his friends. But if we think of this closely and honestly, we must recognize that, when the Lord Jesus gave his life for us, strictly speaking we were not exactly his friends. True, he calls us friends. It is also true that we become his friends. But we become friends because of his act, because of his electing grace toward us manifesting itself in the atonement and in the ministry of his Spirit by which our natural rebellion against God is overcome and our hearts are drawn to love and serve Jesus. When he died for us, or (if we may push that even farther back) when in eternity past he determined to die for us, he did so while we were yet enemies or were forseen to be enemies. It was "while we were still sinners, [that] Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

Here especially do we see the wonderful love of the Lord Jesus Christ. So long as we think of ourselves as being somewhat good in God's sight we do not see it. But when we see ourselves as God sees us, then the surpassing worth of the love of Christ becomes evident.

It is this that leads up to the verse I have just quoted from Paul's treatment of the human condition in Romans. The opening chapter of that book deals with man's sin, showing how all men and women have possessed a certain knowledge of God but have turned from that knowledge in order to worship a god of their own devising. Paul says that a certain knowledge of the existence and power of God is disclosed in nature and in the consciences of all men and women. But we have rejected that knowledge. Paul says, "For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (Rom. 1:21-23).

There are certain consequences of this, as the chapter goes on to show. We have given up God. So, says Paul, in a certain sense God has given us up. He has given us up to certain consequences. Three times in this chapter we read that "God gave them over." In every case, however, we are told what God gave them over to. This is important, for it is not as if God were holding the human race in his hand and then let go with the result that the human race simply drifted off into nowhere. If I let go of an object, the object falls. I have not given it up to nothing.

I have given it up to the law of gravity, and the law of gravity draws it downward. In the same way, God gives us over to the sad consequences of our rebellion.

First of all, God has given us over to "sexual impurity" (v. 24). That is, when we turn our backs upon God, who is perfect in his purity, we inevitably become dirty spiritually.

Second, God has given us over to "shameful lusts" (v. 26). That is, the good affections we have and that we rightly cherish become warped because they are severed from their source. Love becomes lust. A proper sense of responsibility becomes the driving pride of personal ambition. Self-sacrifice becomes selfishness, and so on.

Third, God says that he has given us over to a "depraved mind" (v. 28). This means that we have developed a way of thinking that is antagonistic toward God so that we are constantly devising philosophies and actions that try to eliminate his presence from our lives.

These important verses from Romans give God's assessment of the human race. He made us. More than this, he made us in his own image. But we have rebelled against him and defaced that image. Instead of God's glory, we have advanced man's depravity. Instead of his sovereignty, we have sought human autonomy. Instead of holiness, we have sin. Instead of love, hate. Yet, in spite of our depravity, Christ came to be our friend and prove his friendship by dying for us. As Paul states, "At just the right time, when we were still powerless, Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:6-8).

Spiritual Death

There is one more reason why the love of the Lord Jesus Christ for his friends, seen in his death for us, is superior to all human loves. The death of the Lord was a spiritual death, whereas ours, if we are Christians, is only physical.

If we were to give our life for someone else, the death we would endure would be only physical. We cannot die spiritually in the place of another person. But that is precisely what Jesus Christ did. Death is separation. Physical death is the separation of the soul and spirit from the body. Spiritual death is the separation of the soul and spirit from

God. This is what makes hell such a terrible place; those in hell are separated from God. And because God is the source of all good— all joy, peace, love, and other blessings—hell is the opposite. It is misery, unrest, hate, and so on. This is the separation that Jesus endured for us. He died physically also; that is true. His death was particularly painful and degrading. But the truly horrible aspect of his death was his separation from the Father when he was made sin for us and bore sin's punishment.

This is the meaning of the cry wrung from his lips in that moment: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" I do not know how to explain that. I do not know how it is possible for the second person of the Godhead to be separated from the first person of the Godhead, even for a brief time, as this was. But this is what happened as Jesus experienced ultimate spiritual death in order that we might never have to experience it. Love like that goes beyond our best understanding.

These truths and more are involved in Christ's statement: "Greater love has no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends." We read that and acknowledge its truth. But then we go on to say, "Yes, and greater love has no one at all—either man, devil, or angel—than that the Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, should die a spiritual death for us sinners."

Do you know him as the One who demonstrated his love and friendship for you by thus dying? Is he your friend in that sense? If not, you are not yet truly a Christian. But you can be. You can find him to be your friend, indeed, a superlative friend. As the hymn says:

> There's not a friend like the > lowly Jesus, No not one!
> No not one!

You need only come to him, confessing your sin and acknowledging your need of him to be your Savior.

Friends of Jesus

There is one other question that arises from our text. I have asked, "Is Jesus your friend?" This is the question that emerges from verse 13 in which Jesus speaks of his love and, therefore, of his friendship for us. But in the next verse we have what might be called the other side of that question. It is, "Are you Christ's friend?" Jesus suggests this when he declares, "you are my friends if you do what I command you" (v. 14).

I am glad the Lord put it as he did, for I suppose that if we had come to him and had asked, "Lord, you have shown yourself to be a friend to us; what must we do to be your friends?" Jesus could have answered, "You have my example of what a true friend is; do that." But if he had said that, we would have been discouraged. How could you or I do that—love as he loves, give ourselves as he gave himself? It is impossible for us to die spiritually for someone else. If Jesus had required us to do all he did, it would be impossible to become his friend. But he did not say that. Instead, he put the requirements in our terms and on our level, saying, "You can be my friends if you will only do what I command you." This means that we are to show our friendship to him by simple obedience.

Did I say "simple"? Yes, it is simple; but it is simple obedience, and this means that it must be active, continuous, and in all things. We see that our obedience must be active, for Jesus said, "You are my friends if ye do...." Unfortunately some Christians talk about the Christian life as though it consisted largely in refusing to do certain things. If we fall into that way of thinking, we imagine after we have refused to drink alcohol, refused to play cards, refused to have extramarital sex, refused to cheat in business, and so on, that we have done a great deal. But we have not. We have obeyed negatively but not positively. Christ calls upon us to love one another, and that cannot be done except in very practical ways. We are also to pray. We are to worship with other Christians. Our lives are to be marked by good deeds. It would make a great difference in the lives of many Christians if, as they read their Bibles and pray each day, they would pause as part of their devotions to ask what practical things the Lord would have them do.

Second, our obedience should also be continuous. Jesus did not say, "If you do what I command and then quit" or "If you do it on Sundays" or "If you do it when you feel like it." The verb is a present subjunctive meaning "If you are doing." The idea is of continuous action, day after day, year after year. There is no vacation from being a disciple of the Lord.

Finally, our obedience is to be in all things, for he says, "If you do whatever I command you." It means coming to him in love to do whatever he asks of us, not picking and choosing as some do, not exalting those aspects of the Christian faith we like and neglecting those we dislike. Rather it means coming with that yielded humility of mind and body that places us prostrate at his feet and asks from that position, "Lord, what will you have me do?" It is only when we ask that question and mean it that we find ourselves being lifted up to do the great errands of our king, and not as slave either, but rather as a friend of Jesus.

I asked earlier, "Is Jesus your friend?" Now I must ask, "Are you Christ's friend by this definition?" God grant that you might be, to your own great joy and to the praise of his glory.

Chapter 195.
Fruit, More Fruit

John 15:15-17

A part from the fifteenth chapter of John's Gospel, in which the Lord Jesus Christ calls his disciples friends, I do not know of any other characters in the Bible who are called friends of God except Abraham. But this one case is significant, because the nature of the relationship of God to Abraham is an illustration of the main point of Christ's teaching here. Abraham is called "the friend of God" in James 2:23, and the reference in James is either to 2 Chronicles 20:7 (in which Abraham is called "your friend," "your" being God) or Isaiah 41:8 (in which Abraham is called "my friend") or both. The significance of the term is in the fact that God spoke freely to Abraham and thus repeatedly opened his mind to him. The classic example is God's conversation with Abraham just before the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. In this conversation God said, "Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do?" (Gen. 18:17). The answer was no, for the story goes on to record how God revealed the coming destruction to Abraham and how Abraham, knowing that Lot was in Sodom, interceded for the righteous who lived in those cities.

Communication is essential to friendship. Friends speak to one another. They bare their souls and tell their troubles. They share their aspirations. It is no surprise then that in the upper room, in the midst of those conversations in which Jesus calls his disciples friends, the Lord of glory shares his thoughts with them. Already he has done this in reference to his death and resurrection, heaven, the coming of the Holy Spirit after his ascension, and other doctrines. Now he does so in reference to his special calling of them to fruitful service.

He declares that they are his friends because "everything that I learned from my Father I have made known to you" (v. 15).

Friends, Not Servants

One thing that characterizes our friendships is autonomy in the area of choosing whom we will befriend and whom we will not befriend. Generally speaking, that exercise of autonomy is mutual for the persons involved. For example, when we meet another, three reactions are possible so far as friendship is concerned. First, we may not like him or her, and he or she may not like us. In that case we try to be polite to the other person, but no friendship develops. Second, we may like the other person, but he or she may not like us, or vice versa. In that case also no friendship develops unless, of course, the one who dislikes the other changes his or her mind. Third, there may be a mutual attraction. It is only in this latter situation that the people involved become friends. This means that we have a choice in the matter, and so does the other person. We consider this essential to friendship. Yet, in striking contrast to our understanding of the matter, in these verses Jesus stresses that we have become his friends, not because we chose him (because we did not), but because he in his great mercy chose us.

Do we think that we have chosen him? If we do, we have not sufficiently recognized the depth of our own depravity or the unmerited nature of God's grace. The true situation is that we had not only failed to be his friends; we had actually become his enemies, having rejected his rightful rule over us and having spurned his love. The friendship is established only when God acts in Christ to remove the barrier. It is only after he has spoken of laying down his life for us that the Lord Jesus speaks of his disciples as friends.

There is a second difference. It is seen in the purpose clause of verse 16 ("I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit") and in the command that follows ("This is my command: Love each other"). Does it not seem strange from our conception of friendship that Jesus should speak of choosing his friends in order that they might do something and, which is perhaps even worse, immediately follow his declaration of friendship with a command? We would not think of choosing a friend for what he or she could do. That sounds calculating and ignoble. It is not worthy of friendship. Moreover, we would not think of commanding our friend to do something, at least not if we wished to retain him as our friend.

How can Jesus do this? Is his friendship less than human friendships? Or is he teasing, that is, pretending to be our friend when actually he is not? The answer is in the nature of the friendship involved. For this, while true friendship, is nevertheless not a friendship between two equals but between sinful and limited human beings and God. Consequently, the full dimensions of that relationship (which always involve our sin, ignorance, and finitude as well as God's holiness, omniscience, and total sovereignty) are involved. We are God's friends —by grace. But that does not mean that we can approach God as his equal or dictate the terms of the friendship. It means that we must approach him in gratitude always bearing in mind that the friendship exists because he has stooped to our estate.

Fruitful Christians

Having placed the matter of friendship in its proper perspective the Lord goes on to disclose the privileges of that friendship in terms of a life of fruitful Christian service. Here, therefore, the purpose clause emerges, not as a qualification upon the nature of the friendship (though in one sense it is that) but rather as the glorious privilege and destiny of all whom the Lord Jesus Christ calls friends. "You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit— fruit that will last. Then the Father will give you whatever you ask in my name" (v. 16). This statement of purpose has two parts, each of which is introduced by the important Greek word hina ("in order that"): first, that they might be fruitful and, second, that their prayers might be answered.

This is not the first time the word "fruit" has occurred in this chapter, but it carries the understanding of fruitfulness a step farther than any of the previous occurrences. In these verses there is a fourfold progression.

1. In the first part of verse 2 the Lord speaks merely of "fruit." There are no qualifying adjectives. His teaching is that it is the purpose of the vine's branches to bear fruit and that he is concerned that they do so. In studying this verse and (in chapter 14) the fruit of the Spirit, we saw that the fruit is primarily those aspects of character that it is the Spirit's work to produce in the life of believers. The fifth chapter of Galatians describes it as "love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control" (vv. 22-23). In a secondary sense, the word "fruit" may also refer to good works, which flow from these characteristics, and to converts to Christianity.

2. In the second half of verse 2 the Lord adds a modifier to the word "fruit," saying, "Every branch that does bear fruit he prunes so that it will bear even more fruit." "More" is a searching word, as Andrew Murray has noted in his valuable devotional study The True Vine. The reason it is searching is that "as churches and individuals we are in danger of nothing so much as selfcontentment. The secret spirit of Laodicea—we are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing—may prevail where it is not suspected. The divine warning—poor and wretched and miserable—finds little response just where it is most needed." So let us not be content with little fruit. Regardless of past blessings, there is always more that God has for us in growth of Christian character, service, evangelism, and other blessings.

3. Seven verses farther, in verse 8, we have another modifier. This time the Lord says, 'This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples." Christians often seem to want little to happen—perhaps because they consider "much" of anything to be worldly, including spiritual growth and successes. But whatever the reason, it is certain that Christ is thinking in different terms here, for here he speaks of "much fruit" and of the fact that "much fruit," rather than merely "fruit" or "more fruit," is to the glory of God. Do we believe him? Then we must strive to achieve much, knowing that little fruit brings but little glory either to the Father or the Son.

4. Finally, in the verse we are studying, we come to the last stage in this progression. It is "fruit that will last" (v. 16). Not all fruit does last. In fact, in purely agricultural terms no fruit really lasts. Pears perish. Apples become rotten. Berries, oranges, and grapefruit spoil. In human terms much that we do also belongs in this category. We work, but much of our work and the fruits of that work pass away. In time we will ourselves pass away. Does nothing remain? Does all pass? One thing remains, and that is the fruit produced in the life of the Christian by the Lord Jesus Christ. He is eternal. Therefore, his work is also eternal and will never perish. We come close to this in a bit of doggerel that says:

Only one life! 'T' will soon be past.
Only what's done for Christ will last.

Is Christ at work in you? Or is it just you working? Here every Christian worker should pause and ask what he or she is accomplishing in the light of eternity. We should remember that it is possible to build great monuments out of wood, hay, and stubble. A haystack can be quite a large thing. But these will not last. Rather, we are to build with the gold, silver, and precious stones provided by God and assembled by the Lord Jesus Christ according to his blueprint.

Intercession

The second purpose of Christ's calling of us to be friends is that "the Father will give you whatever you shall ask in my name." I must admit that when I first looked at that clause, I found myself wondering why it is introduced here in what is apparently a repetitive way. The inducement to pray is not new. We have had it several times already (14:13-14; 15:7).

It would be a sufficient answer to say that the promise is repeated simply because we need to hear it and because we are so lax in our life of prayer. But as I think about the context in which Jesus speaks of this new friendship and of his command that we love one another, it seems to me that he is probably thinking here of that particular type of prayer known as intercession.

Intercession is prayer for others. What should be more natural for the one who along with others has been brought into this great brotherhood and sisterhood of Christianity than that he or she should pray earnestly for those others who are also Christ's friends? If they are Christ's friends, then they are our friends too. And we must pray for them, as indeed they also must pray for us. In this respect we must be like a towering vine, anchored upon earth but reaching up to that rarified and invigorating atmosphere of heaven in which we meet the Lord and have our requests met by him.

Love One Another

The last verse of this section returns to the theme with which verses 12-17 began, to "love one another." It is not the first time that this command has been given, and if we are sensitive at this point, it is possible that we are just a bit irritated at Christ's repetition. In John 13:34-35, Jesus said, "A new command I give you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another. By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." In the next chapter Christ speaks frequently of our need to love him. Then, in chapter 15, we read, "My command is this: Love each other as I have loved you" (v. 12). Why this constant repetition?

And why are we irritated? The answer to both questions is the same: we do not love one another. Therefore, we feel guilty about it and know that we need to be reminded.

John himself learned this, for, in imitation of Jesus, he repeats the command in his first letter to the churches of Asia. "Love one another," he says in 4:7. "Love one another," he repeats just four verses later (v. 11). Then a third time, "Love one another" (v. 12). We are to love one another because of God's great love toward us and because of Christ's command.

Do we? Do we love one another within that bond of friendship created by the Lord Jesus Christ and according to his own love and standards? Let me list some things that love within friendship does.

1. Love prays for the other. Job is a significant example. Job had lost all that he valued, including his family, health, and property. In his misery his "friends" had turned against him though pretending to give comfort. Truly, if anyone ever had a right to spurn friendship, it was Job. Yet at the end of the story, after God had intervened to disclose his true purposes and reveal his anger at the counsel of Job's friends, we read that Job prayed and that God blessed Job greatly. For whom did Job pray? "After Job had prayed for his friends, the Lord made him prosperous again and gave him twice as much as he had before" (Job 42:10).

2. Love sticks close to the friend when the friend is in trouble. Solomon knew what it is to have a friend who sticks close, for he wrote: "A man of many companions may come to ruin, but there is a friend who sticks closer than a brother" (Prov. 18:24). He indicates the same thing a chapter earlier saying, "A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adversity" (Prov. 17:17).

3. Finally, love also gives and gets. This double activity is seen in Christ's parable of the two friends, one of whom visited the other in the night to say, "Friend, lend me three loaves of bread, because a friend of mine on a journey has come to me, and I have nothing to set before him" (Luke 11:5-6). In the context of Christ's parable the friend who is in bed is reluctant to get up to give to the one asking, yet eventually does, the point being the superior worth of the friendship of God, who gives to all men liberally and is not hard to be entreated. The parable ends, "Ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you" (v. 9). I tell the story, however, not to stress the willingness of God to give (though that is a valuable lesson) but rather to show the nature of that friendship that goes out of its way to supply what another needs.

We would not want to imply that we should spend time in prayer meetings when it is within our power to give to those who are in need. That is like dedicating a gift to God (corban) when parents are destitute. On the other hand, if we are thinking spiritually, we know that we have nothing to give of ourselves. We cannot meet the other's spiritual need. Yet, by God's grace, we have a friend who can meet those needs, even the Lord Jesus. "Friend,... a friend of mine on a journey has come to me, and I have nothing to set before him." Can we think that if we pray that way, recognizing our own need, Jesus will not provide all that the friend of ours (who is, therefore, also a friend of his) lacks? Of course not. Therefore, we must love and give and pray. And we must be friends of Christ, as well as of one another.

Chapter 196.
Hated for No Cause

John 15:18-25

The complaint is sometimes made against some American evangelists that, while they may faithfully proclaim the advantages of Christianity, they nevertheless do not adequately confess the disadvantages from the human point of view. In particular, they do not stress the cost of discipleship nor that the one who faithfully follows Christ will be persecuted. I cannot say how true this criticism is. It is probably less true today than it was a few years ago. But whatever the case, the failure does not stem from Jesus. He was totally honest about discipleship. True, he taught the many and great advantages of following him—eternal life, access to the Father through prayer, the gift of the Holy Spirit, a home prepared by him in heaven. But at the same time he never glossed over the fact that love for him would mean the world's hatred.

We have a prominent example of this in the verses that form the second half of John 15. Up to this point Jesus has stressed the blessings that naturally come to one who has left all to follow him. He has been doing this in order to comfort the disciples, for they were rightly distressed at thoughts of their Lord's pending departure. But now the emphasis changes, and instead of privileges Christ speaks of persecution. The dominant theme is the hostility of the world to Christ and his followers, the word "hate" or "hatred" being repeated seven times. Earlier he had spoken of "his own," now of "the world." Before, it was "friends," now "enemies." First he declared his "love" for them and exhorted them to love; in these verses he warns of the world's "hatred."

These verses are of great importance, if for no other reason than that we might learn of the great gap between those who are Christ's own and the world. If we understand it, we will not raise so many questions as to whether there is harm in this or that. We will not ask how worldly we can be. Rather, we will seek the will of God in all things and strive for God's glory.

The World's Hatred

Christ begins by talking about the hatred of the world for the disciples. But the thrust of the verses is not only to say that they will be hated; it is also to show why. There are three reasons.

First, the disciples of Christ will be hated because they are not "of the world" (v. 19). When John uses the term "world" (as he does five times in just this one verse), he is using it not of the world globe, the earth, or even of the human race that populates the earth. Rather, he is using it of the world system. It is the world of men in rebellion against God, and consequently, it is inclusive of the world's values, pleasures, pastimes, and aspirations. It is said of the world in this sense that it does not know God (1 John 3:1) and that it rejected Jesus (John 1:10). This is the world that hates Christ's followers, and the reason it hates them is that they are not of it. The world hates them for the difference.

In Barclay's commentary on John there are several illustrations of this principle, all from purely secular sources. The first concerns the man who invented the umbrella. Today umbrellas may be seen everywhere and are not at all unusual. But when Jonas Hanway first tried to introduce the umbrella into England and walked down the street beneath one he was pelted with dirt and stones. He was actually persecuted. Again, there is Aristides of Athens. Aristides lived during Athens' golden era and was an outstanding man. He was called Aristides the Just. Yet he was banished from Athens. Why? When one of the citizens was asked why he had voted for Aristides' banishment, he answered, "Because I am tired of hearing him always called the Just." A third illustration is Socrates. Socrates was known as the human gadfly because he was always calling upon others to examine themselves and think deeply, but for this they hated and killed him. Barclay concludes, "To put it at its widest—the world always suspects nonconformity. The world likes a pattern; it likes to be able to label a person and to classify him and to put him in a pigeon-hole. And anyone who does not conform to the pattern will certainly meet trouble."

If this is true of any difference at all, as it seems to be, how much more true is it of that radical difference caused by the transformation of some individuals by the Spirit and power of Jesus Christ. Here is a difference that makes the unusual qualities of Hanway, Aristides, or Socrates pale by comparison. Christians have been with Jesus and have become like him in part. They are not like the world—at least they had best not be. They have other experiences, loyalties, and goals. So the world hates them.

There is a second reason Jesus gives for the world's hatred of his disciples, and this is that he has "chosen" them out of the world. He says, 'You do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you" (v. 19). What is the meaning of this? It is merely the old subject of election. Christ elected the disciples to salvation. He chose them for a specific work in this world. Therefore, although the world rejects Christ's salvation and despises his work, it also hates those who have been chosen by him for it.

There is probably nothing that the world hates more than the doctrine of election. Certainly it was this more than anything else that caused the world's virulent hatred of Christ during the days of his ministry. In John 6, after Jesus had begun to talk about election, pointing out that no man is able to come to him unless drawn by the Father and that those who do not come to him do not because they cannot, we read that many of his disciples "turned back and no longer followed him" (v. 66). Similarly, in John 8, after he had taught the same thing, we read, "Then took they up stones to throw at him" (v. 59). Nothing so stirs up the hatred of the worldly mind than the teaching that God in sovereign grace elects some and does not elect others.

Third, because it hates Christ, the world hates Christians because of their identification with Christ. This truth is probably present in verse 19 of our text also, as we see when we read the verse with an emphasis upon the word "I." "I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you." This emphasis is justified because of the drift of the verses that follow. There Christ says, "If they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also. If they have obeyed my teaching, they will obey yours also. They will treat you this way because of my name" (vv. 2021).

Here is the crux of the matter. Why does the world hate Christians? It hates them because it hates their Master. Hatred does not exist because of what Christians are in themselves; they are nothing. It does not exist because of what they have done; they are harmless (or at least they should be). Hatred exists because the world hates Jesus and because Christians are identified with him by virtue of his call.

Christ Hated

But in a sense, this only pushes the problem back one step, for having explained the first hatred by the hatred of Jesus, we immediately ask: But why does the world hate Jesus? It is a perfectly valid question. Jesus answers it in verses 22-24.

The first reason is that the world hates Jesus because of his words. Jesus states this by saying, "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin. Now, however, they have no excuse for their sin. He who hates me hates my Father as well" (vv. 22-23). Why should they hate Jesus for his words? There are people whom we might hate for their words. Some men's words are arrogant, and people are opposed to them for their arrogance. We all hate pride and show it no pity, save in ourselves. But Jesus was not arrogant. Rather, he was entirely humble, the most perfectly humble man who ever lived, who even when he was afflicted "did not open his mouth" (Isa. 53:7). Some men's words are selfish. Everything revolves around themselves, and they are rightly despised for that. But Jesus was not selfish. He actually gave up his divine prerogatives in order that he might become like us and die for our salvation. Some person's words are mean. But can we hate Christ for that? He was not mean. Instead, he was loving and gentle. He said, "Come to me all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). In still other cases the words men speak are hypocritical, and they are hated for that. But the Lord was not hypocritical. Instead, he is the only man who ever lived whose word could always be trusted, who never said one thing while meaning another.

Then what does Christ mean when he says that his words are one cause of men's hatred? How can this be if they were not arrogant, selfish, mean, or hypocritical? That is just the problem. Before Christ came and spoke, men and women could get by with relative goodness. They could have a little arrogance, but not too much; a little selfishness, but not too much; a little meanness, a little hypocrisy. Moreover, they could be thought good because of the limitation. After Christ came this was revealed for what it is: sin. People hated the exposure.

Ironside tells a story to illustrate this point. Years ago, at the time of the opening up of inland Africa by missionaries, the wife of an African chief happened to visit a mission station. The missionary had a little mirror hung up on a tree outside his home, and the woman happened to glance into it. She had come straight out of her pagan environment and had never seen the hideous paintings on her face, or her hardened features. Now, gazing at her own face, she was startled. She asked the missionary, "Who is that horrible-looking person inside the tree?"

"It is not the tree," said the missionary. 'The glass is reflecting your own face."

She could not believe it until she was holding the mirror in her hand. When she had understood she said to the missionary, "I must have the glass. How much will you sell it for?"

The missionary did not want to sell his mirror. But she insisted so strongly that in the end he thought it would be better to sell it to her and thus avoid trouble. A price was set, and she took the glass. Fiercely she said, "I will never have it making faces at me again." She threw it down and broke it to pieces.

Men and women hated the Lord Jesus Christ for much the same reasons. That is why they hate him today and hate the Bible. Christ and God's Word reveal our true selves, and we do not like the revelation.

There is a second reason why the world hates Christ, and that is his works. He indicates this by saying, "If I had not done among them what no one else did, they would not be guilty of sin. But now they have seen these miracles, and yet they have hated both me and my Father" (v. 24). In this case, as in the previous verses, it is not that men and women actually were sinless before Christ's coming; that is clearly untrue. It is that his works, like his words, brought sin to light.

This word "miracles" is very significant in John's Gospel. Earlier in these studies we looked at the important term "signs," John's characteristic term for a miracle. John uses "signs" seventeen times, but he uses "miracles" (often translated "works" in the NIV) twenty-seven times; and of those twenty-seven times, eighteen apply exclusively to what Jesus has done. On occasion this word refers to what we would term miracles, for example, "I did one miracle, and you are all astonished" (7:21). But it also refers to all that Christ does, as when he prays to the Father, saying, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (17:4). The distinct characteristic of this term is that the works are God's works. Thus, we find Christ saying, "I tell you the truth, the Son can do nothing by himself; he can do only what he sees his Father doing, because whatever the Father does the Son also does" (5:19). Just before healing the man who had been born blind he said we "must work the work of him who sent me" (9:4). When we put the term in this context, we see that the works of Jesus are the works of God and, therefore, the revelation of God. The works of God and the revelation of God are brought to their proper climax and completion in the ministry of Jesus.

This is precisely why the world hates Jesus. It hates him because he was doing the works of God; and the works of God, like the words of God, reveal our spiritual bankruptcy. Before we had Christ's works for comparison, our works looked pretty good. But next to his deeds, even the best of ours looks shabby.

In the final analysis, then, the hatred of the world for Christ's followers may be reduced to this. The world hates Christ's followers because it hates Christ, and the world hates Christ because it hates God the Father.

Two Judgments

What will our reaction be at that point? If it is the reaction of the world, it might be that we should write off discipleship as a bad bet. Discipleship? That is a fine thought if it leads to glory with Christ. But hatred? Persecution? A cross? Who wants those? Would it not be better to simply walk a bit closer to the world and its ways and so escape the world's judgment?

That reaction seems wise, so long as we give no thought to God's assessment of the situation. Write God off, and the option of a pleasant and favored life seems preferable. But place God in the picture, give attention to his judgment, and the balance changes. For what is God's judgment?

It is suggested at the end of this passage by that verse in which Christ quotes from the Old Testament saying, "But this is to fulfill what is written in their Law: 'They hated me without reason'" (v. 25). The quotation here is either from Psalm 35:19 or Psalm 69:4, but the source is not significant. The significant thing is that in these verses God himself expresses a judgment upon the world's hatred of Christ and Christ's followers, saying that it is entirely without cause, groundless, unfair, without any justification. It is therefore blameworthy and culpable.

What will God do in the face of that situation? Will he ignore the injustice? Can he ignore it? He cannot. Rather, he will move against those who have hated or ignored his Son. He will judge them. And he will receive and honor those who have taken their place alongside Jesus and who in quiet faith and determination have borne the world's ridicule with him.

Finally, there is also a word for those who have taken their stand with Jesus and have known the world's hatred. If this has been true of you, you will know that the favor of the world is not worthy to be compared with the favor of Jesus toward his own and that the world's fellowship, for all its joviality, cannot compare with our fellowship with Christ. You would not think of returning to what you were before you met Jesus. But hatred from others can have the effect of making one hard, and out of that hardness there can arise a desire to strike back in fierce retaliation. This is not Christ's way. Therefore, if you are in danger of this, remember that it is said of Christ, "They hated me without reason." Then, in imitation of him, make sure that you give no cause to hatred either. Let such enmity as there is be provoked only by your fellowship with your Lord.

Chapter 197.
He Will... You Will

John 15:26-27

Could anything be more exciting than being a coworker with God? I hardly think so. Yet this is what is promised to every faithful Christian in the pages of God's Word. If your boss should call you up tomorrow morning and say, "I have been watching your work and have been very satisfied with it; I would like you to become a partner with me in directing the affairs of the company," you would be thrilled. You would be even more thrilled if the call should come from the President of the United States asking you to be a member of his cabinet or a special counsel in the area of your expertise. How much more delighted should we be, then, that the sovereign and eternal God has appointed us coworkers with him in carrying the gospel of salvation to this world!

Where does God say that we are appointed coworkers with him or with Jesus Christ in this ministry? The passage I am thinking of as I use that word is 2 Corinthians 6:1, in which Paul says, "As God's fellow workers we urge you not to receive God's grace in vain."

The idea also occurs in the words of Christ in the midst of the final discourses as he instructs his disciples concerning the coming of the Holy Spirit. Here Christ says, "When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you... he will testify about me. And you also must testify" (John 15:26-27). He will testify... you must testify. It is the combination of these two testimonies, however strange it may seem, that God uses to exalt Christ and draw men and women to him. And yet, lest we get too carried away in thinking about being coworkers with God, we need to note that the Lord mentions the Spirit's witness first and only after this does he mention our own. Our witness is necessary, but it is powerless without the presence and supernatural activity of God's own Spirit. Only he can illuminate the unregenerate mind and move the rebellious will of man to embrace our Savior.

Witness of the Spirit

How does the Holy Spirit bear his witness? Or, to put it in slightly different words, in what does the testimony of the Holy Spirit consist? There are two answers. One is the work of the Holy Spirit in directing the writing of the books of our Bible. The other is the Spirit's work in bringing those objective truths home to the subjective experience of the individual Christian.

The witness of the Spirit in directing the writing of the Bible is clearly involved in this section, for the next chapter goes on to speak of it explicitly. "When he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you" (16:13-14). "The truth" that was to be revealed is the truth of the Christian gospel, centering in Jesus' ministry. It involved the past ("he will remind you," 14:26) and future ("he will tell you what is yet to come," 16:13). In this ministry there is special reference to the official role of the apostles as the recipients of the witness.

This is taught at several other key places in the Bible. Second Timothy 3:16 says: "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness." This verse teaches that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the result of the direct breathing out of God and that the vehicle of that divine "spiration" was the Holy Spirit.

Similarly, 2 Peter 1:21 teaches that the Holy Spirit directed the human writers of the Bible so that the work they produced, while still in one sense the work of men, was nevertheless precisely what God himself desired. The verse says, "For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit."

This puts the Bible in a category of its own, for it is not like other books. It is true, if we speak only on a human level, that from time to time human authors are what we may choose to call inspired. That is, they are wrestling with a problem and then suddenly are confronted with a great solution or with an exceptional way of stating what they desire to say. They write it. Later, when we come to what they have done, we are so impressed that we say, 'Well, he must certainly have been inspired when he wrote that." But this is a loose use of language, and it is not what we are speaking about when we say that the Bible is inspired. When we speak of the Bible being inspired we mean that in a unique way the Holy Spirit came upon the human authors so that what they produced was what God desired, both in the whole and in its parts. It is this that makes the Bible distinct.

The Internal Witness

There is also a second way in which the Holy Spirit bears witness to the Lord Jesus Christ. He continues to bear a witness (present tense) by speaking through the Bible to carry the truths of the Bible home to the individual human mind and heart.

The experience of this truth is what lay at the heart of, and was fundamentally new in, the Protestant Reformation. When the Reformers spoke of the unique authority of the Scriptures they spoke of sola Scriptura ("Scripture alone"). But this meant more to them than the simple idea that God had revealed himself to men through the Bible. The new element was not that the Bible, being given by God and through the channel of his Holy Spirit, speaks with God's own authority. The Roman Church held to that as well as the Reformers. The new element was the Reformers' belief, substantiated by the explicit teaching of Scripture and by their own personal experience of Bible study, that the Bible interprets itself to God's people from within, due to the fact that the Holy Spirit has not ceased to speak through it to their hearts. It was this discovery that freed them from an improper and debilitating dependence upon traditions and the decrees of church councils. These may have had value, but they were ultimately unnecessary, for God is not only able to teach but also does teach his people without them.

What is this activity of God's Spirit? The Reformers called it "the internal witness of the Holy Spirit," for they wished to stress that it was the subjective or internal counterpart of the objective or external revelation embodied in the pages of the written Word of God.

Their own experience of Bible study taught them this, but they also noticed that this particular function of the Holy Spirit is repeatedly revealed in God's Word. For example, "The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit" (John 3:8). Or again, from the last discourses, "But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you all things and will remind you of everything I have said to you" (John 14:26). Similarly, in his first epistle John writes of this, extending the principle from that special ministry of the Spirit toward the apostles to a more general ministry for all believers, "But you have an annointing from the Holy One, and all of you know the truth.... As for you, the anointing you received from him remains in you, and you do not need anyone to teach you. But as his anointing teaches you about all things and as that anointing is real, not counterfeit—just as it has taught you, remain in him" (2:20, 27). Later in the same letter John adds, "It is the Spirit who testifies, because the Spirit is the truth" (5:7).

Paul writes of the same reality. "We have not received the spirit of the world but the Spirit who is from God, that we may understand what God has freely given us. This is what we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom, but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in words" (1 Cor. 2:12-13).

Comprehension, Conviction, Commitment

We may break this down a bit by asking, "When we say that the Holy Spirit speaks through the Bible to the individual heart, precisely what does the Holy Spirit do? What are the results of his ministry?" There are several answers.

First, the Holy Spirit gives comprehension. Apart from the ministry of the Holy Spirit there is no understanding of spiritual things. The Bible is taught, but men and women do not comprehend it. The gospel is proclaimed forcefully, but the unregenerate consider it nonsense. What is wrong? Is it the nature of the Bible or the inability of the preacher? What is wrong is that the Holy Spirit has not yet granted understanding. This is what Paul is speaking about in 1 Corinthians 2 when he says, 'The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (v. 14). Without the internal witness of the Holy Spirit, the unregenerate comprehend nothing of the gospel. On the other hand, where the Holy Spirit is at work, understanding follows. This is true regardless of the obstacles to comprehension.

In his discussion of this theme, R. A. Torrey refers to it as the explanation of something that every experienced Christian worker has noticed. He speaks of sitting down beside a person who has expressed a desire to know more about salvation through Christ and of trying to explain the gospel. The Bible is opened. Texts that speak of Jesus as the atoning, risen, and returning Savior are shown, but the inquirer does not see it. The truths are those the person needs to see and believe in order to be saved, but he stares blankly. He sees nothing. The worker goes over it again, but still there is no understanding. A third time! Suddenly, with face lighted up, the person exclaims, "Oh, I see it. I see it. Jesus is God, and he died for me. I only have to believe it to be saved." He does believe it, and he is saved. What has happened? Torrey writes, "Simply this, the Holy Spirit has borne his testimony and what was dark as midnight before is as clear as day now. This explains also why it is that one who has been long in darkness concerning Jesus Christ so quickly comes to see the truth when he surrenders his will to God and seeks light from him."

The second thing the Holy Spirit brings is conviction. This is necessary too because it is not enough merely to have a comprehension of spiritual things. Comprehension is necessary. But if we have a proper comprehension, this will involve an understanding of our own sin and we will need to be convicted of our sin. The next chapter speaks of this, for Jesus says, speaking of the Spirit, "When he comes, he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment: in regard to sin, because men do not believe in me; in regard to righteousness, because I am going to the Father, where you can see me no longer; and in regard to judgment, because the prince of this world now stands condemned" (John 16:8-11).

America will never experience a great revival until there is a deep and disturbing recognition and confession of both personal and national sin. It is the Holy Spirit's work to bring such conviction.

Third, the Holy Spirit will also bring commitment to the Lord Jesus Christ. Having comprehended the gospel and having been convicted of sin to the point of repentance, the one to whom the Holy Spirit bears his witness then commits himself to Christ as Lord and Savior.

We have an example of this in the story of Philip and the Ethiopian treasurer. The Ethiopian had been to Jerusalem to worship God and while there had apparently bought a scroll of the prophet Isaiah. He was sincere in his search, but he did not understand spiritual things, so he was puzzled by what he read on his way back to Ethiopia. God sent Philip to him. When Philip arrived, the Ethiopian had come to Isaiah 53: "He was led like a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb before the shearer is silent, so he did not open his mouth. In his humiliation he was deprived of justice. Who can speak of his descendants? For his life was taken from the earth" (Acts 8:32-33; cf. Isa. 53:7-8). He wanted to know of whom the prophet was speaking.

Philip taught him about Jesus and how he died for our sin, as Isaiah indicates. At this point, having been given understanding and having been convicted of his own sin, the Ethiopian asked to be baptized as a sign of his commitment. He said, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God" (v. 37). This is what happens when the Holy Spirit is at work.

Is he at work in your heart? Do you know that Jesus Christ is indeed the Son of God, as he claimed to be, and do you understand that he died in your place, the just for the unjust, that he might save you from sin? Are you convicted of sin so that you are sorry for sin and willing to turn from it? Have you reached the point of committing yourself to Jesus? If you have, say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I am a sinner, but I believe that you are the Son of God and that you died for me. Accept me now as one of your children and help me to follow you faithfully until my life's end."

Human Witness

Finally, there is a word here for those who have heard the witness of the Spirit and responded to it. The Holy Spirit is witnessing, but you must also bear witness, and it is only because of his witness that yours has promise of succeeding. This is why Jesus, immediately after he has said, "The Spirit... will testify about me," goes on to add, "and you also must testify" (v. 27).

Moreover, there is a reminder of what constitutes an effective human witness. There are three elements. First, there must be assurance that the gospel is indeed true. This is suggested in Christ's reference to the Holy Spirit as the Spirit of truth, for if the Spirit of truth has borne his witness to your mind and heart, one of the inevitable results will be your conviction that what he has testified to you concerning Christ is factual. There can be no true witness on your part without that, just as there can be no true conversion without it. John R. W. Stott, Rector Emeritus of All Souls' Church in London, has said correctly, "No man or woman is truly converted who is not intellectually converted." So, too, there is no true witness that is not at its heart a proclamation of facts that the witness knows beyond any doubt to be true.

Second, there must be a personal experience of that truth. In other words, it is not enough merely to be intellectually convinced of something, important as that may be. It is also necessary to have entered into the reality of it personally. This, Jesus indicates when he says, referring to the witness of the apostles, "And you also must testify, for you have been with me from the beginning." Today neither you nor I can reenact the experience of the apostles. But it is not altogether different to say that we must experience the Lord Jesus Christ as they did. Certainly we must spend time with him through our periods of personal Bible study and prayer. And we must attempt to put into practice what we learn of him in those sessions.

Finally, there must be a verbalized testimony. That is, you must speak about these things to others. It is not enough merely to be convinced of the truth of the Christian faith and have experienced it yourself. You must seek to tell others what you have known and experienced.

Chapter 198.
No Strange Trial

John 16:1-4

Many times in my ministry I have had occasion to speak of the liberal church as "the secular church." But to be perfectly honest, I must point out that there are areas in which the evangelical church is also secular. One of these is in some forms of evangelism. By this I mean that we are inclined to present the gospel in such a favorable light that the disadvantages (from a human point of view) of following Christ are forgotten. Granted that in spiritual terms there are no disadvantages. Spiritually, all we lose is our sin, and in its place we gain the fullness of God's salvation. Nevertheless, from the point of view of the unregenerate person there is a cost to discipleship, for it means leaving anything that might deter us from God's will for our life, taking up our cross, and following Jesus.

Jesus stated the cost clearly, as we know. For example, at the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount, in those verses that delineate the character of those who should be his disciples, Jesus says, "Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are you when people insult you, persecute you and falsely say all kinds of evil against you because of me. Rejoice, and be glad, because great is your reward in heaven" (Matt. 5:10-12). In these verses, Jesus indicates that the normal expectation for one who follows him is persecution.

Moreover, this is what the disciples, who listened to Jesus on that occasion, learned from him and remembered vividly. Thus, we find that the beatitude about persecution is quoted twice in 1 Peter, once in chapter 3 ("But even if you should suffer for what is right, you are blessed," v. 14) and once in chapter 4 ("If you are insulted because of the name of Christ, you are blessed," v. 14). Peter adds, "Dear friends, do not be surprised at the painful trial you, are suffering, as though something strange were happening to you. But rejoice that you partake in the sufferings of Christ, so that you may be overjoyed when his glory is revealed" (4:12-13). Paul, who had himself endured much persecution (2 Cor. 11:22-33), writes to Timothy, "In fact, everyone who wants to live a godly life will be persecuted" (2 Tim. 3:12). To some he says, "For it has been granted to you on the behalf of Christ not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for him" (Phil. 1:29).

Forewarned and Forearmed

It is along precisely these lines that the Lord Jesus Christ speaks of persecution in the verses that open the sixteenth chapter of John. He has already spoken of persecution once (in 15:18-25), but now he returns to the same theme, explaining that he has done so in order to forewarn and thus forearm the disciples. He says, "All this I have told you so that you will not go astray. They will put you out of the synagogue; in fact, a time is coming when anyone who kills you will think he is offering a service to God. They will do such things because they have not known the Father or me. I have told you this, so that when the time comes you will remember that I warned you. I did not tell you this at first because I was with you" (16:1-4).

Clearly these verses are a continuation of the disclosure of the coming hatred of the world for Christ's followers, recorded in the previous chapter. But they are not merely a repetition of what was said earlier. They have emphases of their own. One new emphasis is the specifics of the coming persecutions: excommunication and murder. The other, quite startling revelation is that these will be inflicted upon the disciples, not by the secular world but by religious persons.

Excommunication

The first matter, then, is this penalty of excommunication, which Christ indicates by saying, "They will put you out of the synagogue" (v. 2). To gain the full force of this we must understand that exclusion from the synagogue was not at all like a person being denied membership in a local church congregation today. To be denied membership in a contemporary American church, or even to be put out of it for one reason or another, is not serious. There are always other denominations. There are even other churches with different attitudes within the same denomination. And if worse comes to worst and you are unable to gain admission to any church, it is still no big loss, for it is possible to function well in American society without any church membership.

This was not the case in the matter of excommunication from the Jewish synagogue. For one thing, excommunication meant separation from the spiritual life of Israel. For the one who was excommunicated there would be no worship, no sacrifices, not even the reading of the Scripture—for the Bible was not available to normal people. The Scriptures could be found and heard only in places of worship. To be excommunicated meant losing those benefits and more. It meant losing all that Paul talks about in Romans, when he says of the Jewish people,

'Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises" (Rom. 9:4).

Moreover, the banning of an individual from the synagogue would have a devastating effect upon his social life and his economic well-being. Former friends would shun him, considering him worse than a pagan. He would be exiled from his family, ostracized. He would lose his job or else, if he was self-employed, his customers. He would even be refused the right of honorable burial. So in speaking of excommunication from the synagogue Jesus was warning his disciples against a threat with fearsome consequences.

The unique thing about this (and the following example of murder) is that, according to Christ, the persecution was to come from religious people, in this case from Judaism's spiritual leaders. This is worth noting, for it is the fact that persecution comes from our religious superiors that makes it so emotionally devastating. Persecution can also be bad if it comes from the secular world, but it does not strike us at the same point. It is external. When it comes from the religious authorities, it strikes inwardly, for the argument is always that they, not we, are the true church and have the true religion. It is the persecuted one that is always called a heretic.

And sometimes he is. Consequently, the persecuted one (if he is at all honest and even a bit humble) must find himself asking, "Are the authorities right? Can I actually be on the right track with all this great weight of opinion and tradition against me?"

At this point I have been greatly helped by reading the exposition of John 16 by Martin Luther, for Luther felt the weight of such opinion in his own excommunication by the Roman church of the sixteenth century. We usually think of Luther in his strongest moments, because he is the hero of the Reformation. We think of him as unaffected by the papal decrees. But Luther was not unaffected. Rather, he portrayed himself in the role of Jeremiah, who was required to stand before the Judaism of his day and declare it bankrupt, adding that God's judgment was quickly coming upon Judah and the city of Jerusalem, but who was shaken by his own stance and preaching. The leaders rebuked him saying that they were God's people. They even quoted Scripture to refute his prophecy, for had not God promised to David that there should never fail a king of Judah to sit upon his throne? Luther found himself asking, as did Jeremiah, "Am I to stand up alone and preach against your people, your kingdom, your priests, and your Word? For that, of course, is where your name is; they have your Law, your temple, and both the spiritual and the worldly government, ordained by you yourself. Who am I to oppose singlehandedly all that is God's? I would rather say that they are right, retract my preaching, or at least keep silence." Luther understood the force of the taunts against him: "You are a heretic and an apostle of the devil. You are preaching against God's people and the Church, yes, against God himself." This must affect every sensitive Christian. Consequently, this is where the pain of this particular persecution comes in.

What does one do in these circumstances? Fortunately for the Reformation, Luther was also sensitive to Scripture, for he replied that the only ground on which a true servant of God can hold his own against such logic is that which Paul sets down in Romans 9:6, 7—"For not all who are descended from Israel are Israel. Nor because they are his descendants are they all Abraham's children." Persecutors always claim to be the true church, the people of God, but the claim alone does not make it so. There is an old German proverb that says, "Not all who carry long knives are cooks." In the same way, not all who lay claim to the title "church" are the church. Not all who wear ecclesiastical garb and who preach sermons are God's ministers.

Who are God's ministers? They are those, says Luther, who confess Christ and his work, as the Bible presents them. The true church is composed of those who so believe. The Bible, which is the Word of God, is the standard. On that standard one can correctly ask, not how many persons teach a certain doctrine or even how important are those who teach it, but rather, "What are the doctrines they teach?"

We need people to ask that question today and then to stand by what the Bible teaches. The weakness of the churches in our time is that those within the various denominations will not evaluate the opinions and programs of those denominations by the Word of God and then stand against all that is in opposition to it. So long as this is true the churches will never be strong. Moreover, there will be persecution.

What then? Well, if God in his infinite wisdom permits those who merely profess the name of "church" to excommunicate, persecute, or otherwise relegate to the sidelines those who are determined to live by the Bible's authority, let it happen. Our task is to be forewarned and faithful.

Killed in God's Service

The second specific mentioned by the Lord Jesus Christ is murder. Obviously this is not always the experience of Christ's followers—-Jesus speaks only of a "time" when this will happen—but it has been far more common than most people realize. In the early years some of the apostles and many normal believers were killed by the Jewish authorities or by Jewish instigation. Later execution was inflicted by Rome, at first in random fashion and then in a more systematic way as in the cities of Lyon and Vienne in southern France. Under Decius and Diocletian the killing of Christians became the policy of the Empire. Persecutions filled the Middle Ages, climaxing in the Reformation period. In more modern times there have been deaths in pagan lands, in tribal settings, and even in the more sophisticated countries of the modern East and West.

The interesting dimension in all this is that the killing of Christians is almost entirely by religious people and for religious reasons. It is as Christ said: "Anyone who kills you will think they are offering a service to God" (v. 2). Luther in his vigorous manner comments, "It pains one beyond measure that the Christians, who undergo such suffering, must die not only without any sympathy but also amid the greatest ignominy, derision, and mockery, yes, amid all the joy and exultation of the world, which sings nothing but Deo gratias and Te Deum laudamus when it happens."

Rejoice! Rejoice!

What is it that can allow a Christian to rejoice in persecutions, even such severe persecutions as these Christ mentions? There are several answers. First, persecution demonstrates to the Christian and others that the Christian is identified with Christ. This is involved in Christ's explanation of the world's conduct in verse 3: "They will do such things because they have not known the Father or me." In other words, here is another statement of that radical distinction between Christ's own and the world that was introduced at the start of chapter 13 and that has characterized most of the teaching in this section of the Gospel. On the one side is the world, which knows itself but which does not know God. On the other side are believers, who are known of God and who know God, but who are not known by the world and are, in fact, even hated by it. To be hated by a world that does not know either the Father or Christ is therefore a mark of being identified with both of them.

Second, the Christian can rejoice in persecutions because he knows that they are not accidents but rather that God has certain purposes. This is one whole point of Christ's teaching in this section, for here he is telling of the persecutions to come in order that the disciples "should not be offended" and that, when the time should come, they might "remember that I warned you." This means that through the coming persecutions the disciples' faith would be strengthened.

Another purpose is growth in practical holiness, for persecutions strip away the unnecessary dross in our lives and draw us closer to Jesus. Peter knew this. He had heard Christ teach it. Then he experienced it in his own life and in the lives of those who had come to faith under his ministry. Thus, when some of these people went through persecutions, he wrote to them about it, saying, "In this you greatly rejoice, though now for a little while you may have had to suffer grief in all kinds of trials. These have come so that your faith—of greater worth than gold, which perishes even though refined by fire—may be proved genuine and may result in praise, glory and honor when Jesus Christ is revealed. Though you have not seen him, you love him; and even though you do not see him now, you believe in him and are filled with an inexpressible and glorious joy" (1 Peter 1:6-8). Peter was pointing out that persecution is the crucible in which God purifies the precious part of Christians' lives.

In one of my earlier writings I shared an illustration that Billy Graham has sometimes given of this principle. He tells of a friend who went through the Depression, losing a job, a fortune, a wife, and a home. But he was a believer in Christ and so held tenaciously to his faith, even though he was depressed and cast down by circumstances. One day in the midst of his agony he stopped to watch some men doing stonework for a large church in the city. "What are you going to do with that?" he asked a man who was busy chiseling a piece of triangular stone.

The workman stopped and pointed to a small opening near the top of the spire. "See that little opening up there near the top?" he asked. "Well, I'm shaping this down here so that it will fit in up there." The friend said that tears filled his eyes as he walked away from the workman, for it seemed that God had spoken to him personally to tell him that he was perfecting him for heaven through his earthly ordeal.

The third reason why a Christian can rejoice in persecutions is that they more than anything else allow the believer to show forth the supernatural radiance of the Christian life. If all is going well in your life and you rejoice, what is so remarkable about that? But if all goes wrong and you rejoice, that is remarkable and others will notice. Paul and Silas sang praises to God at midnight in the jail at Philippi. The jailer had seen many prisoners. He had seen sullen prisoners, rebellious prisoners, hopeful prisoners, dejected prisoners. But I am sure that he had never seen prisoners who could rejoice in the midst of severe beatings and captivity, as Paul and Silas were doing. Thus, when the Lord subsequently opened the gates of the prison to permit the faithful missionaries to leave it, the jailer fell at their feet demanding, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" He had seen Jesus in them.

Chapter 199.
Witness for the Prosecution

John 16:5-11

One great teaching of the Word of God is that believers may always reckon their losses among their greatest gains. This is true in the ultimate sense, for Jesus said, "Whoever loses his life for me and for the gospel will save it" (Mark 8:35). But it is true in regard to lesser things also, things like disappointments, sickness, financial setbacks, persecution. The difficulty is that we often do not believe this and so sorrow at what seems to be a great loss.

This was true for the first disciples, as our text indicates. God was sending the Holy Spirit to them through the departure of Christ, and yet they were sorrowful. He had prepared a great gift for them, but they could think only of their loss. They were despondent. Jesus, who knew their sorrow, began to teach them once more about the Holy Spirit. Previously he had spoken of the time when he had been with them. "Now," he says, "I am going to him who sent me, yet none of you asks me, 'Where are you going?' Because I have said these things, you are filled with grief. But I tell you the truth: It is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away, the Counselor will not some to you; but if I go, I will send him to you" (vv. 5-7). These verses lead into the longest discussion of the ministry of the Holy Spirit to be found in John's Gospel, a discussion in which a twofold ministry of the Spirit is unfolded: first, a ministry to the world and, second, a ministry to the apostles. This study deals with the first of these two activities.

The Spirit and the World

The question for us is: What does the Holy Spirit do in relationship to the world? Obviously, the answer is in verse 8 and in those verses that follow—"When he comes, he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment." But what does this mean? How does the Holy Spirit "convict" the world of anything?

The verb that lies behind our word "convict" has two main meanings: "to reprove" or "to convince." The meaning must be determined from the context. If the translation "to reprove" is chosen, the idea will be that of reproving someone or some group of people for an error previously held or a wrong previously committed. If the translation "to convince" is chosen, the idea will be that of convincing them of some truth previously unknown or unrealized. In this passage the choice would therefore be between a work of the Holy Spirit in rebuking the world for its sin, without any necessary thought of salvation, or a work of conviction concerning the true state of things so that the world might turn from sin to faith in Jesus as the Savior.

Which is to be chosen? The fact that it is the "world" that is spoken of favors the idea of conviction. In John, the word "world" most often denotes non-Christians, that is, the world of people in opposition to God. If that is the case here, then a conviction of the world for its sin seems appropriate. Unfortunately, the matter is not as simple as that. For one thing, nowhere else in the Scriptures is the Holy Spirit pictured as having such a ministry to the unregenerate world. He is said to restrain the world's evil. He is said to convince those whom God has chosen to be his own of their sin and so lead them to repentance and faith. But the work of convicting the world for sin is always associated, not with the ministry of the Holy Spirit in the present day, but with the exposure of sin by God before the judgment seat of Christ. Second, not all items mentioned in the verses that follow this are reprehensible, and therefore the idea of conviction is not applicable. True, the world can be reproved for its failure to believe on Jesus Christ (v. 9), but it can hardly be reproved of righteousness because Christ goes "to [his] Father" (v. 10) or of judgment because "the prince of this world now stands condemned" (v. 11). By contrast, the world can be convicted of sin, righteousness, and judgment as they are connected with these items.

For these reasons it seems best to consider this passage as involving a slight departure from John's normal use of the word "world." True, it is still the world of men in opposition to God upon whom the Spirit works. But the work is that divine power of conviction that, in spite of the darkness and resistance of the carnal mind, brings those whom God has given to Christ to repentance. In this light the passage becomes the greatest statement of the Spirit's work of conviction and regeneration in the entire Bible and a ground of great encouragement to us, as it undoubtedly also was to the apostles.

Conviction of Sin

The first reality the Holy Spirit convicts the world of is sin, and Jesus immediately gives the explanation: "because men do not believe in me" (v. 9). This may mean, "He will convict the world of wrong ideas of sin which they have because they do not believe," "He will convict the world of its sin because, without this conviction, they do not believe," or "He will convict the world of the sin of unbelief." Any of these three translations is possible, and John may even be suggesting more than one, as is his manner. But if the idea of conviction with a view to salvation is the major thought of this passage, then the second interpretation is primary, for the root sin is that which puts self at the center of things and therefore spurns belief. It is only as this is brought to light that there is salvation.

The Holy Spirit convicts the world in two senses. First, like a prosecuting attorney he secures a verdict of "guilty" against the world. But then, second, the Holy Spirit also brings this guilt home to the human consciousness so that men and women are disturbed by sin and seek alleviation from it.

An example of this ministry occurs on the occasion of the Holy Spirit's coming in power on the day of Pentecost. The disciples had been gathered together in one place awaiting the coming of the Holy Spirit. He had come upon them visibly, as a result of which they went into the streets of Jerusalem where Peter preached a sermon. Peter told how this coming of the Spirit was the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel and how the Holy Spirit was given in order that men and women might call on Jesus and be saved. He preached Jesus, concluding his sermon by saying, "Therefore let all Israel be assured of this: God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified, both Lord and Christ." We are then told that "when the people heard this, they were cut to the heart and said to Peter and the other apostles, 'Brothers, what shall we do?'" (Acts 2:36-37). When Peter answered their question, three thousand believed and were saved.

This was a remarkable response, but it was not due to Peter's brilliant analysis of the gospel or to his eloquence. If he had preached this sermon the day before, nothing would have happened. No one would have believed. He and the others would have been laughed at. What made three thousand believe? The answer is that the Holy Spirit had come and had begun to do his work of conviction of sin in the world. This is why they were "cut to the heart" and asked, "What shall we do?"

We cannot convict men and women of sin. Neither can those to whom the gospel is preached convict themselves. It is this that lay at the heart of the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine and later between Arminius and the followers of Calvin. Neither Pelagius nor Arminius denied that salvation was by grace, for they were not ready to assert that Jesus did not have to die, the Bible did not have to be given, the Holy Spirit did not have to be sent, and so on. But they did deny that it was all of grace in the sense that man makes no move toward God unless God first convicts and then draws him. Pelagius put it like this. He said that the will of man is always free and that it can therefore always choose or reject anything offered to it. As to the gospel, grace makes the offer. But the ultimate criterion by which any individual is either saved or lost is his will. Pelagius did not understand that it is impossible for the individual either to become aware of his sin or to understand and respond to the gospel without the Holy Spirit's previous and supernatural activity in his life. He has a will, but without the Spirit's activity the will is always deflected from God to its own destruction.

In one of his books Reuben A. Torrey illustrates this from his own experience. At one point in his ministry a number of officers of the Chicago Avenue Church, where he served, were burdened over the fact that there was so little profound conviction of sin in their meetings. There were conversions, Torrey noted, but few were coming with an apparently overwhelming conviction of sin. One night one of the officers said, "I am greatly troubled by the fact that we have so little conviction of sin in our meetings. While we are having conversions and many additions to our church, there is not that deep conviction of sin that I like to see. So I suggest that we, the officers of the church, meet from night to night to pray that there may be more conviction of sin in our meetings."

The suggestion was taken up, and the meetings began. A few days later on a Sunday evening
Torrey noticed a man in the congregation whom he had not seen before. He was showily dressed. He had a large diamond blazing from his shirt front. Torrey rightly guessed that he was a gambler. As the preacher held forth, this man kept his eyes riveted on him. After the service Torrey went to the room where they always dealt with inquirers and there found this gambler. He was terribly agitated. "I don't know what is the matter with me," he groaned. "I never felt this way in my life. I was starting out this afternoon to go to Cottage Grove Avenue to meet some men and spend the afternoon gambling. But as I passed the park some of your young men were holding an open-air meeting, and I stopped to listen. I saw one man testifying whom I had known in a life of sin, and I waited to hear what he had to say. When he finished I went on down the street. I had not gone far when some strange power took hold of me and brought me back and I stayed through the meeting. Then this gentleman spoke to me and brought me over to your church. I heard you preach." Here he stopped and sobbed, crying, "Oh, I don't know what is the matter with me. I feel awful. I never felt this way before in my life."

"I know what is the matter with you," Torrey replied. "You are under conviction of sin, for the Holy Spirit is dealing with you." Torrey then pointed him to Christ, and the man asked Jesus to forgive his sins and was born again. It was the beginning of many striking conversions in the Chicago Avenue Church.

There is one more thing about this convicting work of the Holy Spirit in relation to sin. It is that the sin of which the Holy Spirit convicts men is the sin of unbelief. "In regard to sin, because they do not believe in me,"Jesus says. Notice that it is not conviction of the sin of gambling, though that may come in time. It is not the sin of adultery, or drunkenness, or pride, or stealing primarily, but the sin of refusing to believe on Jesus. Why is this? It is not because the other sins are not sin or that they need not be repented of and renounced, for they must be. It is just that belief in Christ, the one thing God requires for salvation, is that which is hardest for the natural man even to acknowledge, let alone attain. Does the average unbeliever look on unbelief as sin? Not at all! If anything is true, it is the opposite. He generally looks upon unbelief as a mark of his supposed intellectual sophistication. "I am glad that you can believe those things," he says with an air of condescending superiority (he really means, "that you can believe that nonsense"), "but I cannot." He thinks it a matter for pride that he is an agnostic or an atheist. Or, if he does not take that tack, he looks to you for pity, saying, "I wish I could believe as you do, but I can't. There must be something wrong with me."

Real conversions take place when both these excuses are withered away by the Spirit's heat. As Torrey says, "When the Holy Spirit touches a man's heart, he no longer looks upon unbelief as a mark of intellectual superiority; he does not look upon it as a mere misfortune; he sees it as the most daring, decisive and damning of all sins and is overwhelmed with a sense of his awful guilt in that he had not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God."

Christ's Righteousness

Second, the Holy Spirit is said to convict men and women of righteousness. "In regard to righteousness," says Jesus, "because I am going to the Father, where you can see me no longer" (v. 10). There are two ways in which this can be taken.

On the one hand, it can mean that the Holy Spirit will show the world what true righteousness is, an action made necessary by the fact that Christ is no longer here to demonstrate the meaning of righteousness in his own person. Apart from Christ none of us has any understanding of what God's righteousness is. We think of it in terms of human goodness, for we imagine that some people have 10 percent goodness, others have 30 percent, still others have 60 or 70 percent, and then there is Jesus, the best of all, who scores 100. But this is not what God's goodness is. If this were the case, then confrontation with Christ would have the effect of making us want to try harder. We would see that we are not as good as he is but that he represents what is possible. We would try to be better. This, however, is not what happens when men and women meet Jesus. What happens is that they are impressed with the totally different characteristics of his righteousness and with the fact that for them it is totally unattainable. The reaction, rather than being a renewed determination to try harder, is despair: "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." Because the Lord Jesus Christ is no longer with us here on earth, it takes another divine personality, the Holy Spirit to create this awareness in the world.

On the other hand, there is another way in which these words can be taken. They can be taken as showing, not primarily what righteousness is but rather where that righteousness can be found. It cannot be found here. We know only human righteousness. But it can be found in Christ, who was once here but is now at the Father's right hand.

I do not know which of these is to be preferred, and again both may be possible. However, if the second meaning is possible, even in a secondary sense, then it suggests something interesting, something which Spurgeon saw and wrote about in one of his sermons. Spurgeon has pointed out that in human affairs, if a person is convicted of wrongdoing, the next step is judgment. If the jury renders a verdict of guilty, the next words are those of the judge, who says, 'The defendant will be remanded to the keeping of the sheriff, and this court will reconvene next Tuesday for sentencing." But notice God's procedure. It is true that the conviction of sin is followed by judgment. Verse 11 does follow verse 9, but God interpolates a process. It is the provision of righteousness in Christ, so that the one who believes on Christ might be saved from judgment. Spurgeon writes, "The Lord takes a man, even when he is sinful and conscious of that sin, and makes him righteous on the spot, by putting away his sin and justifying him by the righteousness of faith, a righteousness which comes to him by the worthiness of another who has wrought out a righteousness for him."

So here is a great promise: not only that the Holy Spirit will convict the world of sin, which neither you nor I can do, but that he also will direct them to Christ where alone that true righteousness, which we are all lacking, can be found.

Satan Judged

The final aspect of the Spirit's work mentioned in these verses is to convict the world "in regard to judgment, because the prince of this world now stands condemned" (v. 11). Once again, there are difficulties of interpretation. But the best view seems to be that the Holy Spirit will convince the world that there is such a thing as judgment, which is proved by the judgment of Satan and the breaking of his power at the cross.

No one wants to believe in judgment. We want to think that we can do what we wish with impunity and that no day of reckoning will come. Sometimes we are even encouraged in this by the thought that God does not seem to judge immediately and that evil often seems to go unpunished. But this is false thinking. It is true that God does not visit his judgments upon the sinner immediately and that evil often seems to go unpunished. God is longsuffering in his judgments. Still, they come eventually and inevitably, and of this, God's judgment upon Satan is proof. In his second epistle, Peter makes the same point concerning false teachers, showing that God judged the fallen angels, the world of Noah's time, and the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. He then concludes by saying, "The Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials and to hold the unrighteous for the day of judgment, while continuing their punishment" (2 Peter 2:9).

If the individual will not come to Christ, who has died for him in order that his sin might be punished and that God's own righteousness might be applied to his account, then he will experience such judgment. How much better it is to come to Christ now in this the day of grace.

Human Channels

There is one last point. It is true that this passage is primarily about the work of the Holy Spirit by which he convicts the world of sin and thus points men and women to Jesus Christ as the Savior. But notice that, while it is true that it is the Holy Spirit who convicts men and women of sin, he nevertheless does it through us. Jesus indicates this in these verses, saying, "It is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you. When he comes [to you], he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment" (vv. 7-8). This means that the Lord is sending the Holy Spirit to believers and that it is as he works through them and in them that he convicts the world.

Every conversion recorded in the Book of Acts was through the agency of someone who was already saved. Jesus bore witness to the Twelve. They bore their witness on Pentecost and the days following. Even Paul, that great witness who had such an unusual conversion while on the way to Damascus to persecute Christians, was converted through others. For, in advance of his experience, he had witnessed the stoning of Stephen and had heard his great sermon, recorded in Acts 7. And even after his experience, while he was in Damascus, Ananias was sent to him as the human instrument through whom the Holy Spirit then did his work. Cornelius also fits this pattern. True, he had witnessed an angel. But the angel did not tell him the gospel. Rather, the angel said, "Send to Joppa for Simon who is called Peter. He will bring you a message through which you and all your household will be saved" (Acts 11:13-14).

This is God's way: by the power of his Spirit working through human channels, like you and me. Are you his instrument? You can be. Draw near to him; ask him to cleanse you. Allow him to make of you an unobstructed channel for his grace.

Chapter 200.
More Words to Come

John 16:12-15

In the second chapter of John there is a story with an interesting final line. The story is of Jesus changing the water in six stone waterpots to wine at a wedding in Cana of Galilee, and it ends with the remark of the master of ceremonies to the bridegroom after he had drunk the wine Jesus made. He said, "Everyone brings out the choice wine first and then the cheaper wine after the guests have had too much to drink; but you have saved the best till now" (v. 10). The situation is the same as that which we find in John 16:12-15.

We are nearing the end of the final discourses. Only a summary follows. So the startling thing is that Jesus introduces a new and totally unexpected subject. What is more, it is in a sense the best of all he has been saying.

How can it be the best? That is a hard question to answer when we think of what he had been teaching, particularly in these last discourses. He had taught about heaven. He had taught how to get there. Then he had taught about the works that those who were his disciples should do. He had taught about prayer, saying that whatever the disciples should ask in his name he would do. Best of all, he had taught about the Holy Spirit, how he should come after Christ had himself returned to heaven and how he should comfort the disciples, teach them, cause them to be spiritually fruitful, and finally convict the world of its sin in order that it might find righteousness in Christ and escape God's judgment. It is at this point, after all that teaching, that the words we are studying come in.

How can this last subject be the best of all? The answer is in the nature of the subject itself: Christ's promise of even more teachings to come. Jesus says, "I have much more to say to you, more than you can now bear. But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come" (vv. 12-13). In other words, although Jesus had taught his disciples what seem to us to be many significant doctrines, there were nevertheless many more things still to be taught.

Although he was departing, it would be the work of the Holy Spirit to communicate these teachings.

A New Revelation

Even at this point, we have not really captured the full wonder of Christ's promise, however, for by reading these verses closely, particularly in the original language, we find that it is not simply that the Holy Spirit was going to teach the disciples in the same sense, for instance, that the Holy Spirit may be said to teach us. He would presumably do that for the disciples also, as for us, but that is not what the verses mean. The true sense emerges when we learn that an important word has been dropped out of verse 13 in several versions. It is the word "the," and it comes before "truth." When we understand this, we see that it is not just into some general idea of truth that the Holy Spirit is said to be coming to guide the apostles, but rather into all "the truth," that is, into a definite body of material centering on Christ. This, we recognize, is nothing other than the New Testament. So the promise is that the Holy Spirit would be the vehicle of a new revelation through those specifically commissioned to this ministry. The Revised Standard Version and the New English Bible render this verse correctly.

This is startling. If the disciples understood what Jesus was saying, it was startling to them, for they were Jews and were therefore well aware of the unique, divine character of the Old Testament. They knew, as the Book of Hebrews says, that "God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways" (1:1). They knew that the law had come "through Moses" (John 1:17). They believed that the law was "holy, righteous and good" (Rom. 7:12). This law was in every Jewish synagogue. It was God's greatest gift to Israel. How, then, could there be a further revelation? It would have seemed unnecessary, unbelievable. Yet this is precisely what Christ was promising.

This is not a promise of inspiration that is made generally to all Christians in all periods of the church. If we think like that, we fall into William Barclay's error. If you turn to Barclay's discussion of this passage, you find that he says two things. First, he says that these verses teach that "revelation is bound to be a progressive process." Expressed rightly, that is true. God has revealed himself progressively in a certain sense in the writings that compose our Bible, but Barclay takes it to mean, first, that the earlier revelations were imperfect or wrong (at least in part) and, second, that there is no end to God's revelation. In combination, this means that Jesus is still imparting truth today and that this truth can modify, correct, or supercede the truth previously given. This is not Jesus' teaching, nor is it suggested or permitted by this passage. On the contrary, Jesus is teaching that the Holy Spirit would lead the disciples into a supplementary but definitive new revelation that thereafter would be the church's authoritative standard of doctrine.

The second thing Barclay says in his commentary is that the operation of the Holy Spirit to lead us into truth applies in all areas. He gives some examples. First, he notes that when H. F. Lyte wrote the hymn "Abide with Me," he had no feeling of actually composing the verses. Instead, he wrote them—so Barclay says—as if by dictation. Next, Barclay talks about music, noting that Handel said of his writing the Hallelujah Chorus of the Messiah: "I saw the heavens opened, and... God sitting on the Throne." Finally, Barclay adds that the same is true of the scientist who discovers something that will help the world and make life better for the human race.

We have to make a distinction here, however, for it is not that "Abide with Me" is not a beautiful hymn, or that the Hallelujah Chorus is not truly an inspiring composition, or that a scientist may not be guided by God to discover something that will be beneficial to humanity. Certainly the Holy Spirit works in that way. He works in every area of life. But these things are in a different category from what the Lord is talking about in John 16:12-15. What the Lord is promising to do here is to work by the Holy Spirit in the apostles to give us our New Testament. This revelation is authoritative and inerrant, as the others (even if we refer to them by the terms "revelations" or "inspirations") are not.

This is a point at which we have to allow the whole weight of the Word of God to come to bear.

Reuben A. Torrey has a good discussion of this in his book The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit. He points out, first, that there is a diversity of gifts according to the Word of God and that this diversity relates to different positions in the church and church history. Torrey turns to 1 Corinthians to show this. Thus, in 12:4-6, Paul says, "There are different kinds of gifts, but the same Spirit. There are different kinds of service, but the same Lord. There are different kinds of working, but the same God works all of them in all men." Later in the chapter, while still thinking about these gifts, he writes of the various people involved. "And in the church God has appointed first of all apostles, second prophets, third teachers, then workers of miracles, also those having gifts of healing, those able to help others, those with gifts of administration, and those speaking in different kinds of tongues. Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Do all work miracles? Do all have gifts of healing? Do all speak in tongues? Do all interpret?" (vv. 28-30). Paul here relates the gifts to the various offices, saying that some gifts apply to one office and other gifts to another. We therefore rightly expect that God gave the apostles their own particular function and gift.

Second, says Torrey, there are passages that teach that the particular function of the apostles was to receive the new revelation. An example is Ephesians 3:2-5. Again Paul is writing. "Surely you have heard about the administration of God's grace that was given to me for you, that is, the mystery made known to me by revelation, as I have already written briefly. In reading this, then, you will be able to understand my insight into the mystery of Christ, which was not made known to men in other generations as it has now been revealed by the Spirit to God's holy apostles and prophets." Paul's point is that his teaching was profound not because he was a particularly brilliant person but because God had revealed this teaching to him. His unique role (along with the other apostles) was to receive and record this revelation.

Finally, Torrey makes the point that this revelation is embodied in words. Note what Paul says:
"This is what we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words" (1 Cor. 2:13). This is the biblical picture. So we understand that in John 16 the Lord Jesus Christ is pointing to that day—it was not far off at that moment—when the Holy Spirit would speak through these apostles as he had spoken in time past unto the fathers by the prophets. In other words, there was to be a New Testament, a new chapter in the history of God's dealings with men.

Diverse Revelation

These verses also say something else. They tell about the nature of this new revelation, giving general categories of its content. These are three. Sometimes, as I read the notes in the Scofield Bible, I am not particularly impressed with what is written. But in this particular case the notes are remarkable. At the bottom of this page in my Bible we are told that Jesus outlined the general categories of the New Testament revelation in advance and that these are: historical, doctrinal, and prophetic. This is exactly right. The New Testament fulfills this pattern precisely.

First, there is a historical element to the New Testament. This is involved in verse 13, in which Jesus says of the Holy Spirit, "He will guide you into all [the] truth." That is, "He will guide you into the truth concerning me." In 14:26 the historical element is made even clearer, for there Christ says, "He will teach you all things and remind you of everything I have said to you." In other words, the disciples were likely to forget certain things that happened, but the Holy Spirit would bring these historical events to their minds. What events are these? Obviously, they are the events connected with Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. Do we have that in the New Testament? Of course. This is the substance of the Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John—and also Acts.

Christianity begins with a historical revelation. It is this that sets Christianity off from other religions. It sets it off from mythology. It sets it off from philosophy. These systems of thought conceive of religion largely as a pattern of ideas and of salvation as learning certain things. But this is not the essence of Christianity. Christianity has ideas, that is true; but the ideas are based upon fact, and the facts are determinative.

The historical basis also cuts Christianity off from an evolutionary religion. Such a religion says that people thousands of years ago had primitive ideas of God but that, as they grew in knowledge, their ideas of God grew and their writings about God showed progression. This went on and on up to the New Testament period and then beyond it to the point where today we can drop certain things we consider unworthy of a true conception of God and add other things we consider to be valuable. Christianity's historical base undercuts all that; the basis of the revelation is the historical action of God in history. This centers primarily in the cross of Christ. God did something at the cross. He did not just teach an idea. He did not just show himself in some vague way. He atoned for sin at the cross; he also revealed his love and showed his judgment. Any understanding of the faith that departs from that historical basis is heresy.

Doctrine

Second, there was also to be a doctrinal element in the New Testament. This is indicated by Jesus when he says, again of the Holy Spirit, "He will take what is mine, and make it known to you" or, as in 14:26, "He will teach you all things." Do we have that in the New Testament? Of course, we do. We have it in the Epistles, beginning with the great letter to the Romans, which unfolds Christian doctrine in its fullest form, continuing through the Epistles that deal with particular problems in theology, and ending with those books that are pastoral in nature—1 and 2 Timothy; Titus; 1, 2, and 3 John; 1 and 2 Peter; and Jude.

This is also important, because, while it is true that we must stress facts, while it is true that we must say that Christianity differs from all other religions because of the fact that God has done something in history, still it is not just the mere fact of God's having done this that is important; it is also what the facts mean. Thus, we say that God came in Jesus. But the significance of that is that God is revealed in certain categories. Because of Jesus, we know God to be love, justice, compassion, mercy, and many other attributes. Or again, we say that Jesus died. True enough!
But that in itself is not significant. All men die. Why did he die? At this point we need teaching.

So the Epistles are given to show us why Jesus Christ died and what the full implications of this are. He died for sin. He died for our sin, in our place. Moreover, he died in order that he might call out a people destined to be conformed to his own image and to be with him forever. The Epistles teach these as well as other doctrines we need to learn.

Things to Come

Finally, there is the prophetic element. Jesus indicates this when he says at the end of verse 13, "And he will tell you what is yet to come." Do we have that in the New Testament? Yes, we have. We have it scattered throughout the New Testament in various references (Matthew 24; 25; Mark 13; Romans 11; 1 Corinthians 15; etc.), but particularly in the Book of Revelation.

What shall come when the Lord returns in power at the end of the age? There can be a preoccupation with prophecy that is debilitating. A person can become so fascinated with what is to come that he does not live for Christ now. Sometimes that happens. But the importance of prophecy is in the indication that God is still at work in history. He does not just deal with us in some static way so that our period of history is absolutely identical with that of those who lived in an earlier period and with that of those who will come later. Rather, God is doing unique things in history—working with people, unfolding a plan—so that what each one does is important. Moreover, these workings are leading up to the day when the Lord will return, at which time God will have gathered his own out of the world and will have demonstrated the reality of the Christian faith in such a way that all will see that the Lord's way is the only way that anyone can be personally fulfilled and find true blessing.

These verses also tell us why this revelation—involving history, doctrine, and prophecy—has been given. The Lord indicates this by saying, "He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you" (v. 14). It is not just that we are told certain doctrines in order that we might know things. Nor are the end times revealed so that we can simply have a private inside track to the meaning of history. These things are taught to us in order that the Lord Jesus Christ might be glorified. This is the Holy Spirit's ministry. "He will not speak on his own," said Jesus, "he will... [take] from what is mine and [make] it known to you" (vv. 13-14).

As you study the Bible the Holy Spirit will continue to do the work he began in an authoritative way with the inspiration of the New Testament documents. The Holy Spirit, the true author of these books, will lead you to see the Lord Jesus Christ and bring you to the point of increasing obedience and service to him.

Chapter 201.
Joy in the Morning

John 16:16-22

Are you one of those people who always wakes up in the morning with a smile on your face and a buoyant spirit in your heart? I am not. So I confess that when I come to a verse like Psalm 30:5—"Weeping may remain for a night, but rejoicing comes in the morning"—I have to understand it in poetical terms. It is worth trying to do this, however, for the idea of joy after a nighttime of sorrow is an important biblical theme. We have it in the passage we come to now: "I tell you the truth, you will weep and mourn while the world rejoices. You will grieve, but your grief will turn to joy."

In general terms, we understand what this means. It means that for a Christian, sorrow endures for just a time and then is replaced by a joy that no one can take from us. Unfortunately, when we study the entire passage more specifically, we soon find that there is some uncertainty as to what Jesus is referring. The first part of this passage speaks about "a little while" when the disciples will not see him and then "a little while" after which they will see him. But because this has several possible applications, it is probable that having read that passage we find ourselves in the position of the disciples, who said, "What does he mean by 'a little while'? We don't understand what he is saying" (v. 18).

As I look at these words I suspect that this ambiguity is intentional. It is not that the Lord is vague in his teaching, of course. He makes things as clear as he can possibly make them. It is rather that by means of such ambiguity he suggests more than one meaning. Here the Lord is talking about a little while when he will not be seen, a time marked by sorrow, and then after that space of time, another time in which he will be seen again and which will therefore be joyful. This apparently deliberate ambiguity suggests three different levels of interpretation. First, it can refer to Jesus' death and the days of his entombment, during which time he was not seen, and then the resurrection that follows with its renewed sight of him. Second, it can indicate the periods before and after Pentecost, for now, because of the ministry of the Holy Spirit, we see him in a spiritual way that was not possible previously. That is suggested by the tie-in of these verses with those preceding. Finally, it may describe the church age, this short time in which we do not see Christ with our physical eyes, but after which, when the Lord will return in glory, we will see him face-to-face and have earth's sorrows transmuted into eternal joy.

I would like to take each of those meanings, show how it is supported by the context, and trace its importance.

Death and Resurrection

First of all, then, these verses refer to the death and resurrection of Jesus. This is the first and most obvious interpretation simply because Christ is here speaking to his disciples, trying to comfort them on the eve of his arrest and separation from them. They are going to sorrow, but he wishes to show them that very soon, following his resurrection, they will again be joyful.

Jesus has already talked along those lines. For example, in John 13 the Lord had been talking about his glorification, saying, "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in him" (v. 31). This refers to his exaltation to heaven by his crucifixion, death, resurrection, and ascension. But it is immediately followed by the words: "I will be with you only a little longer. You will look for me, and just as I told the Jews, so I tell you now: Where I am going, you cannot come" (v. 33). Peter understood this "little while" to be imminent even though he did not comprehend much more than that, for he asked, "Lord, where are you going?" Jesus replied, "Where I am going, you cannot follow now, but you will follow later" (v. 36).

When we take the passage in this sense, we recognize that this was precisely the experience of these early disciples. Jesus was their friend. They loved him with a love that had grown intense because of his love for them and fellowship with them over the three-year period of his ministry. Then, although he had tried to prepare them for it, he was suddenly taken from them and crucified. They were plunged into despondency and near disillusionment.

There were multiple reasons for their great sorrow. First, they sorrowed because of their personal loss. They were warmly attached to him, and he was gone—gone forever, so they thought. Since they had left all to follow him and since he had become their all in place of what they had lost (and much more besides), they were left with a vacuum in their lives. This was comparable to the kind of sorrow we have at the death of one greatly loved. Yet it was far more intense, because in this case it was the Lord of glory, Jesus Christ, who was removed.

Second, they sorrowed additionally because of the world's attitude to Christ's crucifixion. The Lord alludes to this in John 16:20, saying, "You will weep and mourn while the world rejoices." In other words, the sorrow of the disciples would be intensified because the world, far from sorrowing at the loss of Jesus, actually rejoiced that he was now out of their way and would no longer be a bother to them. As the disciples sorrowed during this interim they knew that the scribes and Pharisees, those who represent the spirit of the world, were actually rubbing their hands in glee. They were saying, "At last we've gotten rid of him; we won't have him exposing us anymore. Things will get back to normal." The sorrow of the disciples was intensified because of that.

Third, their sorrow during those days must have been particularly acute because of their disappointments. Every time we catch a glimpse into what they were thinking about during this interim we are impressed with how disappointed they were. There is the story of the Emmaus disciples. They were on their way home. The Lord appeared to them on the way and asked why they were downcast. They told him about Jesus, explaining how he had been crucified by the leaders of the people. Then they uttered what is certainly one of the most poignant lines in Scripture, "But we had hoped he was the one who was going to redeem Israel" (Luke 24:21). They had put so much of their hope in him and he had been taken away from them. Their hopes had been crushed.

Disappointment explains the attitude of Thomas, who said, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it" (John 20:25). It was not that Thomas was particularly disbelieving. None of the other disciples believed either until they had seen Christ. It was only after he appeared that they had come to faith. But Thomas, in a bitterness born of acute disappointment, said, "You're not going to overcome my grief by some mystical story of a resurrection. I'm the one, let's not forget, who said, 'If he goes up to Jerusalem, he will die; if we go with him, we must be prepared to die also.' I warned you about it. He died. So don't try to put me off with fairy tales." It was disappointment that made him speak that way.

The disciples experienced acute sorrow because of their loss, the joy of the world, and disappointments. But then came the resurrection, and their sorrow was changed into joy. It was not that their sorrow was followed by joy, that joy came afterward but what was sorrow still remained. No, the sorrow was itself changed into joy so that what had been the cause of their sorrow before was now in equal measure joyous. Before the resurrection the death of Christ appeared to be a total tragedy. It was meaningless to the disciples because they did not understand that this was God's atonement for the sin of the world. It was only the death of one they deeply loved. But when Jesus rose from the dead they understood that the cross was not a tragedy but a triumph. Did you ever notice as you have read the New Testament that the cross of Christ is never referred to in a tone of sorrow? It is true that when the disciples tell about their own feelings during the three days between the crucifixion and the resurrection, as they do in the Gospels, they reflect in a historical way that they sorrowed then. But afterward whenever they wrote about the cross they spoke of it not as a cause for sorrow but as a cause for joy. Paul even speaks of the cross as his "glory" (Gal. 6:14). If there were nothing but the crucifixion, glorious as that might be, we would not understand it and it would be a cause of sorrow for us. But having had a resurrection, having known that the One who was crucified and buried rose again on the third day according to the Scriptures, as the Bible itself tells us, we rejoice in that the cross is now seen to be a victory.

This incidentally, is why Lent should not have the extraordinary and exaggerated character that it does in some circles. For some it becomes a kind of mock funeral for Christ in which they try to work themselves into a depressed state leading up to Good Friday. That is all artificial. There is nothing genuine about it. For Jesus is living, not dead; and although we must remember the cross and its agony, we remember it as that great act that procured our salvation, and we rejoice in it.

Spiritual Sight

Second, we must refer these verses to Pentecost and the coming of the Holy Spirit for the church age. This is not reading something into the passage, because it is suggested to us by the context. In the first part of this chapter the Lord has been talking about the Holy Spirit. He has talked about the ministry of the Holy Spirit, first, to the world—bringing some to faith in Christ, convicting them of sin and of righteousness and of judgment (vv. 7-11)—and then, second, also to the apostles in a special sense so that they might become vehicles of the New Testament revelation as they remembered, understood, interpreted, and recorded what Jesus had done (vv. 12-15). The verses end by saying that when the Holy Spirit comes he is not going to speak of himself but rather is going to speak of Jesus and make him known. Then, immediately following that and in the same context, the Lord begins to speak of the little while when we will not see him and then the little while after which we will see him. In this context we, therefore naturally think of the church age in which the Holy Spirit makes the Lord Jesus Christ visible to Christian people, not physically but spiritually, as he reveals the Lord to us in the pages of the Word of God.

Someone will perhaps say at this point, "But I do not see the Lord Jesus Christ even in a spiritual way. There are times when he is far from me. I would like to see him, to feel him close, but I am afraid that the Lord seems far away. He seems to be locked in a previous age of history." If that is the case, then you have to approach the Lord in the only way he can be found in this age, that is, through a study of the Word. This is really the burden of the passage as I understand it.

Moreover, there is a second part to that, for it is not enough that we just come to the Scriptures in a certain academic way and study them, important as that may be. Rather, as we find the Lord presented to us in the Scriptures, there must be that personal interaction with him that brings us face-to-face with his holiness and causes us to turn from sin in order that we might go his way.

I am sure that this is what the author of Hebrews had in mind when, in the twelfth chapter, he talks about our "looking to Jesus, the author and perfector of our faith." Hebrews 11 is the great chapter on faith. You would think that by the time the author had come to the end of that chapter, having cited the great heroes of faith of the Old Testament, he would have stopped, taken a deep breath, and perhaps gone on to something entirely different. But that is not the way he was thinking. Rather, he thinks of a present application according to which we, like those previous heroes, should turn from sin and pursue that which is set before us by Jesus: "Therefore, since we are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us throw off everything that hinders and the sin that so easily entangles, and let us run with perseverance the race marked out for us. Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and say down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:1-2).

If being aware of Jesus is to turn sorrow into joy in the present age, it must be based, first, upon a study of the Scriptures, and second, upon a deliberate turning from anything that would hinder discipleship. It is turning from sin in order that we might press on to what is ahead.

When we talk along those lines it is almost impossible not to think also of that chapter in Philippians in which the apostle Paul says almost the same thing in giving his testimony. He has already said in the third chapter what it meant for him to become a Christian. It meant to have come to know Christ. Now he expresses his desire to know him even better: "I want to know Christ and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death" (3:10). He concludes that section by saying, "Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus" (3:13-14).

Our Blessed Hope

Third, there is also a sense in which this applies to the Second Coming. Even with the vision of Christ through the Holy Spirit in this age there is still often great cause for sorrow, because we have disappointments, personal loss, and sin; and that keeps us from God. But it is not permanent. Jesus is coming. It is only a little while. Then sorrow will be turned into joy. We tend to think that the return of Jesus Christ is delayed—it is because we are locked in time—but that is why that phrase "a little while" is so important. It seems to us at times, as it always seems to skeptics, that "everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation" (2 Peter 3:4). But this phrase says that the present state is only temporary. It is short, and after it is over all present sorrows will be turned into joy. The phrase "a little while" is mentioned seven times just in this one passage.

There is an obvious progression here. First, there is the revelation of the Lord at the time of the resurrection, a revelation that went beyond anything that the disciples had previously known. Second, there is the revelation of Jesus to his people during this age. This is even better. Jesus said, "It is for your good that I go away. Unless I go away the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you" (John 16:7). Finally, there is that perfect revelation of Jesus when he returns in his glory at the end of time. If the progression applies in that historical sense, it should also apply to our own personal relationship to and knowledge of Jesus. We should know him better this year than we did last year, and better next year than this year. That is what we should desire. Let us see that it is fulfilled as, by the grace of God, we study the Bible and seek to enter into a full knowledge of our Lord.

Chapter 202.

Another Prayer Promise

John 16:23-27

The verses that conclude the sixteenth chapter of John and, therefore, also the final discourses of Jesus with his disciples, are in the nature of a summary. That is, they produce no new themes but rather repeat with some variations that which has already been taught. This does not mean that these themes are unimportant, however. On the contrary, it means that they are of the greatest importance. For of all that Jesus has taught in these discourses it is these, rather than the other themes, that he brings forward once again and stresses in his final words prior to the arrest and crucifixion.

One theme is his own origin and destiny, that is, his full divinity both before and after the years of his incarnation. We find this in verses 28-30. A second theme is the assurance that those who follow Christ may have peace even though, as in the case of the disciples, they would all be scattered when he was seized by the temple authorities. This peace is based on his own victory over the world and is discussed in verses 31-33. In the verses we are to study now, Jesus again teaches his disciples about prayer.

Why is prayer important? Reuben A. Torrey answers that question comprehensively and wisely in a little book entitled How to Pray, listing eleven reasons: (1) Because there is a devil and because prayer is the God-appointed means of resisting him; (2) Because prayer is God's way for us to obtain what we need from him; (3) Because the apostles, whom God set forth to be a pattern for us, considered prayer to be the most important business of their lives; (4) Because prayer occupied a prominent place and played a very important part in the earthly life of our Lord; (5) Because prayer is the most important part of the present ministry of our Lord, since he is now interceding for us (Heb. 7:25); (6) Because prayer is the means God has appointed for our receiving mercy from him and of obtaining grace to help in time of need; (7) Because prayer is the means of obtaining the fullness of God's joy; (8) Because prayer with thanksgiving is the means of obtaining freedom from anxiety and, in anxiety's place, that peace that passes understanding; (9) Because prayer is the method appointed for our obtaining the fullness of God's Holy Spirit; (10) Because prayer is the means by which we are to keep watchful and be alert at Christ's return; and (11) Because prayer is used by God to promote our spiritual growth, bring power into our work, lead others to faith in Christ, and bring all other blessings to Christ's church.

In these verses we find four teachings: (1) the nature of prayer, (2) the privilege of prayer, (3) the conditions of effective prayer, and (4) a new prayer promise.

The Nature of Prayer

The nature of prayer is indicated by the word "ask," which is repeated five times. Once it refers to asking something of Jesus. The remaining four times it refers to asking something of the Father in Christ's name. The interesting thing is that these two askings are treated as if they were parallel, meaning that Jesus was considering prayer to the Father as identical in its essential nature with the conversation the disciples had been having with him.

If we see this clearly, we see that prayer must be lifted out of some mysterious realm of religious rites or practice, where only special people can go, and instead be brought down to the common experience of normal men and women. It means that prayer is essentially a conversation in which we talk to God. "For," says Jesus, "in precisely the same way in which you have been asking questions of me during our time together, so shall you ask of God the Father after I return to heaven."

We get a feeling for the kind of questions we may ask the Father by seeing what the disciples had to say in the preceding chapters. "Lord, where are you going?" (13:36). "Why can't I follow you now?" (13:37). "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?" (14:5). "Lord, show us the Father" (14:8). "Lord, why do you intend to show yourself to us and not to the world?" (14:22). "What does he mean by saying, 'In a little while you will see me no more, and then after a little while you will see me,' and 'Because I am going to the Father'?" (16:17). These questions were not very perceptive; they reveal much ignorance. But they are natural and quite unaffected. That is the point. They are an indication of what the tone of our own prayers should be.

The Privilege of Prayer

Second, these verses indicate something of the privilege of prayer. This is implied in what we have been saying about prayer's nature, for Christ's point is that now, as a result of his death and resurrection, those who will come in his name may come to the Father with the same freedom and boldness that had characterized his disciples' approach to him during the days of his earthly ministry. What is more, they may come knowing that their requests will be granted.

We must not think that the disciples had not prayed to God before Christ's resurrection.
Undoubtedly, the disciples had often asked the Father for things directly just as they had asked Jesus for things directly. Jesus had even given them a prayer pattern that began with the words "Our Father in heaven" and that included the requests, "Give us today our daily bread,... forgive us our debts,... and lead us not into temptation" (Matt. 6:9-13). But before this the disciples had not asked anything of the Father in Christ's name. Now they are to do so and are to know that on that basis whatever they should ask the Father he would give them (v. 23). The next verse urges, "Until now you have not asked for anything in my name. Ask and you will receive, and your joy will be complete" (v. 24).

This verse puts the privilege of prayer on the same level as the verses from the fourteenth chapter which we considered earlier: "And I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. You may ask me for anything in my name, and I will do it" (vv. 13-14).

The Conditions of Effective Prayer

The third teaching in these verses is the conditions of effective prayer, conditions embodied in the phrase "in my name," which is repeated three times (vv. 23-24, and 26) and is to be supplied mentally in one additional instance (after "ask" in v. 24). Jesus says, "I tell you the truth, my Father will give you whatever you ask in my name. Until now you have not asked for anything in my name. Ask and you will receive" (vv. 23-24). And again, "In that day you will ask in my name" (v. 26).

What does it mean to approach the Father in the name of Christ? It means several things, a number of which were suggested earlier in our study of John 14:13-14. In the first place, it means to come to God as one who is identified with Jesus Christ by faith, that is, to come as a saved person. When we speak of the name of Jesus we do not mean just a mere human name, as if the name 'Jesus" is all we are talking about and as if it were no different than any other name. Jesus' full name is "the Lord Jesus Christ." And this means "Jehovah, the Savior, God's Anointed." "Lord" is the English translation of either of two Hebrew words: "Jehovah," the great Old Testament name for God, or "Adonai," which also refers to him. So to speak of "the Lord Jesus Christ" is to speak of One who is entirely divine, the incarnate God. We receive an impression of the significance of this title when we remember that the early Christians would not affirm the lordship of Caesar (Kyrios Kaisar) because it meant ascribing a divinity to the emperor that belonged to Christ alone.

The next part of the name, "Jesus," is the Greek form of the Hebrew name Jehoshua, meaning
"Jehovah is salvation." When the angel announced Christ's name to Joseph before his birth, Joseph was told, "You are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins" (Matt 1:21).

"Christ," the last part of the name, is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word mashiach ("Messiah"), both of which literally mean "anointed." It refers to One who is anointed by God to perform the work of redemption.

When we put these together we see that to come to the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ is to come to God believing (1) that Jesus is fully divine, the unique Son of God, and (2) that he performed the full work of saving people by his death and resurrection, which he was anointed by God to do. Since this is the minimum definition of what it means to be a Christian, this is the equivalent of saying that prayer is for Christians only. It is a family privilege. God does not promise to hear the prayer of anyone who comes to him in any way but through faith in the person and work of his unique and beloved Son.

Second, praying in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ means praying on the basis of his merit and not on the basis of any merit of our own. The illustration of drawing money out of a bank is perfect in this connection because it involves a person's name. If I go to a bank with a check that I have signed and attempt to draw the stipulated amount of money from the bank, I am asking in my own name. If I have an account sufficiently large to cover the amount requested, the check will be cashed. If I do not have an account or if I have insufficient funds, it will not be cashed. But if, on the other hand, I go to a bank with another person's name signed to the check and if he has great resources on deposit, then it does not matter whether I have an account or not. The check is honored because of his name and his deposits.

That is what it means to come to God on the merit of Christ. Torrey, who uses this illustration in the book from which I quoted earlier, concludes, "So it is when I go to the bank of heaven, when I go to God in prayer. I have nothing deposited there, I have absolutely no credit there, and if I go in my own name I will get absolutely nothing; but Jesus Christ has unlimited credit in heaven, and he has granted to me the privilege of going to the bank with his name on my checks, and when I thus go, my prayers will be honored to any extent."

There is one more thing that praying in the name of Christ means. It means praying in line with Christ's character and objectives, that is, praying as he would under identical circumstances. Stedman writes on this point, 'To ask in anyone's name means to ask as though you were that person. This means we are to ask for what Jesus would want, what he is after, and not for our own desires."

Can we really know what Christ is after? Can we know his will? Yes, we can. First, by means of his Word, and second, by the ministry of the Holy Spirit who interprets that Word to us and correctly guides our petitions.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of knowing and studying the Bible if we are to know the will of God. Nothing can ever be allowed to replace it. Occasionally, very occasionally, God reveals his will to us by extraordinary means, as he did to Moses at the burning bush or to Gideon by means of his fleece or to David by the voice of a prophet. But these are unusual means. The normal way of knowing the will of God is by what God has revealed of his purposes and character in the Bible and by the work of his Holy Spirit who takes what is written there and brings its meaning and contemporary force home to our hearts and consciences. Paul speaks of this latter part of the Spirit's ministry in prayer in its Godward aspect in Romans 8:26-27, saying, "In the same way, the Spirit helps us in our weakness. We do not know that we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express. And he who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints in accordance with God's will."

There are times when we do not know the will of God, and when that is the case we must pray cautiously allowing the Holy Spirit to interpret our prayers aright. But when we know God's will, as we do wherever it is revealed in Scripture, then we may pray confidently in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and know that we shall receive the petitions that we have requested of him.

A New Prayer Promise

The fourth and final element of these verses is the new promise they give regarding prayer. It is in two parts. First, there is the promise that God will give spiritual understanding to those who ask him. This is the point of verse 25, which on the surface seems to break up the main thought of the passage. In verse 25 Jesus says, "Though I have been speaking figuratively, a time is coming when I will no longer use this kind of language but will tell you plainly about my Father." We read that verse, and we think that suddenly the theme of the discourse has shifted; first, Jesus was talking about prayer, now he is talking about the nature of his teaching. But this is not a change. It is rather that Jesus was recognizing as he spoke that the disciples were not really understanding his teaching and that much of what he said was therefore a "dark saying" to them. "But this will not last forever," he says, "for one of the things you may ask for in prayer is understanding. If you ask, you will receive it." Do you and I lack understanding? Does the Bible at times seem a closed book to us? Are certain sayings of Christ or certain doctrines "hard"? If so, we have this promise that, if we ask, we will receive understanding. Jesus has said that he will show us "plainly about [the] Father."

Then, too, the promise of this passage concerns joy, for, says Jesus, "Ask and you will receive, and your joy will be complete" (v. 24). How does prayer promote joy? One way is that when we get what we ask this naturally satisfies us and makes us conscious of the favor of God toward us. But this is only part of the story. The other part is that prayer makes God himself real so that, as we pray and receive what we asked for, God is actually there dispensing the gift and meeting with us on the personal level.

I spoke to a woman who had cancer and knew at the point at which I talked with her that she did not have long to live. We talked about Christ and heaven and about God's purposes in suffering, and after we did we prayed together. I prayed fervently and specifically, but she prayed much better. In her prayer she quietly thanked God for his special and very vivid presence with her in these days, citing several examples, and she expressed her joy in him. It was evident as she prayed that God's presence with her was real and that she rejoiced in him in a way that clearly overshadowed her concern about the cancer.

It is a joy to stand in God's presence in the name of Jesus and make and receive requests of him. Do you know that joy? If not, you must take time actually to come into the presence of God and learn to pray. If you need help, he will help you. He will help you because he loves you and wants to be known by you, as Jesus indicates (v. 27).

Chapter 203.
Great Origin, Great Destiny

John 16:28-30

Some time ago in Toronto, Canada, I was talking with a young man about the various errors in theology, and I pointed out that most often heresy results from emphasizing one part of biblical truth at the expense of other parts, as a result of which even that one part is distorted. "That is true of the Trinity," he said. I agreed, for at this point error consists in emphasizing the unity of God at the expense of the diversity of persons or emphasizing the diversity at the expense of the unity. The first heresy is unitarianism. The second is polytheism or Arianism. As our conversation went on we pointed out that the same thing is true of the doctrine of Christ's person. Some overemphasize the deity, others the humanity. The true position is that Christ is both God and man in one person.

In thinking about the difficulty theologians have in keeping Christian doctrines straight and in balance, it is always somewhat of a surprise and relief to discover that the difficulty is never apparent in the Bible. The doctrines are there. God is both three and one. Christ is both God and man. But these truths are never stated in a labored or highly technical form. Instead, they seem to flow from the narrative or doctrinal sections of the books as easily as any other statement.

We have an example of this in the section of the Gospel of John now before us. It is toward the end of the final discourses, which close with chapter 16. The Lord is speaking, of course; and he says, "I came from the Father and entered the world; now I am leaving the world and going back to the Father" (v. 28). This statement concerning his true nature, his heavenly origin, and his heavenly destiny, is profound but, at the same time, so simple that the disciples listening to him were led to exclaim, "Now you are speaking clearly and without figures of speech. Now we can see that you know all things and that you do not even need to have anyone ask you questions. This makes us believe that you came from God" (vv. 29-30). Beyond doubt, the disciples did not understand all that Christ was saying, but they were impressed that he knew their questions even before they asked them and could answer them simply. We should also be impressed as we begin to see all that is involved in Christ's statement.

I see four parts to verse 28. First, there is the doctrine of his heavenly origin; it involves Christ's preexistence and his full divinity. Second, there is the doctrine of the Incarnation, voluntarily assumed. Third, there is his voluntary return to God by way of crucifixion, burial, resurrection and ascension. Fourth, there is the matter of his heavenly destiny.

A Heavenly Origin

The first part of Christ's statement deals with his heavenly origin, for Jesus said, "I came from the Father." This, interestingly enough, is the main part of what the disciples understood, for their response was, "This makes us believe that you came from God" (v. 30).

What did they understand Christ to be saying? They undoubtedly understood Jesus to mean that he was the Messiah, for this was a common way of talking about the Messiah's coming into the world. Nicodemus said, when he encountered Jesus, "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him" (John 3:2). The people who witnessed the miracles of the multiplication of the loaves and fish in Galilee exclaimed, "Surely this is the Prophet who is to come into the world" (John 6:14). That they were speaking of the Messiah in this sentence is proved by the fact that they then wanted to make him king, which we read about in the next verse. Similarly, Martha confessed, "Yes, Lord, I believe that you are the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world" (John 11:27). At the least, then, this sentence indicates that Jesus was the one sent into the world by God for the work of redemption.

But it also means more than this, as Martha's additional phrase, "the Son of God," indicates. For it is not just that Jesus was a special servant of God's but rather that in addition to this he was with God from all eternity and was himself God. I do not know if the disciples understood this entirely, but it is certainly Christ's teaching, as other statements show.

For example, in reference to his heavenly existence before the incarnation, Jesus told the Jews, "Before Abraham was born, I am" (John 8:58). His hearers understood this to be blasphemy because they immediately took up stones to kill him. On another occasion Jesus said, "No one has ever gone into heaven except the one who came from heaven—the Son of Man" (John 3:13). He said, "What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before?" (John 6:62). He said,
"I have come down from heaven not to do my will but to do the will of him who sent me" (John 6:38). Even more impressive than these statements is that great assertion from the seventeenth chapter: "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do. And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began" (vv. 4-5).

Here are claims to both preexistence and deity, and they are so frequent throughout the public and private teaching of Christ that we can truthfully say that if we do not know this about him, we can in truth know nothing. Jesus claimed to be God and to have come forth from God. Is it true? Or was it false and therefore devilish teaching? Alexander Maclaren saw the issue clearly over a generation ago and expressed it as follows: 'The meekest, lowliest, and most sane and wise of religious teachers made deliberately over and over again this claim, which is either absolutely true, and lifts him into the region of the Deity, or else is fatal to his pretensions to be either meek or modest, or wise or sane, or a religious teacher to whom it is worth our while to listen."

This claim to deity is simple but stupendous. There can be no honest assessment of Christ that does not result in committing ourselves either to the truthfulness or falseness of those statements.

The Incarnation

The second part of verse 28 is an expression of the truth known as the incarnation, for Jesus said, "And [I] entered the world." There are several interesting aspects to this sentence. First, Jesus speaks of having "come" and "entered" rather than of having been "sent." It is true that Christ also was sent. Elsewhere he speaks of "the Father who sent me" (John 12:49). But this is not the point Jesus is emphasizing here. The point he is emphasizing is the voluntary nature of his incarnation. In other words, he did not have to be born. He was born because he wanted to be. This too is unique, because no one else can say that.

But this raises an even bigger question, for if Jesus chose to be born, if he assumed our human nature voluntarily, we immediately want to ask why he did this. Cur Deus Homo? Why did the eternal Son of God become man? There are two main answers. First, he became man in order to be our Savior, in order to die in our place and thereby pay the penalty of our sins so that we might be saved from the penalty and power of sin for heaven. This is the point of that passage from Hebrews from which I quoted earlier. I quoted the verse, "I have come to do your will, O God" (Heb. 10:7). But that verse is prefaced by others that speak of the way in which the sacrifice of Christ perfected the ineffectual sacrifices of animals under the Jewish sacrificial system: "It is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins. Therefore, when Christ came into the world, he said, 'Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me; with burnt offerings and sin offerings you were not pleased" (vv. 4-6). The passage says further on, "He sets aside the first [sacrifice] to establish the second. And by that will, we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (vv. 9-10).

Once, when Donald Grey Barnhouse was talking with some students about the atonement, he used the illustration of a judge who saw his son come before him, accused of reckless driving. The charge was clearly proven, and the judge fined the young man the full amount permitted under the law. Then the judge adjourned the court, stepped down from the bench, and paid his son's fine. A girl who had been listening very intently objected, "But God cannot get down off the bench!"

Barnhouse's answer was, 'You have given me one of the best illustrations of the incarnation that I will ever have. For Jesus Christ was no more or less than God, come down off the bench to pay the fine which he had imposed upon us."

There is a second reason why the Son of God became man, and it is this second answer that the Gospel most emphasizes. It is that Jesus came into the world to reveal God.

We see this clearly simply by examining the occasions on which Jesus speaks of his having "come" into the world or of his having been "sent" into the world by God. Here is a scattering of such sentences just as one is likely to find them by reading quickly through the Gospel. "I tell you the truth, we speak of what we know, and we testify to what we have seen, but still you people do not accept our testimony" (3:11). "The one who comes from above is above all... He testifies to what he has seen and heard... The man who has accepted it has certified that God is truthful. For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for God gives the Spirit without limit" (3:31-34). "My teaching is not my own. It comes from him who sent me" (7:16). "I am telling you what I have seen in the Father's presence" (8:38). "As it is, you are determined to kill me, a man who has told you the truth that I heard from God" (8:40). "I did not speak of my own accord, but the Father who sent me commanded me what to say and how to say it. ... Whatever I say is just what the Father has told me to say" (12:49-50). 'These words you hear are not my own; they belong to the Father who sent me" (14:24). In the great prayer of John 17, Jesus addresses the Father directly saying, "I gave them the words you gave me" (v. 8) and "I have given them your word" (v. 14).

The point of this is that Jesus has firsthand information about God the Father and that he should therefore be trusted and believed when he speaks of spiritual things.

A Voluntary Departure

The third part of verse 28 deals with Christ's voluntary departure from this world; for he says, "Now I am leaving the world." This throws a great deal of light on the nature of his crucifixion, because if we take it seriously, it means that the crucifixion was not something thrust upon Jesus against his will (as it might well have been were we in his place) but rather that to which his entire ministry was directed and which he joyfully embraced. It was he who said, "I lay down my life—only to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord. I have authority to lay it down and to take it up again" (John 10:17-18).

We hear much about love today, and God is assumed to be love. But it is only at the cross of Christ, in his voluntary death for us, that we learn that God truly is love. Love is seen at the cross. For this reason there is hardly a verse in the Bible which speaks of God's love that does not in the same context, often within the very verse itself, speak of Christ's voluntary sacrifice. John 3:16, "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." Or, Galatians 2:20, "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." First John 4:10 declares, 'This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins." Christ's Destiny

The final section of verse 28 deals with Christ's heavenly destiny: "And [I am] going back to the Father." What is the significance for us that Jesus has returned to the Father, having come to this earth and having died for our salvation? There are several answers. First, it shows us that the work of redemption is completed and that we can be confident as we come to God on the basis of Christ's finished work. If the work was not done, Christ should still be here completing it. But it is done. Hence, he has returned to heaven, where he has sat down at the Father's right hand. The author of Hebrews discusses this in the same passage referred to earlier, for those verses go on to say, "But when this priest had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God. Since that time he waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy" (Heb. 10:12-14).

Second, the fact that Christ has returned to heaven shows us that he is now in a place where he is able to impart all spiritual gifts and blessings to us as he sees we have need of them. The first of these gifts was the Holy Spirit, for Jesus said, "It is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away, the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you" (John 16:7). There are other gifts also. Thus, we read in Ephesians, "But to each one of us grace has been given as Christ apportioned it. This is why it says: 'When he ascended on high, he led captives in his train and gave gifts to men'" (Eph. 4:7-8; cf. Ps. 68:18).

Third, Christ's present position at the right hand of the Father is one from which he intercedes for his own. Paul speaks of it in Romans saying that Christ "intercedes for us" (Rom. 8:34). The author of Hebrews says, "Therefore, he is able to save completely those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them" (Heb. 7:25). Thus we sing,

> Arise, my soul, arise,
> Shake off thy guilty fears:
> The bleeding Sacrifice In my behalf appears:
> Before the Throne my Surety stands, My name is written on his hands.

It is Jesus' present position in heaven that makes us confident both of salvation and in our approach to God in our prayer and worship.

Finally, Christ's present position in heaven is a token that he is coming to earth again, this time in great power and glory and with his holy angels. Jesus is coming. This is as sure as the fact that he has come once to die for our salvation. Will you be ready to meet him? Will you greet him as your Savior, or will you have to greet him as one whose love you have spurned, whose sacrifice you have repudiated?

You say that you believe in Christ as a great man, a great teacher. Good! That is better than nothing. But it is not enough to save you. Why stop there? Why stop with Jesus the man? Why not have the whole Christ as he is here presented? Maclaren has well written, 'These four facts— the dwelling in the Father; the voluntary coming to earth; the voluntary leaving earth; and, again, the dwelling with the Father—are the walls of the strong fortress into which we may flee and be safe. With them it 'stands four square to every wind that blows.' Strike away one of them, and it totters into ruin. Make the whole Christ your Christ; for nothing less than the whole Christ, 'conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,... crucified, dead, and buried,... ascended into Heaven, and sitting at the right hand of God,' is strong enough to help your infirmities, vast enough to satisfy your desires, loving enough to love you as you need, or able to deliver you from your sins, and to lift you to the glories of his own Throne."

That is precisely the case. May you find that One and come fully to trust him for your own soul's good and the praise of the glory of his grace.

Chapter 204.
Christ's Disciples Scattered

John 16:31-33

There are two reasons why the Lord Jesus Christ was not as impressed by his disciples' professions of faith as they themselves were. First, their faith had been a long time coming. Second, it was about to evaporate. In the verses that close the sixteenth chapter of John, Jesus had been answering the questions of the disciples without their having actually asked them, and this had led them to exclaim, "Now we can see that you know all things and that you do not even need to have anyone ask you questions. This makes us believe that you came from God" (v. 30). This claim was honest, but really quite pretentious. They claimed to believe. They said that they were sure in their belief, but they were actually weak in commitment. Thus, instead of being impressed with his disciples' faith, Jesus goes on to foretell their confusion and scattering at the time of his crucifixion.

This whole exchange should be a lesson for Christian people, for we are often quite confident in our faith, and yet are not as strong as we imagine ourselves to be. We say, "Now I believe; now I am sure." But in a short while we find ourselves doubting the very thing we affirmed.

A Realistic Appraisal

A number of years ago my first assistant at Tenth Presbyterian Church told me something that he had remembered from his early childhood. He had been helping his father put some things on the dining-room table, and he had asked to carry something that his father judged to be too heavy for him. He argued with his father, making many protestations. "Please, Father, I know I can carry it. I am sure I can." At last his father let him try. He started out confidently and carefully, but suddenly he dropped the container and the liquid spilled. He told me that he learned one of the great lessons of his life that day as he stood staring down at the spilled mess and the broken container. He felt absolutely chagrined; he had been so sure of himself. But his father had been right after all, and he was wrong.

Everyone has had such experiences, and it is these that will help us understand the profession of the disciples and their feelings as Jesus gently revealed the future to them. They were so sure of their faith. But in a short while—in fact, within hours—their faith would be gone.

Notice three things that Jesus prophesied concerning them. First, he revealed that they would soon be scattered. Now they were together, and, as is often the case, there was encouragement in numbers. And, of course, there was Jesus. If they had known the song, they might well have sung, "Give me ten men who are stouthearted men, and I'll soon give you ten thousand more." But they did not really know themselves. So before long, much to their chagrin, they would be scattered. Most scampered back over the Mount of Olives toward Bethany at the time of Christ's arrest in the Garden of Gethsemane. Peter followed the arresting party back into Jerusalem, but afar off. After the crucifixion Cleopas and Mary returned to Emmaus, and the others were undoubtedly making plans for their own departure.

Second, Jesus foretold their confusion. This is involved in his questions about their belief, for when he exclaims, "You believe at last!" it is as much as to say that the time was coming when they would no longer believe and all would be confusion. Now they were sure that he was the Messiah, come forth from God. But how could they be sure of that following the harsh reality of Christ's crucifixion? Like the Emmaus disciples they would all be saying, "But we had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel" (Luke 24:21).

Third, Jesus revealed that they would soon be isolated, for each would be scattered "to his own." When we read that phrase the first time we find ourselves asking, "Scattered to his own what? To his own house? City? Friends?" Jesus is saying that each would be scattered to his own little world and that each would be isolated in it. With the center gone, there would no longer be any cohesion to the little itinerant band. It is as if the devil, the disrupter, would have his way and that this heroic attempt to bind the sinful and scattered race of Adam into that glorious new unity of the church would come to ruin.

Well, what of it? Surely that is not our case, now that we have understood the meaning of the cross and stand on this side of Christ's resurrection! Is that right? Are we never scattered? Never confused? Never isolated? Of course, we are! We are scattered—sometimes by persecution, sometimes by schism within the denominations, sometimes merely by our suspicion of other Christians. We are confused, for even believers do not always have a sure answer to give to those who ask them a reason of the hope within. Circumstances, sickness, and other troubles rattle us. We are isolated, for Christians are often terribly alone. I have had Christians write to me with problems because of having heard me over the Bible Study Hour, and they have said, "I have no one to turn to; there is no other person with whom I can share my problems."

I want you to notice that in all of these respects—scattered, confused, isolated—Jesus is the exact opposite of the disciples. They scattered at the time of his arrest, but Jesus stood firm. He stood firm even to the point of death, as a result of which, after his resurrection, he became a magnetic point about which they regathered. They were confused, but he was strong in faith, as a result of which they recovered faith from him. They were isolated. But he, even though he was abandoned by them, could say, "But I am not alone, because the Father is with me." They emerged from their isolation when he came to them again following the resurrection.

I am glad that the Lord accepts weak, stammering, even ignorant faith. If he did not, what would become of us? Who could be saved? But having said that, let us not imagine that our faith or perception is the crucial thing, for "weak, stammering and ignorant" is an accurate description of it. Our strength is not in our faith but in him who is the object of it. It is in Jesus.

Christ's Legacy

The second lesson of these verses is Christ's parting legacy to his disciples. He had gently exposed the weakness of their supposedly strong faith. But not wishing to leave them with the exposure, he immediately goes on to talk of that which really is strong and which will endure even in tribulations. He talks about peace, his peace. It is the same peace he had spoken of in the fourteenth chapter: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give you. I do not give to you as the world gives. Do not let your hearts be troubled" (14:27). It was announced of Christ at his birth that he had come to bring peace—"peace on earth, good will toward men." This he did, and he left it behind at his departure.

In 1874 a French steamer called the Ville du Havre was on a homeward voyage from America when a collision with a sailing vessel took place. The damage to the steamer was considerable, and as a result it sank quickly with the loss of nearly all who had been on board. One passenger, Mrs. Horatio G. Spafford, the wife of a lawyer in Chicago, had been en route to Europe with her four children. On being informed that the ship was sinking she knelt with her children and prayed that they might be saved or, if not, that they might be willing to die, if that was God's will. When the ship went down, the children were all lost. Mrs. Spafford was rescued by a sailor who had been rowing over the spot where the ship had sunk and found her floating in the water. Ten days later, when she reached Cardiff, she sent her husband the message: "Saved alone." This was a great blow, a sadness hardly comprehensible to anyone who has not lost a child. But though a great shock, it did not destroy the peace that either of the parents, who were both Christians, had from Jesus. Spafford wrote as a testimony to the grace of God in his experience:

When peace, like a river,
attendeth my way, When sorrows like sea-billows roll—
Whatever my lot, thou hast
taught me to say, It is well,
it is well with my soul.
Though Satan should buffet, though trials should come, Let this blest
assurance control,
That Christ has regarded my helpless estate, And hath shed

his own blood for my soul.

This is the meaning of the Christian's peace. It is not an absence of conflict or any other kind of trial or disappointment. Rather it is contentment and trust in God in spite of such circumstances.

Two Conditions

But it is not automatic. That is, it is not ours regardless of whether or not we meet Christ's conditions for entering into this inheritance. The conditions he lays down in this passage are two.

First, the peace Christ gives is for those who are "in him." This could mean simply that peace is for Christians, for when we become Christians God places us in Christ so that we may properly be said to have died and risen with him and to be sitting now with him in heaven. But this is probably not what Christ is talking about here. We must remember in interpreting this verse that the discourses in which they occur have been full of admonitions to "believe on" Christ and, more importantly, to "remain in" him. This is not the kind of being "in" Christ that corresponds with being saved but rather a conscious dependence on him and staying close to him that is the prerequisite to joy and fruitfulness in the Christian life. It is this that Christ has in mind as he closes these discourses. Jesus gives peace. But the gift of peace is appropriated only by those who depend on him, trust him, and remain close to him in their living of the Christian life.

Moreover, this interpretation of being "in" Christ is reinforced by the second of the two conditions: that the words of Christ might be in his followers. Jesus indicates this when he says, "I have told you these things, so that in me you may have peace" (v. 33). What things are these? They are the doctrines of this section of John's Gospel. We previewed these at the beginning of our study of this section.

First, there is the fact of Christ's love for the disciples. Chapter 13 begins with this truth: "It was just before the Passover Feast. Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father. Having loved his own who were in the world, he now showed them the full extent of his love" (v. 1). The chapter that is introduced by that verse contains a great demonstration of the love of Christ for his own, the foot washing, which is at the same time both a true demonstration of Christ's condescending love and an illustration of his humbling of himself in order to be able to die on the cross. Throughout the discourses there is repeated evidence of Christ's concern for his own. He is concerned to instruct them, warn them, and prepare them for his departure.

Second, Jesus spoke about heaven, saying that he was going to prepare a place for his own in heaven and that, if he was going, he would return and take them to himself so that where he was there they would be also (14:2-3). What was new in this teaching was not the mere fact of heaven, but rather that Jesus had an interest in it and would guarantee a personalized place in heaven for his followers.

Third, Jesus had spoken about the coming of the Holy Spirit. This was a tremendously new thing, for although the Old Testament had much to say about the Spirit of God, and although several of the Old Testament prophecies had spoken of a day when the Holy Spirit should be poured forth in power, no one had been associating that with Christ's ministry or gifts. Now the disciples were told that Christ would himself send the Spirit and that he would come to be in them and work through them. According to Jesus, the Holy Spirit would comfort the disciples. He would also perform a ministry toward the world, for he would convict the world "of sin, righteousness and judgment" (16:8).

Fourth, Jesus spoke of a work that the disciples were to perform and for which he was leaving them in the world. He spoke of it in different ways. In the fourteenth chapter he spoke of it in comparison with his own work, saying that it would be even greater: "Anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father" (v. 12). In the fifteenth chapter he spoke of it in terms of his commissioning of them to fruitful service: "You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit—fruit that will last" (v. 16). Having work to do in this world, their lives would be meaningful.

Fifth, the Lord spoke about prayer, giving us some of the most exciting promises in the Bible concerning it. "And I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. You may ask me for anything in my name and I will do it" (14:13-14). "If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given you" (15:7). "Until now you have not asked for anything in my name. Ask and you will receive, and your joy will be complete" (16:24). The Lord also told them that he would pray for them. In the seventeenth chapter, we have a magnificent example of just such intercession.

Finally, even as Jesus reminds the disciples of what he has already taught, he adds another teaching: "But take heart! I have overcome the world" (16:33).

Christus Victor

This is the point at which we should end—the point of Christ's victory. He overcame the world in three areas: in his life, in his death, and in his resurrection. He overcame it in life because, in spite of abundant griefs and temptations, he pursued the course God had set before him without deviation, sin, or error. He said of Satan, "The prince of this world is coming. He has no hold on me" (John 14:30). He overcame the world in death because his death was the price of sin and thus broke sin's hold upon us. He overcame the world in his resurrection because by his resurrection he began his return to the throne of heaven from which he now rules the church and from which he will one day come again to put down all authority and power.

"I have overcome the world." These words were spoken within the shadow of Golgotha, at the very foot of the cross. They were spoken on the verge of what surely seemed a defeat. But they were true then. And if they were true then, it is even more abundantly demonstrated that they are true now. Do you believe them? Is Christ the victor? If you do and if he is, then stand with him in his victory. Possess that peace that he dispenses, and in your turn also overcome the world. Does the world deride Christ's gospel? So much the worse for the world. Do circumstances press us down? He has overcome circumstances. Stand with him then. He is the King. He is God over all, whose name is blessed forever.

Chapter 205.
The Real Lord's Prayer

John 17:1-5

In several places in his Institutes of the Christian Religion and other writings, John Calvin, the great reformer and theologian, speaks of God's revelation of himself to us in the Bible as baby talk, the kind of speech used by a loving mother communicating with an infant child. What Calvin means by this is that any communication to us by God must be in the simplest and most rudimentary language from God's point of view. His thoughts are not our thoughts. His ways are not our ways. Consequently, God must condescend to speak to us in baby talk if we are to understand him. If the Scriptures are to be of any use to us, they must be a rudimentary revelation.

When we think along these lines, however, it is natural to speculate on what that true and deep communication that exists between the members of the Godhead might be by contrast. It is granted that God must talk baby talk to us, but how profound, deep, and unfathomable must be that talk between the Father and Son and between both of them and the Holy Spirit! Are we right in this speculation? In one sense, we obviously are. Still, the section of the Gospel of John to which we come now is an immediate and abrupt check on any of our thoughts along these lines. For, while it is the purest and most extensive example in all the Bible of a direct, verbalized communication between two members of the Godhead, nevertheless it is expressed in the most comprehensible phrasings, syntaxes, and words.

Compare it with Luke's prose, for example. Luke begins the Book of Acts with beautiful Greek style: "In my former book, Theophilus, I wrote about all that Jesus began to do and to teach until the day he was taken up to heaven, after giving instructions through the Holy Spirit to the apostles he had chosen. After his suffering, he showed himself to these men and gave many convincing proofs that he was alive" (1:1-3). It goes on in that vein. But listen to John 17. "Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you. For you granted him authority over all people that he might give eternal life to all those you have given him. Now this is eternal life: that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (vv. 1-3). The prayer goes on: "I pray for them. I am not praying for the world.... All I have is yours, and all you have is mine.... Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth.... Father, I want those you have given me to be with me where I am and to see my glory, the glory you have given me because you loved me before the creation of the world" (vv. 9-10, 17, 24).

This prayer contains the simplest of sentences, though the ideas are profound. It is proof that the difficulty we have in understanding God's truth is not in the complexity of the truth itself or in the language with which it is conveyed (as if it were logarithms or German philosophy) but in our own ignorance, sin, and spiritual lethargy.

A Priestly Prayer

What a wonderful prayer this is! It has three parts: Christ's prayer for himself (vv. 1-5), his prayer for his disciples (vv. 6-19), and his prayer for all who should follow them in faith in the coming centuries (vv. 20-26). The shortest part is Christ's prayer for his own interests. By contrast, he prays at length both for his disciples and for ourselves as members of his mystical body. The prayer has five main petitions, one for himself and four for us. The second and third parts enumerate six distinctive marks of the church, each of which we will eventually study separately: joy, holiness, truth, mission, unity, and love.

A study of these verses soon shows that this is the true Lord's Prayer. The prayer that begins, "Our Father in heaven, hallowed be your name..." (Matt. 6:9-13), should more accurately be termed The Disciples' Prayer. The one in John 17 is Jesus' prayer. It has properly been designated his High Priestly Prayer, for he intercedes for us here as our High Priest before his Father's throne.

Luther said of this prayer, "This is truly, beyond measure, a warm and hearty prayer. He opens the depths of His heart, both in reference to us and to His Father, and He pours them all out. It sounds so honest, so simple; it is so deep, so rich, so wide, no one can fathom it." Melanchthon, Luther's friend and colleague, wrote, "There is no voice which has ever been heard, either in heaven or in earth, more exalted, more holy, more fruitful, more sublime, than the prayer offered up by the Son to God Himself." The Scottish Reformer, John Knox, had this prayer read to him every day during his final sickness, and in the closing moments of his life he testified that these verses continued to be a great comfort and a source of strength for his conflict.

This prayer should be to us something of what the burning bush was to Moses, for here we hear God speaking, and we should put off our shoes and bow humbly, being about to tread on the most hallowed ground.

The First Petition

We turn now to the first of Christ's petitions. It is found in verses 1 and 5. It is the prayer that the Father would "glorify" Jesus, as a result of which Jesus would in turn "glorify" the Father. The verses read, "Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you.... And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began."

In understanding this petition we are, however, immediately confronted with a problem, for few words in the distinct biblical vocabulary are less understood than the word "glory." What is more, even a perfectly correct definition—once we have found it—does not always do justice to the passage under consideration. This passage is itself a perfect illustration of this second difficulty, for in the first five verses we are told four apparently conflicting things about Christ's glory. First, Jesus possessed a certain glory with God before the incarnation. Second, this glory was God's glory. Third, Jesus did not possess this glory during the years of his incarnation; he here prays that this original glory might be restored to him. And yet, at the same time and fourthly, there is a sense in which he did possess this glory while on earth, for he revealed it to others by finishing the work God had given him to do. This latter sense is involved in John 2:11, to give just one additional example; for we are told there that the changing of water into wine at Cana was the beginning of those miracles in which Jesus "revealed his glory" and as a result of which his disciples "believed on him."

How can this be? How can the Lord have possessed God's glory, have renounced it, and yet have possessed it even in the period of the renunciation? And what does the phrase "the glory of God" mean anyhow?

The resolution of this problem and the only sufficient basis on which we will ever understand Christ's petition lies in an understanding of the way in which the idea of "glory" was used in ancient Greek and Hebrew literature. In the Greek language the word for glory is doxa, which in turn is based upon the ancient verb dokeo. In the early days the verb meant "to seem," "to appear," or "to have an opinion." This meaning is apparent in the idiomatic expression dokei moi, which means, "it seems good to me." It occurs in the New Testament most clearly in Galatians 2 in which Paul speaks of the Jerusalem apostles as those who "seemed to be leaders" (v. 2), "seemed to be important" (v. 6), and were "reputed to be pillars" (v. 9). It was an opinion that Paul himself apparently did not fully embrace. The noun correspondingly meant an "opinion" or, more precisely, "what one thinks." This meaning is preserved in our English words "orthodox," "heterodox," and "paradox," which mean, roughly, "a straight (or right) opinion," "a different (or other) opinion" and "a contrary (or conflicting) opinion." This early history of the words is documented in the great theological Greek dictionary edited by Gerhard Kittel, from which these details are taken.

Some time after this early history of the words, the noun (doxa or "glory") began a development of its own that soon took it from its original meaning. In the early stage it had meant an "opinion," any opinion. But as time went on it came to mean, first, a "good opinion" (as opposed to just any opinion) and, then, "that which merits a good opinion." During these stages the word could correctly have been translated as "praise," "honor," "good standing," "reputation," or "renown." When used of a king or of a divine being, it obviously meant the ultimate in praise or renown, as when we read: "Who is this King of glory? The LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.... The LORD Almighty—he is the King of glory" (Ps. 24:8, 10).

The quotation from Psalm 24 introduces us to another feature of the history of the word, however, for it begins to show the result of the Bible's applying the word to God. The glory of God was obviously linked to his attributes, for he could be called the King of glory because he was perfect in all his attributes—love, truth, holiness, grace, power, knowledge, immutability, and so forth—and was therefore truly glorious. Incidentally, this also exemplifies the meaning of the word orthodox, because the person who has orthodox beliefs is the one able to form a correct, or proper, opinion of God's attributes. In this way, God's glory consists of his intrinsic worth, or character, to use a human term. Thus, all that can be properly known of God is an expression of his glory.

At this point we can understand one use of the word glory in Christ's petition, for when he says, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (v. 4), he is saying that, by his ministry, he had revealed the essential characteristics of the Father. When the disciples beheld his glory, as in 2:11, they actually beheld his character, which was the character of God. It is one way of saying that, if we have seen Jesus, we have seen the Father.

Shekinah Glory

This only explains one use of the word, however. It explains the glory that Jesus obviously retained during the years of his earthly ministry. But what of that glory that he had with the Father before the incarnation, which he renounced and which he prayed might be restored? If this glory refers to God's essential character, it would mean that Jesus was less than God during the days of his ministry, and this is not right. What does the word mean in these more exalted references?

The answer to this question is found in the recognition that there is another, entirely different meaning of the word "glory," which had its origin in Hebrew rather than Greek thought, and which entered the Greek language later only as a result of contacts between Greek and Hebrew culture. Although the beginnings of these contacts are not known, it seems that the major factor was the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek about one hundred years before Christ.
The translation is known as the Septuagint. Later writers, such as the Jewish philosopher Philo (born c. 20-10 B.C.) and Flavius Josephus (born c. A.D. 37), employ the word with both meanings.

In Jewish thought any outward manifestation of God's presence was believed to involve a display of light, radiance, or glory so brilliant that no man could approach it. This idea is involved in the phrase "the light of [his] face" (Ps. 4:6; 44:3). It is in Psalm 104:1-2, "O LORD my God, you are very great; you are clothed with splendor and majesty. He wraps himself in light as with a garment." We have a graphic example in the case of Moses whose face glowed with a transferred light after he had been with God on Mount Sinai, so much so that the people asked that he cover his face with a veil that they might be shielded from the radiance (Exod. 34:29-35; 2 Cor. 3:1315). Light was also associated with the cloud of glory that overshadowed the wilderness tabernacle during the years of Israel's wandering and that later filled Solomon's great temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 8:10-11). This idea is so important that it is found throughout the Old Testament. In post Old Testament times, in the Targums and other Jewish writings, a new word, Shekinah, more perfectly embodied it.

We now have enough knowledge of the word "glory" to understand Christ's first petition. Before his incarnation Jesus had possessed the glory of God in both these senses. He possessed the fullness of God's attributes and character in the inward sense; he also possessed the fullness of God's outward, visible glory. In the Incarnation Jesus laid the second of these aside; for, if he had not, we would not have been able to approach him. Nevertheless, he retained God's glory in the first sense and indeed disclosed it to his disciples, who received it by faith. Now at the end of his earthly ministry, on the verge of his crucifixion and subsequent resurrection, he prays that he might again enter into this visible glory.

Now Jesus has been exalted. He has been given that glory. Stephen saw it at the time of his martyrdom; so also did John (he wrote about it in the Book of Revelation) and perhaps Paul as well. This fact should be a great encouragement for believers, for it points to the kingly rule of Christ who now rules his church in righteousness and preserves his people.

Christ Our Glory

There is one further thought. It is that we shall share in Christ's glory. In a sense, we share in it now, for, to the degree that we embody Christ's character, we possess his glory in the first of its two important senses. Is not this what Jesus means when he goes on to say, "Glory has come to me through them" (v. 10)? Or again, "I have given them the glory that you gave me" (v. 22)? Moreover, we shall even see Christ's visible, outward glory one day, for Jesus goes on to pray concerning us and of that glory, "Father, I want those you have given me to be with me where I am, and to see my glory" (v. 24).

What shall we conclude then? If we shall one day behold Christ's glory and if we are to be filled with it now, let us strive to glorify him and show forth his glory. And let us pray that God will do that in us, for it is obviously not something of which we in ourselves are capable.

But notice! When Jesus prayed that he might be glorified and that God would therefore be glorified in him, he buttressed his petition with reasons. They are instructive. I see five reasons behind Christ's request. First, that the hour had come (v. 1). This means that the hour of Christ's great work had come, the hour of his crucifixion and subsequent resurrection. To say that the hour had come meant that Jesus had been in the will of his Father throughout his life, that this had brought him to the hour of his most important work, and that he would be continuing in that will until it was done. Second, he prays for his glorification because it would result in the glorification of the Father (v. 1). In other words, the prayer was not selfish but merely that which every intelligence in the universe should desire. Third, he says that God the Father had already given him authority to grant eternal life to each one who had been given to him (v. 2). His glorification followed naturally upon this. Fourth, Jesus argues that by virtue of his death he is the only way to life (v. 3). His glorification would therefore mean the salvation of his people. Finally, he speaks of his finished work (v. 4). The divine pattern is first self-denial, obedience, and suffering, after which the glory follows.

This should be our pattern also. We must seek to glorify Christ while we live by showing forth his character. But this will not happen in some mystical way. It will happen only as, by the grace of God, we walk in his will (as he directs), as we carry out whatever responsibility he has entrusted to us, as we point to Jesus as the only way of salvation, as we finish our work, and as we seek the glory of God in its fullness, rather than our own.

Chapter 206.
God's Gifts to Jesus

John 17:2

The second verse of the prayer recorded in John 17 gives a reason for Jesus' request that is found in the first verse (the request to be glorified by the Father). The reason is that glorification and the authority over all flesh already granted to him go together. As I read this verse, however, the part that strikes me most is its repetition of the verb "to give" or "grant." It occurs twice of the Father's gifts to Jesus: the gift of power [or authority] over all flesh, and the gift of a people. It occurs once of Christ's gift of eternal life to those whom God has given him. As we study this verse we will find that the three are connected, and will be led into the very heart of the relationships of the Son to the Father and of both to us in salvation.

Gift of a People

I do not know if you have ever had difficulty finding an appropriate gift for someone, particularly for a person who apparently has everything, but I confess that I have. And sometimes it bothers me. I can imagine myself giving a bottle of shampoo to a man who wears a wig, though I did not know it, or giving a recording of the Bach B Minor Mass to a person who hates classical music. The fear of doing something inappropriate is what makes us hesitant so much at the counter when buying a present for someone just before Christmas.

I do not think, however, that God the Father had a problem when he was considering the first of these great gifts for his Son Jesus. For what could be more appropriate for God the Father to give the Son than a people who should be conformed to his own blessed image and be his brothers and sisters throughout eternity? A mansion would not be appropriate, for all the mansions of heaven already belong to Christ and are going to be prepared by him for those who are his own. A world such as this, even a galaxy of such worlds, is not appropriate, for Jesus shared in the making of the worlds that already exist, and he could make billions more at any time, if he so chose. Nothing that we can possibly imagine would be a more appropriate gift to that One who is himself the Lord of glory than a people of his own—a people who had been created in his image, who had fallen into sin, but who were now to be redeemed by Christ and called to him in faith by the power of the Holy Spirit.

As we read this and the other verses that speak along these lines, we find ourselves facing what the old Reformed theologians called a covenant between God the Father and God the Son, according to which God would give to Jesus in salvation that vast company for whom he was specifically to die.

Moreover, this was not only an appropriate gift for Jesus; it was a satisfying one as well, for it is often recorded of Christ that he took joy in or rejoiced over his people. One great example of this is in the Old Testament, in the Book of Isaiah. In Isaiah 53, that great chapter in which the suffering and death of Christ for his own is most clearly spelled out, it is said that the Lord should look upon the fruit of his suffering and be satisfied: "Though the LORD makes his life a guilt offering, he will see his offspring and prolong his days, and the will of the Lord will prosper his hand. After the suffering of his soul, he will see the light of life and be satisfied" (vv. 10-11). The satisfaction was in knowing that his death would secure our salvation.

The theme of Christ's satisfaction is also in the New Testament, as in Hebrews 12, to give just one example. We are told there to look to the example of the Lord Jesus Christ, "the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame" (v. 2). In what was Christ's joy to be found? Clearly in the knowledge that by his death he would secure the salvation of all whom God had given him.

Do you think that the promise to Christ that a certain people, given to him by the Father and surely to be saved by his suffering, was also a comfort to Christ on the verge of his crucifixion? It must have been. Otherwise, why would the phrase "who you have given me" (twice with slight variations) appear seven times in verses 2, 6, 9, 11, 12, and 14?

We all find ourselves repeating an idea or phrase when we have been faced by something particularly trying or traumatic. Sometimes people facing a dreaded operation keep repeating, "It will all be over in just a few hours," or "I know it will turn out all right." When competing in sports, we sometimes repeat something we should recall in order to perform well: "Keep your chin down," "Keep your forearm stiff," "Remember to breathe deeply," or some such point of personal instruction. It was the same with Jesus. The cross was no easy task for him, particularly since, when he was made sin for us, it involved a real, though temporary, separation from the Father. In the Garden, on this same evening, he even prayed in agony that this cup be removed from him, if such could be the Father's will. This was hard, but in his trial he received comfort in knowing that his suffering would result in the salvation of his people. Of these he had said earlier, "All that the Father gives me" (John 6:37). His death was to provide the objective and judicial basis upon which these who had already been given to him should come.

There is no greater gift, no more appropriate gift, no more satisfying gift for Jesus than this, the gift of the church to the One who would die for it. If you have believed on Christ as your Savior, you should know that you are one who was thus given to Jesus before the foundation of the world and about whom he was thinking and receiving comfort as he died.

Authority

The second of God's gifts to Jesus according to John 17:3 is power or, as the word exousia should better be translated, authority. The gift is authority over all flesh to do with as he will. It is a great authority, for it is on the basis of this authority that he can give eternal life to all whom God has given him.

There are several very important things about this authority. First, its scope. The text is speaking of this when it says, "For you granted him authority over all people." All means everyone, everyone who has ever lived or who will ever live. It means the rich as well as the poor, the supposedly sophisticated persons of our culture as well as the savage in the jungle, the strong as well as the weak, the intelligent as well as the not-so-intelligent. It means the other person. It means me. No one is expected from the scope of this universal authority of the Lord Jesus Christ.
Therefore he may do with them as he wishes. He is the King of kings and Lord of lords.

Moreover, it is not just all men and women, past and future, who are subject to his authority. It is angels and demons, those in heaven and in hell as well. This truth is clearly taught in that great passage on Christ's exaltation—Philippians 2:9-11. "Therefore, God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Here three distinct categories of intelligent beings are mentioned: those in heaven, those on earth, and those under the earth. This refers to angels (whose natural dwelling place is with God), men and women (who dwell upon earth), and those fallen angels or demons (who were cast out of heaven at the time of their original rebellion and who will one day inhabit hell, which has been prepared for them). There are two different kinds of acknowledgment, of course. The holy angels and those who have been redeemed from among men and women will acknowledge Christ gladly. They will rejoice to confess him Lord. Others, the fallen angels and those who have not believed from among men and women, will not acknowledge him gladly. But they will acknowledge him, being forced to this by the sheer fact of his triumph. However the acknowledgment is made, either willingly or reluctantly and with hatred, the acknowledgment will be made, and the full scope of the authority and power of the Lord Jesus Christ will be vindicated.

It is wise for us to ask, not how we may escape that authority (for we cannot) but rather in what way that acknowledgement of his rule shall be made by us. Willingly and with joy? Or grudgingly and with hatred? If we do not come to believe in and love the Lord Jesus Christ here, we will not do it on that great day when all are called before him.

The second important thing to note about the authority of Christ portrayed in this verse is its depth, for it is not just that Jesus has been granted authority over all, important as that is, but also that He has been granted authority "over all flesh"(KJV). Flesh is the most recalcitrant thing in the universe.

In common English usage the word "flesh" refers almost exclusively to the fleshy parts of the body and is related to the "skin." Yet this is not what the word means in the Bible. To be sure, it can at times mean "skin." But generally it means the entire individual—composed of a body, soul, and spirit—which since the fall is constantly motivated by a sinful nature. We see the first instance of this broader definition in the early chapters of Genesis when Adam says, after God has brought the first woman to him, "'This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called "woman," for she was taken out of man.' For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh" (2:23-24). This last phrase does not mean that the man and the woman were to be united sexually only, though that was an important part of their union, but rather that they were to be united on each level of their being—body, soul, and spirit—so that they would thereafter be what we might conceivably call one organism. The word "flesh," therefore, denotes the whole of man's being.

In this first case the word "flesh" is used in a favorable sense. But with the coming of the fall in the next chapter this initial and favorable usage changes. Now the word continues to refer to the whole of man's being, but a being that is sadly dominated by man's depraved sinful nature.

Let me give an illustration. We may think in terms of an airplane flying at 35,000 feet. The pilot is the soul. The fuselage is the flesh. The thrust of the engines is the spirit. In that form each part of the airplane is good and is functioning as the designer intended it to function. But if the engines stop, the entire plane is in trouble, for now the fuselage, which was an asset when the engines were running, becomes a liability and will soon draw the plane to destruction. To be fleshly in the biblical sense means, therefore, to be dominated by the body without the ongoing thrust of the spirit. Sometimes it is said that we are dominated by our "old man" or "old nature." Sometimes the Bible speaks of the deceitfulness of our heart.

Here are some texts. "Surely I was sinful from birth, sinful from the time my mother conceived me" (Ps. 51:5). "Put off your old self, which is being corrupted by its deceitful desires" (Eph. 4:22). "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9). "For from within, out of men's hearts, come evil thoughts, sexual immorality, theft, murder, adultery, greed, malice, deceit, lewdness, envy, slander, arrogance and folly. All these evils come from inside and make a man 'unclean'" (Mark 7:21-23). "Those controlled by the sinful nature cannot please God" (Rom. 8:8).

With this background we can appreciate something of the depth of the authority of Christ over all flesh, for the point of this word is not merely that Jesus has authority over all intelligent beings, though that is true, but also that he has authority even over that stubborn and rebellious nature that now so totally dominates men and women. I am glad that he does, for if he had not had that authority over me to turn me from my path of rebellion and quicken my dead spirit so that I might respond to him in faith, I would never have believed. I would be under condemnation and soon to perish in my sin. But in grace he turned me to himself, as he has countless others.

Universal and Specific

This leads to the third of the gifts mentioned in the text. We are told that Jesus has been given authority over all so that he might in a specific way give eternal life to as many as God has given him. The authority is universal. It cannot possibly be greater either in scope or in depth. Nevertheless, the exercise of that authority in the matter of salvation is specific, for it is shown in the giving of eternal life to those, and only those, whom God has given him.

This is the problem of the verse so far as natural, human thinking goes. We do not really doubt or question the statement that Jesus has authority over all—at least no Christian does—for this is what a Christian confesses when he calls Jesus Lord. But it is quite another matter to say that he gives eternal life selectively and that only to those who have already been given to him by the Father. How can this be? Is God partial? Is this really the way God operates in salvation?

We must be ready to say that we do not fully understand these things, particularly when we are asked the why of God's actions. Nevertheless, we must always say that this is the way God operates and that he is just in doing so, whatever our thoughts in the matter may be.

Jesus faced precisely these objections on more than one occasion during his ministry, and sometimes they were violently expressed. For example, on the occasion of his opening his ministry by a reading of the Book of Isaiah in the synagogue at Nazareth, he got into a discussion of the nature of God's electing grace, and the people who heard him were offended. Earlier he had pointed to himself as the fulfillment of Isaiah 61:1-2, and they were not particularly upset about that. In fact, we are told that they actually "were amazed at the gracious words that came from his lips" (Luke 4:22). But then he explained that God does not always work where we expect him to or according to our standards of justice or propriety. He said, "I assure you that there were many widows in Israel in Elijah's time, when the sky was shut for three and a half years and there was a severe famine throughout the land. Yet Elijah was not sent to any of them, but to a widow in Zarephath in the region of Sidon. And there were many in Israel with leprosy in the time of Elisha the prophet, yet not one of them was cleansed—only Naaman the Syrian" (vv. 25-27). These verses illustrate God's authority over all so that he might show mercy on whom he will. And at this statement, not at the earlier one but at this, the people were "furious.... They got up, drove him out of the town, and took him to the brow of the hill on which the town was built, in order to throw him down the cliff (vv. 28-29).

Which is worse, the fact that we are dead in our trespasses and sins and unable to come to Christ unless Jesus first gives eternal life to us, or the fact that we naturally hate these truths when they are spoken to us? It is hard to say. But what is best is to say that God in his grace has given some to Christ and that Jesus has in turn given them his own life that they might be saved.

Are you such a person? I cannot say that you are or are not, apart from your response to Christ, and neither can you. But I can say that if you find stirrings of spiritual life within you so that you are becoming increasingly aware of your spiritual need and are finding Jesus to be the One who is attractive to you as the Savior, and if you are turning to him, then it is because these great gifts of God have already taken place where you are concerned, and you are being brought inevitably to Jesus. God has given you to him. Jesus is drawing you. Come to him. Find him to be your Savior.

Chapter 207.
Knowing the True God

John 17:3

One of the things that has always interested me in my study of the Word of God is the number of ways in which one may speak of salvation. In fact, it has been more than interesting. It is important because it is often the case that Christians get locked into one particular way of talking about salvation and thus cannot change, even when the person to whom they are talking fails to understand their terminology. That needs to be corrected.

In evangelical circles the most common way of talking about the gospel of Jesus Christ is by the words "sin," "atonement," "the new birth," "believing on Jesus," and related concepts. It is no surprise that this is so, for these are the dominant biblical terms, and they are correctly at the heart of our Christian proclamation. But what if these words were missing from the English language? Or what if, which is nearly the same thing, these words and what they mean are missing from the thoughts of someone to whom we are speaking about the gospel? Can other terms be used? My study of the Bible indicates that they can. Thus, to give just one example, it is possible to speak of the will of God, our rebellion against that will, and God's activity in Christ and through the Holy Spirit to get our wills in line with his once again. The rebellion of our wills against God's will is sin; this is what the Bible calls Satan's sin (Isaiah 14). Salvation is that by which God again establishes his perfect and holy will in us so that we are drawn to Christ and begin to seek after holiness. Heaven may be described as that place where the wills of those who are there, after having been disrupted by Satan, are harmonious.

Our text in John gives another set of terms for salvation. It says, "Now this is eternal life: that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (17:3). Here the operative term is knowledge—"that they may know." Knowledge of God is salvation. By contrast, not knowing God and not wanting to is sin.

True Knowledge

When we speak along these lines we must be careful to define what we mean by that knowledge that is salvation, for there are several uses of the word that are not what the Lord meant in this expression and that, far from suggesting salvation, actually are used biblically to explain why men are guilty for failing to come to God for it.

There are four senses of this word that are inadequate. The first is that sense of knowing by which we actually mean awareness. It is what we have in mind when we say, for example, that we know the United States is governed by a president and a congress and that the headquarters for both are in Washington. This is not a very profound kind of knowledge, nor is it necessarily detailed. It is the kind of awareness a child might have as a result of something he or she has been taught in school. The Bible speaks of this kind of knowledge in Romans 1, saying that all who have ever been born into the human race have this knowledge and are guilty before God because, having it, they do not come to him. More precisely, Paul speaks of the wrath of God being revealed against men "since what may be known about God is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them. For since the creation of the world God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made, so that men are without excuse. For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened" (Rom. 1:19-21). These verses are not speaking of a knowledge of God in the sense intended by Jesus when he linked a knowledge of God to eternal life, otherwise all would be saved. Rather, they speak of the most rudimentary kind of knowledge. It is awareness only, but it makes us responsible.

The second inadequate meaning of the words "to know" or "knowledge" involves information. To return to the earlier illustration, we may say not merely that we know there is a president and a congress but also that we know much about them. A reporter covering the Washington beat would have much knowledge. But the type of knowledge would be the same. In spiritual terms this would be the kind of knowledge of God possessed by a theologian who, while he may know much about God, is not necessarily born again.

The third view is knowledge by experience. But this, although better than either of the other two, is still not enough. We might think of this as the experience of a person who goes out into the fields around his house on a summer night and looks up into the twinkling heavens and returns, saying, "I have experienced God. Do not give me any of your theology. I don't want words. I have experienced the real thing." We may believe that such a person is imagining his experience, particularly if it has nothing to do with the Lord Jesus Christ; but he is not necessarily imagining it, nor is his experience without meaning. He actually may have experienced something very profound and moving. Still, moving as this may be, it is not what Jesus meant when he spoke of eternal life consisting in such knowledge.

Fourth, even in its highest form this knowledge is not merely knowledge of God alone, for it always involves knowledge of ourselves in terms of our relationships to him. Knowledge of God and of ourselves go together.

What is this knowledge? It is a personal encounter with God in which, because of his holiness, we become aware of our sin and consequently of our deep personal need and then, by his grace, are turned to Christ who is our Savior. This knowledge occurs only where God's Holy Spirit is at work beforehand to make it possible, and it always changes us, issuing in a heart response to God and true devotion. This is involved even in Christ's brief statement, for he stresses that the knowledge of which he is speaking is knowledge of the true God and of himself as Savior.

The True God

This brings us to the matter of knowing the true God as opposed to a false or imaginary God. It causes us to ask: Who is this God? What is the effect on us when we come to know him?

There is a story in the Old Testament that is helpful at this point. It is the story of God's revelation of himself to Moses. Moses was certainly aware of the true God prior to this time. He had been born into a godly home. He had undoubtedly heard of God's calling of Abraham and of His subsequent dealings with him and the other patriarchs. He even believed in God's promises to deliver the Hebrew people from their Egyptian bondage, for he put himself forward as the vehicle of that deliverance by killing an Egyptian. Still it is probably true that Moses had never had a personal encounter with God in any full sense of the term until God revealed himself to him in the burning bush on Mount Sinai.

Moses had been going along minding his own business when he noticed this bush. It was burning, which was unusual but not miraculous. The astonishing thing, which he became aware of gradually as he stood watching, was that the bush did not burn up. He went closer. After a while a voice came to him out of the bush saying, "Moses! Moses!... Do not come any closer. Take off your sandals, for the place where you are standing is holy ground" (Exod. 3:4-5).

What is the first thing that God revealed about himself to Moses? The first thing that God revealed about himself was his holiness. Here God was obviously calling Moses and desiring him to come close and listen to what he had to say. But the first words Moses heard were: "Do not come any closer. Take off your sandals." And the reason given was that even the ground was holy by virtue of God being in that place. Holiness! That is the first and most important thing that fallen men and women have to learn about the true God, and accompanying that they have to learn that sin bars their access to him. Moses was apparently aware of this instantly, for we read in the next verse: "Moses hid his face, because he was afraid to look at God" (v. 6).

Let me ask in a personal way: Have you ever had the experience of being afraid to look on God because of his holiness and your sin? I do not mean: "Are you always afraid of God?" or "Do you not know that you should be afraid of God?" If you have also believed on Jesus Christ, you have learned that God has made provision to blot out your sin through Christ's sacrifice and that you can therefore come to him boldly and joyfully on that basis. What I do mean is: Have you ever been really disturbed knowing that you must ultimately deal with One in whom is no sin at all, who cannot tolerate sin in any form and who must judge it? If you have not really known God in that way, then I suggest that in a sense you do not know even the first thing about him, at least not deeply. Consequently, you do not really know much about the depth of your sin or the true measure of God's great grace.

God's Knowledge

The second thing that God revealed about himself to Moses was his own knowledge of things or, as we would say in more precise language, his omniscience. In this account God spoke to Moses, Moses hid his face, and then God began to tell what he had seen and heard concerning the condition of the people of Israel in Egypt. "I have indeed seen the misery of my people in Egypt. I have heard them crying out because of their slave drivers, and am concerned about their suffering. So I have come down to rescue them from the hand of the Egyptians.... Now the cry of the Israelites has reached me, and I have seen the way the Egyptians are oppressing them" (vv. 79). "I have seen.... I have heard.... I am concerned," and therefore, "I have come"—these are the words God uses. They speak of omniscience. And if Moses did not get the point in this declaration—because he was hiding his face and undoubtedly trembling in his shoeless feet—he soon got it later, for God showed that he knew all about Moses too, his strengths and weaknesses—and about what was coming, for God foretold difficulties, saying that Pharaoh would not willingly consent to Moses' demands, in fact, that he would strongly resist them and would let go eventually only after God had done many wonders in Egypt.

Why is it important to know this about God? Why is it important to know that he knows everything? The answer is in two areas. First, we must know that God is omniscient so that we will not be tempted to try to fool him with some exalted portrayal of our own deep devotion or loyalty. If we could, we would try to convince God that we are serious about following him when actually we would be going our own way. We would try to appear good, when we are not; loving, when we are actually motivated by hatred or antipathy; humble, when we are filled with pride.

God is not fooled by such things. He is not fooled by anything. Consequently, we are to learn that, whatever our relationships to others may be, our relationships with God must be based on total honesty, as he is honest. We must know that "everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13).

The second area in which knowledge of the omniscience of God is important to us concerns our trust in him. If God did not know everything, if something could at any moment rise up to surprise him, then God could not be trusted. For however good his intentions, the unexpected thing might cause him to change his mind or actually change him so that he would no longer be the God we knew originally. His promises could not be trusted, for he might decide to break or change them on the basis of this new knowledge. He might even change his attitude toward us, for we might surprise him by the sin we commit and thus cause him to look upon us with abhorrence or even apathy. If God does not truly know everything, any of this is possible. On the other hand, if God does know all things both in the past and future, then nothing unforeseen can change him. He has seen the end from the beginning. He has taken all into consideration. Nothing we can ever do will surprise him. Thus, his promises can be believed, and he can be trusted to remain the same in himself and toward us forever.

Our Sovereign God

The third thing that Moses learned about God was his sovereignty. This was personal too, for it was expressed to Moses in terms of God's demand that he return to Egypt with God's message to Pharaoh: "Let my people go." Moses did not want to do it. He was like the rest of us who do not want to do anything difficult and who often are content only when God blesses us while allowing us to do nothing. Moses made excuses, but they were not valid. He asked for signs; God provided them. At last God intensified the tone of his orders, and Moses, who eventually ran out of excuses, succumbed.

Have you learned this about God, that the God of the Bible, the true God, is a sovereign God who will be obeyed and who will most certainly see his will rather than ours done in the universe? There is no other God. Any god less than this is not God. So why do we fight him? Why do we find this matter of doing the will of God so unwelcome?

Knowing God

Here we come to the true problem in the knowledge of God, for the problem is not that God has not revealed himself in at least a partial way or that we do not have the physical ability to seek after him for salvation, if we would. The problem is that we do not want to do this, and the reason we do not is that we find the true God, who is there to be known, threatening. His holiness is threatening. His knowledge is threatening. His sovereignty is threatening. All that can be known of God is threatening, profoundly so when we are yet in our sins, but also sometimes even after God has brought us to faith in himself through Jesus Christ.

God knows this. He knows that we do not know him and do not want to know him. Therefore, he has taken steps to reveal himself to us in spite of our sinful dispositions against him. He has done three things.

First, God has revealed himself in history. This special revelation is in addition to that general revelation of himself in nature of which all have an awareness but to which none will respond.
This revelation consists of direct supernatural interventions in earthly affairs. In the Old Testament this was centered in God's actions on behalf of the nation of Israel, in their deliverance, guidance, and preservation. In the New Testament it centers primarily in Jesus, the fullness of God's personal revelation. This One died for us. He paid the price of our sin. He shows the nature of God to be love, while at the same time he satisfies God's justice.

Second, God has revealed himself in writing. This has two purposes: one, that we might know what God has done and, two, that we might understand it. We would not even know what Jesus had said, as in the case of this particular text, for example, if God had not caused these things to be put down on paper and be preserved throughout the years of church history to our own generation. Nor would we understand these things, even if they were recorded, had God not given an interpretation along with the facts.

Finally, God also reveals himself to us personally, applying these truths to us by the work of his own Holy Spirit. So great is our sin, so warped our knowledge, that even with the interpretation of his acts in Scripture we would not know God or understand his ways, apart from this activity. What light does this throw on our knowledge? It shows it to be God's gift, for notice that in John 17:2-3, Jesus speaks, first of all, of his gift of eternal life to as many as God has given him and then, secondly, that this eternal life is to be found in spiritual knowledge. This makes knowledge itself God's gift. And so it is, for no one would ever know God in the fullest sense unless God first revealed himself and then made the reception of this knowledge possible.

Chapter 208.
A Good Work Done

John 17:4

There are few things in life more truly satisfying to a human being than a job well done. Some people never know this satisfaction, because they never do anything well. But those who do, who really work at something and see it to completion, know. It is the satisfaction of a student who has finished his course with high honors, the satisfaction of a musician who has at last mastered a difficult piece. It is, to give a specific biblical example, the satisfaction of the apostle Paul, who said to Timothy near the end of his life, "For I am already being poured out like a drink offering, and the time has come for my departure. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day—and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing" (2 Tim. 4:6-8).

In all honesty, however, we must say that although there is often satisfaction for us in a job well done, there is never that satisfaction that we would have if we could say that the job was done perfectly or completely. There is only one human being who ever lived who could say that, and that was the Lord Jesus Christ whose words on this subject we are to study.

What is it we do? We do many things; but most of them are not finished, and none are done perfectly. I am sure that every housewife and mother will admit readily that her job is never finished. We even have a saying for it: "A woman's work is never done." There are always dishes to wash, cleaning to do, meals to prepare, children to help with their homework, and countless other chores. If she works outside the home, she has these (or some of these) perpetual problems plus others. Husbands, for their part, have the continuing obligations of their job. Our work is never completed, and we never do even the individual parts of what we have to do, perfectly. Yet this was not true of Jesus, for he said of his work, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (John 17:4).

As we study this verse we find that it has three parts: first, that a work was given to the Lord Jesus Christ by the Father; second, that Jesus completed that work; and third, that the result was the giving of glory to God.

Christ's Work

The first thing this verse tells us is that Jesus was given a work to do by God. What a great work it was! It was the work of all works! It was an achievement before which all other achievements pale into virtual insignificance.

In a sense, everything that Jesus had done was an aspect of the work he was given, and God was glorified by it. We know that Jesus was active in the creation of all the worlds of our universe. Colossians says of him, "For by him [Christ] all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him. He is before all things, and in him all things hold together" (1:1617). We know too that it was Jesus who, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, guided the fortunes of the Jewish people during the Old Testament period. He may even have been that mysterious figure, the "angel of the Lord," who appears at such strategic moments in the history of the patriarchs and those who followed them (Gen. 16:7-14; 22:11-15; Exod. 3:2; Judg. 2:1-4; 5:23; 6:11-24; 13:3). Finally, it is true that the work includes the whole of Christ's life and ministry, beginning with his birth in the stable in Bethlehem and including all his teachings, acts, and miracles. Since he is speaking in the past tense in this verse, at the end of this ministry, it is this that is particularly in view.

Yet none of these things can possibly be the heart of what Jesus is speaking about, for the great work that was given to him and that he completed perfectly was the atonement for sin, which he alone accomplished on the cross. Therefore, it is this above all that he declares he has finished.

It is not a real difficulty to this understanding of the verse that Jesus speaks here in the past tense while, in point of fact, the death on the cross was not yet actually completed, for the prayer as a whole looks forward to the death and even beyond it with such assurance that it is as though these things had already been accomplished, as they surely were in Christ's mind. Besides, we have that interesting repetition of the phrase "It is finished" later, when Jesus is actually hanging on the cross just before he bowed his head and gave up his spirit (John 19:30). This second reference fixes the meaning of this early reference precisely. In the same vein, we note that Jesus had said earlier, "And what shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'? No, it was for this very reason I came to this hour" (12:27). The meaning of this verse is that above everything else Christ came to die on the cross.

A Finished Work

We must go on to the second point of this verse. The first point is that the Father had given Jesus a great work of salvation to do. It is a great point, but while it is great, the second is even greater, for having been given this work, Jesus did not merely attempt it and then drop it or else carry it forward a little bit and then stop. He finished the work, as a token of which he was subsequently raised from the dead and is now seated at the right hand of the Father.

Do you find that satisfying? I know one person who is satisfied with that work. God is satisfied. We know that God was satisfied by Christ's death by the resurrection of Christ, for the resurrection is God's seal upon Christ's work. Paul writes of this in Romans saying succinctly that Jesus "was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (4:24-25). This does not mean that we were justified by Christ's resurrection; it was his death that did that. Rather, it means that by the resurrection God gave notice that Christ's death was that perfect substitution for sin he entered this world to make and that he, the Father, had accepted it in place of the condemnation of the sinner.

Ralph L. Keiper told of the time in his youth when his family lived on borrowed money. They were a poor family and sometimes had to depend on what they called "household finance." It was a bad system, for in the end they paid more interest than principal. As a boy, Keiper had the job of taking the passbook, which contained the record of their borrowings, to the bank and there depositing the amount that the family was able to pay back plus the interest. He did it for eighteen months and felt each time that it was a miserable experience. At last the day came when the final payment was to be made. It was terrific. First, he handed in the book with the payment. Then he watched the teller put in the amount paid, mark the last page with the words "Paid in full," and hand it back. Finally, through the window the teller handed him the bank's book against the family, and it too said "Paid in full." Now the account was paid, and no one had any record against them.

This is what the resurrection is to us. It is God's declaration that the account of our moral indebtedness has been paid, that God is satisfied. This just God will never demand anything else for our salvation.

I know someone else who was satisfied by Christ's death. It was Jesus himself. Can you not hear the tone of satisfaction as he turns to his Father on the verge of his arrest and crucifixion and declares without any wavering, "I have brought glory to you on earth by completing the work you gave me to do"? Let us learn from this that Jesus is not sitting in heaven today wringing his hands, saying, "Oh, if I had just done so-and-so..." or "If I had just been a little more conscientious at that point...." He is not even wondering if something has been left undone, because nothing was left undone. When he came into the world he said, "Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me; with burnt offerings and sin offerings you were not pleased.... I have come to do your will, O God" (Heb. 10:5-7). While on earth he said, "I have a baptism to undergo, and how distressed I am until it is completed!" (Luke 12:50). Then he accomplished it, fulfilling his Father's will. Now he looks back and is "satisfied" (Isa. 53:11).

What then? If God is satisfied in Christ's death and if Christ is satisfied in his death, should not we, who benefit from it most directly, also be satisfied? Yes, and more than that! We should rejoice in that completed work, knowing that it is our glory. We should sing about it:

Jesus paid it all,
All to him I owe;
Sin had left a crimson stain,
He washed it
white as snow.

God's Glory

But perhaps it seems wrong to speak of our glory. If so, remember that it is not only our glory. It is the glory of Jesus and of the Father too. In fact, Jesus begins with this emphasis, "I have brought glory to you on earth."

How does the finished work of Christ redound to God's glory? It does so because it reveals God's great attributes clearly. We must remember from our earlier study of the word "glory" (in chap. 42) that to glorify God means to "acknowledge his attributes" or "make them known." It means proclaiming his sovereignty, justice, righteousness, wisdom, love, and everything else that may rightly be said about him. But where are these attributes best known? The answer is: at the cross, for only here is the perfection of God's sovereignty, justice, righteousness, wisdom, and love abundantly and unmistakably displayed. We see God's sovereignty in the way in which the death of Christ was planned, promised, and then executed, without the slightest deviation from the prophecies of the Old Testament. We see God's justice in sin actually being punished. Without the cross God could have forgiven our sin gratuitously (to speak from a human perspective), but it would not have been just. Only in Christ is that justice satisfied. We see God's righteousness in recognition of the fact that only Jesus, the righteous One, could pay sin's penalty. We see God's wisdom in the planning and ordering of such a great salvation. We see his love, for it is only at the cross that we know beyond doubt that God loves us even as he loves Jesus.

Jesus revealed these attributes of the Father fully by his death. Hence, his obedience to the Father's will in dying, fully glorified him. No wonder we sing:

> To God be the glory—great things he has done!
> So loved he the world that he > gave us his Son, Who yielded > his life an atonement for sin
> And opened the Life-gate that > all may go in.

This is God's glory... and Christ's glory... and our glory too, for we glory in Christ's death, rather than in any works or plans of our devising.

Conclusions

There are a few conclusions to this study, and they are as obvious as they are inescapable. First, if Christ's atoning work is finished and if it has been accepted as such by the Father, then what folly it is and what ingratitude it shows if we think we can add to it. Millions of people, many of them serious churchgoing people, are doing this. They do not disbelieve in Christ's work especially, but neither do they trust it wholly. Instead, they try to add to it by tears and confessions and charity and by every other kind of supposed "good work." They suppose that by these things God may perhaps be moved to be gracious to them and so save them at last. What an insult to God! It is insulting to suppose that you can add to that salvation that he in his own great love and wisdom planned from before the foundation of the world and then brought to completion in time through the death of his beloved Son, the Lord Jesus.

Will you turn from your work to Jesus? His work is a great work, an all-sufficient work, a certain work. It is all you need. It is all that God will accept. Accept it then, and present it to the Father in place of your works.

Second, if Christ's atoning work is really a finished work and if God has accepted it as the sole grounds of salvation, let us proclaim it as such. We cannot honestly proclaim this truth until we have first entered into it ourselves. But if we have entered into it, having come to God on the basis of Christ's sacrifice, then we have an obligation to make this gospel widely known. It should be joy for us to do so. Many need this word. There are the pagans of our world, those who have neither heart nor stomach for Christ's gospel, who would willingly tread it underfoot if they were able. They need to hear that all that is necessary for our salvation has been done by Christ. He has died, and "it is finished."

The sophisticated, ethical people of our world need to hear it also. They think they are pleasing God by their efforts. But they are not; they cannot. Nor need they try. "It is finished." The work is done.

There are also the highly religious persons, some in other religions—Jews, Catholics, Greek Orthodox, cultists—some in our own. These too need the gospel. They need to know that Jesus has finished his work, the very work they need. Who will tell them? Will you? How can you not tell them if you have yourself found what they so desperately need? The Bible says, "How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them?" (Rom. 10:14).

Third, it may be that you are quite busy and that you therefore react to what I have just said by replying, "But I cannot tell others about Christ's death for them. If I did that, so many other things I have to do would not get done." Do you say that? If you do, you must apply our text by noting that Christ did, not his own work, but rather that which was given him by God. You must ask, "Am I doing what God has given me to do? All of it? Or have I slipped my own plans in somewhere along the line, for my own benefit, and so ceased to serve him?" If you do not have time to tell others about the gospel or work to bring them to where they may hear it, you are too busy. Perhaps you are not doing the work God has given you to do at all.

Finally, it may also be the case that you really are doing what God has given you to do. You cannot say as Jesus did, "I have completed the work you gave me to do." But you can say, "I am working at the work you gave me to do." If this describes your condition, if you can say that, then the message of this text is simply: Keep at it! Do not quit! Hold to that of which God has made you the custodian! Yours may be a glamorous work but one with heavy burdens, as is the case with many prominent works. It may be an unspectacular work. Most works are like this; but so was Christ's work, at least from the world's unsanctified perspective. Moreover, receive this encouragement: while it is true that you and I will never fully finish our work in the sense of having done it to perfection, we can nevertheless finish it in the sense of hanging on to the end, Christ helping us. More than that, we can put a lot of "finish" in it by improving our service constantly by the grace given to us.

"I have finished the work you gave me to do," says Jesus. "I am working at the work you have given me to do," we answer. God give us the grace to do that always.

Chapter 209.
Prayer for Christ's Own

John 17:6 So much of what we do is selfish.

William Gladstone, the great English statesman, said, "Selfishness is the greatest curse of the human race." The poet Robert Browning wrote, "Man seeks his own good at the whole world's cost." We see it in our prayers. We pray for ourselves most of the time, and even when we pray for others it is often with a view toward what they can do for us or be toward us ("Help my wife to get better, so she can start doing the dishes again" or "Help my boss to become a Christian, so he won't be so mean").

Jesus is not selfish. Nor are his prayers selfish. It is true that he prayed for himself. In the prayer recorded in John 17 he begins by praying for what concerns himself—"Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you" (v. 1). But even here the request is never for the Lord's interests as opposed to those of others. He asks to be glorified in order that he might in turn glorify the Father. Nor are these requests improper or even especially magnified. Thus, we have a record of one petition concerning himself, but of four for others. Or, to put it in terms of verses, there are five verses in the first section of this prayer (where Jesus is praying on his own behalf), but twenty-one verses in the next two sections (in which Jesus prays for his disciples, and for all who should inevitably follow them in faith).

Christ's Own

Verse 6 says, "I have revealed you to those whom you gave me out of the world. They were yours; you gave them to me and they have obeyed your word." This verse says four things about Christ's disciples. First, they are (or were) God's. Second, God has given them to Jesus. Third, Jesus has made God known to them. Fourth, they have received or kept the revelation. The importance of this sequence is that it is repeated in the experience of everyone who ever comes to Jesus. First, we are God's. That is, he can do with us as he likes. Second, we are given to Jesus. Third, the gospel is made known to us by Jesus through his Holy Spirit. Finally, we receive this teaching. We cannot help but notice that our response comes last in the sequence.

First of all, Jesus says that the disciples were God's originally. "They were yours," says Jesus. In an important sense, everything that exists is God's, for he made it originally and can do with it as he pleases. This is true of the material world. From the tiniest atom to the greatest star or galaxy, all that exists is God's and obeys the laws that he has set for it. Moreover, we know that this is not some independent existence or some law apart from God, as if God were bound by it, for on occasion he steps in over his natural law to do what we instinctively term a miracle, thus demonstrating that creation is controlled by him and not he by creation.

God's right of possession is true in the realm of persons also. Events seem to go according to the dispositions of men and women; for, like the material world, God does not usually intervene supernaturally. Yet human events are no less ordered by him, and the destiny of individuals is also controlled. All things—whether material objects or persons—are in God's hands, and he can do with them as he likes.

But now, in addition to this general possession by God of all things, there is also a possession by God that is more specific. It is a possession of a holy people, who are his in this special way solely because of his election of them to salvation. In Romans, Paul speaks of this in terms of God's possessive foreknowledge, saying, "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (8:29-30). It is this possession of his own by God about which Jesus is primarily speaking in his prayer, for he sets them off as "those you gave me out of the world." This possession anchors our salvation, not in any slight whim of the moment (which we might have), or in any faltering ability on our part to choose or keep choosing God (which we do not have), but rather in God's great purposes and possession, which alone are trustworthy.

Given to Jesus

The second point in the sequence of verse 6 is that those who were the Father's in this special, elective sense were then given to Jesus, so that they became his possession as well.

We do not need to treat this point at as great length as the point preceding, for we already looked at it in part when dealing with the verse in which the phrase "as many as you have given [me]" or "those you have given me" occurs for the first time (v. 2). In studying that verse we noticed that the phrase occurs seven times in all and is therefore somewhat of a continuing motif throughout this prayer. We must remember as we think of this that Jesus had been in the world for more than thirty years (by most estimates) and had probably conducted a public ministry of about three years' duration. What had been the result? He was in the world as the world's light. He was filled with the fullness of God's character. He was sinless, gracious, winsome and as loving as anyone could possibly be. But he was not loved for it. Instead, he was hated. He was about to be crucified. At the time of his arrest, even these who were now gathered about him would be scattered.

Where was any bright point in this picture? The bright point was that, in spite of appearances, these disciples and countless others who should follow them in faith had been given to Jesus by the Father. Because it was he who had given them, and because of his power, these would most surely come to him and would be kept by him through the days of their earthly pilgrimage and eventually be united with him forever in glory.

The knowledge that these had been given was a controlling perspective for Jesus as he went about his earthly ministry. He was confronting the sin-enslaved wills of men and women. So, knowing this, he did not deceive himself into thinking that anything was possible apart from God's purpose and power in their lives. On one occasion we read that, even though many had been impressed with him as a result of having seen his miracles, he "did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man; for he knew what was in man" (John 2:24-25). On another occasion he said, "No one comes to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (6:44). Jesus knew the problem. He was under no illusions concerning the outward success of his ministry, as if by doing something spectacular or teaching more palatable doctrines or preaching with just a bit more eloquence, he could perhaps win a few more souls to his side. Jesus did not think like that. Consequently, as he went about preaching he was concerned to conduct his ministry as God had instructed him to conduct it, meanwhile looking about for those persons whom God had given him and expecting such to come to him.

Did they come? A few did. At this point in his ministry there were the eleven collected by him, plus a number of others who had been deeply influenced and who probably believed. They were not many. But these were God's gift to him, however few their number. Besides, there would soon be others. Jesus rejoiced in these and thanked the Father for them.

The Names of God

We must not think that our salvation operates in a mechanical way, however, for in the same verse in which Jesus speaks of God's activity in giving us to him he also speaks of his own personal activity in time to make the Father known to these people. Jesus is speaking of this when he shows that next in the sequence of God's application of salvation to the disciples is the fact that he (literally) had made the name of God known to them.

"The name of God" is a Semitic phrase for speaking about God's attributes. To make the name known is to reveal the God who possesses those attributes. If we think theologically in light of the full scope of the biblical revelation, then Jesus is saying that he revealed the God of the great biblical names to his disciples. There is the name Elohim, the name occurring in the first verse of the Bible—"In the beginning God [Elohim] created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). This name speaks of God as Creator; so we may believe that Jesus told the disciples about this aspect of God's nature. Another—indeed the great name of God—is Jehovah. This has a variety of meanings, but it is used primarily in reference to God's character as Redeemer. Jesus revealed this about God. So with all God's other names: El Elyon, Jehovah Jireh, Jehovah Sabaoth.

Yet this approach to the names is only theological, and it is not the whole story. If by contrast we look at the matter historically, asking, "What is the unique name of God revealed to us by Jesus?" then we must say that the name is "Father."

It is not generally appreciated how unique this name was. Today we are at home with the thought of God as Father, but this was not true in Jesus' day, nor would it even have been thought to be proper. The use of this word (and in most quarters the failure to use it) in referring to God has been documented in recent years by two German scholars: Ernst Lohmeyer, who has written a book called "Our Father" (a study of the Lord's Prayer), and Joachim Jeremias, in an essay entitled "Abba" from the book The Central Message of the New Testament, and in a booklet called The Lord's Prayer. According to these scholars, three things are beyond question: (1) the title "Father" as a designation of God was new with Jesus, (2) Jesus always used this form of address in praying, and (3) Jesus authorized his disciples to use the same word, thereby leaving a tremendous legacy for the church.

It is true that in one sense the word "Father" for God is as old as religion. Even the Greeks spoke of "Father Zeus, who rules over the gods and mortal men." But in this case the word really means "Lord." In Israel God was also said to be the Father of his people: "But now, O LORD, you are our father" (Isa. 64:8), and "As a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on them that fear him" (Ps. 103:13). But this is characteristically of the people as a whole; nowhere, either in the Old Testament or in any other document prior to the time of Jesus, does any individual Israelite ever address God directly as "my Father."

Yet this is what Jesus does always. He always called God "Father," and this undoubtedly impressed itself upon the disciples to such a degree that they preserved it in their records of Christ's speech and prayers.

Thus, not only do all four Gospels record that Jesus used this address, they also report that he did so in all his prayers (Matt. 11:25; 26:39, 42; Mark 14:36; Luke 23:34; John 11:41; 12:27, 28; 17:1, 5, 11, 21, 24-25). The only exception is one that actually enforces the importance of this title. It is the cry from the cross ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?") pronounced at that moment in which Jesus was made sin for us and the fellowship which he had enjoyed with the Father previously was temporarily broken.

The Lord's use of this title indicates his awareness that he was the Son of God in a unique sense. But strikingly, he then revealed that it can be used by those who become sons of God (in a lesser sense) by their union with him. After his resurrection Jesus announced that the disciples could come to the Father as he came to him: "But go to my brothers and tell them, 'I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God'" (John 20:17). In the Sermon on the Mount he taught, "This, then, is how you should pray: Our Father..." (Matt. 6:9).

Is this important? Of course it is, for it means that while God is the great, high, exalted, eternal, self-sufficient, self-existent, and inscrutable God, he is at the same time and in equal measure the Father of all who believe. So we can come to him, not with a prayer that says, "O high, exalted and inscrutable God, far from us in your majesty, unreachable and unknowable...," but rather with that warm and personal prayer that begins, "My Father...."

Is God your Father? If he is, then he will be a Father to you during the days of your spiritual infancy when you are just a babe in Christ. He will teach you to walk, as it says in Hosea: "When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son.... It was I who taught Ephraim to walk, taking them by the arms" (11:1, 3). God sets our way before us and helps us in it.

Is God your Father? If he is, then he will be a Father to you in his paternal care. The laws of our country recognize that a father is responsible for the care of his children. God accepts this responsibility also. You need not fear that the great God of the universe, the One who owns and controls all things, will let you down, that he will disappoint you or turn his back on you. This God clothes the lily of the field and the grass. "Will he not much more clothe you, O you of little faith?" asks Jesus (Matt. 6:30).

Is God your Father? If he is, he will preserve you to the end and will permit nothing to change your relationship to him. You may disgrace him. You may be unworthy of your high calling. You may run away from him, as Jonah did. But he will still be your Father.

Christ's Word Obeyed

There is one more step in this verse. First, we have been told that those who are Christ's previously belonged to the Father. Second, we are told that they have been given to Jesus. Third, Jesus has filled his responsibility to them by revealing the Father to them. Now we are also told that they have received this word, or obeyed it.

In Greek the word for "obey" literally means "to pay attention to" or "observe," just as one would pay attention to a traffic law and observe it. But observing Christ's word is the end product of first hearing it and then understanding it to the point at which it makes a difference in our behavior. Some people have never heard that word. That is why we have missionaries, radio programs, Christian books, and all other kinds of gospel communication. Some people have never understood. Indeed, all fail to understand unless the Holy Spirit makes these things comprehensible to them. That is why we pray as we give out the message, for we know that our efforts are wasted unless God intervenes to do this miracle. But at last, there must also be the keeping of Christ's words, involving commitment and change. This had been true of the disciples. Jesus says so clearly. It must also be true of us and of all who would follow him.

What will be the results? There are two of them. On the one hand, those who have not obeyed Christ will not like us. In fact, they will hate us, according to verse 14. "I have given them your word and the world has hated them, for they are not of the world any more than I am of the world." But on the other hand, we will be vehicles for Christ's glory, as it says in verse 10. "All I have is yours, and all you have is mine. And glory has come to me through them." There is no greater privilege for those who belong to Jesus.

Chapter 210.
Christ's Word Kept by Christ's Own

How does one tell who are the elect of God? How do we judge who are Christians and who are not? We must admit as we raise the question that there is a sense in which we cannot judge and that the answer is none of our business. We cannot judge in this sense because it is a matter of the heart, and the heart is visible to God only. On the other hand, whenever we admit members to a Christian church or seek out Bible school teachers or church officers we find ourselves having to make a decision in just this area. And so, although we cannot see as God sees, the question remains.

How does one tell who are the elect of God? There are certain ways in which we obviously cannot tell. We cannot tell by the alleged depth of the spiritual experience of the person. There are those who measure reality by the depth of their feelings. In some circles this is even accompanied by a certain anti-intellectualism in which facts and doctrines are neglected and emotion is everything. The difficulty with this approach is that feelings come and go.
Consequently, such a person may consider himself or herself a Christian one moment and a nonChristian the next. Which is right? In which frame of mind should the person involved be believed?

Another way in which we obviously do not know whether a person is a Christian or not is by his or her denominational affiliation. All denominations are composed of a mixture of people, some of whom are Christians and some of whom, even by their own confession, are not.

How can one tell who is a Christian? There is only one answer, the answer given by the Lord Jesus Christ when he said of those who were truly his disciples, "I have revealed you to those whom you gave me out of the world. They were yours; you gave them to me and they have obeyed your word. Now they know that everything you have given me comes from you. For I gave them the words you gave me and they accepted them. They knew with certainty that I came from you" (John 17:6-8).

According to these verses, the only way to tell whether one is a Christian or not is to see whether he or she believes and continues in the words of the Lord Jesus Christ.

A Second Sequence

Of the three verses the most important for the theme of this study is verse 8, for it sets the matter of keeping Christ's words in a sequence of actions similar to the sequence in verse 6, which we studied in the last chapter.

In verse 6 Christ presents the matter of salvation from God's point of view, stressing his acts.
Thus, we find Jesus teaching: first, that believers were God the Father's initially; second, that the Father gave believers to Jesus by an act of sovereign grace; third, that Jesus exercised his responsibility to those he had been given by revealing God to them; and fourth, that they in their turn received or kept Christ's words. In verse 8, by contrast, Jesus presents the matter from the disciples' point of view, thereby in effect elaborating upon the last two steps in verse 6. Here Jesus says: first, that he has given the disciples the words that the Father gave him; second, that they have received those words; third, that on the basis of those words they have known that he came forth from God; and fourth, that they have believed in him as the One whom God sent. To summarize, the steps are: the giving of God's Word, the receiving of that Word, knowing, and believing. The believer is the one for whom and in whom these things have occurred.

The first step in this sequence, then, is the giving of God's Word, which Jesus indicates by saying, "I gave them the words you gave me." The Word is the only thing that is powerful enough to do what is required in the hearts of fallen men and women if they are to be saved. Nothing else can do it. The Word is God's tool. It is, as the author of Hebrews writes, "living and active. Sharper than any double-edged sword, it penetrates even to dividing soul and spirit, joints and marrow; it judges the thoughts and attitudes of the heart" (4:12). Compared to this the words of men are next to nothing. Luther knew this. On one occasion he said, 'We must make a great difference between God's word and the word of man. A man's word is a little sound, that flies into the air, and soon vanishes; but the Word of God is greater than heaven and earth, yea, greater than death and hell, for it forms part of the power of God, and endures everlastingly" (Table Talk, xliv). Peter was thinking of the same thing when he wrote concerning the new birth, "For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23).

The conversion of an individual is much more than mere persuasion. If persuasion were all that is required, then our words would be sufficient and we could win men and women by argument. This is not enough. Arguments have their place. God uses them. But at its base what takes place in the matter of salvation is something like a resurrection, a miracle. Clearly, only the Word of God, not our words, can accomplish that.

This is why there must be witnesses and missionaries in the Christian church and why a bit farther on Jesus will allude to this need, saying, "As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world" (John 17:18), and again, "As the Father has sent me, I am sending you" (20:21). God could save the entire race by a fiat, if he so chose. But he has not chosen to operate in this way. Rather, he has declared that it will be by his Word, preached and shared by his people and applied to the hearts of individuals by his Holy Spirit, that men and women will be saved. We have a share in this great work, for it is by us that God's Word is conveyed to those who need so desperately to hear it.

Receiving God's Word

The second step in the sequence of verse 8 is receiving God's Word, for Jesus said, not only that he had given the disciples the words that God had given him but also that they had accepted them. The Greek word for "accepted" is not the same as the word for "obey" in verse 6. The word in verse 8 means only to "get" something or "receive" it. Thus, in going to a lesser word in verse 8, it is as if Jesus is backtracking in order to explain the harder word he used earlier. To "obey" his Word is, as he now shows, to hear it, receive it, know on the basis of it, and believe on him personally. The fact that Jesus puts in the step of merely receiving his Word indicates that it is possible to have the Word given but have it pass over the head of the one listening. Or, as we say colloquially, it is possible to have it "go in one ear and out the other." More than this is required. In contrast to merely hearing the Word, there must also be a receiving of that Word so that it sinks down into the mind and becomes the basis for our thinking and meditating afterward. It is a way of saying that God must actually communicate with us through another's witnessing or preaching.

Knowledge

Up to this point the sequence of giving and receiving the Word that Jesus gives has been obvious. The word must be given if it is to be received, and it must be received if it is to be of any use to us. But now, as a third point, Jesus goes on to talk about knowledge of certain things followed by believing, and this is not so obvious. We have always been taught that in spiritual things it is the other way around. In fact, Jesus himself taught this. In speaking to Martha just before the raising of her brother Lazarus, Jesus said, "Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?" (John 11:40). The world says, "seeing is believing."Jesus says, "believing is seeing." How then, in John 17, can he seem to put it backward?

It would be a sufficient answer to this question to note that seeing and knowing are not exactly synonyms as Jesus uses them in these two passages. But the truly significant thing to note is that, while a full apprehension of spiritual realities always follows upon belief, nevertheless there is a proper and necessary kind of knowing that must precede it. Otherwise faith is "blind faith," which is not a true biblical faith at all.

Here we come into the area of Christian apologetics and to the question, "Does faith need reasons?" More specifically, "Do we need reasons to undergird our faith, and do we need reasons to present that faith to others?" On one level, the answer to these questions is no, if by them we are asking whether all doubt must be cleared away before God can save someone. God obviously saves many without resolving their doubts, and some retain a great many throughout their Christian life and experience. But on the other hand, knowledge does play a role in faith, for faith is commitment to One whom we have come to know through the propositional witness of Christian people. We find the apostles giving an account of their belief in the face of critical questioning. Peter encourages those who follow him to "always be prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have" (1 Peter 3:15).

In the context of John 17, this means that a certain number of convictions concerning Jesus must precede faith in him. These convictions will not embrace all possible areas of religious truth. Jesus does not even suggest that in this prayer. But they will embrace the central questions concerning both the person of Christ and his teaching. Jesus indicates this by saying, "They know with certainty that I came from you" (v. 8) and 'They know that everything you have given me comes from you" (v. 7). Before we commit our lives to Jesus we must be convinced that he is divine, that his teaching is true, and that he did what he said he did, primarily in dying on the cross. He died as our substitute, bearing the penalty for our sin. If we are not convinced of these truths, our faith is in a phantom.

Nor is it just for our own personal belief that knowledge of this type is important. It is also important for our motivation to evangelism. One of the great impetuses to evangelism is the conviction, based on knowledge and reinforced by experience, that the facts to which we testify are really true. After Jesus' death, and prior to the resurrection, the disciples were downcast and scattering. After the resurrection they were impelled to tell others. Why? The difference was their conviction that the resurrection had really occurred and that it was important that others know of it. So should we think, if we share those convictions.

Finally, knowledge is important in the proper satisfaction of our minds. Some Christians act as if the mind is evil and so refuse to think, at least deeply. This is not right. Though fallen, the reasoning faculty in man is still one aspect of his being created in the image of God and is to be used by the Christian in thinking through spiritual matters. As this is done there is an element of true spiritual satisfaction and a preparation for being able to deal with whatever problems might come.

Faith and Action

Having stressed the importance of knowledge, we must not, however, fall into the trap of stopping there, as if Christianity were only a process of learning certain things. There was an early heresy of Christianity, a form of Gnosticism, which taught that. But this is not Christ's teaching, for having spoken of the three steps of having given the word, having had the word received, and having had the disciples come to know certain things concerning himself because of it, the Lord went on to talk about the most important factor of all, namely, faith or belief. He concludes by saying, "And they believed that you sent me"

Faith is not blind trust, as we have seen from our study of knowledge. But it is not only knowledge either. Rather, it is a personal commitment based upon that knowledge but going beyond it in the sense that, having come to know the Lord Jesus Christ as God, the one who follows him is thereafter willing to follow him in areas about which he has quite limited knowledge or in which he has doubts. Faith like this involves action. So we often say that in the biblical sense faith is believing God as he is revealed in Jesus Christ and then acting upon it.

Who were they, these few disciples? They understood little of his teaching. True, they believed that he had come forth from God. On one occasion Peter affirmed, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). But even in the upper room on this very night, Philip asked Jesus, "Lord, show us the Father" (John 14:8), and Jesus had rebuked him, saying, "Don't you know me, Philip, even after I have been among you such a long time? Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father" (v. 9). They understood. But then again, they did not understand. At best they understood dimly.

Again, they obviously failed to understand the meaning and necessity of his death. He had tried to tell them. He had prophesied earlier in this week, "We are going up to Jerusalem... and the Son of Man will be betrayed to the chief priests and teachers of the law. They will condemn him to death and will hand him over to the Gentiles, who will mock him and spit on him, flog him and kill him. Three days later he will rise" (Mark 10:33-34). He taught that "even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (v. 45). But they missed this teaching. What is more, even after the resurrection they were missing it, for they asked, "Lord, are you at this time going to restore the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts 1:6), indicating that they were still thinking in terms of an earthly messianic reign.

Weakness? Poverty of understanding? Yes, but there was strength too. It was not their own. It was only the result of the words of Christ that had by now entered into them. But the words were within them. That is the point. Like a seed planted in fruitful ground, those words would sprout into the fullness of a fruitful spiritual life. They were alive—that is what we really want to say— spiritually alive. Therefore the Lord could be confident, saying, "They have received my words, they have known who I am, and they have believed on me as their Savior."

That is the experience of all God's elect. They may vary in understanding, courage, and many other things, but they have been touched by Jesus. They have his words, and they will inevitably continue to grow in the power of his life and be fruitful for him.

Chapter 211.
Prayer for Christ's Own Only

John 17:9-10

I do not doubt that there may be some limited sense in which Jesus prays for everyone. But whatever that may be, it is not what our text is speaking of. On the cross Christ prayed for his enemies: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34). But between that (or any prayer like it) and the prayer of John 17, there is a gap so vast that in another sense we may say that Christ's prayer is for his people only. Moreover, this is what he seems to teach in the words that actually begin the intercessory part of this chapter. He says, "I pray for them" thereby designating the disciples. "I am not praying for the world, but for those you have given me, for they are yours. All I have is yours, and all you have is mine. And glory has come to me through them" (vv. 9-10).

Spurgeon, with his usual eloquence, says rightly of these verses, "I remark that our Lord Jesus pleads for his own people. When he puts on his priestly breastplate, it is for the tribes whose names are there. When he presents the atoning sacrifice, it is for Israel whom God hath chosen." This is a reminder of the unique position in which believers stand to him and that they must not desecrate by disregard of spiritual things or by sin.

However, the most interesting thing about these verses is not that they are part of a prayer that is for Christ's own only. Rather it is that they tell, from the perspective of our divine Lord, why he prays for them as opposed to praying for others. There are three reasons. First, because they are the Father's. Second, because all that the Father has is also his. And third, because he is glorified in them.

Christ's First Reason

The first of Christ's reasons is that those for whom Jesus prays belong to the Father, and this means that Jesus values them simply because they are God's. We can find illustrations of this reasoning in our own experience wherever we have been entrusted with something that belongs to someone else and value it because it belongs to that person.

When I was working in Washington, D.C., for Christianity Today, friends whom my wife and I knew lent us their home for the summer. This was a great luxury for us, for we were just students at the time, and their home was in beautiful suburban Washington and had great trees and a large backyard with a garden. We valued the home because of our appreciation for those who had lent it to us. That summer we got busy in the garden on Saturday afternoons and in the late evenings. We mowed the grass. We dug up the garden. We trimmed the flower beds. We did our work so well that I think we dug up the bulbs that were in the garden. If a person can understand our appreciation for that house, he can understand how the Lord Jesus Christ values that which is his Father's, for what the Lord is saying in these verses is: "Father, I am praying for these persons because they are yours, and I am concerned for what is yours." This is wonderful for us and for others, for we are going to see, when we get to the end of this study, that it is also why we should value other Christians.

There is also a second thought involved in Christ's reason, for it is not only that we are valued by Christ because we belong to the Father. There is also the fact that we are valued by the Father. Hence, this also becomes part of Christ's argument. It is as though he says, "I pray for them because they are yours and you value them; therefore, your interest in them is as my own."

We would do well to go beyond the use of mere indefinite pronouns ("they" and "them") to put ourselves in Christ's sentence, for only then do we get the full force of it. It is as though Jesus said, "I pray for John Smith (Mary Jones, or whatever your name may be) because he or she is yours and because you value this one even as I do."

Though we have been given to the Lord Jesus Christ, as he says seven times in this chapter, the Father nevertheless has a continuing interest in us. Here we may use the illustration of the church as the bride of Christ.

We can imagine a father who gives his daughter to be married and then watches her go off with his son-in-law to a difficult field or work, perhaps in another country. The father is anxious to know how they are getting along, and the son-in-law is concerned with taking care of his wife, both for her sake and for that of her father. Suppose that things go badly for this young couple and that the son-in-law eventually writes back to the father at one point to say, "Father, I am sorry to have to write a letter like this, but business has gone poorly. I have suffered great financial losses. We are in jeopardy of losing our home, and I need some financial help." Do you not think that in circumstances like this the father would readily answer the request of his son-in-law (even if he did not care much for him and thought his business venture foolish) because of his concern for his daughter?

That is the kind of compassion that is involved here. So the argument goes, first that Jesus is interested in us because we belong to the Father, and second, that the Father himself is interested in us and values us because we are his possession.

Christ's Second Reason

Christ's second reason for praying for his own is found in the second half of verse 9 and in the first half of verse 10: "For they are yours. All I have is yours, and all you have is mine." What does this mean? It means that the Lord is speaking of an interest in us that the Father and the Son share jointly. It is as though, having said in the first instance, 'They are yours," he then acknowledges in the next breath, "but they are also mine; and furthermore, it has always been the case that everything that belongs to you as Father belongs also to me as Son, and that everything that belongs to me as Son belongs to you as Father." Jesus therefore comes, not pleading for a cause that is of interest to the Father only, or to himself only, but for that which is of interest to them jointly.

There is a second level on which we can consider this mutual interest. There is an interest between the Father and the Son. But there is also a mutual interest between the Father and the Son and ourselves. We see it in the way the pronouns are mixed up in the sentence: "they," "I,"

"mine," and "yours." They are literally thrown together. So we have a situation here in which we could say that those who are Christ's are wrapped up in the same ball of life with the Godhead and that the Lord prays for us accordingly.

This means that our concerns, however small, are God's concerns; and God's concerns, however noble and beyond our understanding, are our concerns also. The second half of this can be readily understood—God's concerns are ours in the sense that they are for our good and affect us, just as the decisions of a head of state might affect each citizen of his country. The first half— that our concerns, however small, are God's— is not so easy to understand. An illustration may help.

During the summer of the American Bicentennial, I visited the White House in Washington, D.C., as a representative of an informal group of pastors known as the National Presbyterian and Reformed Fellowship. We had drafted a paper on the spiritual roots of our country and on the need for renewal. We wanted to present it to the President. So the head of our group and I went to submit it. We did not get to see the President. Instead, we presented the paper to one of his deputies. But as we were passing through the basement floor of the White House on our way to the north lawn (where the official presentation was to be made), I became aware of the fact that much life in the White House goes on, on two levels. Up above were the important offices where decisions of state are reached. Below, where we were walking, were people much like ourselves with far less monumental concerns. Moreover, in case I might have missed this, just as we were walking through the lower passageways a volley of trumpets sounded suddenly, announcing the arrival of an ambassador. The soldiers who were on duty on the lower level snapped to attention. I thought, "Here are these soldiers, each with his own problems, going through the motions of a proper honor guard drill, while just a few feet away national affairs will be debated. Each of the two groups is unaware of the other's concerns."

In human affairs this is often so, and we would be surprised if it were any other way. We would be astonished if the President and his cabinet, or the President and the ambassadors, were to spend time looking out the window to the guards below and discuss their problems. "Do you think that guard's rifle is too heavy, Mr. President? Perhaps we should get him another one?" Or, "Mr. Ambassador, are you aware that Private Brown's wife (that's the third one from the left) is expecting a baby this June?" We would think that ludicrous. Yet the Father and Son, while not forgetting or neglecting the other great issues of the universe, are also involved in our concerns—no matter how small—because we are important to God.

Christ's Third Reason

Jesus gives a third reason for his prayer in the last half of verse 10. He says, "Not only do I pray for them because they are yours, and not only do I pray for them because we have a mutual interest in them. I also pray for them because I am glorified in them."

How is Jesus glorified in us? There are several answers. First, he is glorified in us by saving us. It is his doing, and the glory of it must rightly and inevitably go to him. Here Spurgeon has written wisely, "When the Lord lays hold upon a drunkard, a thief, an adulterer, when he arrests one who has been guilty of blasphemy, whose very heart is reeking with evil thoughts, when he picks up the far-off one, the abandoned, the dissolute, the fallen, as he often does, and when he says, 'These shall be mine; I will wash these in my blood; I will use these to speak my word,' oh, then, he is glorified in them! Read the lives of many great sinners who have afterwards become great saints, and you will see how they have tried to glorify him, not only she who washed his feet with her tears, but many another like her. Oh, how they have loved to praise him! Eyes have wept tears, lips have spoken words, but hearts have felt what neither eyes nor lips could speak, of adoring gratitude to him."

Second, Jesus is glorified by our trusting him in this life. Donald Grey Barnhouse was talking to a man about the gospel. The man said to him in the course of the conversation, "But what does God want. Just tell me, what does God want?" Barnhouse said that the answer came to him in a flash. He shot back: "What God wants most in all the world is to be believed. He wants to be trusted." Do you believe him? Do you trust him? Do you live as though you really trust this God who sent Jesus Christ to be your Savior? Do you trust the Savior himself? You do not trust him if you complain about circumstances. You do not trust him if you always worry about the future. You do not trust him if you are fretting over small disappointments every day. On the contrary, you trust him and thus glorify the Lord when you say, "I am his, and I will go his way. I am glad to let him have his way with me whatever the circumstances, whatever the sorrow."

Third, Jesus is glorified in his own people to the degree that we live a holy life. Holiness is the attribute of God most mentioned in the pages of the Word of God. To hear most people talk about God today you would think that the attribute most mentioned about him is love. But this is not true. To be sure, love is a wonderful attribute. It is all the more wonderful because we do not deserve it. There is nothing in us that could possibly call forth the love of God. Yet he loves. This makes the love of God particularly wonderful. But even with this wonder, it is not the attribute of God most mentioned in the Bible. The attribute most mentioned is holiness. So if we would glorify him, we must make his holiness known as, allowing him to work through us, we attempt to live upright and dedicated lives. If we live in spiritual adultery, compromising with the values of our society, if the priorities of our non-Christian culture become our priorities, we are not living in a way that glorifies him. But if, by contrast, the priorities of the Word of God seize upon us and we strive for holiness in our lives, then we do glorify him.

Fourth, we glorify the Lord by our confession of him before the world. It is important to believe on Christ as Savior and trust him. It is equally important to live a holy life. But in addition to this, we must also testify to his grace, simply because we are called to be witnesses and have something great to say.

Finally, we may glorify the Lord Jesus Christ by our efforts to extend his kingdom, that is, not just by our speech but also by our activity. Many Christians are lazy. They sit around and do nothing, content, as the hymn says, to be "carried to the skies on flow'ry beds of ease," while all around there are suffering people, lonely people, people who need compassion, help, and, above all, the gospel. We need to wake up the church of Jesus Christ. We need to wake up ourselves. We need to sense the calling of the Holy Spirit in the area of our service instead of enjoying our luxury, comfort, and time selfishly, as we so often do.

Prayer for Others

In this passage we see Jesus Christ praying for us and, as he does, giving the reasons for his intercession: because we belong to the Father, because he and the Father have a mutual interest in us, and because he is glorified in us. But it is not only the Lord who has a ministry of intercession; we have a ministry of intercession too. We are to pray for others, and the reasons why we are to pray for others are precisely the reasons Jesus gave when he explained why he prayed for us.

Why should you pray for your fellow Christian? First, you should pray for him or her because that one belongs to the Father and is valued by him. What belongs to the Father and is valued by him should be valued by you as well.

Second, you should pray for others because you have a mutual interest in them in the sense that all Christians are bound up in the life of God together. When the Lord calls an individual to faith in himself he calls him not to an individual relationship alone, but rather he calls him into the church. This might not be the way we would do it, but it is the way God does it. He takes people from every nation, race, culture, and academic level, and he puts them together into one body, the church, to show that the binding principle is the love of the Lord Jesus Christ within them and the power of the Holy Spirit. We are together in this, whether we like it or not. Therefore, we should pray for one another, because the success of the other is our success, and his or her failure is our failure.

Finally, we should pray for others because God is glorified in them. Could it be that you would prefer not to have God glorified in them? I think sometimes, when I hear of frictions that exist between certain Christians and between denominations, that this is precisely what some Christians wish. They do not like the other person or other denomination and hope that these others will do something horrible to show that they themselves are right in having taken the position they have. This is not right. Rather, God has called that one, whoever he is and in whatever circumstances he finds himself, in order that he might do something unique in him that he might bear a valued witness.

Chapter 212.
God's Perseverance with His Saints

John 17:11-12

There are many points in John's Gospel at which the great distinguishing doctrines of the Reformed faith are discussed, for it is "a right meaty Gospel," as one of the early Reformers stated, and therefore these doctrines are understandably found here.

They are in chapter 10, in which Christ's enemies asked him to speak more plainly, thereby implying that their failure to believe was due to his fuzziness in preaching. Jesus replied with the statement, 'You do not believe because you are not my sheep. My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (vv. 26-28). They wanted the gospel said plainly, so Jesus spoke plainly. Thus, these verses contain a statement of man's hopeless depravity through sin, God's electing grace in salvation, and his keeping power over his saints. The same doctrines are also found in chapter 6, for there Jesus pointed out: (1) no one can come to him unless the Father draws him (v. 44), (2) all whom the Father has given to Jesus will come to him (v. 37), and (3) none of those who come will be lost.

We would be surprised if these great truths did not also occur in Christ's great high priestly prayer recorded in chapter 17, for although they have already been stated, we would expect them to have a place (even a dominant place) in this most intimate prayer of our Lord to the Father for his own. Thus, we have, first, a clear distinction between those who are Christ's and those who are of the world. The implication is that the world cannot come to him for salvation and indeed does not. Second, he teaches that those who come are those who have been given to him by the Father. Third, he speaks of his own special ministry to them for which he is set apart. Fourth, he prays for all who shall come to him later as a result of the disciples' testimony, indicating that these shall believe. Finally, in the verses to which we come in this study, Jesus asks that they be kept by the Father and thus never be lost.

Here then are the great distinguishing doctrines of the Reformed faith again stated: (1) radical depravity, (2) election, (3) definite atonement, (4) irresistible grace, and (5) God's perseverance with his saints. Jesus expresses this last point by saying, "I will remain in the world no longer, but they are still in the world, and I am coming to you. Holy Father, protect them by the power of your name—the name you gave me—so that they may be one as we are one. While I was with them, I protected them and kept them safe by that name you gave me. None has been lost except the one doomed to destruction so that Scripture would be fulfilled" (vv. 11-12).

Christ's Second Petition

These words record Christ's second direct petition of this prayer. It is his first for his disciples. Earlier he had prayed for himself, asking that, having glorified the Father on earth by finishing the work that he had been given to do, he might in turn be glorified (vv. 1,5). Now he turns to others and intercedes for them. This prayer is for their safekeeping. The remaining petitions are for their sanctification (v. 17), unity (vv. 20-21), and eventual presence with him in heaven (v. 24).

As we look ahead to these other petitions, as well as to the one with which we are now to deal, we cannot fail to notice that they all refer to spiritual things. Marcus Rainsford, one of the most comprehensive commentators on this chapter, has noticed this and has written, "The Lord does not ask riches for them, or honors, or wordly influence, or great preferments, but he does most earnestly pray that they may be kept from evil, separated from the world, qualified for duty, and brought home safely to heaven. Soul prosperity is the best prosperity; and, in truth, all temporal prosperity, as it is so called, is only real when it is in proportion to the prosperity of the soul. Remember how the beloved disciple brings out this thought in his third epistle. 'Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth' (3 John 2). Soul prosperity is the index of true prosperity."

The Danger

We turn then to the second petition itself, the petition for God's safekeeping of the disciples, and the first thing we notice is the danger that calls forth this expression of concern from our Lord.

First, although Jesus was leaving to go to the Father, these were not leaving. In fact, they were to remain in the world. This is a serious and almost ominous note in an otherwise joyful and optimistic prayer. Moreover, there is a contrast between himself in the position he was soon to enjoy and these in their position. Rainsford puts it like this, "I come to thy presence where there is fullness of joy, and to 'thy right hand where there are pleasures for evermore.' 'I come'—to where the river of the water of life flows from the throne of God; but these, these are in the wilderness. 'I come'—where no enemy can follow me, where no temptation can assail me, where no weariness can distress me; but these, 'these are in the world.' 'I come'—to reap the trophies of my great victory. 'I come'—to grasp the scepter, to wear the crown, and to ascend the throne. I have been weary here, but I shall soon be weary no longer; the way has been rough and thorny, but it is all over, my haven is almost reached; yet these, 'these are in the world!'" We cannot miss the importance of this contrast.

Do we need an illustration? We find one in that story of the disciples' storm-tossed crossing of the Lake of Galilee. They had been sent across the sea while Jesus remained on the mountain to pray. But a storm had come, and he, looking down from the mountain, had seen their little boat buffeted and had come to them walking upon the water. Yes, he had come to them, but he had also deliberately permitted them to go through the period of struggle. Thus it is now. One day Christ will return for his own, but in the meantime we are in the world and he prays for us.

When he was here Jesus was their first and last line of defense. If they were threatened, he was there to receive the blows. If they were hated, he was there to allow that hate to be expended on himself. Now he was going, and the hate that had formerly been directed against himself would soon fall in equal fury upon the disciples.

Earlier he had warned them of it. He said, "Remember the words I spoke to you: 'No servant is greater than his master.' If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also. If they obeyed my teaching, they will obey yours also. They will treat you this way because of my name, for they do not know the One who sent me" (15:20-21).

Second, we notice that the disciples' danger was very great because apart from God's perseverance, they would surely be lost. This is the reason for Christ's mention of Judas at this point. We must not think, although our English translation seems to suggest it, that Judas is brought forward as an exception to God's perseverance with His saints, as though, for the sake of a prophecy, God consented to abandon Judas. This is not the case, for Judas was not one of Christ's originally. This is said elsewhere, and even this passage implies it. The phrase "son of perdition" is in the nominative case, rather than the genitive, which sets it off from the words "of them" which precede it. The true meaning is, "I have lost none of them whom you have given me, none at all. But the son of perdition is lost, as has been prophesied in Scripture." The reference is to Psalm 41:9. No, the case of Judas does not teach that a born-again person can be lost. But it does teach what would inevitably happen if God did not regenerate the individual and then keep in his care the one who has been so regenerated. If it were not for God, who could stand? Who could survive the onslaughts of the world if God did not keep us?

The Lord, Thy Keeper

But God does keep us. That is the point of these verses and the object of our Lord's petition.
While Jesus was here, he kept those whom God had entrusted to him, and he kept them well. None was lost. Now he is about to return to the Father, and therefore he recommits those whom he had cared for to the Father's keeping.

This theme occurs many times in the Old Testament, often in rich images. For example, in Psalm 121, the image is that of a divine watchman or protector. In that psalm the words "watches" or "watch over" occur five times.

Another important passage is Ezekiel 34:11-16. In the verses immediately before this, God has been speaking against those who had been the shepherds of Israel, that is, Israel's leaders. They had not done their work. Now, says God, I will myself be a good shepherd to them. "For this is what the Sovereign Lord says: I myself will search for my sheep and look after them. As a shepherd looks after his scattered flock when he is with them, so will I look after my sheep. I will rescue them from all the places where they were scattered on a day of clouds and darkness. I will bring them out from the nations and gather them from the countries, and I will bring them into their own land. I will tend them in a good pasture, and the mountain heights of Israel. I myself will tend my sheep and have them lie down, declares the Sovereign Lord. I will search for the lost and bring back the strays. I will bind up the injured and strengthen the weak, but the sleek and strong I will destroy. I will shepherd the flock with justice"

In Isaiah 27 God's keeping power is likened to the care of an husbandman for his vines. "Sing about a fruitful vineyard: I, the Lord, watch over it; I water it continually. I guard it day and night so that no one may harm it" (vv. 2-3).

These were the images upon which Jesus was drawing as he prayed for his people. Moreover, he had lived these images himself. We can hardly miss the fact that during the days of his incarnation he had been the watchman, the shepherd, and the husbandman. Now the disciples were to be committed to his Father—Israel's great watchman, shepherd, and husbandman. How could they be safer? True, the danger was great without. The danger was even great within, for they possessed an old nature that would surely drag them down into sin again and again. But over against this was One who was greater even than the danger. And he would keep them, even as he had promised to keep and actually did keep Israel.

"In Your Name"

There is one more point here that must not be lost. Three times in these verses Jesus speaks of keeping the disciples, once in reference to God and twice in reference to himself. But in two of these instances he also speaks more specifically of that by which they are kept. It is by God's name. In verse 11 we read, "Protect them by the power of your name—the name you gave me." In verse 12, we are told, "While I was with them, I protected them and kept them safe by that name you gave me."

What does it mean to be kept in God's name? We have already seen a partial answer to this question in our study of verse 6. There Jesus said that he had revealed God's name to those who had been given to him. We saw in studying that verse that "the name of God" is a Semitic phrase for speaking of God's attributes. To be protected by the name is therefore to be protected by the One who is sovereign, holy, all-knowing, wise, compassionate, and anything else that can properly be said of God. And there is more, for to be kept "in the name" is not merely to be kept by God, as if he were only some distant force that could be called in to defend us if that were necessary. It is rather that we are actually in him, much like being in a fortress. Thus, his power and other attributes surround us constantly. Proverbs 18:10 catches this exactly by saying, "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous run to it and are safe."

Indeed we are! Can anything touch us when we are safe in that fortress? Harry Ironside came from a background that caused him not always to be entirely happy with some of the distinguishing tenets of Calvinism, but he knew that the believer's security was with God and readily perceived it to be affirmed by these verses. He wrote, "You may be sure that whenever the Father gives any one to Jesus, he gives him for time and eternity. Such an one will never be lost. 'Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.' People call this the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, but I rather like to think of it as the perseverance of the Savior. He says, 'Those that Thou gavest me I have kept.' If I had to keep myself, I would be hopeless of getting through. I would be sure that something would happen some day which would cause me to lose my hold on Christ and be lost. But it is his hold upon me on which I rely. None can pluck the believer out of his hand. I receive great comfort from these words. When he gives his account to the Father, when the last believer of this dispensation is safely arrived in heaven, he will be able to say of the entire elect Church, 'Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost.' You may think you know of exceptions to this; but it will be made manifest in that day that these apparent exceptions were like Judas himself, never really born of God."

I like that, because Ironside had it right regardless of what terms he used. We are safe, not because of ourselves (for we are weak), but rather because we are kept by the Lord Jesus Christ and the Father.

God for Us

And what of us? How shall we react to these teachings? Some say that if we believe in God's keeping power with his saints, we will go out and sin. "Why not sin," they argue, "if we are sure to be saved anyway?" How little such people understand spiritual things! Do we feel free to sin, because God is for us? Of course not! Rather we choose to go his way and seek to please him because he, and only he, is for us. Who else is for us? No one! No one at all! The world is not for us. Satan is not for us. Even our friends are not for us when it gets right down to it, for all are for themselves in the final, grim analysis. Only God is for us. And lest we doubt it, we have the death of Christ on our behalf, the impartation of the Holy Spirit, and then the vast number of promises of God's perseverance, of which this is just one.

Shall we sin then? Not at all. Rather we will seek to please God. And what is more, we shall seek to persevere also, since we have learned perseverance from him. We will persevere in our work. It is often discouraging; we often see few results. But we will keep at it, for God has given it to us, and we must be like him in faithfully fulfilling this responsibility. We will persevere in our witness. Again we often find this disheartening. Men and women do not want the gospel. They hate the gospel, and they hate the God who gave it. Still, we will keep at it, knowing that the same God who is able to keep us in the world is able as well to save some out of it. He may use our witness as one means of doing so. Finally, we will persevere with our families. They are a special area of our responsibility, and we are often cast down when a son or daughter or wife or husband will not walk in God's way. Sometimes the situation seems hopeless. But it is not hopeless to God, and therefore we will not allow it to be hopeless for us. We will not give up. We will not quit. God is faithful. He is our keeper, and with God all things are possible.

Chapter 213.
The First Mark of the Church: Joy

John 17:13

What do you think should be the distinguishing marks of the church of Jesus Christ? Or, to put it in slightly different terms, what do you think should be its most important characteristic? I think that if that question were asked of me a number of years ago, I would have replied that the most important characteristic of the church is doctrinal faithfulness.

And after that I would have listed holiness, unity, and love. Well, I do not want for a moment to suggest that holiness, unity, and love are not important; they are. But I have been impressed, as I have studied the great seventeenth chapter of John, containing Christ's prayer for his church, that the characteristic of that church with which Jesus begins is joy. The prayer has three parts: a section dealing with Jesus himself, a section dealing with the disciples, and a final section dealing with those who were to follow them in faith. In other words, the prayer moves by stages from the Lord to the Lord's church. Verse 13, the verse to which we have now come, is halfway through the prayer; so it, not surprisingly, introduces this first characteristic. The others are: holiness (vv. 14-17), truth (v. 17), mission (v. 18), unity (vv. 21-23), and love (v. 26).

The Early Church

That most of us do not think of joy as a primary characteristic of the church probably indicates both how little we regard it and how far we have moved from the spirit of the early church, for if anything characterized the early church it is that it was a joyous assembly.

We see this immediately when we begin to study the subject of joy, for the New Testament is a book of joy. In the Greek language, in which the New Testament was written, the verb which means "to rejoice" or "be joyful" is chairein; it is found seventy-two times. The noun, which means 'joy," is chara; it occurs sixty times. Moreover, as we study these instances, we find that joy was not a technical idea, as if we were to find it only in highly theological passages. Rather it occurs most often simply as a greeting, meaning "Joy be with you!" To be sure, chairein is not always restricted to the speech of Christians. It is used, for example, in the letter to Felix about Paul by the Roman officer Claudius Lysias (Acts 23:26). But in Christian hands it obviously meant much more than it did with pagans and is used more frequently.

We notice, for example, that the angel who announced the birth of Jesus to the shepherds said, "I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all the people" (Luke 2:10). This obviously meant more than "Greetings!" Again, we notice Jesus saying, "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (John 15:11). The things he had spoken were great promises. So the joy in this verse relates to the fullness of the Christian life.

When the Jerusalem church sent a letter to the churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia after the first church council, they began their announcement of the momentous decision regarding gentile liberty from law by the word chairein—"Greetings" (Acts 15:23). James begins his letter in the same manner—"Greetings" (James 1:1). In Paul there are many such greetings. Thus, when in a letter literally flowing over with joy, the apostle wishes to give final admonitions to the Philippians, he writes, "Rejoice in the Lord always. I will say it again: Rejoice" (4:4). As Barclay says in his treatment of this term, "This great greeting, 'Joy be with you!' rings triumphantly through the pages of the New Testament."

Need for Joy

But is the church today joyful? Are Christians? I do not doubt for a moment that we are all far more joyful than we would be if we were not Christians, nor do I doubt there are places where joy is particularly evident. It is often very evident in new believers, for example. But across the board in most churches, if one were to observe them impartially week after week, I wonder if the joy that obviously characterized Jesus and the early church would be visible.

No doubt we think of joy as something that should characterize the church ideally and will doubtlessly characterize it in that day when we are gathered together around the throne of grace to sing God's glory. But here? Here it is often the case that there are sour looks, griping, long faces, and other manifestations of a fundamental inner misery. The story has often been told—I am sure it is a true one—of the church in Scotland in which someone had obviously been bored by the sermon and had begun doodling. He had started drawing pictures of the preacher and then had gone on to writing verses. When the service was over the janitor found this bit of doggerel:

To dwell above with saints I love, Aye, that will be glory!
To dwell below with saints I know, Now that's a different story.

That is the difference between what we profess and know we ought to be, and what we really are.

We should be joyful, but often we are not. We are depressed. Circumstances get us down. Instead of the victory we should experience, we know defeat and discouragement.

God's Remedy

Since I am certain that none of us wants to remain gloomy—at least I hope we do not—let us see what we can find as a remedy. Is there one? There must be; for if there were not, what would be the point of Christ's prayer for just this characteristic? That he does pray for it indicates that he was aware of the problem that we so easily develop. That he prays in the way he does indicates that, in addition to merely recognizing our need, he also knows the way by which our depression can be overcome.

The first remedy for a lack of joy is obvious, for it is on the surface of the text. Jesus says clearly, "I say these things while I am still in the world, so that they may have the full measure of my joy within them." This means that the basis for joy is sound doctrine. When I first began to handle this subject in connection with my exposition of the Book of Philippians, I was surprised to find how many times joy is associated with a mature knowledge of God's Word. David said, "The precepts of the LORD are right, giving joy to the heart" (Ps. 19:8). Psalm 119 reads, "I will rejoice in following your statutes as one rejoices in great riches" (v. 14). Earlier in these final discourses Jesus declared, "If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love, just as I have obeyed my Father's commands and remain in his love. I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (John 15:10-11).

Someone may remember that at the beginning of this study we denied that doctrine in itself was the most important mark of the church, and you may feel that we are now reintroducing it dishonestly through the back door. But this is not the case, for what we are talking about in this area is not doctrine in and of itself but rather that experiential knowledge of God's character and commandments that we receive from his Word.

It is rather, to put it in other language, what Francis W. Dixon has called the "establishing" of the hearts and minds of God's people. This particular phrasing of the matter occurred in an address by Dixon given at the great English Keswick in 1962, entitled "God's Happy People." It was based on Psalm 34:8, 22, which he translated, "Happy is the man that trusteth in him.... None of them that trust in him shall be unhappy." He made the point that happiness (his word) or joy (my word) consists in having settled all our thoughts on God, his dealings with us, and his purposes with and through us. So long as we are unsettled, we are in a quagmire of doubt and inner turmoil. When we are settled in our knowledge of God, his will, and his ways, we can trust him peacefully and joyfully whatever the circumstances.

Dixon gave a number of illustrations. One of them concerned the wife of C. T. Studd, the wellknown missionary to Africa. Mrs. Studd was an invalid and could not go with her husband when he returned to Africa for what proved to be the last time. As he left she knew that probably she would never see him again on this earth. She knew that she might have to face years of loneliness. But she did not complain; nor did she become cast down. Rather she said, "I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth." It was not easy for Mrs. Studd to rejoice in these circumstances, but she did. Dixon observed, "That is what I mean by having our thoughts established. Some Christians are only happy when everything pleases; when they can trace in some measure, or think they can trace, God's dealings with them. But others, like the psalmist, know that because he is their gracious and loving heavenly Father, who is planning their life for them, all things are working together for their good and for his glory; and so they praise the Lord and bless his holy Name at all times."

Another illustration concerned the hymn writer Fanny Crosby. Fanny Crosby went blind when she was just five years old, and she lived to be ninety-five—ninety years of blindness. Yet she did not complain. Instead, she resolved the problem at a very early age, for when she was just eight years old she wrote:

> Oh, what a happy soul am I! Although I cannot see,
> I am resolved that in this world Contented I shall be.
> How many blessings I enjoy That other people don't!
> To weep and sigh, because I'm blind, I cannot, and I won't.

Does someone say, "Oh, but that was easy for Miss Crosby; for she was just a child and probably didn't know how important sight was. My case is different. I am trying to support a large family on an inadequate income, and no matter how we try to save we never seem to have enough." Another says, "But you don't know my circumstances. I am thirty-two years old and unmarried. My parents are dead, and I am lonely. I don't know what I'll do if I have to go on this way for thirty or forty more years." Another says, "But I'm an invalid. I can't get about. My circumstances are so hard." If you are speaking this way, you are indicating your practical ignorance of the sovereignty of God and are confessing that your thoughts are not really settled in him. Instead of this, recognize that he has planned those circumstances and look for his purposes in them.

Let me say something about circumstances, which we often think are so bad. Circumstances refer to things that are without. The word itself is based on two Latin words: tircum, which means "around" (as in the word "circumference"), and stare, which means "to stand." So circumstances are the things that are standing around us. They are external. But where is the Lord in this picture? Is he without? No, he is within. It is a case of "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). So why worry about what is without if Christ is within? To know that he is within and that he is directing us moment by moment, day by day, is the secret of that supernatural joy that is our rightful birthmark as God's children.

Fellowship

The second remedy for a lack of joy in the believer's life is fellowship, and that in two dimensions. There is a vertical fellowship: fellowship with God. And there is a horizontal fellowship: fellowship with one another. Jesus is the pattern for us in both cases.

One thing we are going to notice as we continue our study of these six marks of the church is that Jesus is the pattern for each one. And that is certainly the case here; for he was joyful, even though we call him (rightly, but perhaps one-sidedly) "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." We know this from our text, because he speaks here, not just of "joy," but of "my joy." It is this that he holds out to us. What was his joy? Well, there was a future joy centered in the completion of his work upon the cross, for we are told that Jesus "for the joy set before him endured the cross" (Heb. 12:2). But that is not the joy referred to here. Instead, it is the joy of moment by moment contact and fellowship with the Father. This is what sustained him in this prayer and on the cross.

It will sustain us as well, if we will only enter into the reality of that fellowship. Do not say, "But that is for Jesus; he was the Son of God, and I am just I." Are we not also sons of God? Is it not Jesus himself who has taught this to us? He taught that we could be born into God's family (John 3:3, 7). He taught that God could become our Father (John 20:17). Paul, who knew this truth well, declared forcefully, "Because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out 'Abba, Father'" (Gal. 4:6). Clearly we are sons of God also. Therefore, we can enter into the joy of Christ even as he entered into it—by constant fellowship with the Father.

Moreover, we can enjoy it on the horizontal level also. In fact, we must enjoy it on the horizontal level, for fellowship with the Father and with one another always go together. We remember how John stated the relationship in the preface to his first letter. He wrote, "We proclaim to you what we have seen and heard, so that you also may have fellowship with us. And our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ. We write this to make our joy complete" (1 John 1:3-4). These verses indicate that fellowship with the Father and fellowship with other Christians go together. So if you are not joyful, it may be that you have cut yourself off from other Christians, perhaps even with the thought of establishing your own private fellowship with God. It does not work that way. You need other believers, and they need you. Without them your fellowship with God will be diminished and your joy will not be full.

Righteousness and Peace

There is one final part to God's remedy for lack of joy. It is that we must live holy lives, for sin will keep us from God, and the fellowship with him that we need will be broken. In John 17 this thought is suggested by the sequence of the verses, for immediately after speaking of our need for joy, Jesus goes on to speak of our need for holiness, adding, "Sanctify them by the truth" (v. 17). The same thing is suggested by Paul: "The kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14:17).

Many Christians lack the joy they ought rightly to have, because they do not have the peace about which Paul speaks. That is, they are not resting in God—the point first made about having our thoughts established in him. That is one reason. But it is also true that often they do not have joy because they do not have righteousness. They go their way, rather than God's. They disobey his commandments. They have their own way up to a point, but the Spirit's fruit evaporates. How much better to go God's way in holiness, to rest in him, and thus allow him to "fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him" (Rom. 15:13).

Chapter 214.
The Second Mark of the Church: Holiness

John 17:14-17

It may be the case—indeed it is, as I pointed out in the last chapter—that the first mark of the church is joy. But immediately after it, in fact, so close that it might rightly be thought to be competing for first place, is holiness. Holiness is the characteristic of God most mentioned in the pages of the Word of God and is therefore, rightly so, that which should characterize God's church. We are to be a "holy" people (1 Peter 2:9). We are to "follow after" holiness. Indeed, without it "no one will see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14). Jesus speaks of this characteristic of the church in our passage by praying—it is his second petition combined with the third—that God would keep it from the evil one. He says, "My prayer is not that you take them out of the world but that you protect them from the evil one. They are not of the world, even as I am not of it.
Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth"
(vv. 15-17).

What Is Holiness?

What is holiness? Some people have identified it with a culturally determined behavioral pattern and so have identified as holy those who do not gamble or smoke or drink or play cards or go to movies or do any of a large number of such things. But this approach betrays a basic misconception. Actually, although it may be the case that holiness in a particular Christian may result in abstinence from one or more of these things, the essence of holiness is not found there. Consequently, to insist on such things for the church is not to promote holiness but rather to promote legalism and hypocrisy. In some extreme forms it may even promote a false Christianity according to which men and women are justified before God on the basis of some supposedly ethical behavior.

Paul had found this to be true of the Israel of his day, as Jesus had also found it previously. So he distinguished clearly between this kind of holiness (the term he uses is "righteousness") and true holiness which comes from God and is always God-oriented. He said of Israel, "Since they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own, they did not submit to God's righteousness" (Rom. 10:3).

The biblical idea of holiness becomes clear when we consider words that are synonyms for it in the English language, namely "saint" or "sanctify." Christ uses the second one in verse 17. What is a saint? A saint is not a person who has achieved a certain level of goodness (which is, nevertheless, what most people think), but rather one who has been set apart to himself by God. It follows from this that in the Bible the word is therefore not restricted to a special class of Christians, still less a class that is established by the official action of an earthly ecclesiastical body. Rather, it is used of all Christians, as is particularly clear from Paul's use of the word in his epistles (cf. Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Phil. 1:1, etc.). The saints are the calledout ones who make up God's church.

The same idea is also present when, as in Exodus 40, the Bible refers to the sanctification of objects. In that chapter Moses is instructed to sanctify the altar and laver in the midst of the tabernacle. That is, he was to make saints of them. The chapter does not refer to any intrinsic change in the nature of the stones obviously—they are not made righteous. It merely indicates that they were to be set apart to a special use by God.

In the same way, Jesus prays just two verses farther on in this great seventeenth chapter of John, "I sanctify myself, that they too may be truly sanctified" (v. 19). The verse does not mean that Jesus makes himself more righteous, for he already was righteous. Instead it means that he separated himself to a special task, the task of providing salvation for all men by his death. If holiness is to be understood at all, it must be understood in this framework.

A Worldly Church

Now we need to ask this question. If holiness has to do with separation (or, better yet, consecration) and if believers are already holy by virtue of their being set apart to God by himself, why does Christ pray for our sanctification? Why pray for that which we already have? The answer is obviously that although we have been set apart to God we often clearly fail to live up to that calling. We are indeed separated unto God but, to paraphrase Wordsworth, it is nevertheless "trailing clouds of old commitments, sins and loyalties that we come."

We are worldly in the sense that the world's values often remain our values and the world's priorities our priorities. I once prepared a series of studies on "The Secular Church," by which I meant the worldly church. I pointed out that the impact of the world's system on the church may be seen in four crucial areas, the areas of the world's wisdom, the world's theology, the world's agenda, and the world's methods. Each is readily observable.

First of all, there is the matter of the world's wisdom. The old wisdom of the church, in every age and in every denomination, was the wisdom of the Scriptures. Christian people stood before the Word of God and confessed their own ignorance in spiritual things. They even confessed their inability to understand what is written in the Scriptures except by the grace of God through the ministry of the Holy Spirit who opens the Scriptures to us. Christian people confessed their resistance to spiritual things and the fact that, if left to ourselves, we always go our own way. But what has happened in our time is that this old wisdom, the strength of the church, has been set aside for other sources of wisdom with the result that the authoritative and reforming voice of God through the Scriptures is ignored.

Once I was taking part in a conference in which a theology professor disagreed with everything I had said. I had expected this from some source, of course, but the words this man used were so forceful they stuck in my mind. I had spoken of the historical Christ in rather moderate terms, I thought. But this professor violently disagreed with my position. He said, "We must understand that each of the Gospels was written to correct the other Gospels. So it is impossible to speak of the historical Christ." Then, since I had also said something about Jesus' return, he added, "We must get it into our heads that things are always going to continue as they are now and that Jesus Christ is never coming back." I knew what to think of that! Peter had warned long ago that in the last times scoffers would come saying, "All things continue as they were from the beginning," and he encouraged us to continue in the things we have learned. But I tell the story to illustrate the problem we have. It is secularism in the area of the church's wisdom.

Nor is this an isolated incident. A pastor told me that after he had spoken to a particular issue at one of his denominational meetings, another minister came up to him and demanded, "Why are you always talking about the Bible when you stand up to argue a point? Don't you know that nobody believes the Bible anymore?" Then, because he had referred to the apostle Paul on this occasion, his critic added, "After all, the apostle Paul was not infallible."

A rejection of the Scriptures as the wisdom of God has serious consequences. One result is that another authority, a poorer one, inevitably comes to take the Scripture's place. Men and women cannot operate without authority. So if you put out one authority, another will come in. If you reject the authority of God, human authority will emerge. The authority that we have in the large denominations today is the authority of the consensus of the people who make up that particular body. In other words, it is the authority of the 51 percent vote.

A second result of the church's abandonment of God's wisdom is that the church becomes irrelevant to life. This is being seen widely, and not just by evangelicals. A number of years ago, speaking at a meeting of the Consultation on Church Union in Denver, Peter Berger of Rutgers University criticized the lack of authority in the churches today which leads to their irrelevance. He argued, "If there is going to be a renaissance of religion, its bearers will not be people who have been falling all over each other to be 'relevant to modern man.'... Strong eruptions of religious faith have always been marked by the appearance of people with firm, unapologetic, often uncompromising convictions—that is, by types that are the very opposite from those presently engaged in the various 'relevance' operations. Put simply: Ages of faith are not marked by 'dialogue' but by proclamation." He then added, "I would affirm that the concern for the institutional structures of the church will be vain unless there is also a new conviction and a new authority in the Christian community."

Second, it is not only in the area of the world's wisdom that we are faced with secularism; we are also faced with it in the area of the world's theology. The world's theology is easy to define. It is the view that man is basically good, that no one is really lost, and that belief in Jesus is not necessary for salvation.

One consequence is that the theological terms that we have always used and which the church continues to use (because they are part of its heritage) are redefined. We still find people speaking of sin, salvation, faith, and many other biblical terms. But having adopted the world's theology, they no longer mean by these terms what evangelicals mean when they speak biblically. Thus, "sin" means, not rebellion against God and his righteous law, for which we are held accountable, but rather ignorance or the kind of oppression that is supposed to reside in social structures. Since sin is located in the system, the way to overcome it is clearly not by Jesus' death but rather by changing the structures through revolution.

In a similar way, 'Jesus" becomes, not the incarnate God who came to die for our salvation, but rather the pattern for creative living. We are to look to Jesus as an example, but not as the Savior. In some forms of this theology he is even considered to be what we might call the evolutionary peak of the race, a peak that we are all supposed to attain.

"Salvation" is defined, not as the old theology would say, as "getting right with God" or even "God moving to redeem us in Christ," but rather liberation from the oppression of this world's structures.

"Faith" is no longer believing God and taking his Word at face value, because his Word is not believed or taken at face value, but rather awareness of the situation as we see it. This approach is closely related to Marxism, because Marxists say that commitment to communism arises from becoming aware of oppression and beginning to do something about it.

"Evangelism" is also redefined. It no longer means carrying the gospel of Jesus Christ to a perishing world, but rather working to overthrow injustice.

The second result of adopting the world's theology is an apparent contradiction to what I have just said, but it is still true. It is a tendency to ignore theology entirely. This is seen primarily in the church's preoccupation with the world's agenda. In the third century of the Christian church this meant the concerns of the Roman Empire under Constantine. In the Middle Ages it meant the Crusades in which religious zeal was exploited in behalf of political expansionism. Today? Well, what is the world interested in? We are told that the world is concerned with problems of hunger; therefore, that should be a major concern for us too. The world is interested in the problems of Third World, underdeveloped countries. That should therefore be one of our primary concerns. The world is concerned with racism. So should we be. Ecology! The energy crisis! Aging! Alcoholism! Anything you can read about in the evening paper should be a primary concern of the church.

I do not want to deny for a moment that these are legitimate concerns. But what I want to deny emphatically is that they are the primary concerns of the church. For what happens when the church makes these items its primary concerns? First of all, she begins to look foolish in the eyes of the world, because the world knows that she is attempting to speak about something for which she has no particular competence. The offices of the church know no more about world hunger than the great relief agencies or government spokesmen. They probably know much less. Second, in emphasizing these other items as priorities, the church inevitably neglects that about which it really can speak, namely, the moral climate of our day and the remedy for it found in Jesus Christ. Worse than this, the moral climate of our country is endorsed in the sense of approving divorce, homosexuality, pornography, and other items.

Finally, secularism in the church is seen in the world's methods. God's methods are prayer and the power of the gospel, through which the Holy Spirit moves to turn God's people from their wicked ways and heal their land. That has always been the strength of the church of Jesus Christ. But today that power is despised by the great denominations. It is laughed at, because the methods that those laughing want to use are politics and money.

Years ago, when I was in college, I spent some time studying the plays of George Bernard Shaw, and I learned that one of Shaw's beliefs was that the religion of the future would be politics. The idea is in several of his plays. It is in Caesar and Cleopatra, for instance. Caesar is a religious figure in these terms. You find it most explicitly in Major Barbara. Barbara is a major in the Salvation Army, and she is converted in the play from Salvation Army religion to political activism. Politics is the new religion. This is what George Bernard Shaw, that old rebel, was saying years ago. But that is the philosophy of the church today: politics and money.

God's Church

The secularism of the church is bad, and I have taken space to describe it, first, because it is important to see how true worldliness works and, second, because we are going to be considering the cure for it at greater length in our study of the church's next distinguishing characteristic: truth. But we must notice the cure even now. Jesus makes it clear in his prayer by saying at the beginning of this section, "I have given them your word" (v. 14), and then again at the end, "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth" (v. 17). It is by means of the Bible, then, by the Word of God, that we are to become increasingly separated unto God and grow in practical holiness.

Without a regular, disciplined, and practical study of the Bible, the church will always be secular. It will fall into that state described by Paul when he warned that "there will be terrible times in the last days. People will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boastful, proud, abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy, without love, unforgiving, slanderous, without self-control, brutal, not lovers of the good, treacherous, rash, conceited, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God—having a form of godliness but denying its power" (2 Tim. 3:1-5). That is the secular church—"having a form of godliness but denying its power." On the other hand, by means of the Bible, God's people will become the opposite, for if the secular church employs the world's wisdom, the world's theology, the world's agenda, and the world's methods, the true church will invert it. It will employ the wisdom of God, the theology of the Scriptures, the agenda of God's written revelation, and the methods that have been given to us for our exercise in the church until the Lord Jesus Christ comes again.

Chapter 215.
The Church That Is Not Holy

John 17:14-17

We live in the midst of a divided church, but the division is not along the lines that are most talked about. Some say that there is a gap between laymen and clergy. I sometimes hear that the major division in the church is between those who believe in the mission of the church as evangelism and those who believe in the mission of the church as social action. I believe the real division lies between those who regard the church in purely secular terms and those who still regard the church as being based upon and as testifying to supernatural realities. The danger that confronts us, even as evangelicals, is that worldliness takes hold, and the concern for the biblical gospel and spiritual priorities vanishes. In theory evangelicals object to the secularism of the church, but in practice we often are quite secular ourselves. Therefore, when we point the finger at others (and we must do that rightly in order to uphold the teaching of the Word of God), we must, nevertheless, at the same time examine ourselves. In other words, we must pray as David did: "Search me... and... test me... and see if there is any offensive way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting" (Ps. 139:23-24).

Rampant Materialism

What are the areas in which the evangelical church, in spite of its theology, adopts the philosophy and outlook of the world? Where do we begin? The point at which it is necessary and obvious to begin is with our materialism.

Many persons point to this problem, and the fact that they do so should make us sit up and listen. World Vision magazine in its issue of January 1976, quoted a number of evangelical leaders who had been asked to write upon Western civilization and the mission of the church. Most of them, in one way or another, pointed a critical finger at our materialism. J. D. Douglas, editor of the New International Dictionary of the Christian Church and editor-at-large for Christianity Today, wrote: "Pervading our society is an even more insidious materialism which makes Christians short of breath through prosperity and ill-equipped to run the race that is set before them." Horace L. Fenton Jr., General Director of the Latin America Mission, wrote: "In the Western Church we ought to cut back immediately on all unnecessary expenditures—including the elaborate building programs which have obsessed us far too long. It is just as much a sin for a Church to lay up treasure on earth as it is for an individual Christian." Frank E. Gaebelein, Headmaster Emeritus of the Stony Brook School and General Editor of The Expositor's Bible Commentary, wrote: "Negatively the growing materialism in the more affluent western nations is detrimental to the total Christian discipleship essential to the faithful mission of the Church." Each of these men puts his finger on something that is not just a characteristic of our country or of the liberal church, but that is characteristic of evangelicals as well.

This is not a philosophical materialism. A philosophical materialism would be a materialism similar to that of communism. Evangelicals most certainly are not adopting materialism in that sense. As a matter of fact, there is even a negative argument that would go to this effect, namely, that because we are not Communists and Communists are materialistic, therefore we are not materialistic. But that does not necessarily follow. True, we do not have a philosophical materialism, but if we are honest we must admit that nevertheless we have a very practical materialism that is no less detrimental to the advance of the gospel in our age.

Francis Schaeffer analyzed our materialism rightly by saying that it is not so much the desire to be millionaires as it is to have two things: (1) personal peace and also (2) affluence to the degree necessary to enjoy our peace. Personal peace is the goal that causes us to say, "I don't really care much what is happening in the world so long as it doesn't bother me." The desire for affluence is not necessarily the desire to be a Rockefeller or an Astor but simply to have enough money to enjoy life to the full. That is the kind of materialism we have. And if our goals place both of these items high on our list of priorities, then we have an example in our own lives of the insidious encroachment of secularism.

If you are inclined to say defensively, as we naturally do, "But that's not true of me," let me put the question in this form: Is it true of you in respect to your desire for your children? What do you really want for your children, those of you who are parents? Is your first desire that they might be comfortable, that they might have a home, that they might be happily married? Is that what you put at the top of your list of priorities? If you do, this is materialism in every sense of the term. Rather, you should desire first that they might be men and women of God, obedient to his will and doing without those things that are necessary if his work is to be done.

This World's Fads

Second, we become secularized in that we so easily follow the fads of this world. I once had a conversation with Dr. Hudson Armerding, former president of Wheaton College. We were talking about the situation on the campuses, particularly of Christian schools, and I asked him what it was that bothered him most about our Christian campuses. He said, "It's the fact that the Christian campuses always seem to be following along behind the world; they have the same concerns, but it's always a year or two later." Then he spelled it out, noting that when the Vietnam war became a concern in the secular schools, it became a concern in the Christian schools too, but several years later. When ecology became the burning issue on the secular campuses, it also became a burning issue on the Christian campuses, but a year or two later. When women's liberation became the issue elsewhere, it also became the issue in the Christian world, but again some time later. What he was saying is that we have a case of the world leading the church rather than the church leading the world. And what is that if not the secularization of the evangelical community?

Let me speak about it in several other areas. We have a fadism in theology. We know, if we survey the Christian world, that we have a great emphasis upon psychological analyses in our time, upon small group dynamics, interaction groups, sensitivity sessions, and so on. But this has been popular first of all in the world through secular philosophy. Now it begins to enter the church in such a way that small interaction groups begin to replace the proclamation of the Word of God and a proper kind of Christian counseling. This is widely true in the secular church, and it is increasingly true in the evangelical churches, at least in recent years.

We have the same thing in liturgics. Liturgics has become a concern in the secular church, and because it is a concern there it has become a concern in the evangelical church too. So we have a great deal of experimentation in worship, which, unfortunately, in many instances is not worship at all. It has such an undefined content that it is virtually impossible to distinguish it from the revelings of hedonism.

We also see an example of fadism in universalism. Sometimes I have an opportunity to visit on Christian campuses, and when I do I ask about the mood and thinking of the student body. I have been told again and again that the one area in which Christian students today seem most to depart from historical Christianity is in adopting universalism, that is, the idea that all men everywhere, somehow or other, because of the grace of God, are going to be saved. Where does this idea come from? It most certainly does not come from the teaching of the Bible. Rather it comes from the secular outlook of our time. The world does not want to look at men and women as basically bad in God's sight, that is, as sinners in the eyes of a holy God, but rather as those who may have a few foibles, but who nevertheless are basically all right. That is not the teaching of the Bible. Yet it finds its way into our evangelical churches and schools.

We also find that the world's outlook is being adopted in regard to marriage. We have marriages breaking up at a rate that has never been true previously. And, as I observe it, it seems to me that the unique thing today is that the women are leaving the marriages, not the men. It used to be that a marriage would break up primarily because the man would be unfaithful. He would have an affair. That is not what is happening today. I can point to numerous cases where the wife has simply said, not on the grounds of infidelity but on the grounds of a lack of personal fulfillment, "I have had it; this is not meeting my needs," and then has walked out. Secular values, now given popularity through the women's liberation movement, have begun to impinge upon the thinking of Christian people. As a result, God's norms are abandoned and personal desires are sanctified in the name of biblical freedom.

Madison Avenue Religion

The third area in which we see secularism in our evangelical churches is our Madison Avenue approach to Christian commitment. We see this in certain forms of evangelism. I want to be very careful here, because obviously the greater problem in evangelism is not doing it at all. If through a method we are able to rally people to the cause of presenting the gospel of Jesus Christ to those who have not heard it, it is not altogether bad to do that, even if the method is faulty. But at the same time we have to recognize that secularism can enter in even here.

Sometimes Christians are required to memorize a certain stylized presentation of Christian truth.
This is something that in the hands of a person who understands the gospel well can be useful.
Certainly it helps to have thought through the kind of questions you might be asked and the answers that seem most helpful to most people. But to present the gospel in a rigid way, where the words are carefully chosen by a kind of popular opinion poll or analysis, is secularism.

We see the same thing in the way in which the gospel and Christian concerns are sold to our constituency; that is, through advertisements in our magazines, direct mail, and so on. It should be said, in defense of this, that it is often the case that this is the only way in which evangelical leaders seem to be able to awaken the concerns of Christian people. But the proper stance from the perspective of the individual is to be ahead of the appeal in one's own commitment as to how to use money. In other words, before the appeal comes, when you are before the Lord on your knees, ask how the resources that he has given you should be used and then determine to do that on the basis of the Lord's leading and not necessarily on the basis of the sentimental pictures that happen to be on the front of the brochure that comes in the mail about three weeks before Christmas. If we are to overcome this in our life, these are the practical lines upon which we are going to have to operate.

Indifference

Finally, we see secularism in the evangelical church in our great indifference. Indifference to what? The answer is: to practically anything and everything worthwhile. Let me spell it out. First, we are indifferent to the state of the lost. Indifference is the number one problem in recruiting missionaries and support for missionaries. Short-term projects are well received; but the number of those who would commit themselves to a lifetime of missionary endeavor for the sake of Christ and who would support such persons is dwindling.

Second, there is indifference to the suffering of the world's poor. We are often so isolated from the very poor in North America that we seldom see deep suffering face-to-face. We do not know what it is to see someone who is so hungry that he or she can hardly think of anything but food. So we are indifferent to these things.

We are also indifferent to the needs of our fellow believers. If there is anything we hear in the evangelical church today, it is that evangelicals do not want to listen to the hurts in the hearts and lives of other Christians. We do not want to be bothered. We do not want to hear these things because they are demanding; they require a response, and we are not prepared to make it. Instead we want to rest in our own personal peace and affluence, as I pointed out earlier, and we do not get involved.

There is indifference to the leadership vacuum in the churches. There is work to be done, but the hardest thing in Christian work is to find people who recognize the need and who will step into it and do what is necessary by the grace of God, faithfully, if necessary year after year and at great personal hardship. We do not have much of this commitment. I once was given a little poem on the role of the pastor; its conclusion was:

> Ashes to ashes, dust to dust;
> If the people won't do it, the pastor must.

But the problem is that the pastor cannot do it all. Moreover, if he is trying to do it all, a number of things, including the preaching of the Word of God, will be buried by the wayside. If people in the church are indifferent to obvious need and the pastor responds in their place, then the whole church suffers. Each one has a gift. Each one must be willing to use it to the glory of God.

The following question was asked of a number of officials in church circles recently: What is the number one problem in the evangelical church today? "Apathy," said an official of the National Association of Evangelicals. "Lack of discipline," said another. "Not caring enough," said someone who was involved in the Watergate scandal.

I conclude with this question: If these things are true of us, what should be done? The answer to that question comes from the words of the Lord Jesus Christ to the church at Laodicea, a church that he said was "increased in riches," like the church in America. He said, "You say, 'I am rich; I have acquired wealth and do not need a thing.' But you do not realize that you are wretched, pitiful, poor, blind and naked. I counsel you to buy from me gold refined in the fire, so you can become rich; and white clothes to wear, so you can cover your shameful nakedness; and salve to put on your eyes, so you can see. Those whom I love I rebuke and discipline. So be earnest, and repent" (Rev. 3:17-19).

The things that God counsels are these: first, "to buy from me gold refined in the fire." In Psalm 19:10 David uses the image of gold to refer to the Word of God, and in Psalm 12:6 he uses silver to refer to it. He does so because the Word of God is precious, of spiritual value. So what the Lord is admonishing us to do here is to master the Word of God by effort—that is the meaning of the word "buy," by effort, by hard work—in order that this which is the most precious thing on earth, the Word of God, might be ours in a personal way.

The second point of God's counsel is that we acquire "white clothes" to cover our shameful nakedness. Raiment refers to righteousness, and it is plural in this case: righteousnesses. What God is saying is that we should be clothed with acts of personal holiness. We should be zealous for good works.

Third, we must put "salve" on our own eyes so we can see. The counsel here is that we might desire afresh the healing of God's Spirit in order that we might see his truth and walk in it. That truth applies to us in our sin, to God in his holiness, to a world that is lost, and to a work that needs desperately to be done.

Chapter 216.
The Third Mark of the Church: Truth

John 17:17

In each of the previous discussions of the marks of the church we have touched upon the mark to which we now come, for both Christian joy and holiness depend almost entirely upon how well we know God's truth; that is, how well we know and practice the principles of God's written revelation. It is true that Jesus did not begin at this point in his comments in John 17; he began with joy and holiness. But when we ask, "How can I obtain and keep this joy?" or "How can I be holy?" we come to this point at once, for the answer is always, "Through a study of the Bible and the application of its truths to daily life. "Jesus indicates this in our text in regard to sanctification by saying, "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth" (John 17:17).

It is a striking thing, which we realize more and more as we grow in the Christian life, that nearly all that God does in the world today, he does by the Holy Spirit through the instrumentality of his written revelation. This is true of sanctification. Sanctification means to be set apart for God's use. So our text tells us that the only way this will ever happen to us is by an appropriation of God's truth as is recorded for us in the Bible.

So far as the truth goes, the world lives by an illusion, and this is an inevitable problem for us unless we have a sure way of countering and actually overturning its influence. Ray Stedman writes correctly of this problem when he says, "The world lives by what it thinks is truth, by values and standards which are worthless, but which the world esteems highly. Jesus said, 'What is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God' (Luke 16:15). That is how the world lives. And how can we live in that kind of a world—touch it and hear it, having it pouring into our ears and exposed to our eyes day and night, and not be conformed to its image and squeezed into its mold? The answer is, we must know the truth. We must know the world and life the way God sees it, the way it really is. We must know it so clearly and strongly that even while we're listening to these alluring lies we can brand them as lies and know that they are wrong." Stedman is saying that Christians should be the greatest of all realists, because their realism is that of the truth of God. This by its very nature should lead to their greater and greater sanctification.

Dead Ends to Holiness

If we are to receive the blessings God has for his church, we must receive them in the way God has planned to give them to us, and this means that there are many ways in which holiness will not come to us. It will not come through preaching or listening to preaching, for instance. Most of us know people who have specialized in Bible conferences and conventions to such a degree that they are fully aware of the points at which one speaker varies from another and even at times of what a speaker is going to say before he says it. One Bible teacher said that "they can readily foretell a speaker's third point while he is still in the midst of the second." But this alone does not produce holiness, as such people often testify. In fact, they are often quite restless and confess to a lack of true blessing in their lives. What is wrong? Simply, they are looking to men for their teaching, rather than to God. And when they do hear the Word of God, they hear it without that full yielding of the spirit to God's truth, which produces growth through obedience.

A second way in which we will not find holiness is through prayer or, still less, through prayer meetings. Prayer is important, and the Christian who is growing in the Christian life will inevitably find that times of prayer, both public and private, are increasingly precious to him or her. But however valuable prayer is, it is not the God-ordained means for growth in holiness. Prayer is preparation for such growth. But at what point in prayer does God actually speak to us and direct us in the way we should go? It is only when God the Holy Spirit brings the words of Scripture to our minds or directs us to the Bible for the direction we need. Apart from this corresponding reflection on the Word of God prayer is merely a monologue. As such, it may relieve our personal anxieties, but it does not provide direction. On the contrary, when we study the Word and pray over it, God leads us clearly and keeps us from the suggestions of Satan or the kinds of autosuggestion (or wish fulfillment) that all too frequently pass for divine guidance in the lives of some Christians.

Third, we must not expect to find holiness through a special experience, sometimes called a second blessing. There is nothing wrong with special experiences of God's grace; in fact, it is a strange Christian life that does not have many of them. But the error consists in supposing that sanctification will come through one, or even more than one, decisive experience. It does not work that way. Consequently, whenever you find yourself looking for an experience, you are always on the wrong track and in spiritual danger. Sanctification comes rather from seeking always and increasingly to have the Lord Jesus Christ exalted in our lives. And the way to do that is by discovering what he desires of us and for us in his Word.

At this point we are back to the central point of this message. Growth in holiness is through Bible study alone. Therefore, the third mark of the church must be God's truth.

Distinctly Different

We need to be very practical at this point, for in the preceding studies we talked frankly about how the secular church is characterized by the world's wisdom, the world's theology, the world's agenda, and the world's methods. The true church is not to be like that. But what does this mean practically? It means that the godly church must be distinctly, noticeably, and articulately different in each of these areas. This will involve individuals, for the church is made up of individuals. But it will also involve larger units—congregations, associations of congregations, and denominations.

First of all, we have to be clear as to what our authority is. One evidence of the secularism of the large denominations is that biblical authority, the authority of the Scriptures, has been thrown out and the authority of consensus has come in. Things are done in denominations today, not because the Bible says they should be done or even because the creeds say so, but because 51 percent of our people say so. If we are to be distinct in this area, we must do what we do because the Bible says so. We must be men and women of "the Book." In theory we are. We say that we are. We acknowledge that this is what our standard is. But much of the time, in practice, evangelical churches operate exactly the way other churches do.

We have to recover the biblical standard. This means that we cannot say, as I have heard evangelical men say on important issues, "Well, that particular thing just does not bother me." That response is not good enough. Instead, we have to get to what the Word of God says. We have to study it, do our homework, and then we must ask: On the basis of this Word, what does God want for the church in this age?

We will have to do that sooner or later anyway, or else we are going to have to go the world's way entirely. This is so because history does not allow us to stand long in an ambiguous position. Someone has pointed out that in Germany, in the Nazi period, the church went in one of two ways: either it capitulated to the Nazi point of view or it became increasingly a church of the Book. Those who lived by the Book eventually established a communion of their own. They signed documents identifying themselves as the "confessing church." Why did they go this way? They did so because, when the whole drift of society and the culture is contrary to biblical standards, it is impossible to appeal to any external norms. You cannot say, "This is backed up in the area of psychology or science or social relations," because it is not. The things that are being written in all those areas are contrary to biblical truth. So the church must increasingly fall back upon the divine revelation. Has God spoken to God's people in this Book? If so, then we must be clear and say, "Let God be true and every man a liar." Evangelical churches are going to have to recapture that outlook.

Second, we need to be distinct in our theology. This pays off, because where it is done those who hunger for the truth of the Word of God will come to it. We see the evidence in our seminaries today. Enrollment at the denominational seminaries, where there is often no clear theology and certainly not an evangelical theology, is declining. But enrollment at the evangelical seminaries is growing. Time magazine pointed this out in an article some years ago.

The thesis of a book by Dean M. Kelly, entitled Why Conservative Churches Are Growing, is that conservative churches are growing because they know where they stand and, therefore, people know where they stand and turn to them. But the same thesis applies to the seminaries. The seminaries grow for that reason too. They are an illustration of what we need in the area of theology.

We need to articulate the great biblical truths, not just adopt the theology of our culture. We need to speak of the depravity of man, of man in rebellion against God, so much so that there is no hope for him apart from God's grace. We need to speak of God's electing love, showing that God enters the life of the individual in grace by his Holy Spirit to quicken understanding and draw the rebellious will to himself. We must speak of perseverance, that God is able to keep and does keep those whom he so draws. All these doctrines and all the supporting doctrines that go with them need to be proclaimed.

Third, we have to be distinctly different in the area of our priorities. The denominations set their agenda. It is the world's agenda. We must say that our priorities are not going to be the world's priorities but the priorities of the Word of God. This does not mean that we will neglect social concerns. That is part of the priority of the Christian life. But it does mean that we will not reject the gospel of salvation through faith in the vicarious atonement of Christ either. And we will make the proclamation of this gospel our number one priority.

At the end of The Invaded Church Donald Bloesch talks about what evangelicals must do to change the world, and he says that what is needed is not simply an improved social environment but "a new kind of man." That is entirely right. That is what is needed. Then he goes on to give examples, and he gets into the area of racism and analyzes it like this: "For modern secular humanism, including Marxism, the poison of racism can be removed through social reform and education. Biblical Christianity sees this problem in a different light. The real enemy is racial and cultural pride, not ignorance. And behind this pride is unbelief, hardness of heart, what the Bible calls original sin.... Laws are necessary to protect the defenseless, but they can only hold the dike against sin. It is the gospel alone that takes away sin, and this means that the final solution to racism and other social ills is biblical evangelism."

We must be clear then, when we set our priorities, that this is where our emphasis goes—in time, money, and the choice of what we do and say.

A New Lifestyle

Fourth, we need to be distinctly different in the area of our lifestyle. This is something that evangelicals have not been too conscious of until fairly recent times, because we have lived in a culture that, although it is not Christian, has nevertheless held on in part to the vestiges of an earlier Christianity. This is disappearing. Laws are changing, and there is going to be more agitation to change in future days. When this comes Christians must be distinct in their lifestyle. We must say that we do not go with the trends of our times, the increasing secularization. Rather we must want to be known as God's people in these areas.

One of the priorities we must have concerns our time. Sports take an enormous amount of time in our day, by means of television and by our own participation. It is what many people do on weekends. There are evangelicals who find their time so taken up with sports that Christian activities are crowded out. Is that right? Is this not an area in which we have to say that the drift of our day is not in the direction we want to go?

A second area is the amount of time spent watching television. Statistics say that the average American watches television over five hours every day. Is the tube worth that time? The Bible says, "Make the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil" (Eph. 5:16). I wonder if many Christians are not missing out here and if the challenge of the age is not going to require us to sharpen up in this area.

How about the use of Sunday? I do not believe that we should have blue laws. I do not believe in proscribing what is proper and improper Sunday activity for anyone. But how do we use Sunday? Do we go to church? Do we want to worship God? Is sixty minutes, seventy or eighty minutes, on Sunday morning the whole of our Sunday commitment? Is it the total of the time we want to receive religious instruction?

I have noticed that the public schools are increasingly scheduling school events for Sunday, and this is having its effect on our children. Our schools have the rest of the week filled as full as they can reasonably expect to make it. So what do they do when they want to establish a new activity? There is a glee club, and they need people to sing. There are sports, and someone wants to get in an extra practice. There is an orchestra, and they need time to rehearse. They set it for Sunday morning. We are going to see more of that, and Christian people are going to be confronted with it again and again. Are these activities more important than having our children in church? We must ask that question. We cannot avoid it. Moreover, we must be Christian people at that point. Even if it means not getting ahead as much as we would like, even if it means not being as popular as we would like, even if it means that our children are not going to be as popular as we would like them to be. We must say, "But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Josh. 24:15).

When we do that we will have an influence upon the world. I know of cases where Christian parents have said to their children, "You are not allowed to do that on Sunday morning; we go to church at that hour." The children have gone to their teachers and have said, "We are sorry, but we can't participate; our family goes to church at that hour." And the teachers have said, "Oh, we didn't know anyone did that. All right, we'll change the hour." Victories can be won, but we must stand on our convictions.

Perhaps the most pressing area in which we have to be distinct is sexual ethics, particularly in our conception of marriage and the way we conduct our marriages. It is not easy to have a Christian marriage today. Everything in the world works against it. The great and overriding concern of our time is for personal satisfaction, and there is always that in marriage that does not seem personally satisfying. We wish things could be different. But the question is: What are we in the marriage for? Are we in it primarily for personal satisfaction? Or are we there because we believe God has brought us together with our spouse to establish a Christian home in which his truth can be raised high, Christian values demonstrated, and children raised in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? It must be the latter. Furthermore, in our speaking we must make clear distinction between marriages that are Christian marriages and marriages that are simply marriages in the world's sense.

Not long ago I saw a fictitious marriage service on television. I watch these because I am curious as to how the writers are going to handle the vows. The vows, as everyone knows, are Christian. I wondered: Will they use them because they are the traditional vows and they cannot avoid them, or will they doctor them up to make them more secular? In this particular marriage service the couple promised to "live with one another and cherish one another, as long as—" I thought they were going to say, "as long as life shall last." But do you know what they said? They said, "as long as love shall last." In other words, "As long as I love her I'll live with her; but if I stop loving her, that's the end of the marriage." It could be a year, a month, a week. That is the viewpoint of secular men and women. A Christian marriage is different. Thus, when we stand to take our vows, we must be made clear that they are for life —"until death us do part"—because that is what God wants. And we must live as Christians within the marriage bond.

Finally, we must be distinct in our use of money and other resources. How do we use our money? All of us have money we could use in the Lord's work. Do we thus use it? Are we faithful in that area? Some of us do not even give the Old Testament tithe, let alone our life and soul and all that we have to be used in the Lord's own way.

Dependence on God

I have given four areas in which we need to be distinctly different; the areas of authority, theology, priorities, and lifestyle. These correspond to the areas of secularization delineated earlier. But there is a fifth point we need to add. We need to be distinctly different in our visible dependence upon God.

When I was at the conferences I mentioned earlier, something happened that was very revealing. When I spoke about the lostness of men I got a negative reaction. No one wanted to hear that men and women are lost apart from the grace of God. But there was one doctrine that everyone seemed to agree with. It startled me. After I had spoken of the lostness of men, which they did not like, I stressed the grace of God in calling some to salvation. I said, "We cannot move men; we cannot change the world. If the world is to be changed it must be by God's doing, and for that we must pray and ask him." Surprisingly, they agreed with that just as much as they had disagreed with man's depravity! I began to analyze this, and I think I began to understand the reaction. It was because the people to whom I was talking were working in the social arena— trying to help alcoholics, serving those in the ghetto, looking for improvement. And what had happened? They had looked for improvement, but it had not come. So when I said that change had to be by the grace of God, their hearts said, "Amen." They did not like biblical theology, but they knew that the power of God is necessary if change is to come.

So there is a great opportunity for those who know the Lord to show that in dependence upon him changes will indeed come, not because of who we are, nor even because our theology is better, but because we know God and depend upon him.

Salt and Light

How can Christians change the world? The Lord Jesus Christ gave the answer in the Sermon on the Mount. He did not say that we are to maneuver the world. He did not say, "Get elected to high positions in the Roman Empire. See if you can get an evangelical to be emperor." It could happen, of course. He did not forbid it. But that is not the option he gave. He said, "You are the salt of the earth" (Matt. 5:13), 'You are the light of the world" (v. 14).

Salt does a great deal of good, but it does no good at all if it has lost its saltiness. It is only when it is salty that it is effective. So, if we are those in whom the Spirit of God has worked to call us to faith in Jesus Christ, we really must be Christ's people; and it should be evident that by his grace we are not what we were previously. Our values should not be the same values. Our commitments should not be the same commitments.

Our theology should not be the same theology. Rather, there must be a new element in us and, because of us, in the world.

We are also "light." If salt speaks of what we are, light speaks of what we do. The purpose of light is to shine, to shine out. The Lord said, "No one lights a candle and puts it under a basket. It is to be set up on a hill where all will see it." We are to be lighthouses in the midst of a dark world. Being a lighthouse will not change the rocky contours of the coast—the sin is still there; the perils of destruction still threaten men and women—but by God's grace the light can be a beacon that will bring the ships into a safe harbor. That is what it means to be set apart unto God, to be sanctified. We are to be a beacon, knowing that as we are there will be cause for rejoicing, and the evangelical church will be blessed by God and thanked by those who have found the Lord Jesus Christ through its witness.

Chapter 217.
The Fourth Mark of the Church: Mission

John 17:18-19

A number of years ago, when Ralph L. Keiper was preaching at a missions conference in Deerfield Street, New Jersey, he told about a little girl who had come to see him early in his ministry. She was about eight years old. She had been to the church's daily vacation Bible school, and when she came into his study she asked, "Mr. Keiper, is it all right if I commit suicide?"

The young pastor was startled. But he had learned never to give a quick yes or no answer to a child's question without first discovering why the child was asking the question. So he countered, "Mary, why would you ever want to commit suicide?"

"Well," Mary said, "it's because of what I learned in Bible school this morning."

Keiper wondered to himself, "What was this child told?"

She continued, "We were taught that heaven is a wonderful place—no fear, no crying, no fighting, just to be with the Lord. Won't that be wonderful! We were taught that when we die we will be with Jesus. Did I hear it right, Mr. Keiper?"

"Yes, you did, Mary. But why would you want to commit suicide?"

"Well," she said, "you have been in my home. You know my mother and daddy. They don't know Jesus. Many times they are drunk. So we have to get ourselves up in the morning, get our own breakfast and go to school with dirty clothes. The children make fun of us, and when we come home again we hear fighting and things that make us afraid. Why shouldn't I commit suicide? Wouldn't heaven be better?"

It is clear that Mary did not believe in theoretical theology; she believed in practical theology, and she was facing a very practical problem. What she was really asking was why we are in this world anyway. If this world is such a sin-cursed place and heaven is such a blessed place, why do we have to stay here? Why does God not take us to heaven immediately upon our conversion? Or, failing that, why do we not all take our own lives and so speed up what is an inevitable ending anyway? Keiper answered by saying, "Mary, there is only one reason in God's world why we are here. And that is that through our testimony, by life and by word, we might have the privilege of bringing people to the saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus." He then indicated that, as Mary did this, it might be in the Lord's providence that her parents would come to know the Lord as their Savior. Later, her mother did.

A Missionary Church

Keiper's story is important in light of the fourth mark of the church. Up to this point we have been talking about those things that concern the church itself or that concern individual Christians personally. We have been looking at joy, holiness, and truth. But while these are important and undoubtedly attainable to a large degree in this life, nevertheless it does not take much thinking to figure out that all three of them would be more quickly attained if we could be transported to heaven. Here we have joy; that is true. But what is this compared to the joy we will have when we see the source of our joy face-to-face? The Bible acknowledges this when it speaks of the blessedness of the redeemed saints, from whose eyes all tears shall be wiped away (Rev. 7:17; 21:4). Again, in this world we undoubtedly know a degree of sanctification. But what of that day when we shall be completely like him (1 John 3:2)? Or again, here we are able to assimilate some aspects of God's truth and know truly. But in the day of our final redemption we shall know fully. "Now we see but a poor reflection, as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face" (1 Cor. 13:12). If this is true, why should we not go to heaven immediately?

The answer is in the mark of the church to which we come now, for the church is not only to look inward and find joy, to look Christward and find sanctification, to look to the Scriptures and find truth. The church is also to look outward to the world and there find the object of her Godgiven mission. Moreover, it is for this (at least in part) that the other marks of the church are given.

In the World

Our text talks about mission, and the first thing it tells us about that mission is where it is to be conducted. The word "mission" comes from the Latin verb mitto, mittere, misi, missum, which means "to send" or "dispatch." A mission is a sending forth. But as soon as we know that we want to ask, "But to whom is the church sent? Where are we sent as Christian missionaries?" The answer is, into the world. Jesus says clearly, "As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world" (v. 18).

Here is why the evangelical church in America is not as much of a missionary church as it claims to be. We are not saying that the evangelical church does not support foreign missions. In fact, it has probably picked this task up at precisely the point at which the liberal denominations have been dropping it. The problem does not lie there. Rather it lies at the point of the evangelicals' personal withdrawal from the culture. Many seem afraid of their culture. Hence, they try to keep as far from the world as possible lest they be contaminated or polluted by it. They have developed their own subculture. As some Bible teachers have pointed out, it is possible, for example, to be born of Christian parents, grow up in that Christian family, have Christian friends, go to Christian schools and colleges, read Christian books, attend a Christian country club (known as a church), watch Christian movies, get Christian employment, be attended by a Christian doctor, and finally, one may suppose, die and be buried by a Christian undertaker on holy ground. But this is certainly not what Jesus meant when he spoke of his followers being "in the world."

What does it mean to be in the world as a Christian? It does not mean to be like the world; the marks of the church are to make the church different. It does not mean that we are to abandon Christian fellowship or our other basic Christian orientations. All it means is that we are to know non-Christians, befriend them, and enter into their lives in such a way that we begin to infect them with the gospel, rather than their infecting us with their worldliness, which is the wrong way around.

Many years ago now a young pastor in the Central American country of Guatemala went from seminary to a remote mountain area of the country known as Cabrican. Cabrican was unpopular, for it was located at an altitude of about 9,000 feet and consequently was nearly always damp and bone-piercing cold. The church he went to pastor was small, having only twenty-eight members, including two elders and two women deacons. These believers met together on most nights of the week, but they were not growing as a congregation. There was no outreach. So in his first messages to them the young pastor, whose name was Bernardo Calderon, said, "I know God cannot be satisfied with what we are doing." Then he challenged them to this program.

First, they abandoned all the many, dull meetings at the church, retaining only the Bible school hour on Sunday. In their place, home meetings were established. On Monday night they would meet in a home in one area of Cabrican, and all the believers would be invited. Moreover, as they made their way to this home they were to invite everyone they encountered, including those they passed on the streets. Since they came from different areas of the city and took different paths to get there this meant that quite a bit of the city was covered. On Tuesday night another home was chosen, and the same method was followed. Only this time, naturally, different paths were used as the twenty-eight members converged; different villagers were invited. So it was on Wednesday and Thursday and the other days of the week, as the church literally left its four small walls to go into the world with the gospel. Within four years that church had eight hundred members. Moreover, the next year a branch church was started, and within a few more years there were six churches in that area of Guatemala, two of which had nearly one thousand members. There was even an agricultural cooperative in which church members buy land for their own poor and buy and sell the produce their own people supply.

The other story is also of a mission to the world in Guatemala, told to me by Mardoqueo Munos of the Central Church in Guatemala City. A young pastor went to the country's coastal plains, where the people are literally worked to death during the eleven months of the year that are the growing season, but where they have one month with nearly nothing to do between the end of one growing season and the beginning of the next. This church decided to use this month for evangelism.

Some time before the beginning of this period each year, teams of two or three people would be sent out into neighboring villages to investigate the state of the Christian witness in those villages. If the town had a strong church, they reported that it was taken care of. If not, they recommended it as one village to which their church could take the gospel. From these reports one village was selected. Then when the month of vacation came the entire mother church— pastor, elders, deacons, Sunday school teachers, husbands, wives, children, everyone —simply moved to the area of the target village and set up housekeeping. For the next weeks the members went from door to door throughout the entire village witnessing; the elders and deacons sought out a piece of property on which a church could be erected and bought it; the young people went to the nearby rain forests to cut down trees from which a simple church could be constructed. Finally, they placed their converts in the new church, commissioned the most promising convert as pastor, and then went home leaving the new church to disciple its members and multiply its witness on its own. Unorthodox? Yes, even for Guatemala! But it was a successful strategy for that area. For in the eleven years that the young pastor has been in the plains area, eleven churches have been established; and some, including the mother church, have grown to nearly 1,000 members.

The point I am making is that these two churches were not content to carry on in a Christian subculture but rather knew that their mission was the world and that they were in the world to carry out that mission. For us this may simply mean getting to know our neighbors better or infiltrating those with whom we work with the gospel. Again it may mean a whole new approach to our church's outreach or that of our denomination.

To Be As Christ

The second thing the text talks about is the nature or character of the ones who are to conduct this mission, which means our nature or character as Christian people. The point here is that we are to be as Christ in the world. This is made clear in verses 18 and 19, for Jesus compares the disciples to himself both in the area of his having been sent into the world by the Father and of his being sanctified or set apart totally to that work. He says, "As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world. For them I sanctify myself, that they too may be truly sanctified." In other words, we are to be in our mission as Jesus was in his mission. We are to be like the One whom we are presenting.

Here may be our second problem as far as the mission of the evangelical church is concerned. Let me illustrate by another story told by Ralph Keiper. Quite a few years ago, before Weight Watchers, there was a product for those who were overweight called "Weight Right," and Mrs.

Keiper was trying to sell it. She was not successful. On one occasion she came to her husband and asked, "Darling, why do you think I'm not able to sell this product?"

Keiper looked at it. He saw that it was well packaged; in fact, it was very attractive. He said, "Let me hear your speech." This was good too, for Mrs. Keiper was filled with enthusiasm. "May I see the brochure?" he asked. She gave it to him, and as he was looking at it he said, "Oh, oh!"

"Why are you saying 'Oh, oh!' at a time like this?" she asked. He said, "Shall I be polite or truthful?"

"Truthful, of course."

"Well, dear," Keiper answered, "you look like the picture before, not the picture after."

Perhaps that is our problem. We are tying to sell a product, but although the product is excellent and our pitch may be well done, the world can see that we are not using what we are selling. If we were, we would be more like Jesus. Are you like Jesus? Are you as he was in this world?

Perhaps you are saying, "I do not know if I am like Jesus or not. In what areas should I be like him?" Obviously we are to be like him in every way. But in trying to answer briefly we can hardly do better than point out that we are to be like him in precisely these marks of the church that he is citing. Earlier I pointed out that Jesus is our pattern in each case. Certainly we need to remember that here. In other words, as his life was characterized by joy, so is our life to be characterized by joy. As he was sanctified, so are we to be sanctified. As he was characterized by truth, so are we to be. So also are we to be united, as his body on earth, and to be filled with his love both to one another and to a perishing world.

We can readily see how each of these characteristics is important. First, there is joy. This is important because, if we do not have joy, we can hardly commend the "good news" of salvation to anyone. Someone once said to Hannah Whitall Smith, author of The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life, "You Christians seem to have a religion that makes you miserable. You are like a man with a headache. He does not want to get rid of his head, but it hurts him to keep it. You cannot expect outsiders to seek very earnestly for anything so uncomfortable." This is true. So rather than being miserable all the time, we ought to find ourselves becoming increasingly like Jesus who, I am convinced, was the best of company and a joy to be with. Moreover, our joy should be contagious and unending. A former archbishop of Canterbury, Geoffrey Fisher, is reported to have said just before he died, "The longer I live the more convinced I am that Christianity is one long shout of joy."

Second, we must have holiness or sanctification. In fact, it is this that Jesus most emphasizes in our text. He says, "For them I sanctify myself, that they too may be truly sanctified" (v. 19). In what sense was Jesus sanctified? As we saw earlier, he was sanctified in the sense of being set apart totally for the work God had given him to do, the work of dying for our salvation. The parallel in our case is to be set apart totally for the work we have been given to do, which is the work of carrying the gospel of the crucified but risen Christ to all men everywhere. If we do not do this, or if we are halfhearted about it, the world will know it and will hardly consider our message to be earth-shattering.

The third area is truth, by which we are concerned both with our message and with our wholehearted commitment to it as a way of life. Jesus was committed to the truth of God and he was "the truth" (John 14:6). In the same way, we should be based firmly upon this rock and should live by it to such a degree that the world will point to us and say, "Those people are certainly characterized by the truth they claim to preach."

If this is not the case, we will not win anyone, for the world will hardly be attracted to a church that does not seem to know even its own mind on religious matters. There was once an essay by Leo Rosten in the Saturday Review and World, in which Rosten quoted a number of revealing statistics (July 12, 1976). A recent poll had shown that 75 percent of the American people think that "religion is losing its influence." Another showed that only 50 percent of Roman Catholics attend church during an average week, a significant drop. Only 37 percent of Protestants attend. The Protestant figure used to be up around 50 percent. Then, having given a few more statistics such as this, Rosten declared, "I cannot help concluding that the fortresses of faith are experiencing the most profound alterations in centuries. Church authority is being challenged on a dozen fronts.... It is not hyperbole to say that we are witnessing a remarkable erosion of consensus within the citadel of belief." That is true, of course, so we are hardly surprised to learn that the churches are losing members and that the church's missionary effort is being increasingly curtailed.

Next, we are to be like the Lord Jesus Christ in our unity. In fact, this is precisely the way in which Jesus introduces the subject in the next verses of the prayer, for he goes on to pray, "that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me" (v. 21). The world is fractured in a million ways. It is the logical outcome of the work of Satan, one of whose most revealing names is the disrupter (diabolos). If Christians would win the world, they must show a genuine unity that is in itself desirable and winsome and that at the same time points to the unity within the Godhead, which is its source.

Finally, the church must be marked by love, if it is to be as Christ in the world. Jesus loved the world. It was out of love for it that he died. Consequently, if we would win the world, we must love the world too—not the world's system or sin, of course, but rather those who are in it.

Once my family was eating in a restaurant, and my youngest daughter knocked over her glass of coke for about the thousandth time. I was visibly annoyed as I always was (since we never seemed to get through a meal without the identical accident). But we cleaned up and shortly after that left the restaurant. My daughter walked along in silence for a while; but then she said, "You really hate it when we spill our cokes, don't you?" I replied that I certainly did. She looked serious, but then she brightened up as if a particularly happy thought had just passed through her mind. She threw her arms around me in a big hug and added, "But you love me!"

She knew the difference between love of the sinner and hatred of the sin. And so will we if we look to Jesus. We must be like him in love, knowing that if we are, the world will see it and be drawn to him.

Drawn by God

How will they be drawn? By God, of course, for however much and however carefully we strive to actually show forth the character of the Lord Jesus Christ in the world, it is still he and not we ourselves who must move men and women to turn to him for salvation. The description of the early church in Jerusalem, recorded in Acts 2, gives us an indication of this, for having told us that these early believers "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching [that is, the truth] and to the fellowship [that is, unity], to the breaking of bread and to prayer [which suggests true worship leading to sanctification or holiness]" and "selling their possessions and goods, they gave to anyone as he had need [an evidence of their deep and unique love] and that "every day they continued to meet together in the temple courts. They broke bread in their homes and ate together with glad and sincere hearts, praising God and enjoying the favor of all the people," it adds as a result, "the Lord added to their number daily those who were being saved" (Acts 2:42, 45-47). The Lord did it! And he will do it for us as we accept that task for which we have been sent into the world and live like him.

Chapter 218.
The Fifth Mark of the Church: Unity

John 17:20-23

Considering all the divisions that have plagued Christendom for two thousand years, it is amazing that God has continued to use the church to extend his kingdom."

This statement by John White, an InterVarsity Christian Fellowship worker and writer, introduces us to the subject of Christian unity in two important ways: first, by portraying the unfortunate lack of unity that has plagued the church throughout its history and, second, by suggesting why Jesus asked that the church might be marked by unity at this particular point in his high priestly petition. The divisions that exist today are too obvious to need comment. They lie both on the surface and within. Battles rage. Highly praised church mergers not only fail to heal these divisions but also usually lead to further breakups involving those who do not like the new union. So far as Christ's reasons for praying for unity go, it is simply that he foresaw these differences and so asked for that great unity that should exist among his own in spite of them.

Another way of pointing to Christ's interests is to note that all the marks of the church concern the Christian's relationship to some thing or some person and that unity is to be the mark of the church in the relationships that exist between its members. Joy is the mark of the Christian in relationship to himself. Holiness is the mark in relationship to God. Truth is the mark in his relationship to the Bible. Mission is the mark in his relationship to the world. In this mark, unity, and the last, love, which in some sense summarizes them all, we deal with the Christian's relationship to all who are likewise God's children.

What Kind of Unity?

But what kind of unity is this to be? This is an important preliminary question, for if the unity is to be an organizational unity, then our efforts to achieve and express it will be in one direction while, if it is to be a more subjective unity, our efforts will be expended differently.

One thing for sure—the church is not to be is a great organizational unity, for whatever advantages or disadvantages may be involved in massive organizational unity, this in itself obviously does not produce the results Christ prayed for, nor does it solve the church's other great problems. Moreover, it has been tried and found wanting. In the early days of the church there was much vitality and growth but little organizational unity. Later, as the church came to favor under Constantine and his successors, the church increasingly centralized until during the Middle Ages there was literally one united ecclesiastical body covering all Europe. But was this a great age? Was there a deep unity of faith? Did men and women find themselves increasingly drawn to this faith and come to confess Jesus Christ to be their Savior and Lord (for that is what Christ promised, namely, that if the church were one, men and women would believe on him)? Not at all! On the contrary, the world believed the opposite. Spurgeon once wrote, "The world was persuaded that God had nothing to do with that great crushing, tyrannous, superstitious, ignorant thing which called itself Christianity; and thinking men became infidels, and it was the hardest possible thing to find a genuine intelligent believer north, south, east, or west."

Certainly there is something to be said for some form of outward, visible unity (at least in most situations). But it is equally certain that this type of unity is not what we most need, nor is it that for which the Lord prayed.

Another type of unity that we do not need is conformity, that is, an approach to the church that would make everyone alike. Here we probably come closest to the error of the evangelical church, for if the liberal church for the most part strives for an organizational unity—through the various councils of churches, the Consultation on Church Union, denominational mergers, and so forth—the evangelical church for its part seems to strive for an identical pattern of looks and behavior among its members. This is not what Jesus is looking for in this prayer. On the contrary, there should be the greatest diversity among Christians, diversity of personality, interests, lifestyle, and even methods of Christian work and evangelism. This should make the church interesting, not dull. Uniformity is dull, like rows upon rows of Wheaties boxes. Variety is exciting! It is the variety of nature and the character and actions of our God.

But if the unity for which Jesus prayed is not an organizational unity or a unity achieved by conformity, what kind of unity is it? The answer is that it is a unity parallel to the unity that exists within the Godhead; for Jesus speaks of it in these terms—"that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you... I in them, and you in me. May they be brought to complete unity" (vv. 21, 23). This means that the church is to have a spiritual unity involving the basic orientation, desires, and will of those participating. Paul points to this true unity in writing to the Corinthians, saying, "There are different kinds of gifts, but the same Spirit. There are different kinds of service, but the same Lord. There are different kinds of working, but the same God works all of them in all men" (1 Cor. 12:4-6).

This is not to say that all believers actually enter into this unity as they should. Otherwise, why would Christ pray for it? The actual case is that, like the other marks of the church already considered, unity is something given to the church but also something for which the body of true believers should strive. There is a sense in which we already are one in Christ. But there is also a sense in which we must achieve that unity.

Brothers and Sisters

Here we are helped by the various images used of the church throughout the New Testament, one of the most valuable being that of the family. Christians belong to the family of God, and therefore they are rightly brothers and sisters of one another.

The unique characteristic of this image is that it speaks of relationships and therefore of the commitments that the individuals must have to one another. The relationships are based upon what God has done. Salvation is described in the verses that use this image as God begetting spiritual children, who are therefore made members of his spiritual family through his choice and not through their own. John even says this explicitly in the preface to his Gospel, when he writes of our having become children of God "not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God" (1:13). There is a tendency in the world to talk about all men and women as brothers and sisters, but while this is true in a certain humanitarian sense it is nevertheless not what the Bible is talking about when it speaks of Christian brotherhood.

This is something that God has intervened to establish among his own regenerated children.

This fact has two important consequences. First, if the family to which we belong has been established by God, then we have no choice as to who will be in it or whether or not we will be his or her sister or brother. On the contrary, the relationship simply exists, and we must be brotherly to the other Christian, whether we want to be or not.

The second consequence is related to this, simply that we must be committed to each other in tangible ways. We must be committed to helping each other, for example, for we all need help at times, and this is one clear way in which the special bond among believers can be shown to the watching world. A number of years ago I walked into the bathroom in our home and found one of my children sitting on the floor with a large pile of unrolled toilet paper beside her. She had been spinning the roll and watching it pile up in intricate patterned layers as it settled. I took one look at her and said, with a note of astonishment in my voice, "What in the world are you doing?"

"I'm unrolling the toilet paper," she answered. There was no questioning the truthfulness of that.

"Why are you being naughty?" I countered.

She said, "Nobody helps me to be good." I suspect that her answer was a carefully worded excuse (and also not nearly so truthful as her first statement.) But whatever her reasons, the statement did at least point to a true need. We do need help as Christians, and we need it from Christians. Moreover, we must be ready to give help, just as we would to a needy member of our own human family.

A Fellowship

The second important image used to portray the unity of the church of Christ is a fellowship, which the New Testament normally indicates by the Greek word koinonia. Unfortunately, neither the word "fellowship" nor the word koinonia is very helpful in conveying what we mean. This is because the English word commonly means only a loose collection of friends, and the Greek word has become something of a theological cliche. Actually, the word has to do with sharing something or having something in common. The common Greek of the New Testament period is called Koine Greek. Partners, as those who hold property in common or share in a business, are koinonoi. In spiritual terms koinonia, or fellowship, is had by those who share a common Christian experience of the gospel. In this respect the New Testament speaks often of our fellowship with the Father (1 John 1:3), with the Son (1 Cor. 1:9), which is sometimes described as a fellowship in the blood and body of Christ (1 Cor. 10:16), and with the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14). This obviously involves the totality of our experience of God's grace.

But fellowship is not only defined in terms of what we share in together. It also involves what we share out together. And this means that it must involve a community in which Christians actually share their thoughts and lives with one another.

How is this to be done practically? It will probably be done in different ways in different congregations depending upon local situations and needs. Some churches are small and therefore will have an easier time establishing times of sharing. Here church suppers, work projects, and other such efforts will help. Larger churches will have to break their numbers down into smaller groups in various ways. At Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which I serve as pastor, we have tried to do this in three ways simultaneously. First, we have tried to divide the congregation according to age levels. Thus we have a fully graded Sunday school, and on the upper levels we have tried to establish groups for college students, postcollege students, young couples, other adult classes, and meetings for senior citizens. Part of this is an adult elective program. Second, we have tried to divide the congregation geographically. Tenth Church members come from a large and scattered metropolitan area. Some of them drive twenty, thirty, or more miles to get there. Midweek meetings at the church are impractical for most. Therefore we have established area Bible studies, where people can meet weekly with those in their area. They meet to study the Bible, share concerns, and pray together. These area groups are probably the least structured but also the most profitable of all the church activities. Finally, we have also begun to divide the church according to professional interests. In this area there are regular meetings by groups of artists, musicians (we have a chamber orchestra), medical students and nurses, and ministerial candidates and young pastors.

My own experience in this area conforms to that of John R. W. Stott, who experimented with similar groups in his own London parish. He has written on the grounds of his experience, "The value of the small group is that it can become a community of related persons; and in it the benefit of personal relatedness cannot be missed, nor its challenge evaded. ...I do not think it is an exaggeration to say, therefore, that small groups, Christian family or fellowship groups, are indispensable for our growth into spiritual maturity."

Once again, this is an area in which Christian unity can become a visible and practical thing, and its unique and desirable qualities can be made known to the world.

The Body

The third important image used to stress the unity of the church is the body. Clearly, this image has many important connotations. It speaks of the nature of the Christian union—one part of the body simply cannot survive if it is separated from the whole. It speaks of interdependence. It even suggests a kind of subordination involving a diversity of function; for the hand is not the foot, nor the foot the eye, and over all is the head which is Christ. Paul speaks of this in 1 Corinthians saying, "The body is a unit, though it is made up of many parts; and though all its parts are many, they form one body. So it is with Christ. For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body—whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free—and we were all given the one Spirit to drink. Now the body is not made up of one part but of many" (12:12-14).

However, the one function of the body that is unique to this image is service, for just as the family emphasizes relationships, and fellowships emphasizes sharing, so does the body emphasize work. The body exists to do something and, since we are talking about unity, we must stress that it exists to enable us to do this work together.

In the book from which I quoted earlier, Stott speaks of this service flowing out of the small groups that his church emphasizes. "It must be admitted that several have been unsuccessful— through lack of time or of enterprise," he writes. "Others, however, have offered their practical services as a group.... Certainly without some such common concern and service, the fellowship of any Christian group is maimed."

Your Part

The question we end with is simply: What is to be your part in this area? What will you do? Obviously you cannot change the whole church, but, as one writer puts it, "You can begin in your own life to be an answer to the high priestly prayer of Christ. You can become a small focus of change." First, you can become aware of that great family, fellowship, and body to which you already belong, and you can thank God for it. Second, you can join a small group, where the reality of Christian unity is most readily seen and experienced. Third, you can work with that group to show forth Christian love and give service. If you are willing to do that, you will find God to be with you, and you will be overwhelmed at the power with which he works both in you and in others whom he will be drawing to faith.

But perhaps you are not a part of that family, the family of God, in the first place. You may be a Baptist, a Presbyterian, a Roman Catholic, a Pentecostal. But you have never been born into God's family. If so, do not let pride of denomination (or of anything else) keep you from the reality of Christianity. Run to Jesus and enter in through him, the only true door.

Chapter 219.
Impartial Love

John 17:23

We pause in our study of the marks of the church presented in John 17 to deal with a most extraordinary sentence. The sentence is the last part of verse 23: "You... have loved them even as you have loved me." It means that God's love for us is in the same measure and is exercised in the same way as his love for Christ. There have been attempts to avoid this meaning, no doubt because it is so tremendous. Some have treated the sentence casually, as though it were saying, "You have loved them because you love me." Others have seen it in terms of the mystical union of believers with Christ, as though we are loved as Christ only because we are actually in Christ. These statements are true, but they miss the full force of the sentence because they do not take the key word at full value. That word is kathōs, which means "just as" or "to the same degree that." Thus, we are told that God loves those who are Christ's to the same degree and in the same way that he loves Christ.

This is extraordinary, for none of us loves like that, and even though it is true that God can love like that, to claim that he does would be presumptuous and arrogant were it not that he himself tells us so in these verses. Actually our love is quite partial. It is partial in our preference for our friends over against those who are not our friends. It is usually partial in preference for our family over our friends. There is even partiality within the family, for if we were to ask those who are parents about their love for their children, most would admit that while they try to be impartial and in many cases almost succeed in being impartial, nevertheless they do not love each of their children equally. Perhaps it is the grace and accommodating ways of one child in comparison to the other children. It may be the drive and natural ability of another child. It may be some other characteristic. Something causes us to love the one slightly more than the other or at least be more naturally drawn toward that one. But God, we are told, has no favorites and thus loves us with the same love that he loves his own Son. God does not love one of his children more than he loves the others.

The Scope of God's Love

We see the nature of this in the love of the Father for Jesus. So we naturally turn to it and ask, "But what is this love like? What is the scope of the Father's love for Jesus?"

The first answer to this question is that God's love is infinite. God is infinite; therefore, he is infinite in this as in all his other attributes. This means that there are no limits on God's love. We always have limits, even though we sometimes pretend we do not. In A Place for You by the Swiss psychologist Paul Tournier, I came across a story from the experience of Tournier that is helpful in this area. A woman had come to see him for the first time. She had hesitated for several years before coming, but she had come at last. Now the time had come for her to leave. Her home was far away, and it would be some time before she could come again. She stood at the door obviously reluctant to go. After a pause she asked, "Can I at any rate write to you?" "Of course,"

Tournier answered.

There was a further silence. Then she said, "May I write often?"

Tournier's response was, "There is no limit!" The Swiss psychologist indicates that as he said this he spoke in a somewhat extravagant tone as if to indicate that, although he would certainly do everything in his power to help this patient, he was aware (as she was also) that he did have limits and that no one but God could actually provide this limitless support.

But God does supply it. This is Tournier's point and the point of Christ's statement in his high priestly prayer. Can we imagine any limits on the Father's love for the Lord Jesus Christ? Can we imagine him saying, "Well, it is true that I love you, but after all there are limits upon everything and at this particular point even I must draw the line"? Can we picture him saying, "I'll help later, but don't bother me now; I'm busy"? Of course not! No limits are to be placed upon the Father's love for the Son or upon the love of the Son for the Father. So then, in precisely the same way, no limits are to be placed upon the Father's love for us. We can go to him at any time with any need and know that he stands as ready to help us as he did to help the Lord Jesus Christ in Gethsemane. He is as close to us as to Jesus, whether or not we know it or feel it practically.

Second, the love of the Father for the Lord Jesus Christ is eternal which is, we must note, not the same thing as being infinite. An infinite love is, as we said, a love without limits. An eternal love is a love without end. Can we think of the Father ceasing to love Jesus Christ, his beloved? Can we think of the infinite affection that existed between the first and second persons of the Godhead from eternity past up to and including the present time suddenly ceasing? Far better to imagine the dissolution of the universe we know, far better to say as did Othello, "Chaos is come again," than to imagine such an impossible possibility. God's love for Christ will not cease. Therefore, his love for us will not cease. It will not cease because of changes in him, for he does not change: "I am the LORD, I do not change" (Mal. 3:6). It will not cease because of changes in us, for God has foreseen all change. Indeed, he has ordained that the overriding and ultimately prevailing change shall be, not our conformity to sin, but rather our conformity to the image of his own dear Son: "For those God foreknow, he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers" (Rom. 8:29).

The consequence of this is that nothing, not even sin, can separate us from God's love. As the passage in Romans goes on to say, "Neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (8:38-39).

The third characteristic of the love of God the Father for Christ is perfection. His is a perfect love. Consequently, his love for us is perfection as well. We do not love perfectly, as we well know. That is why marriages break up, friendships dissolve, children so often rebel against parental authority. It is not always that we cease to love. It is rather that we do not love well. We overindulge, or we do not give of ourselves, or we act inconsistently. Sometimes we spoil a child through love; we give him or her too much. Sometimes we do not give enough; so the child spends a lifetime trying to find what he should have found at home but did not get there. Again, we say we will do something, but then we fail to do it. This is the nature of our love, but it is not the nature of God's love. He loves perfectly with a wisdom and consistency that has only our best at heart.

If we believe that—if we believe that God loves us with the same perfection of love he has shown to Jesus Christ—then we will not be gripers because plans do not turn out the way we would like them to. We will not be despondent because of some undesirable circumstances. On the contrary, we will be encouraged, knowing that indeed "in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28).

Does God So Love?

Is it really the case that God loves us like this? Can we really believe that we are loved with that same infinite, eternal, and perfect love with which God the Father loves the Lord Jesus Christ? Is there evidence that we are really beneficiaries of so great a love?

The answer, as any Christian knows, is yes. And the proof of it is not some abstract reasoning in regard to God's nature, but rather the historical manifestation of God's love at Calvary. How do we know that God loves us with such a great love? John 3:16 gives the answer, "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." We know that God loves with the greatest of all loves because of the supreme gift of his Son to die for us on Calvary. I have frequently said that it is almost impossible to find a verse in the Bible that speaks of God's love without finding that it also speaks (in the context, if not in the very verse itself) of the proof of that love by Christ's death for us. Galatians 2:20—"I have been crucified with Christ, and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by the faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." First John 4:10—"This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins."

How do we know that God loves us? We know because God sent Jesus; and the reason God sent him is that he might die for us. It is on this basis that God even commends his love to us. For "God demonstrates his love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

Security

At this point we must turn to the consequences of such love. What are they? First and most important, such love gives us great security. Love should always give security, a security that is either greater or less depending upon the quality of the love supporting it. Husbands need support from their wives. Wives need support from their husbands. Children obviously need the support of their parents. But often this security is lacking because the love that should support it is lacking. Insecurity results.

By contrast, we have great security in God's love. For one thing, we have security as we look toward the future, to the day of judgment. This, I am convinced, is the meaning of that exceedingly simple (but often puzzling) statement in 1 John 4:17—"In this world we are like him." So far as words go, the sentence could hardly be simpler. It is composed of only seven words. All are monosyllables—"In this world we are like him." But what does this mean? Does it involve obligation, as though it said, "In this world we ought to belike him"? Can it refer to the future, as though it could mean, "We will belike him when we depart from this world"? No, it obviously refers to life now. Can it refer to some actual moral perfection? The answer is that it refers to our stance before God in view of the final judgment, for that is what is being talked about in the context. The verse reads, "In this way, love is made complete among us so that we will have confidence on the day of judgment, because in this world we are like him (v. 18).

Because of the identity of the love of God for Christ and the love of God for me, my relationship to the final judgment is the same as his. Will Jesus be judged? Will he be forced to give an account of the sins laid upon him as he hung upon the cross? Of course not! He bore our sins in order that they might be judged once for all and be removed from him and us forever. Then we shall not be judged for those sins either. "There is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1).

But perhaps you are thinking that this is all a bit too remote. It refers to future events, to the events of God's judgment, and what you are concerned about is life now. Is there security now because of God's love? Yes, there is, in precisely the same sense that there is security for a child in a parent's love, though the child may grow up and move far from home. Or, to give an illustration, it is the security of a seaman who fixes his course by the North Star, knowing that this star, in contrast to all other stars, is not variable. One hymn writer wrote:

> O love of God, our shield and stay
> Through all the perils of our way!
> Eternal love, in thee we rest, For ever safe, for ever blest.

Tournier had been counseling a woman who had come back, after a period of several weeks, around the Christmas holidays. "The nail has held," she said as she came in.

"What nail?" asked the Swiss doctor.

"The nail I am hanging on," she explained. "I feel like a picture hanging on a wall. If the nail comes out, the picture falls. My nail was this appointment that you gave me for just after my holidays." The holidays, as Tournier knew, were always difficult times for her. She always approached them in fear that they would be times in which her problems would emerge once more. So she said, "All the time during the holidays I have been watching the nail so as to hold on, and everything went all right." She added, "I don't feel at all that I am hanging on you emotionally; I hang on you existentially."

The love of God is that upon which we can hang. Indeed, we can hang upon it existentially and emotionally and in every other way as well, knowing that it will not budge, even though the wall and everything else in heaven and earth should be shaken. I will be even more graphic. That nail is the nail (or nails) placed through the hands of Christ on the cross; for they are the proof of God's love, the only fixed point in a revolving and chaotic universe.

Love for Others

There is one more consequence of the truth that God loves us as he loves his Son. It is that we should love others and that we should love them, as best we can, impartially. We must not pick whom we will love for Christ's sake. We must not love with an angle. We are not infinite. We will not be able to love everyone with an inexhaustible love. We will not love perfectly. But, God helping us, we can love impartially in the sense that we can love the unlovely for Jesus' sake.

I have been amused by a story along these lines told by Ralph Keiper. Keiper had become a Christian in his senior year of high school, in part through 2 Corinthians 5:17, which says, "If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old is gone, the new has come!" Having become a new creature he immediately began meditating on the second half of the verse, which says, "the old is gone," because he had a problem in the person of his geometry teacher and sincerely wished that she would pass away, which she did not. He says, "She was a witch, the kind of person to whom on Halloween you would give a broom and say, 'This is your night, kid; do your stuff!'" At last the problem drove him to its solution, because he recognized that the new creature of the verse was to be himself and not his teacher, and that the things which were to pass away were his own old attitudes. Recognizing that he was to be like Jesus Christ, he came to the conclusion that if God could endure his teacher then perhaps he could too. He could even love her for Christ's sake. With this attitude he not only finished the course; he even went on to study trigonometry.

God has loved us greatly even as he has loved Christ. But the matter does not stop at that point. It is not meant to. True, the Father has loved us as he loves Christ, but he has loved us so that, as one result, we might love as Christ. If we do, we will become one among ourselves and then by God's grace also win those for whom Christ also died.

Chapter 220.
With Jesus Forever

John 17:24

I once talked to a Christian woman who was dying. She had cancer, which by then had spread throughout her body, and as she talked to me about her condition she described her physical state as "sinking." She was sinking physically. But as we spoke of spiritual things we reminded ourselves that such sinking, though painful and difficult, is actually ascending into the presence of God.

I was reminded of a paragraph I had recently read in Blind Ambition, John Dean's book on his White House years, for it made a great contrast. Dean had written of his rise to positions of increasingly greater prestige and power in the White House, but he pointed out that, unknown to him at the time, it was actually a descent to corruption and eventual crimes. He wrote, "I soon learned that to make my way upward, into a position of confidence and influence, I had to travel downward through factional power plays, corruption and finally outright crimes. Although I would be rewarded for diligence, true advancement would come from doing those things which built a common bond of trust—or guilt—between me and my superiors. In the Nixon White House, these upward and downward paths diverged, yet joined, like prongs of a tuning fork pitched to a note of expediency. Slowly, steadily, I would climb toward the moral abyss of the President's inner circle until I finally fell into it, thinking I had made it to the top just as I began to realize I had actually touched bottom."

In this assessment of his political career, Dean was not talking about death, but he might well have been; for what he was describing in regard to political or secular morals is true as well of every part of a life that is not linked to God. Millions spend a lifetime striving to arrive at positions of great influence and power, only to find that everything they have worked for is taken away by death. By contrast, a Christian may actually bury himself or herself in God's service, having no outward earthly rewards, and in the end pass through death in obscurity. Yet that burial is actually a resurrection. And that sinking is actually an ascension into the presence of the Lord of life forever.

Triumph, Not Tragedy

Why is the experience of a Christian so different from that of a non-Christian at this point? It is not because of something meritorious in the Christian, of course. Still less is it due to some intrinsic change in him. The difference is to be found only in the will of God, who has decreed that the death of a Christian shall not be a tragedy, but a triumph.

This is declared many places in Scripture, as anyone who knows the Bible well is aware. Paul spoke of his willingness "to be away from the body and [thus] at home with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8). He called death "gain" (Phil. 1:21). He shared his indecision as to whether he most wanted to remain on earth to serve other believers or "to depart and to be with Christ, which is better by far" (Phil. 1:23). In Romans he wrote of nothing being able to separate us from God's love (Rom. 8:35-39). In the Old Testament Job spoke with this confidence, saying, "For I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth. And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God; I myself will see him with my own eyes—I, and not another" (Job 19:25-27). John 17 moves in this same sphere of triumph, for in it Jesus declares his will that all who have been given to him by the Father be with him in glory after both his and their passage through this life: "Father, I want those you have given me to be with me where I am and to see my glory, the glory you have given me because you loved me before the creation of the world" (v. 24).

Here then is an important fact. The triumph of a believer in death is often spoken of in Scripture. But in this verse it receives, as it were, its only proper foundation and true emphasis. Its foundation is seen in that it is based on the express will of God the Son and God the Father (for their wills are one). Its emphasis is seen in that this is the last of Jesus' great petitions to the Father just before his crucifixion. The last thing he asks—indeed, the last thing he wills—is that we might be with him where he is.

Where Jesus Is

Let us think about where Jesus is. Can there be doubt about Christ's meaning? I hardly think so; yet there may be in some minds, due to the fact that he speaks in the present tense ("where I am") rather than in the future ("where I will be"), which we would use if we were thinking of heaven. Does he mean "where I am now," that is, in the upper room or on the outskirts of Jerusalem on the way to the Garden of Gethsemane —depending upon where one imagines this prayer to have been given? No, because if this were the case, there would be no need for Christ so to pray; the disciples were already with him. Besides, in this section of the prayer he is thinking, not just of the disciples, but also of those who would later believe on him through their witness.

So Jesus is not thinking of where he then was but of where he was soon to be, and he is thinking in such confident terms that he actually uses the present tense to express this confidence. In other words, he is so certain that he is soon to be once again in heaven with the Father that he speaks as though it has already occurred, just as he also does in verse 11, where he prays, "I will remain in the world no longer, but they are still in the world, and I am coming to you." Clearly, in both these verses he means that he is about to leave this world and thereby return to glory.

That is precisely where Christ is at this moment. How do we know? We know because of his own statements, of course. But in addition to that we have the fact of the ascension, witnessed by the disciples and testified to by the angels—"Men of Galilee, why do you stand here looking into the sky? This same Jesus, who has been taken from you into heaven, will come back in the same way you have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). We also have the visions of Christ in glory—seen by Stephen (recorded in Acts 7) and by John (recorded in Revelation).

Of all the pictures of heaven given to us in the Bible, I like the picture in the fifth chapter of Revelation best. However, I know as I read it that the words obviously do not convey the full glory of that place. They talk about a throne upon which God the Father is seated. They speak of the Son, described as a Lamb. There are angels and elders and an additional great host, all of whom are engaged in singing the praises of Jesus Christ. There are harps and bowls of incense. There is a scroll of prophecy that no one but the Son of God can open. But these are images designed to portray something beyond our wildest imagination. Or again, even if they are meant to be literal, they still obviously do not convey the full glory of heaven.

Are we poorer on that account? We may think so, but that is not the impression this great chapter and the other chapters that speak of heaven leave with us. On the contrary, they are rich and reassuring. And the reason they are is that they focus rightly on the most important thing about heaven, namely, upon the fact that God the Father and God the Son are there.

This is the focal point of Revelation 5. It is true that it speaks of the three groups of beings I mentioned earlier: the four and twenty elders, the angels, and a vast host of other creatures from everywhere in the universe. But these are brought forward, not to give us a description of them, but because each of these is bearing a testimony to Christ and thus serves to show how he is prominent. The four and twenty elders praise him. Their praise is this song: "You are worthy to take the scroll and to open its seals, because you were slain, and with your blood you purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation. You have made them to be a kingdom and priests to serve our God, and they will reign on the earth" (vv. 9-10). Then the angels give their testimony. They say, "Worthy is the Lamb, who was slain, to receive power and wealth and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and praise" (v. 12). At last the remaining creatures join in: "To him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb be praise and honor and glory and power, for ever and ever" (v. 13). Heaven is where God is, and it is his presence (and not some high concentration of golden streets or jewels) that makes it heaven.

Do you know that? Do your children know it? My six-year-old daughter was in a first-grade science class. They were discussing the universe—how big it is and of what it is composed. Do you know what the conversation of these six-year-old children drifted around to? Heaven! They wanted to know where heaven fit in. Was it between the stars? Was it beyond them? The only valid answer and the one we gave when our daughter came home and told this to us is that heaven is where God is. It is this that makes it heaven.

Where We Shall Be

So the first thing we note about this particular text is that Jesus is now in heaven in the presence of the Father. It is what he means by "where I am." We must also note that this is where we shall be, if we have truly been given to him. This is the major point of the verse, for Jesus mentions his departure to heaven only to say that it is his desire that we join him there after our work here has been completed.

This is what makes heaven real to us, too, and it is what makes it a comfort. One of the Bible personages who had a vision of heaven was the apostle Paul. He describes it obliquely at one point, using the third person as though he were describing the experience of someone else, but there is little doubt that he is speaking of himself. He says, "I know a man in Christ who fourteen years ago was caught up to the third heaven. Whether it was in the body or out of the body I do not know—

God knows. And I know that this man—whether in the body or apart from the body I do not know, but God knows—was caught up to paradise. He heard inexpressible things, things that man is not permitted to tell" (2 Cor. 12:2-4). Here is a man who saw heaven and who could have described it for us. But he does not, for as Paul comes to speak of death later, as he does in Philippians and in some other books, it is always the presence of Christ in heaven that overshadows these other matters and is his comfort.

We shall be with Jesus! That is the promise and the glory. It is what should fill our minds as we think of the life to come.

It is also the thing that should fill our speech as we talk with dying people or with those who have lost a loved one. Most of us do not have great contact with death, because our culture has devised ways to isolate most of us from this reality. But pastors face it many times each year through the experience of those in their congregations. Here is one dying from cancer. The body is wasting away; so the evidence of approaching death is immediately evident to anyone who enters the dying person's room. It is evident to the person himself. What comfort is there? You cannot say, "You are certainly looking better this morning," because it is not true; and even if it were, it would only be temporary. You cannot bring comfort by asking how the person feels. He is in great pain. Where is the comfort? Only here: in knowing that the dying one will soon be with Jesus and that (before long) we too will be there and will be reunited with our friend.

Take another case. A child has died, and you are going to visit the family. The loss is great beyond measure. The family is in a near state of shock. What can you say? The only comfort is that the child is now with Jesus, having completed that span of life to which God called it, and that we will see the child again one day, at the moment of our own homegoing.

Several years ago, when I had been speaking on death, someone sent me a newspaper clipping containing excerpts from the writing of Pearl Buck, who had died just a few months before. Not having the Christian's hope, she had approached death, not in the comfort and assurance of the believer in Jesus Christ, but in the resignation of the Eastern mystics. She had written, "There are times in sleepless nights when I ponder upon this planet to which we cling. I meditate upon how utterly lost we are in space. We bear the total isolation as we must, for however we may hope there is a God we do not hear his voice and we do not see him and, while faith is a valid emotion, it is not confirmed except through hope" (The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 7, 1973). I would > maintain that the Christian faith is confirmed twice over: first, objectively by Christ's resurrection and ascension, and second, subjectively by the application of these truths to our minds and consciences by the Holy Spirit. Most important, it is this that gives comfort as we contemplate our own passage from this life into eternity.

Like Jesus

I said that the only comfort in death is to know that we will soon be with Jesus. But while it is true that this is the great and only ultimate comfort, I am not sure that this statement is entirely true, for there is at least one other fact that is comforting. The additional fact is that we will not only be with Jesus, we will also be like him. John writes in his first letter, "We know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2).

There are many ways in which we shall be like him. We shall be like him in respect to his character, for in that day all the sin, ignorance, and folly that characterize our lives here will be gone. We will be like him in love, holiness, knowledge, wisdom, truth, mercy, and all his other attributes. Then again, we shall be like him in respect to his body, for we shall receive a resurrection body patterned after his own.

I think this is what was in Paul's mind as he wrote those important words on death that are recorded in 2 Corinthians 4 and 5. There is an unfortunate chapter break in this passage, as there is also occasionally at other points of the New Testament. But if we begin reading with verse 15 of chapter 4 and continue through verse 4 of chapter 5, we will receive the full meaning of the apostle. "All this is for your benefit, so that the grace that is reaching more and more people may cause thanksgiving to overflow to the glory of God. Therefore we do not lose heart. Though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed day by day. For our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all. So we fix our eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal. Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands. Meanwhile we groan, longing to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling, because when we are clothed, we will not be found naked. For while we are in this tent, we groan and are burdened, because we do not wish to be unclothed but to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life" (2 Cor. 4:15-5:4).

As I read this I sense that Paul was not in good health and that he was, moreover, speaking from a sense of real pain. A chapter later he is to speak of the physical trials he had endured in Christ's service—beatings, imprisonments, riots, hard work, sleepless nights, hunger (6:5). In chapter 11 he will detail this suffering yet further—"Five times I received from the Jews the forty lashes minus one. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned, three times I was shipwrecked, I spent a night and a day in the open sea, I have been constantly on the move. I have been in danger from rivers, in danger from bandits, in danger from my own countrymen, in danger from Gentiles; in danger in the city, in danger in the country, in danger at sea; and in danger from false brothers. I have labored and toiled and have often gone without sleep; I have known hunger and thirst and have often gone without food; I have been cold and naked" (vv. 2427). These sufferings were not imaginary for Paul. They were real perils. Luke describes many of them explicitly in the Book of Acts. These had certainly left their toll on Paul. So it may well have been as a nearly broken man that he wrote 2 Corinthians.

But what does he say? Does he complain? Does he bemoan his suffering? No. Rather, he looks beyond it, admitting that although our body is in a state of decline and although physical groans are wrung from us through our suffering, yet we still look up, knowing that a new body awaits us and in that body we will soon stand face-to-face before Jesus. It is after this moving acknowledgment of the problem and its solution that he says convincingly, "We are confident, I say, and would prefer to be away from the body and at home with the Lord" (5:8).

Like Jesus Now

There are some for whom these words are already meaningful. They are old or sick, some close to dying. The thought of being with Jesus forever and being like him is itself a great blessing. On the other hand, there are others who are not in this position and for whom this study therefore does not seem timely. What of these? I could point out that we are all dying, some only nearer to that point than others. Again, I could point out that no one knows the moment of his or her death.

It could be thirty years from now; it could be tomorrow or tonight. Instead of this, let me make an application in two other areas.

First, if it is true that you will eventually be with Jesus, if you are a Christian, then why not spend time with him now? This you may do through times of your own personal Bible study and prayer. What would we think of a couple who are about to be married but who do not seem to feel the need to spend time together before the marriage? They say, "Oh, we will be together a lot after we are married; we have other things we want to do now." We would think that a marriage like that would hardly be promising, and we would be right, for if a couple is going to spend their lives together, they should rightly want to get to know one another better even before the marriage ceremony. In the same way, we should want to get to know Jesus better if we are indeed looking forward to being together with him in heaven one day.

The second application is to our moral conduct. If we are going to be like Jesus one day, as John tells us so clearly in his first epistle (1 John 3:2), then why not strive to be like him now? This is John's own conclusion, for having said that we will be like him in glory, he immediately adds, "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (v.3).

Each winter for many years, after the pressures of the Christmas and New Year's services at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, my family and I took a four-day vacation in the Pocono mountains in eastern Pennsylvania. The place where we vacationed is an immense lodge, beautifully situated on a large mountain estate. We looked forward to this greatly as the vacation days approached each winter. Thinking of it actually helped us do our work better. When the time eventually came that we were to make the trip, we started off, drove for about three hours, and then arrived normally in the evening as dusk was settling over the mountain landscape. We parked, approached the door, and as we went in, the magnificent doormen, some of whom had been there for twenty or thirty years, came up to greet us and take our bags. And they said—this is the point for which I tell the story—"Welcome home! Welcome home!" Well, it was not home (unfortunately). It is only a clever device on the part of the lodge to make its guests welcome. But one day we are going to glory where those words will be rightly spoken by no other than our own blessed Lord, the One who has himself prepared our rooms for us. "Welcome home!" he will say. And we really will be home—forever.

Anyone who has this hope in him will try to be like Christ now, and he will work faithfully in Christ's service.

Chapter 221.
The Sixth Mark of the Church: Love

John 17:25-26

What is the greatest mark of the church? I do not mean by this: What is the first mark of the church, or even, What is the mark that we perhaps most lack? Joy is the first mark mentioned, and the mark most lacking is something that has to be answered differently in different periods of history and in different situations. I mean: What is the greatest mark, the one that holds the others together? What is the one that gives meaning to the others, the one without which the church cannot at all be what God means it to be? There is only one answer. The greatest mark of the church is love.

Paul talks about this in 1 Corinthians 13. After having spoken about love in that chapter and having come to the end in which he looks at the Christian life under the categories of faith, hope, and love—faith that looks back to the cross, hope that looks forward to the Lord's second coming, and love that looks about at the world and other Christians—Paul concludes that while all three are great and abiding virtues, nevertheless "the greatest of these is love."

It is with the same thought in mind that the Lord Jesus Christ, having spoken of joy, holiness, truth, mission, and unity as essential marks of the church in his high priestly prayer of John 17, nevertheless concludes by an emphasis upon love. It is the new commandment of 13:34-35 once again—"Love one another. As I have loved you, you must love one another. By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." Here Jesus says that he has declared the name of God to the disciples in order that "the love you have for me may be in them, and that I myself may be in them" (17:26).

When Love Is Gone

We see the preeminence of love readily if we look at it in reference to the other marks of the church. What happens when you take love away from them? Suppose you take joy and subtract love from it? What do you have? You have hedonism. You have an exuberance in life and its pleasures, but without the sanctifying joy found in relationship to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Subtract love from holiness. What do you get? You get self-righteousness, the kind of virtue that characterized the Pharisees of Christ's day. By the standards of the day the Pharisees lived very holy lives, but they did not love others and were ready to kill Christ when he challenged their standards, and actually did kill him. They were hypocrites.

Take love from truth, and you have a bitter orthodoxy, the kind of teaching that is right but that does not win anyone.

Take love from mission, and you have imperialism. It is colonialism in ecclesiastical garb. We have seen much of that in recent history.

Take love from unity, and you soon have tyranny. This develops in a hierarchical church where there is no compassion for people nor a desire to involve them in the decision-making process.

That is one side of it. On the other hand, express love in relation to God and man and what do you find? You find all the other marks of the church following. What does love for God the Father lead to? Joy! Because we rejoice in God and in what he has so overwhelmingly done for us. What does love for the Lord Jesus Christ lead to? Holiness! Because we know that we will see him one day and will be like him; therefore "everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (1 John 3:3). What does love for the Word of God lead to? Truth! Because if we love the Word, we will study it and therefore inevitably grow into a fuller appreciation and realization of God's truth. What does love for the world lead to? Mission! We have a message to take to the world. Again, where does love for our Christian brothers and sisters lead us? To unity! Because by love we discern that we are bound together in that bundle of life that God himself has created within the Christian community.

Is it any wonder that Jesus ends his final discourses and prayer (undoubtedly spoken within the hearing of the disciples) with this emphasis? Hardly! Rather, we expect it, for it is as though Jesus, in anticipation of the writing of the fourth Gospel, could go back to the beginning of this fourth section (where we read, "Having loved his own who were in the world, he showed them the full extent of his love") and then conclude, "Yes, and here at the very end of my discourses and prayer I am going to talk about precisely that, for love is the most important characteristic."

Love's Source

What can we say about love on the basis of these verses? First, we can say that it has its source in God. This is the kind of love we are talking about. We are not talking about the kind of love the world invents, aspires to or imagines, but rather the love of God that is revealed in Jesus Christ and that we come to know as we come to know God. It is obvious that Jesus has precisely this thought in mind, because verse 25, the prelude to verse 26, talks about knowledge. In it Jesus says, "Righteous Father, though the world does not know you, I know you, and they know that you have sent me." It is after this that Jesus goes on to say, "I have made you known to them [that is, I have made you known in your essential nature], and will continue to make you known in order that the love you have for me may be in them and that I myself may be in them." What Jesus is saying is that, if we know God, we will know God's nature as being characterized by love and that, if we do not know love, we do not know God. John later clearly makes the same point in his first epistle (1 John 4:7-8).

When Jesus says the world has not known God, he means, besides everything else, that the world does not know God as a God of love. This was demonstrably true in Jesus' day. No Greek, no Roman, no Egyptian, no Babylonian in Christ's day, or in any of the centuries before, had ever thought of God's nature as being essentially characterized by love. It is just not there. Read all the ancient documents, and you simply do not find this element. At best, God was thought to be impartial. Or, if one chose to think optimistically, God could sometimes be said to love those who love him; meaning that he might be favorable to them for their service. But this is a tit-fortat arrangement (you serve me, and I will take care of you), not the benevolent, unmerited love of God disclosed in the Bible. It simply does not exist in antiquity, apart from a preparatory form within the pages of the Old Testament.

With the Lord Jesus Christ an entirely new idea entered history, for he taught, not only that God is loving, but also that he loves with an extraordinary love, entirely beyond all human imaginations. That love had sent Christ to die. Moreover, on that basis it would now draw a host of redeemed men and women into an extraordinary family relationship with God.

It may be seen linguistically that a new understanding of love entered history through God's revelation, first in the Old Testament and then preeminently through the teaching of Jesus Christ. To begin with, we note that the Greek language, in which the New Testament is written and into which the Old Testament was translated about one hundred years before Christ's birth, is rich in words for love. Yet when the translators of the Old Testament and the writers of the New came to talk about the love of God, they found that they could not draw upon any of the common Greek words for "love," but instead had to choose a word that previously had been little used and change it, thereby infusing it with an entirely new character.

French has only one word for love, aimer. A Frenchman uses it for whatever he wants to say. He loves his wife; he loves his country; he loves his house; he loves his bouillabaisse and crepes suzette, anything, in fact, for which he has the slightest liking. The English language is a little better; we have "love" and "like."

French has one word. English has two words. But ancient Greek had three words, plus this indefinite word that could hardly be used for love at all. The first word was storge. It referred to general affection, particularly within the family. The closest English equivalent would be "fondness." The Greek would say, "I am fond of my children and my relatives." The second Greek word is philia from which we get the English words "philanthropy" and "Philadelphia." It refers to friendship. Jesus used this word when he said the person "who loves father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:37). The third Greek word is eros, the word for sensual love. From it we get our English word "erotic."

When the translators of the Hebrew Bible came to put the Old Testament texts into Greek, none of these common words was adequate for conveying the biblical conceptions. The translators of the Septuagint might have used storge, the word for family affection; but how could they then have conveyed the idea of graciousness that is inherent in God's love? We like things because they commend themselves to us, but God commends his love toward men while they are yet sinners. Again, the translators might have used eros, noting that God's love for Israel is portrayed as sexual love in Hosea and in the Song of Solomon. However, this translation would have introduced the idea of an unrighteous love, for eros was associated as much with prostitution as with a proper love in marriage. Eros had almost no moral content. In a similar way, philia was also inadequate, for friendships come and go, but the love of God is eternal. God told Jeremiah, "I have loved you with an everlasting love" (Jer. 31:3).

What were the translators to do? The answer was simple. The translators took another word entirely, one without strong associations, and used it in nearly all cases where the love of God is mentioned. By doing this they created a word that came in time to convey the type of love they wanted.

At this point let me interject an illustration to show how this also happened in the New Testament period. When Jesus appeared in Israel announcing his mission, he avoided a number of messianic titles. The people were expecting the Messiah. But Jesus did not proclaim himself the Messiah, at least not openly, for to the Jews that would have meant a king strong enough to drive out the Romans. The title "Messiah" would have meant an earthly king and would have suggested an earthly kingdom. Nor did he call himself the Son of God. The Greeks knew all about "sons of god," but that title would have put him on the same level with Hercules or Alexander the Great. Instead Jesus called himself the Son of man. This title occurs in Daniel and describes a messianic figure. But in the intellectual climate of Jesus' time it was no longer precise and could have meant almost anything. Hence, Jesus used that title more than any other, allowing his teaching and ministry to paint a proper picture of himself as God's true Messiah and Son— the One who came to die, rise again, and return one day in glory to judge mankind and reward those who have believed on him.

It is the same with the several words for "love." Neither storge, nor philia, nor eros conveys the proper biblical ideas. But agape could. It was vague, but it could be made to convey the right ideas. Does God love with a righteous, holy love? Yes. That love is agape. Is God's love gracious, sovereign, everlasting? Yes, that too. That love is agape. By this means agape became the supreme word for speaking about God's love, a new love revealed initially by God through Judaism and then disclosed in its fullness in Jesus Christ through biblical Christianity.

By Revelation

This leads to a second point, the revelation itself. We ask: Where does the revelation of God's love occur? Again, it is a somewhat complicated answer. Certainly God had revealed himself to be a God of love in the pages of the Old Testament. God indicated there that he had set his love upon Israel even though there was nothing in the people to merit it. Again, God is revealed to be a God of love in Christ's teaching. He called him Father, indicating that his was a father's love. All that is true. Yet the best truth is that God is declared to be a God of love by the cross of Jesus Christ. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16).

This is what Jesus is looking forward to in the words that close his prayer, for he says, "I will declare it," meaning the name of God. What is he thinking of here? We could understand the phrase if it had occurred in the past tense, for it would then clearly refer to the previous teaching in the Gospel. But why the future tense? What is Jesus thinking about? It must be the cross itself, for it is as though Jesus is saying, "That which I have been speaking of in years past I am now going to demonstrate in a dramatic and tangible way through my crucifixion."

There has never been—there never will be—a greater demonstration of the love of God. So if you will not have the Cross, if you will not see God speaking in love in Jesus Christ, you will never find a loving God anywhere. The God of the Bible is going to be a silent God for you. The universe is going to be an empty universe. History is going to be meaningless. It is only at the cross that you will ever find God in his true nature and learn that these other things have meaning.

Love in Action

There is something else in this text, for Jesus does not merely show where we can find love. He also shows where we can demonstrate love, for he goes on to pray that "the love you have for me may be in them, and that I myself may be in them. "Love is to be shown in us personally.

Why is Jesus concerned about this? I am sure he is concerned about this simply because it is only in his followers that anyone in this age, or any other age save his own, can see this great love. Jesus was aware that he was about to die. Following his death, there would be a resurrection and an ascension into heaven. Therefore, this One who was himself the perfect manifestation of love, the only one in whom this world had ever seen what true love really is—this one would be gone. He would not be here for men and women to contemplate. So he says as he closes his prayer that this love is now to be in us, even as he is in us, and that the world is to see it there. It must be love in action.

A Practical Question

As we draw to the end of this volume (and this section of John's Gospel) a person may be saying, "But I have a practical question. I can see the importance of love, as you have outlined it. I recognize that if we leave love out of the equation for Christian living, we have distorted it all. I can even understand the doctrinal points: that love comes from God, that love is demonstrated at the cross, that it must be seen in Christian people. But how do we do it? That is the most important question. How do we love one another? How do we put this great love of God into practice?" Let me share a few practical ways.

First, we need to love one another by listening to one another. We live in an age in which people do not listen to each other. We talk to one another, and others are constantly talking to us. But this is a hard world in which no one really listens. So one of the things we need to do, if we are truly characterized by the love of God, is to listen. God listens to us.

I saw a movie in which the dominant male character and the dominant female character were talking to one another. The man was older. He was a product of his generation. The woman was younger; she had grown up with television and was so much the passive product of the television age that she was unable to relate deeply to anyone. She was unable to listen. In this scene they were talking together, and the woman said something like, "What do you want from me?"

He answered, "I want you to love me."

This demand was something she could not cope with and did not really understand. She said, "I do not know how to do that." Then they stood staring at each other, and as they did, one became increasingly aware of how fragile their relationship was and that there was ultimately nothing to hold them together. Finally, the telephone rang. What would happen now? Could the girl transcend the interruption and deal with the pressing personal matter? For a moment she seemed to try. But then, while still facing him, her eyes darted sideways to the telephone and the moment to listen was gone. After this the scene dissolved, because the glance told it all. She could not listen.

Here is another story told by theologian Carl F. H. Henry. On one occasion in his travels he was seated in a diner at breakfast time next to a family who had a small boy. The waitress came to their table and began taking the order from the boy. "What will you have for breakfast?" she asked.

He said, "I'll have a hamburger and french fries with lots of ketchup."

"Oh, no, you won't," his mother said. "You'll have a scrambled egg and toast."

That seemed to settle the matter, so the waitress went on to take the other orders. But when she was done she turned back to the boy and said, "I guess it's going to be a scrambled egg and toast." He nodded. Then she said, "But with lots of ketchup!"

After the waitress had gone to the kitchen the boy exclaimed, "I like that waitress; she thinks I'm real." He liked her because she had listened to him and had learned what he had to say. So should we, if we really love one another.

Second, we should share. That is, we should let others share, and we ourselves should share. We are not to be like some professional counselors, listening but never interjecting ourselves. We are brothers and sisters in the Lord. We have a family relationship. So we do not sit like computers, analyzing what we are told and then coming back with answers carefully based upon social science surveys. We come back as people who are on the same level as the ones to whom we are talking, and we say, "Yes, I've gone through that. God has done this and this for me."

Our problem at this point is that we do not like to share ourselves. And the reason we do not like to share ourselves is, if we put it frankly, that we are ashamed of ourselves because we are sinners and are afraid that if we really did tell what is down inside, the other person would turn away and be disgusted. We would lose the relationship. How do we get to the point of being able really to share? There is only one way, and that is to know deep in our hearts that before God we are fully known as we are, with all our blemishes, sins and shames, and that, nevertheless, Jesus Christ has loved us, died for us, and that we are now fully accepted in the beloved. If you can know that you are known and yet loved, then you can share your true self and love others.

Third, we must serve. We must listen, share, and serve. If anything has been taught in this section of the Gospel, it is that we must serve. The section began with a reference to service as the outworking of Christ's love: "Having loved his own who were in the world, he showed them the full extent of his love" (13:1). In the thirteenth chapter it contained a demonstration of what this love means in the washing of the disciples' feet. Jesus concluded, "Now that I, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also should wash one another's feet" (13:14). Later Jesus goes on to teach what this love means and what the Holy Spirit will do in enabling us to love. Finally, in this prayer, he lists the special marks that should characterize the church in every age: joy, holiness, truth, unity, mission, and love. The last of these involve service.

And quite rightly! For the Christian church is not in the world to be served; she is in the world to serve in order that the love of God in Christ might be increasingly known through the testimonies and specific loving acts of Christian people.

The Gospel of John, Volume 5

Triumph through Tragedy (John 18-21)

by

James Montgomery Boice

© 1985, 1999 by James Montgomery Boice. Database © 2007 WORD*search* Bible Corp.

To him who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood

Preface

From a human viewpoint, the path of John's Gospel has been downhill. An initial appearance of Jesus of Nazareth as the light of this world and a time of popularity have been followed by progressively increasing indifference and rejection on the part of the masses and the intense hatred and open opposition of the religious leaders. Now the story reaches its very nadir as the indifference of the people and the hatred of the leaders combine to have Christ crucified. Yet the low point is also the peak; for in the wisdom and purpose of God the tragedy of the cross is a triumph since it is this that provides an atonement for sins and makes salvation possible. Moreover, it is followed by the resurrection.

This is the message of this fifth and last volume of expositional commentaries of John's Gospel. But it is not just the message of Christ's triumph. It is an indication of how we can triumph as well. In God's plan and in accordance with God's wisdom, even the worst of that which befalls Christians can be transformed into victory.

It has been my pattern in previous volumes to deviate at times from a strict verse-by-verse exposition in order to consider more thoroughly a subject introduced by the exposition. There have been extended discussions of witnessing, baptism, the Sunday-versus-Sabbath question, the Scriptures, Christ our Good Shepherd, death, heaven, the Holy Spirit, and the marks of the church. Two subjects have been treated this way in this volume. The first is the two-part trial of Jesus before the Jewish and Roman authorities. Four studies have been devoted to the Jewish trial (chapters 5-8), and the greater part of twelve studies have been devoted to the trial before Pilate and Herod (chapters 10-21). The second theme is the atonement. The nature, necessity, perfection, and scope of the atonement are considered in chapters 27-30.

For the benefit of those who have purchased the preceding volumes I can point out that the outline introduced earlier is now completed. Volume 1 deals with the coming of the light of the Lord Jesus Christ into the world (chapters 1-4). Volume 2 covers the growth of hostility toward Jesus on the part of the religious leaders (chapters 5-8). Volume 3 deals with the actions of Jesus in beginning to call out a people to himself from among Israel, beginning with the healing and call of the man who had been born blind (chapters 9-12). Volume 4 contains Christ's final discourses (chapters 13-17). The present volume, volume 5, concludes with the account of Christ's arrest, trial, crucifixion, and resurrection (chapters 18-21). It shows the story to be "Triumph through Tragedy."

Some of the material in this volume has already appeared in other forms. The messages on the resurrection have appeared in booklets published in connection with the Bible Study Hour. Material on the trials and the atonement is also being used in this way. All the messages have already been aired over the Bible Study Hour as radio sermons and have appeared in the monthly publication, Bible Studies, which is mailed regularly to the program's supporters.

Publication of this volume represents an end of a considerably lengthy project. My study of the Gospel of John began in reality during the years of graduate work in Basel, Switzerland, as a result of which a preliminary study of the Gospel appeared under the title Witness and Revelation in the Gospel of John. In December 1970, I began to preach on this Gospel for the Sunday morning services of Tenth Presbyterian Church, which I still serve as pastor. With the exception of various interruptions for special services and events, that series of expositions continued through July 1978. The series began on the radio in the late spring of 1971 and continued to December 1978. The series numbers 270 studies in all. During this time I have been blessed by the support and encouragement of the session and congregation of Tenth Church. I have been helped immeasurably by the editing and proofreading skills of Miss Caecilie M. Foelster, my secretary. Greatest of all has been the presence and encouragement of the Lord, who increasingly opened up the meaning of the Gospel to me and showed me levels of meaning and application that I had not dreamed of before.

May God himself bless this exposition to the hearts of all who read it, as he has blessed these years of study to me. May he be glorified. May he draw many to that One who "loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." Amen and Amen.

James Montgomery

Boice

Philadelphia,
Pennsylvania

Chapter 222.
The Final Days

John 18:1

Years ago, when I was in college, there was a course in world literature that always contained on its final examination the question: Is it possible to have a Christian tragedy? It was a question designed to test the understanding as well as the knowledge of the student, as all good examination questions do, for basic to the question (to be answered from the literature studied) was the problem of whether a true experience of Christianity and true tragedy are compatible. The poorer students did not even know what the question meant. Better students analyzed works commonly categorized as tragedy—Paradise Lost, Moby Dick, The Scarlet Letter—but did not answer the question. Only perceptive students answered that in the final analysis a Christian tragedy is impossible, for the essential Christian presuppositions of a sovereign but benevolent God ultimately override the tragic elements.

This does not eliminate the marks of tragedy, of course. In fact, it may be argued that only Christianity of all the world's religions actually takes the tragedy of the human situation with full seriousness. This is the meaning of the fall, the cross, the bondage of the will, the final judgment. But even greater than these things stands the benevolent and wise purposes of the sovereign God in human history. Life may be dark. Tragedy may come. At times the whole world may seem to be crumbling into pieces. But this is not the end. Therefore, in spite of the tragedy, God still works all things together "for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28).

Dark Days

It would be possible to illustrate this thesis, not only theoretically but also by numerous examples from the lives of Christians. But among all these examples there is surely nothing more dramatically illustrative of the Christian principle of triumph through tragedy than the events of the closing days of the earthly life of Christianity's founder, Jesus of Nazareth. A detached observer might look upon these days as dismal in the extreme. He would see a young man, a brilliant and compassionate young man, unjustly arrested through the hostility of jealous older men whose authority he threatened. He is falsely convicted and executed. And even then, the execution is not by some "humane" form of execution but by the unbelievably cruel and agonizing death of crucifixion. What could be worse? Nothing! Yet the story, as told by those friends of his who had witnessed most if not all the events, is not the story of a tragic defeat but of a victory. Indeed, the outcome, far from being one of despair and desolation, is actually a gospel—that which is "Good News" to an otherwise tragedy-bound humanity.

One obvious, historical reason for this is that the crucifixion of Christ was followed by a resurrection, which was good news in itself. But this is not the whole of the testimony, or even its heart. The resurrection was good news; it showed that death was not the end of Christ's life, nor need it be the end of ours. But in addition to this, it is also the case, according to the testimony of these witnesses, that the crucifixion itself was good news. Christ's death was good. Thus, the true meaning of the phrase "triumph through tragedy" is not merely that tragedy is followed by triumph but, far more profoundly, that in the hands of God the tragedy actually becomes the triumph. The apparent defeat becomes victory.

We can say more! For not only does the tragedy in the hands of God become triumph, without the tragedy there really is no triumph. What would the great promises of the final discourses of John's Gospel be without these chapters? Just pipe dreams! What would the miracles be without these latter assurances that they are designed to present to us a sure way of salvation? Nothing! However, in actual fact, these chapters rightly culminate all that has gone before and show how and why the blessings spoken of earlier come to us.

One commentator has written, "Without these two chapters (18, 19)... none of the precious things which have thrilled the heart in the previous chapters could be possible; nay more, none of His own assertions as to what He would be and do, of giving eternal life, of having any of the world, of coming again for them, of sending the Holy Spirit, of preparing a place for them, of having them in the glory with Him, or of having that glory at all; there would be no assembly of God, or restoration of Israel, no gathering of the nations, no millennium, no new heavens and new earth, no adjustment in righteousness of the 'creation of God' of which He is the beginning, no display of grace, no salvation, no revelation of the Father—all these and much more were contingent on His death and resurrection. Without these all things in this book drop out and leave a blank, the blackness of darkness."

So there are dark days, these final days in the earthly life of our Lord. But they are days that are at the same time days of light for those who are of the light. By contrast, the true darkness is for those who will not come to Christ. He and not another is this world's light, and that light is nowhere better seen than in his own cruel death and resurrection.

Days of Blessing

This is not just a later theological reflection on the crucifixion and resurrection narratives either. This is John's own emphasis from beginning to end. As we study these chapters together his unique emphasis will emerge fully. But even in this opening section it is apparent.

For example, John 18 begins with the departure of Jesus from Jerusalem to the Garden of Gethsemane. He was with the party that entered the Garden that night. He was with Jesus (so closely, in fact, that he was one of the three selected to go off with Jesus and accompany him while he prayed). He witnessed all that transpired in the Garden. Nevertheless, he omits many of the important features that the other Gospel writers contain and introduces others that they omit—all to stress the glory and power of the Son of Man, rather than his mere humanity or apparent weakness.

By consulting the other Gospels we are reminded of what else happened in the Garden. Each of the other Gospels tells us that, having selected Peter, James, and John to go with him, Jesus went off from the others and prayed three times that if it was the will of God, the cup of death might pass by him. Matthew and Luke record the fact that prior to this, Jesus began to be greatly agitated, depressed, and sorrowful; he declared, "My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow to the point of death" (Matt. 26:38; cf. Mark 14:34). Luke, who is particularly concerned with the humanity and sufferings of Christ, reports that in spite of the fact that angels appeared and ministered to him, Jesus nevertheless was "in anguish" and "prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground" (Luke 22:44).

John knew these facts as well as any of the other writers (cf. John 12:24-27). Yet he omits them in his account, noting only that Jesus "left with his disciples and crossed the Kidron Valley... [where] there was an olive grove" and was there arrested. Why does John do this? For emphasis. He wishes to stress, not the human weakness of Christ, but rather his mastery over this as well as all other situations.

It is not only in John's omissions that this particular emphasis is noticeable. It is noticeable also in what he includes, particularly in regard to Christ's statements. In the earlier Gospels the scene in the Garden is prefaced by Jesus' prophecy of his coming arrest and death.

He speaks of the shepherd being killed and the sheep scattered (Matt. 26:31; Mark 14:27); he speaks of his being numbered with the transgressors in fulfillment of Isaiah 53 (Luke 22:37). But although John knew these sayings (cf. John 10), he has included as an introduction to this episode, not the prophecy of Jesus' death and suffering, but rather the great promises of Jesus recorded as part of the high priestly prayer of John 17. To be even more accurate, the real preface of this entire section of the Gospel is the verse that begins chapter 13: "It was just before the Passover Feast. Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father. Having loved his own who were in the world, he now showed them the full extent of his love" (v. 1).

John emphasizes the fact that the arrest was under the control of Jesus. For one thing, Jesus initiates the actual confrontation, going forth to the soldiers, asking, "Who is it you want?" rather than waiting for the kiss of Judas, as the other Gospels seem to indicate. John includes that otherwise unmentioned episode in which the soldiers and officers fall to the ground as a result of Jesus introducing himself to them with the majestic name of God: Jehovah ("I am"). Finally, even at the moment of the arrest Jesus is dominant; he issues a command—"I told you that I am he. If you are looking for me, then let these men go" (18:8)—and it is followed.

These converging emphases are to show that it was no meaningless and unanticipated tragedy that overtook Jesus of Nazareth at the close of his otherwise promising ministry and so ended it. Rather, it was that ordering of events set forth by God, which events were thus not only to be inevitably fulfilled but also to be filled with great blessing, not only for Christ himself but also for his followers.

Christ's Days, Our Days

In a sense everything that we are to study in the remainder of John's Gospel has bearing on this great theme: that there is no tragedy for Christians. But because we will be looking at this in terms of Christ's life, it is especially necessary at the beginning that we also stop to see that it must have a profound bearing upon our lives too. For we shall have suffering. There is no doubt of that. We are called to it. There will be dark days. Will they be bitter days? Will we gripe and complain? Or will they be days of victory? Much of the answer depends upon how well we learn the lessons of these chapters.

Let me ask this question: How do Christians most often think of their suffering? Some consider it a breach of trust on the part of God, of course. They reproach him for it. Others simply endure suffering grimly, refusing to ask from whom it has come or even if God might have a purpose in it. But I am not thinking of these. I am thinking of more mature Christians who, because they believe in a sovereign God, readily accept the thought that their suffering, grief, or disappointment first of all passed through God's hand and is intended for them as good. I am asking how they regard suffering. How do they think of it?

From my experience I would say that mature Christians usually think of it in one of three ways, or a combination of them. First, some think of suffering as something to be endured so that in God's own time he might intervene to remove it and thus get glory to himself for removing it. An example of this would be sickness, particularly acute sickness that might lead to death. These Christians think that its purpose is that God might remove it so that they can then praise him for their healing. Another example would be an unpleasant line of work, which they could praise God for after the work has been changed for something new.

Second, there are those who look upon suffering as something for God to transform. Perhaps, if they were bolder, they might pray for its removal outright. But since they have no confidence that God will do this (or else sense, often rightly, that he has no intention of doing so), they pray that God might make things different. They expect him to change the suffering so that it is no longer the pain or discouragement that it might be for other people.

Third, there are Christians who simply look beyond the dark days of suffering to glory and therefore strive to ignore the suffering. They see no purpose in it, but they go through it for the joys that lie beyond.

Are these views right? Let me acknowledge first that there is an element of truth (and sometimes, in a particular case, the whole truth) in each of them. It is true that suffering is sometimes given so that God might remove it and thus be glorified. The affliction of the man who had been born blind, whose story is told in John 9, would be such an example. Sometimes, too, the suffering is deeply transformed. It is also true, whatever the case in the other areas may be, that there is a realm of joy beyond the sufferings. In Christ's case, there was a resurrection and ascension— beyond the cross. He looked forward to it. Similarly, we are encouraged by those scenes of the redeemed saints in glory recorded by John in Revelation. We rejoice to know that there will be no tears there, neither death, sorrow, crying, or pain (Rev. 21:4).

But is this the uniquely Christian approach to suffering, based upon these chapters from John and other passages? Is the Christian's answer only escape or transformation or sublimation? I think not. Rather the answer is the acceptance of suffering in its fullness for Christ's sake, thereby helping to make up the fullness of his sufferings (as Paul said he himself did) and bringing glory to his name, not by an escape from suffering but by the sheer force of the way in which we bear it.

Two Groups of People

Donald Grey Barnhouse, the founder of the Bible Study Hour, once preached a sermon entitled "Tragedy or Triumph." It was an analysis of this problem, and at one point he gave this illustration. He said that one morning early in his ministry a woman stopped him on the street to ask if he would come to see her son. Her son had tuberculosis and was dying. He said, "I'll go home with you now."

"Oh, no," she replied. "Don't come with me. He is very bitter. He might curse you, and I don't want him to know that I asked you. Just drop in later." This was all right with the young pastor. So about half an hour later he rang the bell on the front of one of Philadelphia's little row houses, noticing as he did that there was a front room in which the young man's bed had been placed and in which he was lying. He introduced himself as the pastor of the nearby church and then openly noticed the woman's sick son.

As he walked over to him the young man became angry and began to curse. "Why does God make me spit my lungs into this cup?" he demanded. "Oh, God is so cruel to me!" He cursed God for his suffering, and became so agitated that Barnhouse thought it would be best to leave. In about a week that young man died.

Several years later Barnhouse was holding a series of Sunday night services in a theater in West Philadelphia. As he finished preaching one night, someone asked, "Will you go to see a young man in this neighborhood who is dying of tuberculosis?" He immediately thought of the other incident, but he went to see the young man and was surprised to find the case completely different. Again, it was a little row house. The man was in the front room. But when Barnhouse began to talk to him the young man exclaimed, "Oh, life is so wonderful since Christ has saved me!" He told his story. He said that he had gotten so weak in the last few months that he had been able to spend only one hour out of twenty-four out of bed. But during that one hour each day he would get dressed and take a walk around the block.

One evening, while he was taking his walk, he noticed the lights on in the neighborhood theater and went in to rest. Barnhouse was preaching, and he listened while he spoke of the love of Christ. He received Jesus as his own personal Savior and Lord. During the months that followed, in that one hour out of bed each day, he visited families in his block and told them of what Christ had done to save them and of how much he loved them. Now, however, he was too weak to go out at all. "But," he said, "I have about fifty relatives in this city. I would like to invite them over next Sunday. And if I do, would you come and speak to them?" Barnhouse said he would, and when he arrived on the next Sunday evening he found a full house of people. They were everywhere—on the stairs, upstairs, in the kitchen, some even on the floor. The young man told of his conversion, and then he invited Barnhouse to tell the story he had told in the theater the night the young man was saved.

Afterward he said, "That was the message spoken the night I believed in Jesus. This is how I came to trust in Christ. I know that the next time you are all together it will be for my funeral, but I wanted to witness to you about Christ before I died." A few days later he did die—triumphantly.

Do you think that testimony failed to have its effect on those relatives? Of course it did not. But it was effective, not because the second man had less pain or because his death was transmuted. Rather it was because he received it as being from God himself, which it truly was, and thereby glorified God in it.

Barnhouse's own comment is as follows: "As we review these two cases, almost identical in circumstances but so different in outlook, we realize anew that the world is divided into two groups—those who are born again, and those who are not. People are either the children of God or they are the children of wrath and of disobedience. In order to become a child of God you must believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. As a result of searching the Word of God, and of the experiences of my ministry, I believe that God permits whatever happens to an unbeliever, also to happen to a Christian. The unbeliever cries out against God; but the Christian says, 'Lord, do to me whatever you please.' No matter what your condition in life, if you are not a believer in Jesus Christ, God has a double of you somewhere who is believing in Jesus Christ. If you are in the Home for Incurables, and do not know Christ and think your lot is terrible, someone else in the Home for Incurables is praising God. The Devil has his doctors, and God has his doctors who love in simple faith and trust the Lord. The Devil has his lawyers who connive and cheat; God has his honorable, upright lawyers who seek to aid those in difficulty. God has his rich men and the Devil has his.

"Describe yourself to me. Tell me how old you are, what is your condition, what are your circumstances. I will duplicate them in the life of some Christian. To put it the other way around, whatever happens to a Christian, the same is happening to an unbeliever, and he is crying out, 'God, you can't do this to me!' But the Christian can say, 'O, God, you can do anything you wish to me. You redeemed me. You bought me with your blood. I am yours, and I know that all things will work together for good because I love you.'"

A Privilege

Here is one last story. Dr. Helen Roseveare, a British medical doctor, served for more than twenty years in Africa, in the state of Zaire. For twelve and a half years she had a frantic but generally wonderful time serving as the only doctor in an area containing more than half a million people (today about one and a half million). But in 1964, revolution overwhelmed the country, and she and her coworkers were thrown into five and a half months of almost unbelievable brutality and torture. There were several cases of tremendous deliverance, sometimes involving circumstances so far-fetched that a non-Christian could hardly believe them. But there was still torture, beatings, the wretched misery of seeing others mutilated and destroyed, and fear—a bone-crushing, overwhelming fear.

On one occasion, when she was on the verge of being executed, a seventeen-year-old student came to her defense and was savagely beaten as a result. He was kicked about like a football and left for dead. She was sick. For a moment she thought that God had forsaken her, even though she did not doubt his reality. But God stepped in and overwhelmed her with the sense of his own presence—in his triumphant bigness—and asked something like this: "Twenty years ago you asked me for the privilege of being a missionary, the privilege of being identified with me. This is it. Don't you want it? This is what it means. These are not your sufferings; they are my sufferings. All I ask of you is the loan of your body."

As the force of that hit home, the doctor said that she was overcome with a great sense of privilege, for privilege it was. She rejoiced to be able to serve her Lord in this or whatever other circumstances he might order for her. "He didn't stop the sufferings. He didn't stop the wickedness, the cruelties, the humiliation or anything. It was all there. The pain was just as bad. The fear was just as bad. But it was now altogether different. It was in Jesus, for him, with him." That is her testimony.

I close by asking: Are you a believer in Jesus Christ? And are you aware of the privilege of being just where you are and who you are and in precisely the circumstances you find yourself to be in? Jesus has put you there, wherever it is. He has made you, whoever you are. He has created those circumstances, whatever they may be. It is for you to praise him right there and allow those circumstances, even the most tragic circumstances, to be the grounds of his triumph.

Chapter 223. Gethsemane

John 18:1-2

It is true, as pointed out in the last chapter, that the apostle John does not emphasize the sufferings of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane, choosing rather to stress his mastery over this as over every other situation. But this does not mean that John was ignorant of what had taken place in the Garden or even that he does not have it in mind as he unfolds his version of the story. We know that he was personally aware of these events, for he was there and was even one of the inner three disciples who accompanied the Lord as he departed a stone's throw from the other eight disciples to pray. We know that John knew the nature of that prayer; for he has anticipated it in chapter 12, where he quotes Jesus as saying, "Now my heart is troubled, and what shall I say? 'Father, save me from this hour'? No it was for this very reason I came to this hour" (v. 27).

John is not ignorant of the events that transpired in Gethsemane. But he is, as also noted in our last study, concerned to place his own perspective on them. What is it? We might answer that he wants to show Christ in his divine strength rather than in his human weakness, the triumph rather than the tragedy. But that is a general answer rather than an answer to the question of John's perception of Jesus' struggle in Gethsemane itself. Since we want to consider this account thoroughly, we therefore ask: Does John indicate a particular way in which the struggle in Gethsemane should be viewed? Is there anything in the text to focus our thinking?

I believe there is such an indication in the word "garden," which John uses in verse 1. To us this is hardly remarkable, for we are accustomed to speak always of the Garden of Gethsemane. But this was apparently not a common name in John's day. We notice, for example, that John does not use the word "Gethsemane." Again—this is even more significant—neither Matthew, Mark, nor Luke uses the word "garden." The full name by which we know this place, the Garden of Gethsemane, never occurs anywhere. What is more, it is never referred to as a garden except in John's Gospel.

Is this particular way of referring to Gethsemane only a peculiarity? Or is more involved?

West of Eden

I would say that it is possible, if not probable, that John is suggesting a contrast between the Garden of Gethsemane, in which Christ so clearly triumphed, and the Garden of Eden, in which the father of the human race fell so sorely. Moreover, let me point out that I am not the first to think this. This was a popular interpretation of John 18:1 by the church fathers and is one that occurs in the works of commentators and expositors from subsequent generations.

Arthur W. Pink draws the contrast out at some length: "The entrance of Christ into the Garden at once reminds us of Eden. The contrasts between them are indeed most striking. In Eden, all was delightful; in Gethsemane, all was terrible. In Eden, Adam and Eve parleyed with Satan; in Gethsemane, the last Adam sought the face of His Father. In Eden, Adam sinned; in Gethsemane, the Savior suffered. In Eden, Adam fell; in Gethsemane, the Redeemer conquered. The conflict in Eden took place by day; the conflict in Gethsemane was waged at night. In the one, Adam fell before Satan; in the other, the soldiers fell before Christ. In Eden the race was lost; in Gethsemane Christ announced, 'Of them whom thou gavest me have I lost none' (John 18:9). In Eden, Adam took the fruit from Eve's hand; in Gethsemane, Christ received the cup from His Father's hand. In Eden, Adam hid himself; in Gethsemane, Christ boldly showed Himself. In Eden, God sought Adam; in Gethsemane, the last Adam sought God! From Eden Adam was 'driven'; from Gethsemane Christ was 'led.' In Eden the 'sword' was drawn (Gen. 3:24); in Gethsemane the 'sword' was sheathed (John 18:11)."

Good versus Evil

We may begin by contrasting the circumstances of Adam and Eve as they faced their trial in Eden with Jesus' circumstances in Gethsemane. It is a contrast between good and evil, or as Pink says, between that which was "delightful" and that which was "terrible."

We remember that Adam and Eve had entered Eden at the peak of God's creative activity. They had a world without sin or death and thus perfect in every way. God had made the man and woman vice-regents over this world, giving them explicit dominion over "the fish of the sea and the birds of the air, over the livestock, over all the earth, and over all the creatures that move along the ground" (Gen. 1:26). Adam and Eve had all this without any threat or even suggestion of a lessening of God's great favors. Yet, turning from this overwhelmingly delightful prospect, they sinned.

By contrast, Jesus faced what Adam and Eve could not even begin to imagine: first, physical death in what is probably the most prolonged and excruciating form known to man, and second, spiritual death, from which even his highly disciplined and divinely motivated soul shrank in deep horror. The full measure of what was before Christ is seen in his great agony, bloody sweat, and heart-breaking prayer ("My Father, if it be possible, may this cup be taken from me," Matt. 26:39; cf. Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42). Nevertheless, Jesus did not turn from this but embraced it willingly for our salvation.

God versus Satan

The second gripping contrast between Adam and Eve's conduct in Eden and Christ's conduct in Gethsemane is that our first parents spent their time talking to Satan while Jesus spent his time talking with God. The need for prayer seems to be something that was very much on Christ's mind, for all his actions are geared to meeting it. He leaves Jerusalem for this, a quiet place where he was accustomed often to go, presumably to pray (John 18:2). He separates himself from the larger number of his disciples. He admonishes them to pray (Luke 22:40). Then he prays earnestly himself, returning to pray twice more after interrupting himself to encourage the disciples in their own vigil. Clearly, Jesus felt the need for prayer. But Adam and Eve, though on the brink of that sin that would condemn the race, did not pray. Rather they seemed oblivious to the danger as they communed with Satan.

Why did Christ feel the need for such prayer? Clearly because he felt the force of temptation. We must not think, just because we have the story of the temptation of Christ by Satan at the very start of his ministry (Matt. 4:1-11; Mark 1:12-13; Luke 4:1-13), that Jesus was therefore never tempted again. On the contrary, on one occasion he identified a rebuke by Peter as one of Satan's disguised temptations (Matt. 16:23). And even on this occasion he seems to have temptation in mind, for he admonishes the disciples to pray lest they be drawn into it (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38; Luke 22:40, 46).

To what was he tempted? Here we can only speculate, and that carefully, for where Scripture is silent we must say little. Yet we can imagine that the central temptation would be to leave the work of the atonement undone or else seek the accomplishment of our salvation by some other means. The prayer itself seems to suggest the former—"If it be possible, may this cup be taken from me." The former temptation by Satan in the wilderness suggests the latter—"All this will I give you, if you will bow down and worship me" (Matt. 4:9).

Or again, maybe the temptation was to feel abandoned both by God and men. If this was the nature of Christ's temptation, it would explain the appearance of the angel to strengthen him, for the angel would signify that despite appearances he was not alone.

The lesson for us is not in the nature of his temptations, though ours are often quite similar: to avoid God's work, to attempt to do it in a way other than the way God has mandated, to feel abandoned. Rather, it is in Christ's dependence on prayer. Do we thus value prayer? Do we pray earnestly? Or do we dally with Satan, as Adam and Eve did, or sleep on, as the disciples did?

Two Fell, One Conquered

The third point of contrast between Adam and Eve, on the one hand, and the Lord Jesus Christ, on the other, is also obvious. They fell while he conquered. How soon did they fall? Almost instantly, it would appear. Satan presented his arguments, and they quickly ate the forbidden fruit. Jesus, on the other hand, wrestled in prayer and only prevailed at the end.

Matthew gives us the clearest statement of Christ's prevailing grace in prayer, for he shows progress in Christ's thought and attitude from one prayer to the next. Christ's first prayer, which Matthew records in 26:39 is that the cup that God had poured for him might be taken away, if that should be possible. The actual words are: "My Father, if it be possible, may this cup be taken from me. Yet not as I will, but as you will." The second prayer, offered after he had come back to find the disciples asleep and had admonished them to "watch and pray" with him, employed nearly the same words as the first but without the explicit request that the cup be removed: "My Father, if it is not possible for this cup to be taken away unless I drink it, may your will be done" (v. 42). The third prayer—which, however, is not recorded—must have been to the effect, "I know now that you have given me this cup and that it is your will that I drink it; therefore, I will drink it completely." We know that Jesus must have come to this point, for immediately after this he rose up and went forth to meet those who were coming to seize him.

How long did this take? Today we can read the entire account of this prayer, beginning with Matthew 26:39 and ending with Matthew 26:44, in less than one minute, reading slowly. But Jesus probably prayed at least one hour if not three. For when he came to awake Peter after his first period of prayer, he asked, "Could you men not keep watch with me for one hour?" (v. 40).
This seems to suggest that he prayed for about one hour during this first period of prayer and possibly an equal amount during each of the other two. It was only after this that he apparently came to embrace the will of God fully in the matter of his death.

I have no doubt that this conflict, like all the other incidents in Scripture, was recorded for our benefit. And when I ask, "But what benefit are we to derive from it?" I realize that it is to show us how we too may prevail in prayer when we are cast down, distressed, and tempted. Often that phrase, to "prevail in prayer," is used as though it means that we are to keep at prayer until God at last does what we desire. But that is not how Christ prevailed. He kept at prayer until—I speak of Christ's humanity—his will was conformed to God's will, for that was the victory.

We too shall have troubles. Temptations will come; there will be crosses to bear. But we will have victory when, through a submission of our will to God in prayer, we embrace with willing hearts whatever God has for us. In that case, it will not be our will versus God's, as was the case with Adam. Rather it will be God's will and ours together, as was the case with the Son of God and the Father.

The Fruit of the Cup

One of the contrasts Pink makes is particularly suggestive, for he points out that "Adam took the fruit from Eve's hand" while "in Gethsemane, Christ received the cup from his Father's hand." This leads me to state as a great biblical principle that it is always better to have the cup of life from God's hand, no matter what it contains, than anything else, however desirable, from the hand of another.

Why is this? It is because of who God is. He is the wise, all-powerful, loving God of the universe, the one who truly wishes our good and in addition to that also knows what the good is and how to effect it. Others may wish us well, or they may not. But even if they do, what they choose or recommend for us is not necessarily what turns out to be beneficial in the long run. We think of Eve as she looked upon the fruit and "saw that the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom" and then took of the fruit and gave it to her husband also (Gen. 3:6). But the tree that seemed to be desirable from the human perspective actually brought death to the race. On the other hand, the cup presented to Christ— although it contained both physical and spiritual death and although it was, in the world's eyes, not a thing of wisdom, but rather of foolishness—this cup was actually life and wisdom for God's people.

Not One Lost

The final contrast of these many contrasts between Adam and Eve in Eden and Christ in Gethsemane is the most significant. It is simply that Adam and Eve by their sin plunged the race into misery. They fell and carried their progeny over the cliff of sin into destruction. Christ, on the other hand, stood firm. He did not sin, nor did he shrink from his work. As a result, he saved all whom the Father had given him. In Adam all were lost. Christ could say, "Those you gave me I have kept. None of them is lost."

But why should I tell it? Let us permit the Apostle to the Gentiles to tell it, for this contrast forms the basis of that magnificent statement of the superiority of Christ to Adam, found in Romans 5:12-21. In those verses he writes, Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned—for before the law was given, sin was in the world. But sin is not taken into account when there is no law. Nevertheless, death reigned from the time of Adam to the time of Moses, even over those who did not sin by breaking a command, as did Adam, who was a pattern of the one to come.

But the gift is not like the trespass. For if the many died by the trespass of the one man, how much more did God's grace and the gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, overflow to the many! Again, the gift of God is not like the result of the one man's sin: The judgment followed one sin and brought condemnation, but the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification. For if, by the trespass of the one man, death reigned through that one man, how much more will those who receive God's abundant provision of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life through the one man, Jesus Christ.

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous.

The law was added so that the trespass might increase. But where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

That is precisely it. That is the meaning of Gethsemane. One writer puts it this way, "Sin, death, and judgment flowed from the act of Adam. Righteousness, life, and kingship flow from the cross of Christ. The sin of Adam was a stone cast into a pool which sent ripples to every inlet. The cross of Christ was the rock of ages cast into the ocean of the love of God, and it is the destiny of all who are in Christ to be carried on the swell of this majestic love and life and power both now and forever."

Chapter 224.
Judas, Who Betrayed Him

John 18:2

In our first two studies of the last segment of John's Gospel (chapters 18-21) we have dealt for the most part with theology. That is, we have discussed the meaning of Christ's suffering, viewing it as a triumph rather than a tragedy and contrasting it to the circumstances surrounding the fall of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. This was necessary because this is the perspective with which John himself views the crucifixion, and we must begin here if we are to understand this last and most important section of his narrative.

But it is not only theology that enters into these last chapters. In fact, on the surface theology is not spoken about at all. Rather they are history. They tell what happened during these last hours and days of Jesus' earthly life. They tell who and what and why. Consequently, they are to be studied as history primarily, though in conjunction with that we must necessarily see what these events mean for Christianity.

This is of great importance. Sometimes in our Christian preaching and witnessing the events of these climactic days of Christ's life are allowed to pass almost imperceptibly into the realm of mere ideas with the result that the historical base and, therefore, truthfulness of Christianity evaporates. But these are not ideas only. They are facts. They are presented to us in Gospels, which are purportedly "good news" accounts of what actually transpired. Only by keeping the full importance of these events as history do we have something that may legitimately be proclaimed as good news to sinners.

Why Judas?

In a sense we were in the midst of the final events even before beginning our study of chapter 18.
For as far back as chapter 12, Jesus has set these in motion by means of his dramatic entry into Jerusalem on what we have come to term Palm Sunday. Ever since then Jesus has been preparing his disciples for the end, and equally important, his enemies among the rulers of the people have been plotting to destroy him. With chapter 18, these events actually get underway, for the forces of antagonism now break forth to effect Christ's arrest, trial, condemnation, and crucifixion.

As John relates his version of the story he begins with Judas. Judas is the one who betrayed Jesus, as each of the Gospel writers knows, and it was his activity, first in conferring with the chief priests and then in leading the arresting party to the Garden of Gethsemane, that actually made the arrest of Jesus possible. What about Judas? What precisely was his role in all this, beyond the mere fact of his betrayal? To put the matter in its baldest form, why was Judas and his betrayal necessary for the chief priests at all?

To this question two answers are usually given, either that Judas was necessary in order to lead the arresting party to Christ's hiding place during these last days or else that he was necessary in order to assure a secret arrest because of the leaders' fear of the people. But this is not as clear a matter as one might suppose. To begin with, as Frank Morison has pointed out in a very popular study of the historical forces leading to the crucifixion of Christ, "To regard Judas merely as a common informer, ready (for a consideration) to lead the authorities to the secret hiding place of his erstwhile Friend and Leader, is absurd." For Jesus was not in hiding. In fact, he can hardly have been more open. Earlier he had removed himself from the dangerous vicinity of Jerusalem, knowing that his hour was not yet fully come (John 11:54). But from the moment he had arrived in Bethany from Jericho on the Friday preceding his crucifixion no attempt seems to have been made to conceal his movements at all. The resurrection of Lazarus, which took place on that day, was done openly. On the next day, Saturday, many came to see him and talk both to him and Lazarus. On Sunday Jesus entered Jerusalem with great display while those who were with him and those who came out from the city to greet him cried out, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! Blessed is the King of Israel!" (John 12:13). On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday he had traveled back and forth openly.

Under these circumstances how could it be that the leaders of the people needed Judas, still less would have been willing to pay him money, to tell them where Jesus was? Obviously, if they had felt free to arrest Jesus, the leaders could have done so in Jerusalem at nearly any unguarded moment. Or they could easily have sent to Bethany and have arrested him there.

It is possible at this point to introduce the other common explanation of Judas's role: to effect the arrest of Christ in secret for fear of the people. But this is at best a half-truth, as Morison indicates. True, there was undoubtedly a real fear on the part of the chief priests and Pharisees of what the people might do. There was fear of a disturbance that might cause the intervention of the Roman armies with dire consequences for them. Even greater, there was fear that the vast multitudes in Jerusalem might actually believe on Jesus. Earlier the leaders had said, "What are we accomplishing? Here is this man performing many miraculous signs. If we let him go on like this, everyone will believe in him, and then the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation" (John 11:47-48). Out of that council had come the decision to have Jesus killed. But surely there were other times at which these leaders might have taken Jesus secretly—in Bethany in the early morning or late evening, on the road between Bethany and Jerusalem, in a quiet corner of the capital, even in the upper room. That they did not do this but rather relied on Judas to bring them information necessary to achieve the arrest suggests that there were other and even more important factors.

Fear of Jesus

Here Morison makes a suggestion that is of great value in determining why events moved as they did. He says, "Personally, I am convinced that beneath the ostensible and acknowledged fear of the people, there was a deeper and more potent fear—a fear that explains all their singular hesitancies and vacillations, until a welcome message reached their astonished ears—the fear of Christ Himself."

There are two senses in which this must have been true. In the first place, these shrewd leaders of the people could not have been unaware of Christ's unusual appeal to the masses. Like John the Baptist before him, Jesus had preached on occasion to great crowds of people, some of whom would travel considerable distances to hear him. On at least one and possibly more occasions in Galilee, those who heard him had been fed by him and wanted to make him a king, a political Messiah. He had turned them down then. But who could tell what would happen if for some reason Jesus should decide that he really would assume a messianic role? Moreover, suppose he should decide to make his bid in Jerusalem at this feast? It would not seem at all impossible to the Jewish leaders that Jesus might well whip the expectations of the city to a new peak of excitement and frenzy, particularly since he seemed already to have launched himself on such a course by entering the capital on a donkey the previous Sunday.

This would not be their only or worst fear, however. There was also the matter of Christ's undeniable, supernatural power. Early in his ministry they had, like true skeptics, denied the miracles or else, as in the case of the man born blind, attributed them to some unrelated intervention by God (John 9:24). But by this point they were openly acknowledging the miracles and were afraid of them.

Moreover, there had been the matter of their former unsuccessful attempts to arrest him. John reports several of these, though there may have been others. On one occasion a body of officers, who probably were temple guards, was dispatched by the chief priests to take him. But after a while they returned with the task undone. "Why didn't you bring him in?" they were asked.

Their reply was an incredible reply for soldiers. "No man ever spoke the way this man does" was their answer (cf. John 7:32, 45-49).

Later, at the end of chapter 8, another move was made against Christ, this time to stone him. "But Jesus," we are told, "hid himself, slipping away from the temple grounds" (v. 59). A third time we are told that "again they tried to seize him, but he escaped their grasp" (10:39).

What would the rulers have been thinking as a result of their abortive attempts to take Jesus? Probably they would not have voiced their most fundamental fear, even to themselves. But they must have been fearing —because of Christ's obvious power and their own earlier failures— that in the ultimate analysis he might perhaps be unarrestable? Unarrestable! If this were the case, it would explain their failure to do anything during the earlier part of this last Passover week, their final abrupt decision that very nearly failed, and their use of Judas.

The Time Element

The one thing that is immediately apparent to anyone who studies carefully the circumstances of Jesus' arrest and trial is that they were all greatly rushed. This is apparent from the fact that the first trial (or hearing) was held at night, which was illegal under Jewish law regarding capital cases. It is also apparent from the fact that in order to try Jesus' case, Pilate was prevailed upon to come out of his palace early on what would normally not have been a trial day. Even more significantly, it is evident from the case itself, which was obviously unprepared. Judicially, the case was a blunder, for it was obviously failing until Caiaphas hit upon the illegal but brilliant stroke of interrogating the witness himself. The result was that, when challenged in the name of Jehovah, Jesus declared his divinity and was convicted on a charge of blasphemy (Matt. 26:6366; Mark 14:60-64; Luke 22:70-71).

Briefly put, the problem the leaders faced was that they were arresting Jesus so close to the Passover sabbath that it was a matter of real difficulty to hold the two trials (their own and the Roman) and have him condemned and executed before the Passover began at what I believe to be sundown on Thursday. Their solution was to hold an initial hearing at night and the formal trial, followed by the Roman trial, at the earliest possible moment the next morning. But why did they wait that long? Or why, assuming that they compressed the events in order to get the whole thing out of the way as quickly as possible, were they not better prepared when they actually made their move against Jesus?

The only reasonable explanation is that they had not been planning on making an arrest before the Passover but that Judas had somehow brought them information that led them to think that, in spite of the difficulties, this was indeed the opportunity they had been waiting for. What might Judas have said? Here, of course, we are only speculating, for the Scriptures do not give us his exact words. But if we remember that Jesus had been talking about his forthcoming death in Judas's presence, and if we remember the leaders' fear of perhaps not being able to effect Christ's arrest, which they may well have shared with Judas earlier, it is entirely possible that Judas left the upper room with the message: 'Jesus is thinking and talking about death. He has been suggesting this for some time, but he is now talking as if his death is imminent. I would say that the mood of surrender is upon him. If you move now, without delay, I think he would willingly go with you and your worst fears would be resolved. Moreover, he is going to go to Gethsemane at the foot of the Mount of Olives and will wait there until I come. Hurry and make your arrangements. I will lead you to him."

At this point the question would have been whether or not the necessary arrangements could be made in time. There had to be a preliminary hearing at which the accusation could be worked out. The Sanhedrin would have to be gathered. And then, most important of all, they would have to determine whether Pilate, the Roman governor, would consent to hear a capital case early the next morning on what would normally not have been a court day. Someone would have to go and ask him, probably Caiaphas himself. Meanwhile, the arresting party would have to be aroused and set in order. When we view the events in this light we can see why so much time elapsed between Judas's departure from the upper room and Christ's eventual arrest in the Garden at least three hours later.

During this time, Jesus was clearly waiting in the Garden for his arrest instead of going back over the Mount of Olives to Bethany as was his custom. He waited while Judas carried his message, the leaders made their arrangements, and the arresting party made its way out of the city to seize him.

Who Killed Jesus?

All this has bearing upon two very important matters. First, it indicates that Jesus was in control of these events from the beginning. They did not come upon him by accident, but rather he willed them in conformity to his knowledge of the will of his Father. We have seen this truth already. Clearly, when Jesus came up to Bethany from Jericho, as he did on the preceding Friday, and then raised Lazarus, he precipitated the final decision of the leaders to have him killed. He did so knowingly. When he rode into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday he carried the confrontation a step farther. When he cleansed the temple, as the synoptic Gospels record (Matt. 21:12-17; Mark 11:15-18; Luke 19:45-47; cf. John 2:13-16 for an earlier incident), he further intensified the leaders' ire. On this very night, he dispatched Judas on his errand of betrayal. At last, we find him waiting in the Garden for the arrest.

Historically, there has been a heated discussion as to who killed Jesus. Gentiles who have not known their Bible too well (or the evil of their own hearts) have tried to blame the Jews. Jews (and others) have blamed the Gentiles; for it was Gentiles in the person of Pilate, the Roman governor, who actually pronounced the death sentence. Sometimes these views have led to fierce anti-Semitism or an opposite anti-Christian feeling. But these are not the most important details. In fact, they are relatively insignificant. By contrast, the most important thing that can be said about the death of Christ is that God the Father willed it. It was God who ordained that he should be killed for our sin. The second important fact is that Jesus also willed his death out of love for us and in obedience to the revealed will of his Father.

Moreover, he ordered the events of this last Passover week to indicate the meaning of what he was doing. For just as he ordered his entry into Jerusalem to correspond to the exact time at which the Passover lambs were being led up to the city, so also did he time his death to coincide with the killing of those same lambs. He was the great Passover Lamb of which they were but shadows. It was his blood, rather than theirs, which was to take away the sins of the world.

Again, there is this final lesson. It concerns Judas, who was so close to Christ and yet was unsaved. Think how close he was. He had been with Jesus for at least three years. He had heard his teaching. He had even understood his teaching; for although he had not understood the meaning of Christ's death, he had at least understood Christ's warning that he was to die. Judas was that close to Jesus. He understood his thoughts. Yet he was unsaved. I put it to you: It is possible to be quite close to Christ, to sit in a Christian church listening to good sermons, to hear good Bible teaching by radio, even to understand what you hear, and yet fail to make that personal commitment to Christ that is the necessary human response to God's work of salvation.

How foolish it is to come that close and yet be lost. How much wiser, by contrast, to put your faith in that One who is altogether lovely and who willingly died for your salvation.

Chapter 225.
The Arrest!

John 18:3-11

I do not know how you might have described the arrest of Jesus of Nazareth in the Garden of Gethsemane on the night before his crucifixion had you been there to observe it, for I do not know the perspective you might have had. If you were Caiaphas, you would doubtless have reported it as a triumph: "At last we have seized him!" If you were the captain of the band of soldiers who actually effected the arrest, you might have reported it quite factually: "Fourteenth of Nisan, eleven thirty P.M., arrested, one prisoner, Jesus of Nazareth." I do know, however, that if you had been John the evangelist and if you had been led in your writing by the Holy Spirit, as he was, you would have reported that, from beginning to end Jesus, and not his captors, was in complete charge of the situation. It was he who delayed in the Garden while the arresting party was coming. It was he who went forth to meet them, thereby surrendering himself voluntarily. Moreover, even at the very moment of the arrest, he showed his control over circumstances, for he demonstrated power toward the soldiers, grace toward his own disciples, and mercy to those who were (perhaps unwittingly in this case) his enemies.

It is a ludicrous situation, men with weapons coming forward to arrest the Son of God, and John does not allow us to miss the irony. We remember, for example, that it is John who has stressed more than any other Gospel writer that Jesus is the light of this world. He has done that in the opening chapter, where the word "light" in reference to Jesus occurs six times in just nine verses. Later he twice quotes Christ's own claim to be "the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5). Now those of the darkness come in the darkness with "lanterns and torches" to seek him out.

Moreover, they come with weapons. From his enemies' point of view, these were no doubt thought to be necessary. His enemies were afraid of Christ and were worried about what might happen if he should choose to resist them. They were right to be worried. If he chose to resist them, no weapons would have been sufficient. Jesus was arrested, so John clearly indicates, because he willingly chose to give himself up to die to save us.

Today also those who are the enemies of Christ depend on equally foolish lights and weapons. It is not literal lamps upon which our contemporaries rely, of course. It is rather the light of "progress" or the light of "reason." But however valuable these lights may be in purely human terms, they are clearly foolish when arrayed against him who is himself the Light. His light cannot be extinguished by our lights, for ours owe their existence to him. He is the source of all light and reason. Thus, our thinking runs to foolishness when we fail to acknowledge him, as Paul indicates in Romans when he says that having refused to glorify God as God, men and women became vain in their imaginations, "and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (1:21-23). Similarly, human weapons, which the enemies of Christ frequently resort to when reason fails, are also useless.

God's Power

John is not especially interested in the weakness of men, however. What he is really interested in is the power of Jesus, which he conveys by a rather remarkable incident. It is an incident that none of the other Gospels relates. John writes that Jesus, having seen the approaching soldiers and knowing all that was in store for him, went forth to them and initiated the arrest by a question: "Who is it you want?"

It must have been dark in the Garden in spite of the full moon of Passover (or else a supernatural blindness had been placed upon Christ's enemies), for they did not fully recognize him. If they had, they would have replied, "You! We seek you." Instead they answered, 'Jesus of Nazareth."

At this point, according to John, Jesus answered by saying "I am" ("he" is not in the Greek text), and immediately, so we are told, the arresting party "drew back and fell to the ground," where they remained until Jesus apparently released them by asking his question once again.

What produced this strange reaction? It may be, as some commentators have argued, that it is really not a miracle. There have been cases where the hand of an evil person has been stayed momentarily by the innocence or overbearing presence of the one to be victimized. Kings have sometimes had this effect on mere soldiers of the enemy. Executioners have sometimes been unable to strike an innocent person. Alexander Maclaren, who explores this line of thought in his commentary, writes, "There must have been many in that band who had heard him, though, in the uncertain light of quivering moonbeams and smoking torches, they failed to recognize him till he spoke. There must have been many more who had heard of him, and many who suspected that they were about to lay hands on a holy man, perhaps on a prophet. There must have been reluctant tools among the inferiors, and no doubt among the leaders whose consciences needed but a touch to be roused to action. To all, his calmness and dignity would appeal, and the manifest freedom from fear or desire to flee would tend to deepen the strange thoughts which began to stir in their hearts." Thoughts like these may well have caused Christ's captors to fall back in dismay or consternation.

But this does not seem to be the whole of the picture, as Maclaren also recognizes, for John does not merely say that the officers and soldiers paused for a moment in their efforts to arrest Jesus. He says that they actually stepped backward and fell to the ground. Moreover, and this is of great importance, they did so in response not merely to Christ's presence but rather to the majestic words he uttered: "I am" or (as most of our translations have it) "I am he."

Is this significant? It is if we remember that the meaning of the great name of God, Jehovah, revealed to Moses at the burning bush at the time of God's commissioning him to lead the people of Israel out of Egypt, is "I am that I am." It is a form of the verb "to be." Thus, when Jesus replied to his enemies by saying, "I am," it may well have been that he used his own great name, Jehovah, the name above every name (Phil. 2:9-11), and that hearing this name uttered by the God-man threw the arresting party into utter confusion and rendered them helpless even to stand before him.

Maclaren says, "I am inclined to think that here, as there [he is thinking of the transfiguration], though under such widely different circumstances and to such various issues, there was for a moment a little rending of the veil of his flesh, and an emission of some flash of the brightness that always tabernacled within him; and that, therefore, just as Isaiah, when he saw the King in his glory, said, 'Woe is me, for I am undone!' and just as Moses could not look upon the Face, but could only see the back parts, so here the one stray beam of manifest divinity that shot through the crevice, as it were, for an instant, was enough to prostrate with a strange awe even those rude and insensitive men. When he said, 'I am He,' there was something that made them feel, 'This is One before whom violence cowers abashed, and in whose presence impurity has to hide its face.'"

It is a great contrast, this revelation of the glory and power of Jesus at the very moment of his arrest in Gethsemane, but it is only one more example of the paradox of the incarnation found throughout the pages of the Word of God. We look to his birth and see a picture of human weakness, a baby lying in a manger. But we turn to the fields of Bethlehem and find that birth announced by angels. He is born poor, but a star leads eastern kings to present their gold, frankincense, and myrrh. At his baptism he identified himself with those who repent of their sins; but he had no sin, and a voice from heaven is heard declaring, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). He is so exhausted that he falls asleep in the back of a boat that soon is pitching wildly in a storm on Galilee. The disciples, seasoned fishermen, are frightened. They wake him, and he immediately calms the waves. At the grave of Lazarus, Jesus weeps, but then he speaks the word in power and the dead man comes forth in resurrection. In the Garden he prays in agony that if it might be possible this cup should pass from him. But moments later he goes forth to confront his enemies and overpower them with the sheer force of his presence.

This strange blending of opposites is a clue to the first reason why Jesus did what he did on this occasion. It was to show at this important moment that he was more than man. Man? Yes, but also God manifest in flesh. He would have it known that it was as God as well as man that he was about to die for our salvation. He must be a man to die. But he must also be God if that death was to be adequate as a ransom price for our sin. This he declares at the moment of his capture.

Second, the incident of his display of power over his enemies shows that his death is voluntary and not coerced. If he had been unwilling to die, no amount of troops or weapons could ever have forced him. He could have walked away as he did on numerous former occasions.

Finally, Jesus acted as he did to make it clear that those who were arresting him and those who stood behind their action by commanding it were without excuse. Some in the arresting party may never have seen Christ before. But they will never be able to plead that they were without any indication as to who he was. They were not ignorant of his divine glory. Thus, if they continued on their way after he had released them from their bondage to his power, it was because they did not want to recognize or heed the truth and not because it was unknown to them. So also will it be in the day of Christ's second appearing. In that day too his deity will be made manifest and the guilt and sinful intransigence of man will be exposed. That will be a day of judgment and not of grace. Today is the time to turn from sin and acknowledge him both as Savior and Lord.

Grace for Christ's Disciples

There is also a second feature of the arrest of Christ that the other Gospel writers overlook. He commands the officers and soldiers that since it is he they had come to take, his disciples should be allowed to go their way (v. 8). This is a statement of grace toward his disciples—effective grace. Those whom he had protected were allowed to go their own way so that, as John says,
"The words he had spoken would be fulfilled: 'I have not lost one of these you gave me'" (v. 9). The reference is to the statements of John 6:39 and 17:12.

When John calls attention to the statements of Christ given earlier he is, of course, broadening the protecting grace of Christ from this one incident in which only the eleven disciples were protected to that general exercise of God's grace in which all Christ's people are saved. It is true that Jesus did protect the eleven, for without a doubt these soldiers and officers had intended to arrest the disciples too. We know this because Mark tells us of their attempt to seize a certain young man who was wrapped in a linen cloth but who left it in their hands and fled away naked when they laid hands upon him (Mark 14:51-52). Nevertheless, as John quotes Jesus on this occasion he is also aware that this is but one small example of a greater protection by which Jesus constantly preserves those of all ages whom the Father has given him.

How does Jesus exercise this persevering grace toward those who had believed in him? Here are a number of verses that tell us what God is able to do and therefore will do for his people. Hebrews 7:25—"Therefore he is completely able to save those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them." Second Timothy 1:12—"He is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day." Hebrews 2:18—"Because he himself suffered when he was tempted, he is able to help those who are being tempted." Philippians 3:20-21—"The Lord Jesus Christ, who, by the power that enables him to bring everything under his control, will transform our lowly bodies so that they will be like his glorious body." Jude 24-25—"To him who is able to keep you from falling and to present you before his glorious presence without fault and with great joy—to the only God our Savior be glory, majesty, power, and authority through Jesus Christ our Lord, before all ages, now and forevermore! Amen."

When we put these verses together they tell us that Jesus shows his effective, persevering grace with us by lifting us from the darkness of this world into his own marvelous light, by interceding for us in heaven, by guarding our spiritual deposits, by seeing us through temptation, by saving even our bodies at the time of the last resurrection, and by bringing us at last and without blemish into the presence of his own and the Father's glory. He does this by placing himself between us and our enemies.

Mercy to All

There is one final incident in John's account of Christ's arrest that is, unlike the first two incidents, narrated by each of the other Gospel writers also. It concerns Peter who, when he saw that Jesus was about to be arrested, quickly drew the sword he was wearing and swung at the young man leading the column. No doubt Peter intended to strike off his head. But the young man ducked—his name was Malchus, a servant of the high priest, Caiaphas—and so lost only his ear. Luke tells us, in reporting the full account, that Jesus then touched his ear and healed him (Luke 22:51). John adds that he also rebuked Peter, saying, "Put your sword away! Shall I not drink the cup the Father gives me?" (18:11).

As we look at this incident we see many truths in it. One lesson is the folly of that fleshly activity that, insensitive to God's plan and purposes, seeks to strike out in God's defense. Peter's zeal for Christ was not conditioned by knowledge, which was the inevitable outcome of his failure in the preceding hours to observe Christ's command to him to "watch and pray" (Matt. 26:41). He was courageous but ignorant. Later he would not even be courageous, for he would deny Christ before a servant. Peter failed. And so shall we if our zeal is not nurtured upon the knowledge that Christ gives and is not strengthened by him.

This and other lessons aside, surely the greatest truth of this incident is that Jesus was here showing mercy even to his enemies, and this even at the time they came to thrust him toward his execution.

In this last verse Jesus speaks of "the cup the Father gives me." It is one of two cups spoken of often in Scripture. One is the cup of salvation. It is mentioned in Psalm 116:13 ("I will lift up the cup of salvation and call on the name of the Lord"). The other cup is the cup of God's wrath or tribulation, which is referred to here. Earlier Jesus had prayed that this cup might pass from him (Matt. 26:39). Two cups: the cup of salvation and the cup of God's wrath! Every person who has ever lived shall drink from one of them. But those who drink of the cup of salvation by God's grace will drink of it only because Jesus drank the cup of God's wrath in their place.

Chapter 226.
The Jewish Trial

John 18:12-14

Something about trials, particularly great trials that set precedent and determine the flow of history, uniquely captures and enthralls people's minds. For example, in all of American history, probably no single event has created so much interest nor sustained it for so long a time as the inevitable outworking of justice following the break-in at the Democratic campaign headquarters in the Watergate complex in Washington, D.C., on the night of June 16, 1972, culminating in the resignation of President Richard M. Nixon, effective August 9, 1974, over two years later.

True, the chief defendant never came to trial, though scores of his staff and other underlings did. But the issue revolved about this president—his character, politics, and abuse of power. It was that issue that kept the American electorate enthralled for this long period. At times the press seemed to cover little else. When, at the peak of the investigations, the Ervin Committee began televised hearings in the Senate Caucus Room (on May 17, 1973), the nation almost stopped its regular work to follow the day-by-day revelations. Businessmen brought television sets to their offices. Bars tuned their sets to these historic deliberations. Even in the nation's capital, public hearings were suspended. In the evenings, the Public Broadcasting Service reran portions of the day's hearings for the nighttime television audience and as a result experienced the greatest response to any programming in its history—82,000 letters and over $1,250,000 in new memberships and contributions. The Ervin Committee itself received letters at a rate of between 1,000 and 9,000 per day, and by November the total topped 1,000,000. Besides what other investigative bodies spent, the Ervin Committee alone spent at least $1,500,000.

This unique interest in the outcome of some monumental trial is also observable in ancient history and in our own abiding interest in those ancient events. Several trials come to mind— Socrates before the leaders of Athens, Charles I facing a sober but liberty-minded English Parliament, Alfred Dreyfus in France, Aaron Burr, Mary Stuart, the defendants at Nuremberg.

These trials have engaged the minds and imaginations of millions. Yet, no trial has so challenged our race or so charged our emotions as the trial of Jesus by the Jewish and Roman authorities in Palestine.

Walter M. Chandler, a former member of the New York bar of lawyers and author of an excellent book on the trial of Jesus, has written, "These [other] trials, one and all, were tame and commonplace, compared with the trial and crucifixion of the Galilean peasant, Jesus of Nazareth. These were earthly trials, on earthly issues, before earthly courts. The trial of the Nazarene was before the high tribunals of both heaven and earth; before the Great Sanhedrin, whose judges were the master-spirits of a divinely commissioned race; before the court of the Roman Empire that controlled the legal and political rights of men throughout the known world, from Scotland to Judea and from Dacia to Abyssinia."

It is of great importance that we study the trial of Jesus thoroughly. We study it because of its interest and its obvious implications. We ask: Was it rightly done? Was Jesus guilty as charged? Or was he innocent? What were the charges against the prisoner? Were proper procedures followed or were they violated? And—which is perhaps the most important question of all— what does this have to say to us about our own systems of law and our relationships to Jesus?

Two Trials

We must begin with a general overview of the events in which the trial (literally, trials) took place. These have four main features.

First, there was the arrest, which has already been discussed in the previous chapter. This took place on the evening before the Jewish Passover in the year A.D. 30, probably on Wednesday, April 5. This would have been late, at eleven or twelve o'clock at night. It occurred through the agency of a band of temple officers or Roman soldiers who were guided by Judas.

Second, there was the Jewish trial. This had three separate parts. First, there was a preliminary hearing by night before Annas. This is what John seems to be describing in his Gospel, though the issue is somewhat confused due to his use of the phrase "the high priest" for both Annas and Caiaphas, before whom the second part of the trial was conducted. The reason for this double use of the reference is that, according to Jewish law, the high priest held his high office for life but the Romans, under whose indulgence the Jewish system of government was allowed to function, albeit somewhat impoverished, had displaced high priests who were not to their liking and had put others in their place. Thus, at the time of Christ's arrest, there were: Caiaphas (the Roman appointee), Annas (the elder high priest, who would have been recognized as the true high priest by all Jews), and others (who had also been appointed by the Romans and afterward deposed). Apparently, John describes the appearance of Jesus before Annas, at which time Jesus refused to testify against himself and was therefore unjustly struck by a minor court officer (18:19-23).

The second phase of the Jewish trial was before Caiaphas, to whom Annas had sent Jesus when he perceived that his own method of interrogation was fruitless. The trial before Caiaphas was the significant trial; therefore, it is the one described at length by the Synoptic writers (cf. Matt. 26:57-68; Mark 14:53-65; Luke 22:54). Various witnesses were brought forward who, however, could not agree on their testimony and were therefore dismissed. According to the Synoptic accounts, this trial was moving toward a swift motion of acquittal (and should have resulted in acquittal) when Caiaphas himself intervened illegally to demand of the prisoner: "I charge you under oath by the living God: Tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God" (Matt. 26:63). When Jesus, who was not under obligation to testify against himself but who nevertheless would not refuse this official challenge in the name of Jehovah, replied, "Yes, it is as you say," he was immediately convicted of blasphemy by a unanimous vote.

The third phase of the Jewish trial took place the following morning at daybreak (Matt. 27:1; Mark 15:1; Luke 22:66-71). The pertinent questioning of the previous night was reiterated formally and a judgment secured. This phase of the trial involved the entire Sanhedrin, the highest court of Judaism.

The third feature of these final events was the Roman trial. This was necessary because, although the Jewish court could convict, it could not execute and therefore had to seek Roman concurrence in its verdict. This trial also had three parts. First, there was the prearranged appearance before Pilate (Matt. 27:2, 11-14; Mark 15:1-5; Luke 23:1-5; John 18:28-38). Here, for reasons yet to be studied, the anticipations of the Jewish leaders seemed to be frustrated; for rather than proceeding with a pro forma trial and judgment, which the leaders had been led to expect, Pilate suddenly balked and tried to free the prisoner. The second part of the trial is an appearance before Herod, for when Pilate heard that Jesus was a Galilean, he tried to escape responsibility by sending Jesus to one who might be thought to have better jurisdiction (Luke 23:6-12). Herod sent Jesus back, however. So the third part of the Roman trial, the part at which Jesus was actually given over to crucifixion (though he had not been convicted of anything and was, in fact, pronounced innocent), was before Pilate. This trial, the crucial one, is recorded by all the Gospel writers (Matt. 27:15-26; Mark 15:6-15; Luke 23:13-25; John 18:39-19:16).

The final feature of these events was the crucifixion, the execution of the sentence of the two courts.

Hebrew Law

It is evident from this brief survey of the features of Christ's arrest, trial, and execution, that the first major concern of the student with these events should be the Jewish trial. But it is impossible to understand this trial apart from at least a rudimentary knowledge of Hebrew law and legal practice.

Unfortunately, this is not such an easy subject to familiarize oneself with. To begin with, there is a double base for Hebrew law: the Mosaic law (or Pentateuch), and the Talmud, or oral (not written) law, built upon it. Again, the Talmudic law is of great volume and is very complex. It has two parts: the Mishnah, which is the basic law, and the Gemara, which is what we would call a commentary upon it. The relation between the Gemara and the Mishnah might be compared to the debate over a proposed law in the United States Congress, preserved in the Congressional Record, and the law that results. Only in the case of the Talmud, the law comes first and the Gemara follows. A further complication is that there are actually two Talmuds, the Babylonian Talmud and the Jerusalem Talmud. The Jerusalem Talmud was written down first (in the fourth century). The Babylonian Talmud was written down in the fifth century and is four times longer. Published in English translation and in contemporary format, the Babylonian Talmud might occupy as many as four hundred volumes. Moreover, as if the matter were not difficult enough, there is a puzzling question as to which laws eventually expressed in the Mishnah were actually followed in judicial proceedings at the time of Jesus.

On the other hand, in dealing with the trial of Jesus the matter is not really as difficult as these comments make it sound. For one thing, we need only deal with Hebrew law in the matter of a crime punishable by death, a capital offense, and not with the many hundreds of other matters dealt with in the Talmud. For another, many able scholars have already sifted through this material and summarized the relevant principles admirably. We may consider them under several categories:

1. The court in capital cases. The only court authorized to sit in capital cases in Israel was the Great Sanhedrin or Grand Council. It numbered seventy-one members and convened at Jerusalem. Its name was derived from the Greek word sunedrion, which denoted a legislative body gathered together to debate in a deliberate or sitting posture, but it did not date merely from the impingement of Greek culture upon the Hebrew people. Tradition placed the founding of the Great Sanhedrin in the wilderness under Moses, for Numbers 11:16-17 records God's instruction to Moses to gather together "seventy of Israel's elders" to perform judicial functions. These seventy plus Moses would have been seventy-one.

Whatever its history, the Sanhedrin certainly existed and was vested with the highest authority in religious and other national matters in Israel

(except for the authority of Rome) at the time of Jesus. The Sanhedrin was organized traditionally into three chambers—a chamber of 23 priests, a chamber of 23 scribes, and a chamber of 23 elders—though often this was not strictly followed. To these, two presiding officers were added, making a total of seventy-one. The three chambers represented the religious, legal, and democratic elements of Jewish life. This threefold division is referred to by Jesus in Matthew 16:21, which says, "From that time Jesus began to explain to his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things at the hand of the elders, chief priests and teachers of the law, and that he must be killed and on the third day be raised" (cf. Mark 14:53).

2. Qualifications of judges. Since members of the Great Sanhedrin alone were authorized to judge capital cases, the qualifications for membership in the Sanhedrin are therefore synonomous with qualifications for such judges. Some of these qualifications were obvious. The member of the Sanhedrin was to be a Hebrew of the Hebrews, that is, a full-blooded Jew born of two Jewish parents. He was to be learned in law and to have had prior legal experience. He had to be a linguist, for trials of those who did not speak Hebrew would take place and interpreters were not allowed in Jewish courts. He must be humble and of good repute. Most important, he was not to sit if he had any personal interest in the outcome of the trial. Thus, even a well-qualified member of the Sanhedrin would have to step aside temporarily if he was related to the defendant or stood to benefit from a verdict.

3. Witnesses. The qualifications of witnesses and their role in legal proceedings is perhaps the most interesting feature of Jewish law, for unlike the previous matters mentioned, in this Jewish law took a course strikingly different from Roman law and those derivative legal systems that we know today in the Western world.

First, the role of witnesses was considerably more important than in the trials we know. In our trials a witness is called upon to testify merely to what he knows, and the total case is made up of the collected testimony of whatever number of witnesses is necessary to establish the defendant's guilt or innocence. This was not true in Israel. In Hebrew law the testimony of the witness had to be complete. That is, it had to pertain to the whole of the crime of which the defendant was accused. One authority says of this system, "Even where there appeared a legal number of duly qualified witnesses, the testimony was insufficient to convict, unless they agreed not only with regard to the prisoner's offense, but also with regard to the mode of committing it. Rabbinic law does not subject a person to capital, nor even to corporal punishment, unless all witnesses charge him with one and the same criminal act, their statements fully agreeing in the main circumstances, and declaring that they saw one another, while seeing him engaged in the crime."

The second qualification for witnesses is suggested in the foregoing, namely, that there must be two or more witnesses to convict (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6-7; 19:15). This maxim is an obvious one in any legal system, but in Judaism it was carried to a heightened degree in that the witnesses had to agree on each particular or else the prisoner was to be discharged immediately.

Here certain formulas were used. First, there was an examination of the witnesses (separately, of course) in matters relating to the time and place of the alleged crime. It was called the Hakiroth and consisted of seven set questions: (1) Was it during a year of Jubilee? (2) Was it in an ordinary year? (3) In what month? (4) On what day of the month? (5) At what hour? (6) In what place? (7) Do you identify this person? The second set of questions, termed the Bedikoth, embraced all matters not brought out in the first series of questions and constituted what we might call a cross-examination. This was taken with the utmost seriousness and rigor. Thus, if one witness's testimony varied from another's testimony in even the slightest of these particulars, the testimony was immediately declared invalid. An example of this is the way in which Susanna was acquitted of the false charge of adultery in the apocryphal book of that name, when the elders who had conspired against her were unable to agree on the type of tree under which the act was supposed to have been committed. If it was clear that the testimony had been falsely borne, the witnesses were then punished with the same fate that would have fallen upon the defendant had he or she been convicted. This is what happened to the false judges who had accused Susanna.

A third characteristic of witnesses under Jewish law was that they themselves must be the accusers. This means that there were no prosecutors in Hebrew courts, no lawyers for the state. Instead, those who had seen the crime were, first, to arrange for the arrest of the criminal and, second, present the accusation before the nation's judges.

Finally, it is particularly noteworthy that they were also to have explicitly warned the defendant of the potential legal consequence of his or her crime immediately before the crime was committed. This provision of the law was termed "antecedent warning." It seems to have had three purposes: (1) to protect the potential offender against his own ignorance and rashness and thus deter the crime if possible, (2) to aid in establishing criminal intent at the later trial, and (3) to assist the judges in assessing the proper penalty. So far as is known, this maxim has no counterpart in any judicial system of any nation either ancient or modern and is, in fact, so stringent that it is impossible to see how the death penalty could have been secured against anyone in Israel except under the most extreme and unusual circumstances. And indeed, that was precisely its intent, for so highly did the Jews regard the life of an Israelite that anything that could possibly head off an execution was rigorously employed. The Mishnah says, "The Sanhedrin, which so often as once in seven years, condemns a man to death, is a slaughterhouse" (Makhoth).

4. Mode of trial. The mode of trial in capital cases is something to be considered more completely in our subsequent study of Jesus' actual trial. But we may note here a few basic requirements. First, it was to be conducted between the offering of the morning sacrifice and the offering of the evening sacrifice, that is, in daylight and with a reminder that all that was done was to be done within the clear view of God and by those who stood in a proper relationship to him. Second, the judges were never to seek to condemn the accused but were by contrast to take his side and seek every means for his acquittal. Third, the accused could not be convicted by a bare majority; rather, a majority of two (that is 37 of the total of 71 judges) was necessary. Fourth, by strange contrast, a unanimous vote for condemnation was also invalid; for this was judged to be an emotional decision based on mob action. Fifth, the initial guilty vote and the sentence could not be pronounced on the same day. Thus, assuming that the trial had led to condemnation, the assembly was then adjourned while each man went home to consider if something had not been overlooked that could bring acquittal. Only after a night had passed and the court was reassembled and a new vote taken, could the sentence be passed and the execution follow.

Even then delays were sought. Chandler writes: "If a majority of at least two votes were registered against him, he stood convicted a second time. But the humane and indulgent spirit of Hebrew law continued to operate and deferred immediate sentence. The judges continued to deliberate. No one thought of quitting the judgment hall on the second day of the trial. No one ate anything, no one drank anything on this second day. ...All the merciful tendencies of Talmudic interpretation were invoked and pleaded by the judges, the defenders of the accused. It was hoped that a few hours' time would discover facts favorable to the doomed man. New arguments, it was thought, might be offered and new witnesses might be forthcoming in his behalf."

Even as the death march left the great hall of the Sanhedrin, the judges would continue to seek for new arguments. If one occurred, the procession was immediately recalled and the new evidence considered.

Deceitful Hearts

The point of this is that Jesus was not condemned under a primitive, barbaric, or even inadequate judicial system, but under the best. He, the righteous One—the One who on one occasion demanded which of his enemies was able to convict him of sin and left them speechless—was condemned to death by the most merciful and careful system of judicial processes known to our race. If we ask, as we must, "But how could that happen? How could the very Son of God be condemned?" the answer is simply that the problem, then as now, is not so much in the system itself as it is in the hearts of those who interpret and implement the system and its codes. The human heart is "deceitful above all things and beyond cure," as Jeremiah once wrote (Jer. 17:9). It is this that circumvents the law or (as in this case) actually uses the law to destroy the innocent.

Can anything cure this sickness? Nothing human certainly! But what is impossible for men is possible for God, and it was to accomplish precisely this that Christ came. He, the innocent One, was condemned for those who were guilty. Moreover, he was condemned that they, who were sinners, might be made righteous. We are such men and women. In their shoes we too would condemn the innocent. But Jesus died for us. He redeemed us in order that we might be delivered from sin and its consequences and henceforth live for him.

Chapter 227.
The Charge against the Prisoner

John 18:19-24

If their conduct were not so reprehensible and their character so base, one could almost feel sorry for the leaders of the Sanhedrin as they assembled on the night of April 5, A.D. 30, to convict Jesus of Nazareth of crimes worthy of death. For one thing, they were obviously unprepared for the trial. If they had planned to arrest and try Jesus at this Passover, they would have done it earlier in the week when they would have had the necessary time required for such a trial under Jewish law. But instead they acted suddenly and at a relatively late hour.

That they did so was due only to the message brought to them from the upper room by Judas; but this, as we have seen, found them unprepared.

Again, there was the matter of witnesses. Where, in Jerusalem in the middle of the night, were they to find witnesses to Jesus' alleged crimes? The judges could not be witnesses themselves. Jewish law prohibited this. Witnesses would have to be rounded up quickly from those who might have heard Christ say some incriminating thing, but this would have to be done with the knowledge that the best witnesses to Christ's speech and actions were probably scattered all over the country in those many towns and villages where Jesus had conducted his itinerant ministry. Moreover, even when these witnesses were found, they would still have to provide evidence according to the strict demands of Jewish law.

Perhaps in the sudden excitement of the moment the elders, priests, and scribes thought that Jesus, being shocked and overcome by the arrest, might possibly prove his own accuser. But their hopes along this line were quickly disabused, as John, the only Gospel writer who records the first segment of the Jewish trial, the segment before Annas, indicates. Annas conducted what we would call a preliminary hearing. He asked Jesus about his disciples and his doctrine. Jesus refused to answer this series of questions, thereby indicating that he knew Jewish law—that accusations must come from witnesses and not from the accused—and that he therefore intended to be tried properly (if at all) by the laws of Israel.

John reports him as saying, "I have spoken openly to the world, I always taught in synagogues or at the temple, where all the Jews come together. I said nothing in secret. Why question me? Ask those who heard me. Surely they know what I said" (18:20-21). This was not an evasive answer, though it may sound so to us. It was merely a demand to be tried properly.

It becomes clear at this point that the court was partial. For although Jesus had spoken correctly and according to his right under law, one of the court officers immediately turned and struck him for what he considered to be Christ's impudence. "Is that any way to answer the high priest?" he demanded. Instead of replying angrily Jesus merely repeated his previous position. If there had been any wrongdoing, it should be brought forward legally and established by witnesses. If not, even the blow he had received was improper.

Christ before Caiaphas

We do not know much about Annas, who conducted this preliminary hearing. But I suspect, as I read the accounts, that he was just a bit more upright than his unscrupulous son-in-law, Caiaphas. At any rate, having met with an obstinate refusal by Jesus to testify against himself, and recognizing that Jesus both knew the law and would obviously not be terrified into a foolish mistake by silly court brutality, Annas assumed that there was nothing more that he could do and so sent the prisoner to Caiaphas. John indicates this in verse 24.

At this point, although John does not record it, the serious part of the trial began. It is this segment that the synoptic Gospels give us (Matt. 26:57-68; Mark 14:53-65; Luke 22:54). Caiaphas presided.

There were many illegalities in Christ's trial, as we are going to show in our next study, but underneath the many illegalities ran a strong undercurrent of legality in the sense of formal adherence to certain points of law. One of these was the calling of witnesses. Mark says that many "testified falsely against him," adding, "their statements did not agree" (Mark 14:56). Matthew declares, "The chief priests and the whole Sanhedrin were looking for false evidence against Jesus so that they could put him to death. But they did not find any though many false witnesses came forward" (Matt. 26:59-60). Apparently, there was a search for testimony that might have condemned Jesus, but the priests could not procure it. Clearly, valuable time was wasted in these fruitless accusations.

In Three Days

There were three categories of testimony according to the Mishnah: a vain testimony, a standing testimony, and an adequate testimony. The first of these, a vain testimony, referred to accusations that were obviously irrelevant or worthless and were therefore eliminated at once. This would be the kind of testimony which in our courts is "stricken from the record" and which the jury is instructed to "disregard." The second class of testimony, a standing testimony, is testimony with substance and relevance. It is permitted to stand until confirmed or disproved. The last category refers to evidence in which the witnesses agree together. This alone is "adequate" to convict.

According to this division, it is clear that the first accusations (the accusations of many "false witnesses") were vain testimony and hence were not even admitted provisionally. But at last two men came forward with a very explicit piece of evidence which at once put the trial on a new and promising footing. Matthew says that two accused him of saying, "I am able to destroy the temple of God and rebuild it in three days" (26:60-61). Mark says that they gave this false testimony: "We heard him say, 'I will destroy this man-made temple and in three days will build another, not made by man'" (14:57-58). This accusation was obviously of great importance.

In the first place, it was apparently true. At least, there was an element of truth in it. The fact that there were two witnesses who testified to substantially the same thing is one indication of its truthfulness. But in addition to this, in one of those unintentional and therefore particularly striking corroborations of one or more Gospels by another, John actually gives the incident in which these words were spoken. He says that on the occasion of the first cleansing of the temple, Jesus, when asked for a sign, replied, "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days," to which John then remarks, "But the temple he had spoken of was his body" (John 2:19, 21). We notice that although John does not refer to this incident in his own account of the trial, as we might expect him to do, he nevertheless gives us a piece of narration that fits the situation in the other Gospels perfectly. For this was spoken in the courtyard of the temple in Jerusalem and thus before the very types of people who were likely even at this late date still to be hanging around the temple in the service of the scribes and priests.

The second reason why this particular accusation was important in the eyes of the priests is that it was also of a serious nature. It was the kind of accusation which if substantiated would result in the penalty of death. It might be construed as sorcery, for no one could tear the temple down and then rebuild it in three days without what we might call "black magic." Again, it could also be construed as sacrilege, for the temple was the holiest place in Israel. The penalty for both of these crimes was death.

As I reflect on this charge, however, I cannot help but feel that Frank Morison is right when he suggests that there was probably more to the issue. For one thing, in spite of the various wordings used to report this saying of Jesus, the highly unlikely phrase "in three days" occurs in them all. Moreover, this is a phrase that Jesus had used on other occasions in which it was perfectly clear that he was prophesying that his resurrection would occur three days after he would be put to death. Are we to think that these statements were unknown to the high priests? Are we to think that a man as shrewd as Caiaphas was not aware of what Jesus' enigmatic saying implied? I cannot doubt that they understood precisely what he was claiming, even though they may not have had it in a form sufficiently clear to condemn him legally. They knew that he had said in effect, "You will kill me, but I will prove my divine nature and authority by rising from the dead on the third day."

After his own careful development of this position, Morison says this, "I see no escape from the logic of that conclusion. We may hold that He was mistaken; that He was held by some strange mental obsession which periodically flashed out in His public utterance. But that He said this singular and almost unbelievable thing seems to me to be very nearly beyond the possibility of doubt."

That the high priests thus understood Jesus should be demonstrated alone by their later concern to have the tomb guarded. Matthew tells us that this occurred after the crucifixion. "The next day, the one after Preparation Day, the chief priests and the Pharisees went to Pilate. 'Sir,' they said, 'we remember that while he was still alive that deceiver said, "After three days I will rise again." So give the order for the tomb to be made secure until the third day. Otherwise, his disciples may come and steal the body and tell the people that he has been raised from the dead. This last deception will be worse than the first'" (27:62-64).

So the essence of the accusation of the two witnesses was that Jesus had claimed to be God and that he was able to prove this by his own resurrection. It was a damaging accusation, a fatal one. And yet—and here is a striking fact—this testimony was legally overthrown.

Oath of the Testimony

We are not told why the testimony was overthrown. It may have been on the basis of the slight variations we have already noted ("I am able to destroy the temple" in Matthew, "I will destroy this ... temple" in Mark, "Destroy this temple" in John). It may have been that the witnesses could not agree on the exact place where the words were spoken or when they were spoken. After all, they had been spoken three years earlier. There may have been other inconsistencies. What we do know is that in spite of its essential accuracy the testimony did not stand. And what we can infer on that basis is the seething anger and frustration of the presiding officer, Caiaphas.

Caiaphas was in a difficult position. He had taken a chance on arresting Jesus at a very late hour in Passover week and was therefore committed to conducting a quick trial during the course of this one night after which he would present the judgment of the Jewish court for ratification by Pilate in the morning. If he failed, it would be a disaster. Word of the trial would leak to the population, and Christ's prestige and authority would undoubtedly rise to the same degree that the prestige and authority of the Jewish court would tumble. Besides all this, Caiaphas really did have a case. Jesus had claimed to be God's Son in a unique way, thus making himself liable to the penalty of death for blasphemy. Jesus was guilty when judged on the presuppositions of the Jewish court. Yet—this was the real frustration—Caiaphas could not procure a legal condemnation. He was close. He was right. Yet the situation was slipping from his grasp.

At this point Caiaphas revealed that shrewdness of character and determination for which the Romans had undoubtedly made him the chief Jewish ruler. What he did was illegal, but it was a stroke of genius politically. Seeing that the case was dissolving before his eyes, he abruptly turned to interrogate the prisoner himself, demanding of him on the basis of the most solemn form of oath known to Israel, the famous Oath of the Testimony, "I charge you under oath by the living God: Tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God" (Matt. 26:63).

It was a brilliant stroke for several reasons. For one thing, the oath was brilliant. Although Jesus was not compelled to give evidence against himself, being a pious Jew he would not refuse such a solemn challenge and therefore replied, "It is as you say. But I say to you: In the future you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven" (v. 64). The substance of the charge was also brilliant. If Caiaphas had merely asked Jesus if he was the Christ or Messiah, he could have answered yes without jeopardy, for it was not a capital offense to make such a claim. Time would itself prove that the claim was either false or true. Or again, if Caiaphas had merely asked Jesus if he was the Son of God, Jesus could also have answered yes without danger. For, as he indicated on another occasion, all Jews had a right to be called sons of God (cf. John 10:33-36). However, by combining the two, Caiaphas interpreted the one term by the other, thereby asking in effect, not whether Jesus was a mere human messiah or else a son of God in the general Jewish sense, but whether he was a divine Messiah. When Jesus answered yes to that accusation, he was immediately convicted of blasphemy and sentenced to death.

Savior or Judge?

The Jewish trial exposes the true nature of the hearts of men and women. We tend to look upon our own natures as being essentially good. But this is not the way God views them, and a trial like this brings out our nature. Jeremiah says of man, "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (17:9). This does not mean, according to biblical teaching, that we are all as evil as we could possibly be. Given enough time and opportunity we could all be much worse. But it does mean that the roots of even the most heinous crimes ever perpetrated in the history of the world are within us and that, being placed in a situation similar to that of others who did these things, we have nothing within to hinder us from doing likewise.

The trial of Jesus also reminds us of his claims and promises. True, Jesus was condemned illegally. We will look at some of the illegalities in more detail in our next study. But still, the issues themselves were the right issues, and the claims for which he was convicted were real claims. He had made three of them. He had claimed to be God. He had claimed that he would rise from the dead after three days. He had claimed that he would return again in judgment. Are these claims true? The resurrection was true. If it was true, Jesus was also obviously who he claimed to be, for God would not have vindicated his claim to be the unique Son of God if this was blasphemy. Indeed, the final judgment is proved by the resurrection. For as Paul said to the Greeks in Athens, " [God] has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed. He has given proof of this to all men by raising him from the dead" (Acts 17:31).

So the question is not whether the claims of Jesus of Nazareth are true but rather how we ourselves will respond to them and therefore also how we will greet him when he comes. Will we greet him as those who, like the rulers of his day, attempted to banish his presence from their lives? Or will we greet him as those for whom he died and who trust him as the only wise God and our Savior?

Chapter 228.
Illegalities of Christ's Trial

John 18:19-24

In Jesus: The Man Who Lives, England's great scourge of the establishment, Malcolm Muggeridge, said some cynical things about justice. He called it "another of the world's great fantasies." He wrote, "To call for justice in this world (which Jesus never once did; nor did He at any point give any indication of expecting justice, or, in any of His reported utterances, so much as mention the word) amounts in practice to calling for something which by its nature cannot be just—viz, law. To cry out for justice in human terms is as foolish as calling for iced water in the middle of the Sahara. From men we can look for mercy and pity, and, thanks to Jesus, from God for forgiveness; but Justice—never!... If we were capable of rendering or receiving justice we should need no laws to codify injustice; no parliamentarians to make laws, lawyers to argue them, police to enforce them, revolutionaries to reject them with a view to remaking them in due course, prisons and executioners to dispose of all who refuse to abide by them. 'I only care for justice,' is the cry of every counterfeiter, whether of the hopes, the fears, or just the cash wherewith we live. By comparison with asking for justice, the moon is a trifle, eternity a throwaway line, and happiness on ready sale at every supermarket."

I do not know whether these cynical but witty remarks are justified—though Muggeridge has certainly had more opportunity to observe the workings of this world's justice than I have. But I do know that his remarks are amply justified in the case of the trial of Jesus, for the laws governing his case were broken so many times that it is difficult to see how the trial could have been more illegally run or the laws of Israel more thoroughly flouted.

The Arrest

The first area of illegality in the trial of Jesus is from the period immediately preceding the trial, that is, the arrest. Here three separate errors were committed: (1) the arrest was by night, (2) the arrest was achieved through the agency of a traitor and informer, and (3) the arrest was without the necessary basis of a specific and formal accusation of wrongdoing later to be presented to the court. These related errors should have resulted in an immediate acquittal of Jesus, even if no further errors had been made. The situation was similar to the way in which a case should be thrown out of an American court if, for example, the arresting officer had neglected to inform the suspect of his rights, a confession was coerced, evidence was gathered by illegal entry or seizure, or some other illegal act was done.

The matter of trial by night is quite clear, for it was an established and inflexible rule that proceedings in capital cases could not be conducted at night. Moreover, this restriction did not apply merely to the trial itself but also to the events leading up to it, particularly the arrest. We know that the arrest of Jesus was after dark, for in addition to the time elements of that night, which we have already carefully considered, there is the simple fact that the arresting party arrived in the Garden of Gethsemane with "torches, lanterns and weapons" (John 18:3).

The law bearing upon the role of Judas in the arrest is derived from Leviticus 19:16, which says, "Do not go about spreading slander among your people. Do not do anything that endangers your neighbor's life. I am the Lord." This meant that a witness had to be of good character and, moreover, could not bear witness against a close companion, friend, or relative. He was, of course, also forbidden to take a bribe. He could not be an accessory or accomplice. Judas was all these. So it was illegal for him to have been used in the way he was used in the arrest.

There is a contrast here with modern law, for in most Western law the use of accomplice testimony is allowed, though viewed with distrust. In England, according to Chandler, conviction for a crime may rest on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice after the jury has been warned that such testimony is to be closely scrutinized. In the United States the testimony of an accomplice is also admissible, but it must be corroborated at some points by other testimony if it is to stand. From the point of view of securing a conviction it is clear that the use of accomplice testimony is of great value, as the frequent practice of granting immunity to force the testimony of an accomplice indicates. Yet, in spite of the obvious value of such testimony, Hebrew law forbade it. As Chandler says, "The arrest of Jesus was ordered upon the supposition that he was a criminal; this same supposition would have made Judas, who had aided, encouraged, and abetted Jesus in the propagation of his faith, an accomplice. If Judas was not an accomplice, Jesus was innocent, and his arrest was an outrage, and therefore illegal."

The third illegal aspect of the arrest was the lack of a formal accusation on the basis of which the later trial was to be conducted. Legally, Judas should have made that accusation to the authorities in advance of the arrest and then have appeared in court to sustain it. This was not done. Instead, the opening part of the trial was a nearly unsuccessful attempt to find precisely this accusation.

The Private Examination

The second area of illegality in the arrest and trial of Jesus was the private appearance before Annas. From the nature of the arrest we can well understand why this examination took place. There was no real case against Jesus, and this was an attempt to secure one from the prisoner's own testimony. Still it was illegal, and that for several reasons: (1) it was by night, which we have already seen to be forbidden; (2) it was by a single judge, which was also forbidden (The Pirke Aboth, a part of the Mishnah, says, "Be not a sole judge, for there is no sole judge but One"); and (3) the accused was never to be compelled to testify. Jesus was entirely within his rights when he refused to answer the interrogations (cf. John 18:19-23).

The Charge

The Sanhedrin knew that Jesus was claiming to be the unique Son of God. If this was not true, as they believed it was not, it was a form of blasphemy punishable by death. On the other hand, whether the charge was true or not, the difficulties growing out of the late hour and the conflicting testimony of the witnesses provoked the court into demonstrably illegal proceedings.

One illegality was that there was no formal indictment against Jesus. This should have been the basis for the arrest. It should have been presented at the start of the trial by the two or more witnesses needed to establish guilt in Jewish legal proceedings. But there was no charge. Instead, much valuable time was wasted trying to find one. The first accusations were thrown out of court as being irrelevant, unsupported, or silly. The more serious charge that Jesus had claimed to be able to destroy the temple and build it up again in three days was also likewise disallowed. It was only after these attempts had failed that a condemnation was secured on the basis of Jesus' direct reply to a question placed to him under oath by Caiaphas.

Moreover, it was not Caiaphas's place to do this. In fact, anything of this nature was expressly forbidden. The high priest was not allowed to express an opinion or interrogate either the witnesses or the accused. Rather, he was to keep perfectly silent. When the balloting was taken, he was to vote last, for his prestige was considered to be so great that any opinion expressed by him might be imagined to sway the other members of the Sanhedrin. Caiaphas violated all these restrictions when he intruded into the proceedings by asking Jesus, "I charge you under oath by the living God: Tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God" (Matt. 26:63).

The Trial Itself

The trial itself was illegal on numerous grounds: (1) it was conducted at night, (2) it was conducted on the day before a Jewish Sabbath, (3) it was completed in one twenty-four-hour period, (4) it secured a conviction on the basis of the defendant's own confession, and (5) it concluded with a unanimous and therefore invalid verdict.

The basic rule for trial by daylight rather than at night is from the tractate "Sanhedrin" of the Mishnah: "Let a capital offense be tried during the day, but suspend it at night" (Sanhedrin 4, 1). This was not done, as we have seen. Although there had been no plans to arrest and try Jesus at this particular Passover, this had been altered by the report of Judas that Jesus would be in the Garden until a late hour and would be (so we may suppose the report of Judas to have been) in an arrestable mood. There would have been much excitement among Caiaphas, Annas, and the other priests at this news. But how could they arrest Jesus, conduct a trial, and have him condemned before the beginning of Passover on the day following? Legally it could not be done. There was not enough time. But they decided that they could squeeze the necessary procedures in if they held the trial that night and simply confirmed the verdict formally at dawn.

Chandler writes, "It will be seen that this determination to arrest and try Jesus at night, in violation of law, became the parent of nearly every legal outrage that was committed against him. The selection of the midnight hour for such a purpose resulted not merely in a technical infraction of law, but rendered it impossible to do justice either formally or substantially under rules of Hebrew criminal procedure."

It was another requirement of the Jewish law, particularly in capital cases, that no court could lawfully meet on a Sabbath or other feast day, nor on a day preceding a Sabbath or a feast day. According to Jewish law, no work could be done on a Sabbath. Yet a trial was work, and so was the execution that would inevitably follow if the accused were found guilty. In Western law a trial may be suspended. But a trial could not be suspended in Jewish law, except for the one night that was to intervene between the first and second of the required hearings in a capital case. Thus, a trial was not to be started if it could not finish before a Sabbath. In Jesus' case this was not done. Moreover, not only was Jesus tried on a day preceding a Sabbath; he also was tried on a feast day, for the Feast of Unleavened Bread had begun by the time he was arrested.

The trial was also illegal because it was concluded within the space of one day. We remember that according to Jewish law there were actually to be two trials. On the first day, the entire case was to be heard and the first of two votes taken. If the accused was found innocent, the trial ended at that point. If he was found guilty, the trial was suspended for the night while the judges reconsidered the evidence and tried to find some way by which the accused (and now condemned) man might be exonerated. Only after a night like this did they return to the judgment hall and retry the case. Every attempt was made to secure acquittal. It was only in the afternoon of this second day that a second vote was taken after which, if the vote was still for condemnation, execution followed.

It is true, according to the Gospel records, that there were two trials and thus a semblance of legality—one at night and one in the early morning. But they were not on separate days; in fact, they were within a few hours of each other. And, equally important, the reason for the day's delay—to allow the judges to have time to retire to their homes for discussion, prayer, and meditation—was frustrated. Nor did they carefully retry the case in the short space of time allotted by the morning hours.

Fourth, the trial was illegal because it secured a condemnation of Jesus on the basis of his own confession produced under oath.

Fifth, the condemnation of Jesus was illegal because the vote of the Sanhedrin was unanimous, which by Hebrew law should have resulted in an acquittal. Mark tells us, "They all condemned him as worthy of death" (14:64). This, of course, is a strange part of Jewish law, particularly to those in the English-speaking world who are accustomed to precisely the opposite; that is, the requirement for a unanimous vote to convict under trial by jury. But this strangeness does not mean that it is foolish or even unwise. Chandler presents the reasoning as follows, "In the first place ... there were no lawyers or advocates, in the modern sense, among the ancient Hebrews. The judges were his defenders. Now if the verdict was unanimous in favor of condemnation, it was evident that the prisoner had had no friend or defender in court. To the Jewish mind this was almost equivalent to mob violence. It argued conspiracy at least. The element of mercy, which was required to enter into every Hebrew verdict, was absent in such a case." Whether wise or unwise, this was the law in Israel, and it was violated on this occasion.

No Defense

One last area of illegality may be considered. It is in some ways the most obvious of all: there was no defense of the prisoner. That there should be a defense is such an obvious part of legal proceedings—it is a right under most enlightened systems of justice—that its absence in this case immediately calls the entire activity of the court in question and renders it more the outworking of the hate of the authorities against Jesus than a true trial.

Were there none in Israel, none in Jerusalem even at this late hour on the eve of Passover, who could have testified to Christ's character? Were there none who could have borne witness to his ability to perform miracles in fulfillment of the Jewish prophecies concerning the coming Messiah? Were there no judges to plead the Old Testament and Christ's fulfillment of it in his defense? As we said, there is no need to think that the priests would necessarily have been persuaded by this evidence. But regardless of this, their refusal to consider a defense was nothing less than a failure to do their duty. It was a surrender to manipulation and mob rule.

What the priests, scribes, and elders did on the occasion of Christ's trial is not so different from what men and women are doing even today. Christ is proclaimed as the unique Son of God, but millions reject this while refusing to hear his defense. There is a defense. It is presented regularly in countless Christian churches, on radio and television programs, in books, and other forms of communication. But they will not hear it. They will not go to church. They will not read Christian literature. They turn the radio and television off or watch an entertainment channel.

What shall we say of such people? Are they honest? No more than Caiaphas! Are they wise?

Hardly! For if Jesus is who he claimed to be, the fact is a matter of life and death to all people.

Have you heard the prisoner? Have you considered his defense? If you have not, I challenge you to do so. The next chapter will help get you started. If you have, why wait? Come to him now. Believe on him. Jesus was either a megalomaniac, a deceiver, or the Son of God. If he is the Son of God, he should be your Savior.

Chapter 229.
In the Prisoner's Defense

John 18:19-24

The standards that human beings have developed for the administration of justice have varied widely in the long history of the race and from place to place, but there is one standard without which no sane person would attempt to establish justice at all. It is the right of the accused to a defense. We may imagine a situation in which a mother comes into the house to find that her child has used his brand new set of paints to decorate the living-room walls with murals. We may imagine further that she had specifically told him just the day before that he was to paint on paper only. She cannot imagine any possible words or circumstances that could in any way justify the disaster. She may be determined to punish him. But still she does not proceed to a spanking until she has at least heard her son's defense. "Why have you painted on the walls?" she might ask. "Why did you disregard my warning that you were only to paint on paper?"

So obvious is the right of the accused to a defense that this is observed both formally and informally in virtually every system of law and justice known. If the defense is omitted, the judicial proceedings are not actually a trial but are rather a mob action, no matter what legal formalities may or may not be included.

A Question Not Asked

So we ask, "What was the defense of Jesus of Nazareth in his trial by the Jewish Sanhedrin in Judea nearly two thousand years ago?" The answer is that there was no defense at all. This basic right of the accused was omitted.

We have to say at the beginning that if the proper requirements of Jewish law had been followed, as they should have been, there would have been no need for a defense for the simple reason that the trial would never have proceeded this far. His arrest was illegal, as we have already seen. It was by night, which Jewish law forbade. It was through the agency of an accomplice and informer. There had been no formal charge upon which the warrant for arrest had been issued. Each of these illegalities should have resulted in an immediate end to the prosecution and release of the prisoner if proper procedures had been followed. Again, the conduct of the trial was illegal. It was by night. Those who should have been Christ's defenders became his accusers. The high priest intervened, which he had no right to do. Most important of all, there was no proven charge against the prisoner. He was convicted in the end only because he voluntarily answered a question put to him by the high priest in which he claimed to be the divine Son of God and the Messiah.

But assuming that everything had been legal up to this point, which it was not—assuming that the arrest had been properly executed upon proper warrant, that charges had been properly filed and established under cross-examination, that these charges had related to Christ's claim to be God's unique Son, the Messiah—what was the next legal step under Hebrew law? Assuming that a prima facie case of guilt had been made, what should the judges have done next after hearing the case against him? The answer is that they should have begun to inquire diligently into all matters pertaining to the truth or falsity of his claim. In other words, the greatest illegality of the trial of Jesus was the question not asked. For having heard Christ's statement that he was indeed "the Christ, the Son of God," the high priest should then have asked, "What sign do you have then, that we may see and believe you?" The absence of this question reveals the trial to be a judicial murder rather than a fair inquiry into Christ's innocence or guilt.

We must not suppose that even if they had heard a defense the judges of Israel would have been obliged to accept it. They might have ruled it inadequate or false. But they are to blame, not because of the verdict itself (save that they reached it before the trial even began), but because they denied Jesus all defense whatsoever.

Messianic Prophecies

What defense could be given? One might imagine that the very nature of Christ's claims would put them beyond the realm either of falsification or verification. But this is not the case. We remember that the accusation was twofold: Jesus had falsely claimed to be (1) the Messiah and (2) the unique Son of God. These are religious claims made against the background of the revealed law of Israel, the Old Testament, which both Jesus and his accusers recognized to be determinative. Did Jesus' claims fit in with what the Old Testament taught? On that matter the judges of Israel were not only competent but were obligated to make judgment.

How should this trial have gone if this proper line of defense had been followed? Clearly, there should have been a defense of Christ's claim to be the Messiah, followed by a defense of his claim to be the unique Son of God. The first part might have gone like this.

1. According to the Jewish Scriptures, the Messiah was to be born in Bethlehem, and Jesus was born in Bethlehem. The relevant passage for this point is Micah 5:2, "But you, Bethlehem Ephrathah, though you are small among the clans of Judah, out of you will come for me one who will be ruler over Israel, whose origins are from old, from ancient times." The proof of Jesus' having been born in Bethlehem could have been established even at this very late hour by numerous witnesses, including that of no less a person than his mother, who was in Jerusalem at the time of the trial. It was also in the official Roman records; for the trip to Bethlehem (in connection with which Jesus was born) was made at the demand of Rome in order to provide a census, and Jesus would have been registered at that time.

Luke was to tell about it later, saying, "In those days Caesar Augustus issued a decree that a census should be taken of the entire Roman world. (This was the first census that took place while Quirinius was governor of Syria.) And everyone went to his own town to register. So Joseph also went up from the town of Nazareth in Galilee to Judea, to Bethlehem the town of David, because he belonged to the house and line of David. He went there to register with Mary, who was pledged to be married to him and was expecting a child. While they were there, the time came for the baby to be born, and she gave birth to her firstborn, a son. She wrapped him in cloths and placed him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn" (Luke 2:1-7).

2. The Messiah was to be born of a virgin, and Jesus was so born. Isaiah was the one who recorded this prophecy. He wrote, 'The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel" (Isa. 7:14). No doubt, the reality of a virgin birth would be a hard point to convince these leaders of, just as it is hard to convince many of it today. But Mary, even if no one else, would have testified to it had she been called as a witness. Presumably she at least told Luke, for Luke (as also Matthew) included it in his account of the days preceding the birth in Bethlehem (Luke 1:26-30; cf. Matt. 1:24-25).

3. The Messiah was to be born of the house of David, and Jesus was so born. All Jews understood this to be the nature of the promise made to David himself, recorded in 2 Samuel 7, "When your days are over and you rest with your fathers, I will raise up your offspring to succeed you, who will come from your own body, and I will establish his kingdom.... Your house and your kingdom will endure forever before me; your throne will be established forever" (vv. 12, 16). However, lest there be any doubt that it was indeed the Messiah who was in view in this prophecy, the later prophets made it most clear. Jeremiah wrote, 'The days are coming... when I will raise up to David a righteous Branch, a king who will reign wisely and do what is just and right in the land. In his days Judah will be saved and Israel will live in safety. This is the name by which he will be called: The LORD Our Righteousness" (Jer. 23:5-6). Similarly, Isaiah had written, "A shoot will come up from the stump of Jesse; from his roots a Branch will bear fruit. The Spirit of the LORD will rest on him—the Spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the Spirit of counsel and of power, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD" (11:1-2).

Was Jesus of the house of David? A short inquiry would quickly have shown that this was so. Moreover, a careful inquiry would have shown that not only was he descended from David through his natural mother, Mary, by whom he had a legal claim to the throne, he was also descended from David by virtue of his adoption by Joseph, who was in a different but royal line of descent. In other words, Jesus was descended from David by both his natural mother and adopted father, thereby exhausting both lines, so that, if he is not the Messiah, there is at any rate no other. All this could have been investigated by the Sanhedrin just as it later was by Matthew, who gives Joseph's genealogy, and by Luke, who gives the genealogy of Mary.

4. The appearance of the Messiah was to be preceded by a forerunner, who was to be like Elijah. This was spoken of in the last two chapters of the Old Testament. "See, I will send my messenger, who will prepare the way before me. Then suddenly the Lord you are seeking will come to his temple; the messenger of the covenant, whom you desire, will come" (Mal. 3:1). "See, I will send you the prophet Elijah before that great and dreadful day of the LORD comes"

(Mal. 4:5). John the Baptist was this forerunner. Jesus himself so identified him (Matt. 17:1213), and this was John's own testimony when an official delegation was sent to him by members of this very Sanhedrin (John 1:19-24).

5. The Messiah was to do many great works and miracles, and Jesus had performed the prophesied miracles and more. Isaiah had written, "The Spirit of the Sovereign LORD is on me, because the LORD has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim freedom for the captives and release from darkness for the prisoners, to proclaim the year of the LORD'S favor" (61:1-2). "Then will the eyes of the blind be opened and the ears of the deaf unstopped. Then will the lame leap like a deer, and the mute tongue shout for joy" (35:5-6). Jesus referred to these texts himself in regard to his own ministry and clearly regarded them as sufficient proof of his messianic claims (Luke 4:16-21; Matt. 11:1-6).

We know that the leaders of the Sanhedrin accepted the factualness of these miracles; for, although they had attempted to deny them at first, it was actually their fear that all would follow Jesus because of his miracles that caused them to arrest, try, and condemn him (John 11:47-50).

6. It was prophesied that the Messiah would make a public entry into Jerusalem riding on a donkey, and this Jesus had done. No one could deny this fact. It had happened in full view of the residents of Jerusalem just three days before. The prophecy was in Zechariah: "Rejoice greatly, O Daughter of Zion! Shout, Daughter of Jerusalem! See your king comes to you, righteous and having salvation, gentle and riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey" (Zech. 9:9).

7. It was prophesied that the Messiah should be betrayed by a close friend for thirty pieces of silver. "Even my close friend, who I trusted, he who shared my bread, has lifted up his heel against me" (Ps. 41:9). "So they paid me thirty pieces of silver" (Zech. 11:12). In an ironical twist, the leaders of the Sanhedrin were in the process of fulfilling this prophecy themselves that very night by using Judas as an informant (Matt. 26:14-15; 27:3-8).

8. The Messiah was to be a man of poverty and suffering in his first advent and was to be despised and rejected by the leaders of Israel, as Jesus was. Isaiah had foretold it, "He grew up before him like a tender shoot, and like a root out of dry ground. He had no beauty or majesty to attract us to him, nothing in his appearance that we should desire him. He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering. Like one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not" (53:2-3). The Sanhedrin was fulfilling this prophecy even at the moment of the trial. They were despising Christ. They were rejecting him. Yet so far were they from any impartial presentation of the evidence or any desire to hear his defense that this strange irony escaped them.

God's Son

There was another part to the accusation on the basis of which Jesus was executed. This is his claim to be the unique Son of God. How could this be defended? We remember as we ask this question that as Jesus used the phrase he was not using the words "Son of God" in some general sense in which all men or at least all religious men might be supposed to share. He was using it in an exclusive way, meaning that he was of the same essence as God, whom he termed Father, and that he therefore possessed the same attributes and exercised the same authority as Jehovah. This was a most shocking claim to those steeped in the Judaism of Christ's day, of course. It ran against everything they believed concerning the unity and transcendence of God. It seemed blasphemous and abhorrent. But the claim, abhorrent as it may have been, was not so inconceivable that they could not have asked in all fairness whether anything of this nature could possibly be suggested by the Scriptures of Israel. Again, this does not mean that they would necessarily have accepted Christ's claims, even if the Old Testament suggested their possibility. But it does mean that he should not have been condemned out of hand without the benefit of this defense and inquiry.

Walter Chandler, from whom I have borrowed much of this material, writes, "What the judges of the Sanhedrin should have done in examining the merits of the defense of Jesus was: 1) to consider whether, in the light of Hebrew scripture and tradition, a god of flesh and bone, representing the second person of a Duality or a Trinity of gods, was possible; 2) to weigh thoroughly the claims of Jesus, in the light of testimony properly adduced at the trial, that he was this second person of a Duality or Trinity of gods."

In defense of this claim we may make the following three points:

1. There are references in the Old Testament to precisely the kind of unique Son of God that Jesus claimed to be. A clear reference is Isaiah 9:6, where one who was to be born into the human family is called "The Mighty God." "For to us a child is born, to us a son is given, and the government will be on his shoulders. And he will be called Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace." Similarly, Psalm 2, which is to be understood as a messianic prophecy, declares of the coming Messiah, "He said to me, 'You are my Son; today I have become your Father'" (v. 7). What could possibly be clearer than the statement of this psalm that the Messiah was to be a person uniquely begotten of God the Father? What could more clearly suggest a human being who was at the same time God than Isaiah's prophecy that the coming Messiah was to be called "The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father"? We may readily admit that this is hard to understand. We may not see how an individual can be both God and man at the same time. But the point is not whether or not we understand it but whether the Scriptures, which the Jewish leaders and Christ both fully accepted, teach it. If they do, then the claim of Jesus to be God's unique Son cannot be rejected outright.

2. The Old Testament also speaks of an incarnation, that is, God becoming flesh. This is what Isaiah speaks of in the verse cited earlier: 'The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel" (7:14). Immanuel means "God with us." So the prophecy is that God should become man by means of a virgin birth. Again, we may have great difficulty in understanding this, even in believing it. But the point is that, whether we believe it or not, this is at least what the Old Testament teaches and is what Jesus claimed.

3. There are significant passages in the Old Testament in which Jehovah (or the Son of Jehovah) is portrayed as having appeared on earth among men. One example is the appearance of an individual called "the angel of the LORD" to Hagar. The passage reads, "The angel added, 'I will so increase your descendents that > they will be too numerous to count.' The angel of the LORD also said to her, 'You are now with child and you will have a son. You shall name him Ishmael, for the LORD has heard your misery.'... She gave this name to the LORD who spoke to her: 'You are the God who sees me,' for she said, 'I have now seen the one who sees me'" (Gen. 16:10-11, 13). We should not infer that the phrase "angel of the LORD" in the Old Testament always refers to God himself, but that is certainly the meaning here. For the one who appeared to Hagar as an angel spoke as God, and Hagar addressed him in this way, saying, "I have now seen the one who sees me"

Again, there are appearances of a similar figure or figures to Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation. On one occasion, we are told, "The LORD appeared to Abraham near the great trees of Mamre while he was sitting at the entrance to his tent in the heat of the day. Abraham looked up and saw three men standing nearby. When he saw them, he hurried from the entrance of his tent to meet them and bowed low to the ground. He said, 'If I have found favor in your eyes, my lord..." (Gen. 18:1-3). In the account that follows, these figures sometimes appear as three, sometimes as one; always they speak as if they were themselves God: "Then the LORD said to Abraham, 'Why did Sarah laugh?'" (v. 13), "Then the LORD said, 'Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do?'" (v. 17), "The LORD said, 'If I find fifty righteous people in the city of Sodom, I will spare the whole place for their sake'" (v. 26). The language of this story indicates that Abraham firmly believed that Jehovah had appeared to him and become a guest in his tent. The question may be asked, as Chandler does, "If Abraham could not recognize Jehovah, who could or can?"

The point of these passages is that the Old Testament contains references to the appearances of God on earth in human form, that the appearance of the Second Person of the Godhead was prophesied, and that Jesus amply met every reasonable test that might be raised to determine whether or not he was this one. This defense might not have convinced the Jewish rulers of Christ's innocence, even if it had been presented. But it was a reasonable and adequate defense, reasonable in that it was based on the clear teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures and adequate in that it was sufficient to create "reasonable doubt" of Christ's guilt, if not, in fact, ample evidence that he was indeed who he declared himself to be.

Who Is He?

If it is true that the Sanhedrin was guilty for its refusal to hear the defense of Jesus, how much more guilty are people who refuse to consider his claims and defense today. More guilty? Yes, more guilty even than the Sanhedrin. For although it is true that these men willfully refused to consider even a shred of evidence in Jesus' defense, they nevertheless did not have before them that greatest of all evidences for his divinity that we have today: his miraculous resurrection from the dead. Nor did they have available the full teaching of the New Testament and the works of the many doctors and theologians of the Christian church who have, since their time, clearly presented who Jesus is, why he came to die, the meaning of his resurrection, and the need for the response of faith that people are called on to make to him. That evidence is available to you, whoever you may be. If you reject it or, worse yet, refuse even to consider it, your guilt is greater than the guilt of the Jewish Sanhedrin. But if, on the other hand, you will consider it and accept it, it is sufficient by the power of the Holy Spirit to lead you to saving faith in Jesus. Who is Jesus? He is the Messiah, the Son of God. He is your Savior.

Chapter 230.
Before the Cock Crows

John 18:15-18, 25-27

I seldom come to this story of the denial of the Lord Jesus Christ by Peter that I do not think of two passages from other books in the Bible. They are unrelated technically. Yet they are related, for they indicate in advance the two most important lessons to be learned from Peter's temptation. One is from the first psalm. It is the verse that describes the folly of the man who "walks" in the counsel of the ungodly and "stands" in the way of sinners and "sits" in the seat of the mockers (v. 1). This describes Peter. The psalm describes him as well when it goes on to add that the man who lives like this is "like the chaff which the wind blows away" (v. 4). Peter, like chaff, was certainly blown about by the temptation that came to him while he warmed himself at the fire in the high priest's house.

It was a bad place to be, and Peter certainly paid the price of being there. As Spurgeon writes, "Peter was on dangerous ground. When his Master was being buffeted, he was trying to make himself comfortable. We read of the high priest's servants that they warmed themselves, and Peter stood with them, and warmed himself. He stood with them, and they were rough servants of ill masters. He was in bad company, and he was a man who could not afford to be in bad company; for he was so impulsive, and so easily provoked to rash actions."

On the other hand, whenever I think of Peter's denial, I also think of that prophecy of Christ's concerning Peter that is recorded in Luke's Gospel. There Jesus says, "Simon, Simon, Satan has asked to sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for you, Simon, that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (22:31-32). This teaches us that although Peter, like the ungodly man of Psalm 1, would be blown about like chaff at threshing time, nevertheless Jesus had prayed for Peter with the result that Peter would come forth stronger from the experience. That is, the chaff in Peter would be blown away. But the Peter whom God had recreated by means of the new birth would be strengthened.

We should be strengthened too. We shall be if we can learn from Peter's mistakes. Do you think that you do not need to learn? If that is the case, then you of all people need to, for John has undoubtedly intertwined the story of Peter's fall with the story of the Jewish and Roman trials to show that even the followers of Christ are not free from guilt in their relationships to him. True, they do not hate him, like Caiaphas. They are not indifferent to him, like Pilate. Yet they deny him many times, as Peter did.

Why is this? No doubt because we are too fond of the world and too enamored of its company. Matthew Henry once wrote, "Those that warm themselves with evil doers grow cold towards good people and good things, and those that are fond of the devil's fire-side are in danger of the devil's fire."

In Defense of Peter

In order to understand fully the importance of Peter's fall for ourselves, we need to see that it was Peter, the leader of the disciples, and not another who denied Jesus. If this had been Nicodemus, we should not be surprised. Nicodemus is the one who came to Jesus by night, no doubt for fear of what others might think; there is no indication in Scripture that Nicodemus ever entirely came out for him. Likewise, we would not have been surprised had this been the rich young ruler. He loved riches more than he loved Jesus and thus "went away sorrowful." We might also have expected a denial from those who watched Jesus at a distance, as many did, who never confessed him at all. A denial from any of these would have been no surprise at all. Yet this was not Nicodemus or the rich young ruler or these others. This was Peter—the bold, the courageous, the one who had told Jesus, "Even if all fall away on account of you, I never will" (Matt. 26:33).

The point is that if Peter fell, then anyone can fall—the strongest as well as the weakest. In fact, it may even be the strongest who are in the greatest danger.

But let us not just talk about this generally. Let us talk about specifics in the case of Peter. What can be said in Peter's defense? One thing that can be said about Peter is that he at least followed Jesus when all others (except possibly John) had abandoned him. True, in the Garden at the moment of the arrest they had all scattered into the enveloping darkness. But most of them undoubtedly continued their flight on up the Mount of Olives and down the other side to Bethany, where they had been staying on each of the previous nights and where they imagined themselves to be safe. Peter, on the other hand, quickly stopped his flight and then, joining forces with the unnamed disciple (v. 15), followed the arresting party back to Jerusalem and eventually made his way into the high priest's house. This was not the decision of a coward. As Barclay says, "The tremendous thing about Peter was that his failure was a failure that could only have happened to a man of superlative courage. True, Peter failed; but he failed in a situation which none of the other disciples even dared to face. He failed, not because he was a coward, but because he was a brave man."

A second commendable characteristic follows from this one, namely, that Peter loved Jesus. It was for this reason alone that he followed him. I am sure that when we think of those who loved Jesus and who were in Jerusalem at this time, we think preeminently of Mary Magdalene who for love's sake alone lingered around the garden tomb after the resurrection to try to find and care for the Lord's body. We are right to think of her, for Mary truly did love him. She loved him even when her faith and hope in him had failed. But no less a motivation drew Peter to Jerusalem when all common sense dictated the safety of a nocturnal flight to Bethany. Why else did Peter follow the arresting party? Why else did he seek entry into the high priest's home? Because he loved Jesus! He wanted to know what would become of him. Thus, he failed in a situation into which he would not even have come had he not loved Jesus much.

Third, Peter had tried to defend Jesus. In the Garden he had drawn a sword and attacked the head of the arresting column, a man named Malchus, and had cut off his ear. This was an act of the flesh, of course. It was contrary to the spirit and will of Christ and was, in fact, rebuked by him. But it was a strong act nevertheless, done out of a passionate (though misguided) concern for his master.

Finally, to go back even farther into the history of Peter's experience, we recall that on an earlier occasion it was Peter who confessed Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of the living God," when the other disciples were silent (Matt. 16:16; cf. John 6:68). This is no miserable specimen chosen from among the ranks of Christ's worst followers. This is the best. Yet it is precisely this one who falls, not only dreadfully but speedily and with such slight provocation.

It was a maid who asked the first question. Moreover, she even begins her remarks with a negative (this is quite apparent in the Greek), as if to say, "Surely you are not one of his disciples, are you?" It was not a formal accusation. It was not even a very strenuous challenge. Yet Peter, overcome by the uncertainty and terror of the moment, replies, "I am not" (v. 17). From this point on, having denied his Lord once, he finds it easy to do so again, once to an unspecified group (v. 25) and a third time to the kinsman of the man whose ear he had cut off (vv. 26-27).

Steps of His Fall

Why did Peter fall? If Peter was as strong as we say and yet fell, it is important to know the steps of his fall so that we may avoid them. There are several.

First, Peter was overconfident. Earlier Jesus had warned his disciples that they were going to abandon him. But Peter said in effect, "Lord, I do not know about these others; as I look around at these other disciples, I sense that they are not the kind of people that I, Peter, would have chosen. It may very well be that they will deny you—but not I, not Peter." Jesus reiterated his warning. But Peter replied, "Even if I have to die with you, I will never disown you" (Mark 14:31). We can hardly miss the conclusion that if we indulge ourselves in such overconfidence, if we think that we are invulnerable because we are strong, have certain obvious talents, are wise or can analyze the tendencies and dangers of our culture, then we are well on our way to falling.
Jesus has said, "Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5). Nothing means nothing! Whenever we forget that, we are in trouble.

Second, Peter failed to pray. The Lord did not fail to pray. This seems a strange reversal. If we were to pick someone who, in our opinion, did not need to pray, it would obviously be the Lord. If we were to pick someone who needed prayer, it would be Peter. Yet Peter is sleeping in the Garden while the Lord is pouring out his soul before his heavenly Father. Peter had been warned. He had been admonished to watch and pray. Unfortunately, the church and many Christians are asleep today with no less warning. Paul said, "Pray continually" (1 Thess. 5:17). Yet it is often the case that we do not pray because we do not think it necessary.

Third, Peter "followed at a distance" (Luke 22:54). A moment ago we pointed out that Peter had at least followed when the others had apparently fled. That is true. But although Peter followed, he followed at a great distance; and that was not entirely commendable.

It is true of many in our time, as can be easily observed. Many legitimately, truly, honestly do follow Jesus. But they follow at a distance, because they do not want to become too "fanatical" or "lose touch" with the world that surrounds them. Moreover, they think they are safe at a distance, though they are actually in greater danger. When Jesus calls a person to follow him, he calls him to follow in his footsteps, which means "right behind me." But these hold back, thinking that the closer they are to Jesus the greater their danger will be. Actually, although their exposure is greater, the danger is less. For Christ is the victor. He has guaranteed victory. The place to be really safe, though in the midst of battle, is next to him.

"With Them... with Him"

The fourth step in Peter's fall is the step emphasized by John. It is found in the contrast between a phrase in verse 18 and a phrase in verse 26. In verse 18, it says of Peter as he stood around the fire, "Peter also was standing with them." Then in verse 26, after several had begun to challenge him, the kinsman of the man whose ear Peter had cut off asked, "Didn't I see you with him?" Peter, who had been with him (that is, with Jesus), is now in the courtyard of the high priest with those who are Christ's enemies.

Is this true of us, that we are more with those of the culture in which we live than with Jesus? This does not mean that we are to go out of this world. We are not called to detach ourselves to some kind of spiritual ghetto. We are to be in the world. But—this is the point—we are not to be of it. We are to be with Christ in the midst of the culture, not with them whose culture it is.

I would like to ask this question of you, the question that was asked of Peter: "Didn't I see you with him?" I would like to ask it forcefully. Have you been with Jesus? Have you been with him in fellowship? Have you been with him in Bible study? Have you been with him in prayer? If your answer is yes, as I trust it will be, I then want to follow up that question in this way. First, if you have been with him, then you have been seen with him. You may think that you have not been seen. You may think that you are a secret believer. You may think that your family is so non-Christian that you cannot possibly let your family know what has happened, so you do not confess Christ openly. But if you are really Christ's, the difference will be seen in you so clearly that whether you want to or not you will have been observed to have been with Jesus. Your immediate family will notice it right away. Those with whom you work will notice it shortly. If you come to fellowship with other Christians in a good church, as you should, you will be noticed by many additional people as well.

Next I want to ask: If you really have been with him and have been seen with him, is it not true that certain things will be expected of you because you have been with him? Again, you may not want those things to be expected of you. You may have noticed that there is even a sense in which those who are unsaved demand too much of us who profess Christ. They demand something approaching perfection, and we are not perfect. If we get the notion that we are perfect, we are in trouble indeed. Yet there is a sense in which the world is right to expect certain things, and our Christian brothers and sisters are right to expect them also.

For example, they should expect certain things in regard to our profession. We say we are Christ's, that he is our Savior and Lord. We are seen in his company. Therefore, we should profess what he professes. If we do not profess that, if we do not receive his teaching personally, then he is not our Lord, no matter what we may say. If we follow him, his doctrine should be our doctrine.

Again, if we follow Jesus, his priorities should be our priorities, his values should be our values. This means that we are not at liberty to borrow our culture from the world. We are not at liberty to assume the world's values and adopt the world's theology. Our theology and values must be his.

Again, the marks of the church that Jesus talked about in the seventeenth chapter of John, just one chapter before this, should characterize us as well. We should be filled with joy. We should be characterized by holiness. We must stand with him in his truth. We should be engaged in the mission to which he commissions us. There should be an observable unity among Christian people. All we do should be characterized by love. If we have been with Christ, if (like Peter) we have been associated with him in his ministry, then the world has a right to expect certain patterns of behavior and character from us.

Commitment and Cleansing

If you have been with Christ, there is a call in this text to commitment. So much of our discipleship today is halfhearted. We say we will follow Jesus, but we follow afar off, as Peter did. This is not the kind of discipleship that Jesus lays before us.

Spurgeon once had an opportunity to talk to a girl who was halfhearted. She was trying to live in the world and at the same time follow Christ. He said to her, "There are three things you can do, and those three things I will set before you by an illustration. When you get outside the Tabernacle, there will be a tramcar. Now, go up to the car, and put one foot on the car, and keep the other foot on the ground, and if you do not come down with a smash I am very much mistaken. Yet many people try to keep in with the world and keep in with Christ, and they will never do it; but will make a terrible fall of it before long. Now, the second thing that you can do is, that you can keep standing in the world in the mud, and not get into the car at all. You can stop there, and let the tramcar go by: that is all fair and straight. If you want to live in the world, and be of the world, well, live in the world, and take what pleasure it can give you, and reap the fruit of it at last. But there is a third thing you can do, namely, get right off the road into the car, and let the car take you right away where it is going. Now, it is this third thing that I commend to you. Get right into Christ, and let the Lord Jesus, by the power of his Holy Spirit, carry you right away from the unclean place where you now stand, bearing you in safety along the tramlines of holiness till he brings you to the terminus of glory at his own right hand."

You may be saying, as some do, "I understand clearly what you are teaching. I know this is the kind of discipleship Christ calls for. But in my case it is too late. I am like Peter. I know I should have followed Christ wholeheartedly. I know I should have been near to him. But I have followed at a distance. I have denied him. I have compromised my faith hundreds of times and more. I can never be Christ's disciple."

If you are thinking along these lines, let me assure you that it is not too late. With God it is never too late. It is true that sin brings consequences and that some sins bring consequences so terrible that they remain with us for life. But in this matter of discipleship God always begins with you where you are right now. You may have denied Jesus once. You may have denied him a hundred times. It makes no difference. Jesus comes to you now with the call of discipleship. He says, "Follow me now." Then he sets a new way before you.

We have an illustration of this in the case of Peter. On the one hand, we have Peter described in the eighteenth chapter of John, warming himself by the fire of Christ's enemies. He is cold, lonely, left out. He gets such warmth as he can from those who are determined to do away with his Master. It is a sad picture. Yet a little later, in the twenty-first chapter, there is another Peter and another fire. This fire is kindled by the Lord, the fire on which he prepared breakfast for the disciples. And the same Lord whom Peter had denied in chapter 18 appears in chapter 21 to recommission him to service.

May I carry this concept a step further? This fire reminds us of that described by Isaiah in Isaiah 6, after he had seen the Lord in his glory. He had seen Christ in his holiness, and he had been impressed with his own sin. He said, "I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips" (v. 5). But what happened? God sent an angel with a coal from off this altar to purge away the sin, and after that, when Isaiah heard the question, "Whom shall I send? And who will go for us?"—Isaiah, the man who was conscious of his sin, said, "Here am I. Send me" (v. 8). Peter heard that question and responded in the same way, for when Jesus came to him after his resurrection and asked, "Simon, son of John, do you truly love me more than these?" Peter answered, "Yes, Lord, you know that I love you" (John 21:15). The Lord said, "Feed my lambs."

So it has been with all who have ever served the Lord Jesus Christ faithfully. Those who serve— who are really used in God's service, who are a blessing to other people, who take the gospel of eternal life to those who need to hear it, who keep on in the midst of difficulty—these are not those who have never denied Christ. They have! They have denied him many times and in many ways. But they have found the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ even in the midst of their denials and have been purged from their sin. Then with a sense of their own weakness, but an even greater awareness of Christ's strength, they have gone on to live for him.

Chapter 231.
The Roman Trial

John 18:28-32

The trial of Jesus of Nazareth, as a result of which he was crucified, is in reality two separate trials, one Jewish and one Roman. The trials are separate as far as the jurisdictions, charges, and judges are concerned. The only common elements are the accusers and the accused. The reason for the two trials is that the Jewish court had lost the power to administer the death penalty by the first Christian century; thus, since the leaders of Israel were determined to have Christ executed, they were forced to secure a Roman verdict along with their own.

This makes for a unique and fascinating situation, for it means that in this one instance a man was tried, on the one hand, by a court of heaven seeking to apply the revealed law of God and, on the other hand, by a court of man seeking to apply what is generally thought to be the most highly developed form of law we know.

Jewish law was probably the most humane system of law ever devised. So great was Jewish respect for human life, that it was practically impossible to execute a person under the jurisdiction of a Hebrew court. Roman law was excellent as measured by the comprehensiveness of its coverage, systematization of formal statutes, elaboration of court procedures, and the affixing of penalties. It has been said of the ancient world that Judea gave religion, Greece gave letters, and Rome gave law. The laws of Rome have been passed on to the Western world as the basis of its judicial systems. The Germans were never defeated by the legions of Rome and, in fact, were eventually the people who overthrew the declining Roman Empire. Yet they unquestioningly adopted the Roman laws and edicts. Even today the Corpus Juris Civilis of Justinian is carefully studied in the great universities of the world.

Walter Chandler summarizes the issue thus: 'Jesus was arraigned in one day, in one city, before the sovereign courts of the universe; before the Sanhedrin, the supreme tribunal of a divinely commissioned race; before the court of the Roman Empire that determined the legal and political rights of men throughout the known world. The Nazarene stood charged with blasphemy and with treason against the enthroned monarchs represented by these courts; blasphemy against Jehovah who, from the lightning-lit summit of Sinai, proclaimed his laws to mankind;

treason against Caesar, enthroned and uttering his will to the world amidst the pomp and splendor of Rome. History records no other instance of a trial conducted before the courts of both Heaven and earth; the court of God and the court of man; under the law of Israel and the law of Rome; before Caiaphas and Pilate, as the representatives of these courts and administrators of these laws."

Considering the nature of Roman law, with its careful attention to procedure, we might think that the trial before Pilate would be much easier to understand than the trial before the Jewish Sanhedrin. Yet this is not the case. On the contrary, although the Hebrew trial has its puzzling elements (we might, for example, ask how Jesus could possibly be rejected by the leaders of his own people, those who should have known who he was on the basis of the Old Testament prophecies), the rejection is nevertheless understandable. He was rejected because he was hated, and he was hated because he had revealed the leaders' sin. None of this makes sense where the trial before Pilate is concerned. Pilate did not hate Jesus. If anything, he seems to have respected him. He even acquitted him, pronouncing him innocent on three separate occasions. Yet he eventually turned Jesus over to be crucified.

Frank Morison has rightly said, "We do not get rid of the mystery of Christ when we bring Him to the Roman bar; we increase it tenfold."

The Roman Procurator

Perhaps the greatest mystery in the case of the Roman trial is the marked contrast between what we know of Pilate's character (as revealed in the secular sources) and his conduct at the trial of Jesus (as revealed in the Gospel narratives).

Pilate was not a noble character. In fact, if it were not for his influential connections through marriage, he would never have come even to the relatively insignificant post he held as procurator of Judea. He came from Spain, being a native of Seville. He had joined the legions of Germanicus in the wars on the Rhine. After peace had been secured, he went to Rome to make his fortune. There he met and married Claudia Proculla, the youngest daughter of Julia who was the daughter of the emperor Augustus. From the perspective of Pilate's future this was a wise move. Claudia had connections with the highest levels of Roman government. But morally it was a disgrace; for Julia, who thereby became Pilate's mother-in-law, was a woman of such depraved and coarse habits that even in decadent Rome she was notorious. Augustus, her father, avoided her presence and eventually banished her. It is reported that afterward, whenever someone would mention the name of his daughter to him, Augustus would exclaim, "Would I were wifeless or had childless died!" Unlike Pilate, a man of nobler instincts would not have married into such a family.

Nevertheless, through his new connections Pilate applied for and was awarded the procuratorship of Judea, which post he assumed in A.D. 26. He was the sixth procurator. Those before him were: Sabinus, Caponius, Ambivus, Rufus, and Gratus.

These earlier rulers had exercised great care in their respect for the religious prejudices of the Jews and had governed the people wisely. In particular, they had carefully avoided exhibiting any emblems, flags, or standards that, because they bore the images of the emperor, were offensive to the Jewish population. Even Vitellius, the legate of Syria, when he was marching against the Arabian king Aretas, ordered his troups to march around Jewish territory rather than carry their battle standards through it. Yet Pilate, in obstinate folly and in defiance of the established policy of the earlier procurators, provoked a confrontation on this and other matters.

Three incidents stand out. First, when Pilate arrived in Judea, he sent soldiers to Jerusalem by night carrying ensigns blazoned with the images of Tiberius. That he did this by night indicates his awareness that there might be trouble, but that he did it at all indicates his insensitivity to the feelings of those whose land he was to govern. Nor did subsequent developments prove him wiser. When their city was thus defiled, great numbers of the Jews of Jerusalem flocked down to Caesarea, where Pilate was staying, to demand that the standards be removed. Pilate refused, and the stalemate went on for five days. At last the procurator grew angry, summoned the people to the stadium, surrounded them with soldiers and gave notice that they would be killed if they did not immediately and quietly disperse. To his surprise they threw themselves to the ground, bared their necks, and declared that they would rather die than see their holy city contaminated. When he saw that he could get his way only by wholesale slaughter Pilate reluctantly backed off and had the ensigns lowered.

Pilate's actions were not typical of Roman administrators. In fact, thanks to Josephus, we have a nearly parallel story with an entirely different result. It involved a Roman officer named Petronius. Petronius had a much greater incentive to enforce his will than Pilate had to enforce his, for he had been specifically commanded by the emperor to place the imperial image in the Jewish temple. But Petronius sensed the problem, tried negotiations, and when those failed bravely reported his decision not to enforce the decree and the reasons for his decision to Caius. Petronius was an example of Roman courage and diplomacy at their best. Pilate's conduct reveals the opposite characteristics.

A second incident reveals the same flaws in Pilate's character. He had determined to build an aqueduct to bring water from the Pools of Solomon into Jerusalem. In itself this was commendable and would have been favored by the citizens of the city. But Pilate startled and enraged them by the foolish act of raiding the sacred "Corban" treasury in order to fund the work. The Jews considered this money set aside to God to be used only in his work. To plunder it was sacrilege. Yet Pilate went ahead. Later, when he learned that the people would be sending citizens to beg for the restoration of the temple monies, he sent soldiers into the crowd disguised as common people who, on a prearranged signal, drew hidden clubs and daggers and attacked the demonstrators. In this episode Pilate had his way, but he intensified the hatred of the people of Roman rule.

Josephus and Philo also tell of a third episode in which Pilate, despite his previous experiences, insisted that votive shields dedicated to Tiberius be placed in the palace of Herod. Again the Jews objected, and Pilate refused to have the shields removed. At this point a petition signed by the leading men of the nation, including the names of four of the sons of Herod, was sent to the emperor, asking for the removal of the offensive objects. Significantly, Tiberius granted the request, and the shields were taken out of Herod's palace and hung in the temple of Augustus at Caesarea instead.

We might add to these examples an incident recorded by Luke, in which the "blood" of certain Galileans was "mixed with their sacrifices" (Luke 13:1). We know nothing about this incident. But the reference suggests that Pilate attacked these people in the moment of their worship. If so, it is another example of his cruel and reckless dealings with the Jews.

In each of these incidents and from each of the writers through whom we learn of them we receive an amazingly consistent picture. It is a picture of one who obviously did not have the sensitivity or strength of character to rule well. He was stubborn, proud, corrupt, violent, and cruel.

The Gospel Picture

Yet the mystery comes in at this point, for as soon as we turn to the Gospel accounts, we find a portrait not of one who is cruel and insensitive but rather of one who seems to be sensitive to the cause of justice through his apparent desire to have Jesus of Nazareth acquitted. The Gospel writers would have no cause to enhance Pilate's character. He was the one who actually carried out the crucifixion of their Lord. We may assume, therefore, that the accounts of his actions that they give are correct. But this does not seem to agree with what we know of Pilate elsewhere. The true Pilate is arrogant, overbearing, and unyielding. This Pilate is attempting every stratagem and compromise he knows to have Jesus acquitted.

First, he reopens the case to the obvious surprise and consternation of the Jewish leaders. This is the essential point of the verses with which John begins his account of the trial. The Jewish leaders must have arranged with Pilate to have a hasty morning confirmation of the verdict that they were to reach the night before. But instead of the quick ruling they expected, Pilate began a formal hearing. What had happened to Pilate in the preceding eight or nine hours? Why had he changed his mind?

As the trial goes on we see Pilate's concern demonstrated in other ways. Three times over he declares that Christ is innocent (John 18:38; 19:4, 6). Again, when the leaders are adamant in opposition to his verdict, he tries a series of subterfuges. He sends Christ to Herod, hoping that Herod will take the matter out of his hands (Luke 23:6-12). He offers a choice between Jesus or Barabbas, wishing that Jesus might be set free (Matt. 27:15-26; Mark 15:6-15; John 18:39-40). Finally, he scourges Jesus, thinking that the sight of the bleeding, broken man might move his accusers to pity (John 19:1-5).

Behind Every Man

What accounts for this unnatural change in Pilate's character? Why is he trying to release the Lord? There have been three possible explanations: the first of which is clearly not right (though we should consider it), the second of which probably has some truth (but only some), the third of which alone seems to be the truly adequate reason.

The first explanation is that Pilate was more noble than the secular historians give him credit for being. This is an obvious possibility. But it is clearly not right; for it is the secular historians and not the biblical writers who have the best motivations for placing the Roman ruler in a good light. They have no reason to slander him. Hence, we must believe that he really was the kind of man they picture. Conversely, the biblical writers have no reason to place him in a good light at all. If they do, it is clearly because (on this occasion at least and for whatever reason) he acted precisely as they portray him.

The second explanation probably contains some truth. It is that Pilate was impressed by the person of Jesus. We can imagine this to be true because of what we believe concerning the presence and overriding dignity of Christ. But we have to admit that there is very little in the narratives to suggest this as Pilate's real motivation. We sense that Pilate may have been impressed, but if he had put it into words he would probably have dismissed Christ as "a harmless religious fanatic" and little more. Certainly this was no overriding reason to spare him.

The third explanation, which I suspect is the real one, is outlined in detail by Frank Morison, in the work referred to already. He reminds us that on the morning of the trial Pilate, according to Matthew's account, received an urgent warning from his wife, Claudia, who was in the city with him over this particular weekend, saying that he should have nothing to do with Jesus and giving as her reason that she had dreamt about him. Matthew reports this: "When Pilate was sitting on the judge's seat, his wife sent him this message: 'Don't have anything to do with that innocent man, for I have suffered a great deal today in a dream because of him" (27:19). To those who live in the twentieth century this may seem almost inconsequential. But the Romans were particularly superstitious where dreams were concerned and seldom undertook any grand enterprise without some inquiry as to what the gods or fate deemed favorable. To Pilate his wife's warning would therefore have been quite serious, and he might well have determined to extricate himself at whatever cost from his earlier agreement to consent to Jesus' death.

Moreover, this generally overlooked factor in the events of the Roman trial makes sense of several other elements, as Morison indicates. He suggests:

1. That Pilate and Claudia were probably spending the night together on the evening Jesus was arrested.
2. That Claudia would therefore have known of the visit of Caiaphas (or whoever made up the Jewish delegation) and would have learned of its purpose, either through being present or through asking Pilate about it afterward.

3. That she went to bed with thoughts of Jesus in her mind and then, quite understandably, dreamed of him with forebodings.

4. That she awoke in the morning to find that Pilate had already risen and left the palace and therefore knew at once the business on which he was embarked and her own need for haste.

5. That she quickly wrote the message Matthew records and forwarded it to her husband, saying that he was not to condemn "that righteous man."

Morison concludes, "It was she who stiffened the Roman instinct for justice in Pilate, at a moment when he was tempted, from personal considerations, to humor the prejudices of the Jewish camarilla, and commit Jesus on their recommendation alone. It was she who was the author of that resplendent phase when the tyrant was seen for a few hours in the guise of a patient administrator anxious to weigh the truth to the last ounce.... While the stimulus lasted his handling of this difficult and perplexing case was well-nigh perfect. No more just hearing than this could any man have asked or obtained in any court of that far-off day. The restraining influence of one who clearly believed that Jesus was innocent is obviously upon it. It was only as the stimulus faded against the grinding and growing opposition of the Jewish party that the threat of Caesar's intervention became paramount, and he ended as he intended to begin, by delivering the Prisoner into their hands."

Life's Crises

With that we confront the second great mystery of the Roman trial. The first is that Pilate acted out of character in his obvious desire to have Christ acquitted. We have analyzed that and studied the reason. The second mystery is that, in spite of this great desire and in spite of his power to see that his will was carried out, in the end Pilate consented to Christ's execution.

One lesson in this is the impossibility of a neutral stance where Christ is concerned. Pilate clearly wanted to release him. But he was not a believer in Christ. He was not a follower of Christ. He merely wanted to be innocent of Christ's condemnation; and, of course, he failed miserably. He could not be neutral, and neither can we be. We must either be for the Lord Jesus Christ or against him. Either we are for him, in which case he will strengthen us and enable us to live for him even in the midst of great trials. Or we are against him, no matter how humane, noble, or understanding we may consider ourselves to be.

The second lesson concerns the need to be prepared for life's crises. When Pilate arose that morning, he certainly did not expect to be confronted by the greatest decision of his career. That morning, all he thought he was going to do was consent to a routine condemnation that was basically not much of his affair. Yet suddenly the crisis was on him. Jesus was there, and Jesus was either innocent or guilty. What was Pilate to do? How would he act? We know the outcome. He failed. It would be wise to conclude, therefore, on the basis of his experience as well as our own, that we should never count on either a sense of nobility (which Pilate undoubtedly thought to be true in his case), insight (which is always expected of judges), or the warning of friends (as was the case in the urgent communication from his wife) to be adequate to lead us to do the right thing in a crisis situation.

What will? The only thing that is adequate is the life of the Lord Jesus Christ within and a close relationship with him out of which he can speak to us and lead us to do right in spite of our natural inclinations.

Chapter 232.
Jesus before Pilate

John 18:33-38

The previous study dealt with two puzzling aspects of the Roman trial: one, the contrast between what we know from secular sources regarding Pilate's character—insensitive, impetuous, 1426 rude—and the way the four Gospels indicate he actually conducted the trial; the second, that Pilate pronounced Christ innocent and yet condemned him to be crucified. These elements make a study of the Roman trial quite difficult and suggest levels of mystery that are possibly unfathomable.

There is one aspect of the Roman trial that is not the least bit mysterious, however. It is the tendency of human nature meticulously to go through all the external forms required by a situation while at the same time denying the very reality the forms stand for. There are two examples of this in the second segment of Christ's trial. On the one hand, there is the example of the Jewish rulers who, we are told, "to avoid ceremonial uncleanness the Jews did not enter the palace; they wanted to be able to eat the Passover" (John 18:28). Here were men engaged in a most vile act, the judicial murder of Jesus; yet they were concerned about being ceremonially defiled. They had convicted an innocent man of crimes worthy of death, breaking scores of their own laws in the process. They were about to seek a parallel conviction from Pilate by illegally and unconscionably changing the nature of the accusation made against their prisoner. Yet they were concerned about a ritual purification.

The other example of this human tendency is Pilate, who made a great show of justice while actually allowing mob action to force his acquiescence in the death of a man whom he knew was innocent.

The Formal Indictment

Some students of the Roman trial of Jesus have insisted that the real trial was before the Jewish Sanhedrin and that this was merely an informal hearing. But their argument overlooks the actual stages of the trial as they are recorded for us by the New Testament authors. A Roman trial had four essential elements: the indictment, the examination, the defense, and the verdict. Each of these is present in Christ's trial. The official nature of the proceedings is indicated by Pilate's opening words: "What charges are you bringing against this man?" (v. 29). As Chandler observes, 'This question is very keenly indicative of the presence of the judge and of the beginning of a solemn judicial proceeding. Every word rings with Roman authority and strongly suggests administrative action."

Pilate's question seems to have caught the Jewish leaders by surprise, however. For instead of replying with a formal indictment, as they should have been prepared to do, they attempted to evade the question by answering: "If he were not a criminal, we would not have handed him over to you" (v. 30).

At the very least, the reply of the leaders suggests that the priests and scribes regarded their own trial as sufficient and were coming to Pilate merely to secure a formal signature to effect the execution. They were saying, "You should accept the judgment that he is worthy of death merely because we say so." On the other hand, there may be more to it than this, as was argued in our earlier treatment of the Jewish trial. As we saw in that study, we can hardly suppose that the Jewish Sanhedrin launched into the trial of Jesus at this relatively late hour in Passover week without some understanding with Pilate that he would hear the case and concur in their verdict early on this particular morning. It is clear that the Jews expected a perfunctory endorsement of the verdict already arrived at by their own court. When Pilate surprised them by apparently intending to open the case anew and conduct a formal hearing, they were temporarily caught off guard and replied with this evasion.

Pilate said that if they were unwilling to make a formal accusation, they obviously did not need him and therefore should prosecute the case according to their own laws and inflict whatever penalties they were legally entitled to impose. It is possible that at this point Pilate did not understand that the Jews were seeking the death penalty in Jesus' case, but it is far more likely that he understood this all too well and was speaking as he did merely to remind the priests that they were under the rule of Rome and would have to conform to Rome's rules if they wished to have Christ executed. In a later incident involving the apostle Paul, the same principle was stated: "It is not the Roman custom to hand over any man before he has faced his accusers and has had an opportunity to defend himself against their charges" (Acts 25:16).

The unanticipated stubbornness of Pilate clearly thwarted the Jews in their designs. But they were resourceful and, therefore, produced an accusation on the spur of the moment. John does not record it; he passes instead to the heart of the accusation and Pilate's examination of Jesus on this point. But Luke gives the accusation in full. It has three parts. "We have found this man subverting our nation. He opposes payment of taxes to Caesar and claims to be the Christ" (Luke 23:2).

This is not the crime of which Jesus had been convicted in their own court. Chandler writes, "In the passage from the Sanhedrin to the Praetorium, the indictment had completely changed. Jesus had not been condemned on any of the charges recorded in this sentence of St. Luke. He had been convicted on the charge of blasphemy. But before Pilate he is now charged with high treason.... Why? Because blasphemy was not an offense against Roman law, and Roman judges would generally assume cognizance of no such charges.

"The Jews understood perfectly well at the trial before Pilate the principle of Roman procedure so admirably expressed a few years later by Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, and brother of Seneca: 'If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: but if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters.' This attitude of Roman governors toward offenses of a religious nature perfectly explains the Jewish change of front in the matter of the accusation against Jesus. They merely wanted to get themselves into a Roman court on charges that a Roman judge would consent to try. In the threefold accusation recorded by the third Evangelist, they fully accomplished this result."

The first charge was that Christ was "perverting the nation." This was indefinite. Had Pilate taken it seriously, it would have had to have been supported by specific examples of sedition. Still, it was a real offense. It was, in fact, the precise charge that the Jewish court had tried to prove against Jesus in reference to his claim to be able to tear down the temple and rebuild it in three days. The Jews had been unable to prove this in their court because of the contradictory testimony of their witnesses.

The second charge was also serious. In fact, it was more serious than the first in that it was a specific treasonable act under Roman law governing a captive state. The only problem with this charge is that it was clearly false. On an earlier occasion the nation's leaders had attempted to trap Jesus on this very issue, but he had acquitted himself admirably. They had come to him with a trick question, asking, "What is your opinion? Is it right to pay taxes to Caesar or not?" (Matt. 22:17). They reasoned that if he said yes, they could denounce him to the people, saying, "What kind of Messiah is this who counsels abject subservience to Rome?" On the other hand, if he replied no, they could denounce him to Rome, saying "You have an insurrectionist on your hands." But what did Christ answer? He asked for a coin and demanded of his questioners, "Whose portrait is this? And whose inscription?" (v. 20). When they replied, "Caesar's," he gave that ruling that has become the classical biblical statement of the separation of church and state, involving the proper responsibilities of and to each. He said, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's" (v. 21). In this charge the leaders were therefore guilty of the most flagrant and malicious of lies.

The third charge was the greatest and most serious of the three, that Jesus had claimed to be "Christ, a king." It was serious because it was true. It was also serious because it was the claim about which Rome was most sensitive and against which she was most on her guard. When Pilate heard this charge he gathered his robes about him, motioned for Jesus to follow him, made his way back into the palace (which John alone records) and began the examination, the second part of every Roman trial. Not content with receiving the formal accusation alone, Pilate now sought to determine whether the charges preferred against Jesus were true.

The Examination

Each of the Gospel writers records the question with which Pilate began his interrogation. It is simply, "Are you the King of the Jews?" (Matt. 27:11; Mark 15:2; Luke 23:3; John 18:33). With this question Pilate, it would appear, impatiently brushed aside the two lesser charges as unworthy of serious consideration and proceeded at once to examine Jesus on that charge which, if true, would unmistakably brand him Caesar's enemy.

John records Christ's full reply. As we read it, it seems like an evasion —"Is that your own idea or did others talk to you about me?" (v. 34)— but actually Jesus' reply is much to the point. For having heard the charge first from the lips of the Jews and now from Pilate himself, Jesus wishes to know first of all in what sense the question is being put to him. What was the nature of the charge? If the question were being asked from a Roman point of view, one answer would be given; for Christ was not a king from Rome's perspective. On the other hand, if the question were being asked from a Jewish perspective, quite another answer would be given; for Jesus was the Jews' Messiah.

Pilate's reply, while abrupt, is nevertheless also directly to the point at this stage in the examination. He asks, "Am I a Jew? It was your people and your chief priests who handed you over to me. What is it you have done?" (v. 35). This means, "I am no Jew. I ask my question as a Roman administrator and, as such, purely religious questions have no interest for me. What I want to know is: What have you done that might affect the sovereignty of Caesar?"

The Defense

At this point, although the interrogation continues, Jesus begins his defense by introducing what in modern law would be called a plea of confession and avoidance. This is a plea which admits, either in words or in effect, the truth of the accusation but which nevertheless introduces some new matter to avoid the guilt which normally would follow. For example, we may imagine a case in which a man is on trial for murder. The judge asks, "Did you shoot and kill John Smith on the date in question?" The defendant might answer, "Yes, I did, Your Honor; but you should know that I discovered him in my dining room near an open window trying to steal my silver chest and that when I discovered him he came at me with a knife. My plea is justified homicide and selfdefense." Here the defendant admits to the killing but pleads extenuating circumstances. In the same way, the Lord now admits to the charge of having claimed to be a king but describes his kingship in such a way that it is seen to be no threat to the legitimate claims of Caesar.

Jesus first explains the nature of his kingdom negatively: "My kingdom is not of this world. If it were, my servants would fight to prevent my arrest by the Jews. But now my kingdom is from another place" (v. 36).

We do not know whether Pilate understood what Jesus was saying in this reply, but one phrase immediately caught his attention, the phrase "my kingdom." Jesus seemed to be saying that this was not an earthly kingdom, but Pilate could take no chances on this crucial issue. He therefore picked up on this phrase and (probably) advanced on Christ threateningly to demand sternly, "You are a king, then!" (v. 37).

This time Jesus replies to the question with a positive affirmation: "You are right in saying that I am a king. In fact, for this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me" (v. 37).

Jesus' defense has two parts. One is a negative definition of his kingdom. It is "not of this world." The proof is that his disciples did not fight to prevent his arrest by the Jewish authorities. The other is a positive definition of the kingdom. It is of "the truth." That is, it is a kingdom ruling over people's minds and aspirations. Chandler writes, "His was not an empire of matter, but a realm of truth. His kingdom differed widely from that of Caesar. Caesar's empire was over the bodies of men; Christ's over their souls. The strength of Caesar's kingdom was in citadels, armies, navies, the towering Alps, the all-engirding seas. The strength of the kingdom of Christ was and is and will ever be in sentiments, principles, ideas, and the saving power of a divine word."

Pilate could not fully appreciate this instruction. 'Truth?" he asked. "What is truth?" Then he turned away, convinced at last that whatever Jesus' peculiar ideas, he was certainly no worse than any other religious fanatic and was, at least from Rome's point of view, perfectly innocent of any capital offenses.

The Verdict

The last phase of the Roman trial followed immediately upon Pilate's examination of Jesus and Jesus' defense. John tells us that, having concluded this examination, "he went out again to the Jews, and said, 'I find no basis for a charge against him'" (v. 38). Absolvo! Nonfecisse videtur! Standing alone these phrases indicate the close of the trial and mark it as being an official court proceeding.

Pilate had tried and acquitted Jesus. Why then did he not release him or, if need be, place him in protective custody as a later Roman ruler did with the apostle Paul when his life was threatened (Acts 21:31-33; 23:12-24)? This is the question that the human race has asked of Pontius Pilate for nearly two thousand years. Pilate was guilty of nothing at all up to this point. In fact, he had conducted the trial with precision, wisdom, and dispatch. He had reached the right verdict. But now, in spite of his calling as a Roman governor and judge, the high example of many thousands of Roman administrators before him, and the power of the legions in Palestine, he failed to do the right thing by immediately setting Christ free. The mood of the crowd forestalled him. Then he settled down into a series of irregular and illegal proceedings that eventually ended in the prisoner's execution. Pilate was a coward. This is the only proper analysis of his character and the ultimate explanation of why he failed to do right in this situation.

What does this mean? It means that in the true, eternal issues of the case it is Pilate who was judged by the Lord and found wanting. I have titled this chapter 'Jesus before Pilate," but we must never forget that in another and far more important sense it is also "Pilate before Jesus." In the former Jesus was tried and found innocent. Rightly so. In the latter Pilate was tried and found guilty.

So are all who stand before Christ. He is the only perfect person who ever lived. His standard for us is perfection. We all fall short, each one. For "there is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one" (Rom. 3:10-12). We stand condemned. But it is for such condemned men and women that Christ died. He died to bear the punishment for their sin and thereby free them from God's righteous judgment and curse.

Has he done that for you? He has if you are a subject of his kingdom, which you have entered (if you have entered it) by a believing response to his truth and person. That response entails the belief that Jesus is who he says he is (the Son of God) and did what he said he would do (die for your sin), coupled with a personal commitment to follow him as your Savior and Lord.

Chapter 233.
Christ's Kingdom Not of This World

John 18:36-37

In the first of his two great letters to Timothy, the apostle Paul tells us that Jesus Christ "while testifying before Pontius Pilate made the good confession" (1 Tim. 6:13). That good confession is not found in the synoptic Gospels—Matthew, Mark, or Luke—for they contain only a fiveword response from Jesus. When Jesus was asked if he were the king of the Jews, they report him as answering, "It is as you say" (Matt. 27:11; Mark 15:2; Luke 23:3), after which he said nothing. It is only in John that the good confession of Jesus before Pilate is reported to us fully.

We can be glad that John recorded it. For one thing, it teaches us what a "good confession" is. This confession is good as to the manner in which it is given. It was not rude or brusque or condescending or veiled in mysteries, as our confessions often are. It was simple, kind, direct, and helpful. Though Christ was soon to be condemned by Pilate, he did not despise him but rather treated him with the respect due him because of his office. Again, the confession of our Lord was good as to its matter, for here, before one who was rightly concerned with earthly sovereignty, Christ spoke of divine versus human affairs and of God's sovereignty. This teaches us how we should speak of spiritual things and what we should say.

A second reason why we should be glad that John has included these words is that they contain a definition of the nature of Christ's kingdom in the very words of Jesus and at a most important moment.

Those who have studied the meaning of the kingdom of God in the Old and New Testaments know that this is a very complex subject, the reason being that the phrase is used in so many different ways. Sometimes it seems to refer in an abstract way to the reign or rule of God. At other times it refers to a coming future rule of Christ or God upon earth. In one key text (Luke 17:21, and parallels) the kingdom of God is said to be "among" or "in the midst" of this world, presumably in the person of Christ and his disciples. In a fourth series of passages the kingdom is something into which men and women enter. This is confusing, and it is compounded by the fact that, according to one writer at least, "Jesus nowhere defined what he meant by the phrase."

Well, it may be true that Jesus nowhere gives a careful theological definition of "the kingdom of God." There are not many terms he did do this with. But still these verses in John's Gospel may be brought forward as something very closely approaching it.

Christ, a King

The jumping-off point for Christ's definition of his kingdom is with the confession that he is indeed a king, whatever the appearances may be to the contrary. He did not look like a king. He was bound and beaten (Luke 22:63-65). He was to be beaten further still. Yet no king, seated upon a throne at the pinnacle of world power, was more entitled to be called a king than he.

This fact is important, for what is true of the king is no less true of his kingdom. Charles Haddon Spurgeon wrote of this more than a hundred years ago: "To this day, pure Christianity, in its outward appearances, is an equally unattractive object, and wears upon its surface few royal tokens. It is without form or comeliness, and when men see it, there is no beauty that they should desire it. True, there is a nominal Christianity which is accepted and approved of men, but the pure gospel is still despised and rejected. The real Christ of today, among men, is unknown and unrecognized as much as he was among his own nation eighteen hundred years ago.... Christ chanted in cathedrals, Christ personified in lordly prelates, Christ surrounded by such as are in kings' houses, he is well enough; but Christ honestly obeyed, followed, and worshiped in simplicity, without pomp or form, they will not allow to reign over them....

"We are satisfied that Christ is the king still where he was wont to be king, and that is not among the great ones of the earth, nor among the mighty and the learned, but amongst the base things of the world and the things which are not, which shall bring to nought the things that are, for these hath God from the beginning chosen to be his own."

A Spiritual Kingdom

Jesus says his kingdom is "not of this world." That says a great deal in itself and also by implication.

So far as the statement itself is concerned, it is a denial of the importance for Christ of those things that usually concern earthly monarchs. One concern is for geography. Kings rule a certain carefully defined territory. They protect that territory from others. When they fight, it is usually over this or other territory they wish to annex. But this is not Christ's concern. His kingdom is not of this world. Another concern of this world's rulers is with taxes. There has never been a kingdom without taxes. Taxes pay for the government, army, public works, and of course for the army of bureaucrats who collect the taxes and do a host of other things. But Christ's concern is not with taxes. His kingdom is not of this world. This world's princes are concerned with pomp and ceremony, prestige and privileges, acclaim. Not so Christ. It is of his kingdom as the hymn states:

> For not with swords' loud clashing,
> Nor roll of stirring drums— With deeds of love and mercy The heav'nly kingdom comes.

It is not only in a negative way that this definition of the kingdom of God speaks to us, however. It also speaks by implication. Christ has said that his kingdom is not of this world. But if that is true, from whence does it come? If his kingship is not of this world, it is either from hell or from heaven.

There is a kingdom which is the kingdom of hell. We do not mean by this that somewhere in the universe there is a geographic territory known as hell over which Satan presides, along the lines John Milton painted in Paradise Lost. There is a geographical hell, just as there is a geographical heaven. But Satan does not rule there. God rules hell. That is what makes hell so horrible. On the other hand, this does not mean that there is not a satanic, hellish kingdom. On the contrary, there is; and it is this we are speaking about. It is of this kingdom that Jesus spoke when he referred to a kingdom being divided against itself and therefore being unable to stand (Mark 3:23-26). It is a "spiritual" kingdom founded on hate, pride, jealousy, anger, and cunning. It is the opposite of Christ's kingdom at every point. Is this Christ's source? Is this the source of his kingdom? We recall that the Pharisees thought so. Just before Christ's words about Satan's kingdom being divided against itself, they had said, "He is possessed by Beelzebub! By the prince of demons he is driving out demons" (Mark 3:22).

This is one logical explanation of the authority and kingship Christ so obviously possessed and demonstrated. But is it an adequate explanation? Can it explain the nature of Christ and the qualities of his rule? If it cannot—and who can seriously maintain that Christ's character and ministry were demonic—then the source must be heaven and Christ must be the Son of God. Sheer logic forces any honest person to that position.

The same logic applies to Christ's person. After you have disposed of the one truly impossible explanation of who Jesus is (that he is "a good man"), there are only three things that can be said of him. One, he is God, as he claimed. Two, he was crazy, for he mistakenly claimed to be God when he was not. Or three, he was a deceiver, for he knew he was not God, yet claimed to be God in order to gain a following through such deception. There are no other possibilities. The one who would face Christ honestly must decide among them. Is the Christ who has been proclaimed by so many throughout so many thousands of years of human history insane, a deceiver, or God? He cannot be put off with any nonsense about being a good teacher or a good man.

This was the dilemma Jesus put before everyone when in the Roman hall of judgment he said, "My kingdom is not of this world." Rule out this world, where deception is all too universal and obvious, and there are only two possibilities left: hell or heaven. If you cannot say, "He is from hell," then he is from heaven, and his kingdom is too. And whatever your opinion of it may be or whatever your wishes may be, you are his subject, and you are obliged to fall before him and confess him to be your Lord and your God.

When Jesus says, "My kingdom is not of this world," many utter a sigh of relief and say, "Well, thank God that Jesus' kingdom has nothing to do with us. It is a spiritual kingdom. Hallelujah! We can keep on as we have been and do as we please." Nothing is farther from the truth, for when we say that Christ's kingdom is not of this world, what we are really saying is that Christ's kingdom is of heaven and therefore has an even greater claim over us than do the earthly kingdoms we know so well. There is real sovereignty in an earthly kingdom. There is genuine authority which we may not flout. But over these is Christ, and we flout his kingship not merely at the peril of our fortune and lives but at the peril of our eternal souls.

Why risk such loss? Why not come to this king and confess his lordship? He has promised to rule in justice and with mercy, and he has assured us that his yoke is easy and his burden is light.

Two Kingdoms

There is a third area where Christ's words about his kingdom apply, and that is in their relationship to earthly powers, of which Pilate and the Roman Empire were examples. In modern American history there has been a tendency so to stress the legitimate principle of the separation of church and state that we have almost come to the point of saying that the church and state are not related to each other at all. This is wrong. Jesus deals with it not only in these verses, which speak of the nature of his kingdom, but also in the continuation of the discourse in chapter 19, in which the responsibility of Pilate over against the heavenly kingdom is stressed. In these later verses Pilate had begun to quiz Jesus again, and Jesus gave him no answer.

Pilate said, "Do you refuse to speak to me? Don't you realize I have power either to free you or to crucify you?"

Jesus replied, "You would have no power over me if it were not given to you from above. Therefore the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin" (19:10-11).

This reply speaks directly to the church/state problem. While it is true that the church and state each have their legitimate spheres of authority, and while it is also true that the church and state should have separate organizations, neither possessing the right to appoint officers or authorities in the other—nevertheless, it is not true that they are totally unrelated, for in many areas they have the same concerns, and both are responsible to the same divine sovereign.

Some have said, for example, that the Christian community should be so separated from the secular sphere that Christians should not go into politics, that believers in general should not vote in elections, that we should withdraw from the culture as much as possible, live in distinct communities, have Christians as friends exclusively, work for Christian companies, and so on. But Jesus refutes this when he says that his kingdom is not "of the world. The key word is "of." If he had said "in," we would separate. But he said "of and therefore means that we are to be actively "in" the world though not "of it in terms of its values and goals. To turn to the other side, some have said that the state has nothing to do with the concerns of Christian people; that it is not in business to "regulate morality," for example. But again this is wrong; for when Jesus reminded Pilate that his authority came from God, he was also reminding him that it was to be exercised in accord with the character of that one whose authority it is.

When the state develops and enforces laws against homicide, what is that but the legislation of morality? It is the state's way of saying, "We agree that life is precious and that it is wrong to take it away. In this we support the sixth of God's Ten Commandments." Again, when the state makes laws against larceny and burglary, what is it doing but enforcing the eighth commandment? The same is true of its requirement of legal marriages, contracts, labor negotiations, and similar formalities in a hundred different areas. In each of these areas the state is dealing with morality. Jesus emphasized in his words to Pilate that the state is responsible for this before God, just as the church is responsible.

This is the significance of Christ's mention of sin: "Therefore, the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin." Sin is a transgression of the law of God and is therefore punishable by God and will be punished by him. So Jesus was telling Pilate, "Your sin may not be as great as those who have hated me and turned me over to you. But their sin does not excuse your sin. You are still a sinner, and you will be judged for it."

Entering Christ's Kingdom

The final point Jesus made about his kingdom is that it is not entered into by secular means. The heavenly kingdom and the earthly kingdom overlap at some points, but not here. The same person may be in both; the emperor can also be a Christian. In some areas they have corresponding concerns. But they are nevertheless different kingdoms and are entered differently.

Jesus spelled this out in two ways. In one of the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount he indicated the manner in which we must enter, saying, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:3). This does not mean, "Blessed are the poor-spirited" or "Blessed are failures." To be poor in spirit is the opposite of being rich in pride. It means to be humble. So Christ's first requirement for entering his kingdom is to humble yourself and take up the position of a suppliant before him. It is to pray with the publican, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

Second, in his words before Pilate Jesus shows that this also has a positive dimension in the area of our response to his truth. Humility is a prerequisite, but it does not produce salvation in and of itself. Rather, we must also respond to that truth that Jesus came to earth to communicate. It consists in this: that Jesus is God, that he died on our behalf, and that those who have nothing to present to God in terms of their own merit nevertheless can come boldly to God on the merit of Jesus.

Chapter 234.
What Is Truth?

John 18:37-38

There are two ways to define something, and both are necessary. One way is by telling what the object in question is. The other way is by telling what it is not. Both are important because if you cannot say what it is not, then the object may very well be everything and consequently nothing. Some persons' definitions of God are like that; he is everything and therefore nothing at all. On the other hand, it is also necessary to say what the object is, because the negatives at best merely narrow down the possibilities.

This basic principle is important in the matter of the examination of Jesus by Pilate, for the crucial issue was the claim of the Lord to be a king and consequently to possess a kingdom. Was this kingship and kingdom to be thought of as in opposition to that of Caesar, whose interests Pilate was obliged to represent? Was it an earthly kingdom? Or was it something else, something that did not threaten Caesar's legitimate interests and that, therefore, neither he nor Pilate should fear? These were valid questions. So, in his conversation with Pilate, Jesus was careful to define the nature of his kingdom accurately. He defined it negatively by affirming that it is "not of this world." Now he defines it positively, showing that it is of "the truth" and that it was for the very purpose of bearing witness to the truth that he came into the world. In developing this he says, "For this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me" (John 18:37).

Pilate's Question

The interesting thing about this definition of Jesus' kingdom is that Pilate's response was not in the nature of a further pursuit of the matter or even a recognition of the importance of what Jesus said. Rather, it was a cynical response based on what was to Pilate the seeming impossibility of ever knowing what truth is. "What is truth?" he said, and then walked out.

When Sir Francis Bacon came to write his famous essay "On Truth," he suggested that Pilate's famous words were facetious. Bacon began, "What is truth? said jesting Pilate; and would not stay for an answer." Whatever these words were they were far from facetious, however. Pilate had just looked into the eyes of the Son of God and had heard him exclaim, "For this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth." No one who has had that experience could be joking. Moreover, it was far from a laughing matter. The situation was grave, and the question that welled up from Pilate's deep cynicism was the disillusioned and despairing cry of his age.

It is this that makes Pilate the preeminently modern man. We readily admit that there are elements of this trial that we can identify with only with difficulty. Obviously Pilate's concern for Caesar's rights is foreign to us. Even more so are the petty rivalries among the Jewish leaders and between these men and Pilate. But our inability to identify does not hold true at this point. On the contrary, here we detect the disillusioned voice of our own culture and recognize the current widespread view, not only that truth in the ultimate sense may be unknowable but that it may in fact not even exist as an object of our inquiries.

In Pilate's day disillusionment with truth was disillusionment with Greek philosophy. Pilate may have been no philosopher, but he was aware, as were all Romans, that the Greeks had excelled in precisely this field and yet had failed to solve the ultimate philosophical questions. The man who had tried hardest was Plato. Plato understood that the basic problem in acquiring knowledge of what is true is that there must be knowledge of more than particulars if there is to be meaning. In the language of philosophy the word "particulars" means "things," those things that we see in the world. We are surrounded by thousands of them at any given moment, and we know by experience and projection that there are many thousands, indeed millions, more. In a sense we know these particulars because we observe them. But real knowledge is something that goes beyond these individualized things to that general concept or form that gives them meaning.

For example, when we talk about chairs we can easily list many styles and types of chairs, some of them quite different from others. There are rocking chairs, spindle-back chairs, desk chairs, stuffed chairs—the list seems endless. Yet when we speak of a chair we obviously have some general idea of a chair into which these particulars fit. Plato said that what is so obviously true on this level must be true in every other area as well.

But where do these ideals come from? On the level of chairs we may argue that they come from the human mind, and thus we may localize the ultimate meaning of the universe there. But if we do that, we immediately want to ask: But where does the idea of the mind or of man himself come from? And where do we find absolutes in those areas about which men apparently disagree—morals, the proper structuring of human society, religion, and so on? Popular Greek thought answered: From the gods. But then, where does the idea of the gods come from? Plato recognized that in pursuing this necessary kind of argument one must move backward and upward to one great universal from which every meaning comes. But here is the problem. Although Plato and the other Greeks understood the necessity of finding such a grand, overriding universal, they nevertheless never found a place from which the universal could come nor a way in which it could be known surely. It was out of the despair of this search that Plato is reported to have said wistfully, "It may be that some day there will come forth from God a Word who will reveal all mysteries and make everything plain."

After Plato there were other attempts to solve this same great problem, but these were no more successful. Consequently, Greek philosophy gradually descended into a growing cynicism expressed in the "grin-and-bear-it" philosophy of the Stoics, the "if-it-feels-good-do-it" philosophy of the Epicureans, or the "leap-of-faith" philosophy of the various mystery religions. Pilate knew all this. So he asked (quite correctly from the perspective of the philosophical thought before him), "What is truth?" meaning that speculations in this area had proved both impractical and meaningless.

The Situation Today

One proposed solution to the problem of truth (though it is actually a denial of a solution) is the relativism that has grown out of the philosophy of Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831). Hegel was a German professor who, in a series of brilliant books, advanced the proposition that truth is not an absolute but rather is something that is always evolving through the flow of world history. In Hegel's view it is the result of a synthesis which comes about in this fashion. Every fact, theory or "truth" may be called a thesis, which by its very existence produces an antithesis. At first these appear as opposites, but in time they come together to form a synthesis. This synthesis in turn becomes a new thesis producing its own antithesis, and so on. According to this system truth is relative. It depends upon whom you are asking and of what period you are asking. What is true now may not have been true ten or twenty years ago, and it may not be true ten or twenty years from now. Or again, it may be true for me but not for you. This is Hegel's heritage for the modern world.

Most people today speak of what is true or false purely on a subjective basis. That is, they determine whether a thing is true or not on the basis of how it makes them feel.

In the winter of 1976-77, the Public Broadcasting System aired a six-part film series entitled Scenes From a Marriage. It was by Ingmar Bergman and was originally for Swedish viewers. On the surface it is merely a perceptive analysis of the breakup of what appears to be an ideal marriage. But it is actually more than that. It is an analysis of our culture, as most Bergman films are, and it is filled with personal and political implications. In the first of these six scenes there is a speech by Johan, the husband, which unintentionally reveals the weaknesses both of Johan and Marianne, his wife, and of their marriage. They are being interviewed for a national magazine.

They are sitting on a sofa. The interviewer asks, "Are you afraid of the future?"

Johan replies, "If I stopped to think, I'd be petrified with fear. Or so I imagine. So I don't think. I'm fond of this cozy old sofa and that oil lamp. They give me an illusion of security which is so fragile that it's almost comic. I like Bach's St. Matthew Passion though I'm not religious, because it gives me feelings of piety and belonging. Our families see a lot of each other and I depend very much on this contact, as it reminds me of my childhood when I felt I was protected. I like what Marianne said about fellow-feeling. It's good for a conscience which worries on quite the wrong occasions. I think you must have a kind of technique to be able to live and be content with your life. In fact, you have to practice quite hard not caring about anything. The people I admire most are those who can take life as a joke. I can't. I have too little sense of humor for a feat like that. You won't print this, will you?"

The speech is devastating. There is a denial of security but a wish for security feelings. There is denial of religious values but a desire for religious feelings. In fact, feelings are all there are. Therefore it is no surprise that the solution to living that Johan puts forward is technique—"You must have a kind of technique to be able to live and be content with your life." What happens when the technique fails? The answer is that the marriage breaks up, as this one does. Thus does Bergman dramatize what is happening to our society.

Today as never before, on thousands of campuses and in millions of homes, the question of truth is not even asked. Instead people are asking, "Does it work?" "Is it practical?" "How does it make you feel?" Obviously our own lack of meaning is linked to the failure of this quest, and the declining moral tone of our culture—expressed in presidential scandals, industrial pay-offs, legalized immorality, shoplifting, and many other things—flows from it.

Word to Modern Man

Here we turn to the answer to the modern dilemma, for if Pilate's question is preeminently the modern question, then the statement of Christ which provoked it is preeminently a word to our own disillusioned culture. This is not the first time Jesus had spoken of truth and its nature. Earlier he had spoken of himself as "the truth" (John 14:6). He had called the Holy Spirit the "spirit of truth" (John 14:17; 15:26; 16:13). He referred to the Bible as "truth" (John 17:17). He even spoke of the need to "worship ... in truth" (John 4:23-24) and to "do" the truth (John 3:21). All these references are totally understandable in view of the Old Testament conception of what truth is and how it functions. But here before Pilate, in the very last references to truth in the entire Gospel, Jesus refers to it in a way which even a Gentile like Pilate could fathom: "For this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of the truth listened to me." This says several important things that Pilate and our own culture need to know.

First, it says that there is such a thing as truth and that truth is an entity. That is, truth is singular. It is not in fragments that would require us to speak of "truths" in the sense of unrelated facts or items. Truth holds together. Therefore, there is no phase of truth that is not related to every other phase of truth. The nature of God is related to the structure of the atom. The inspiration and inerrancy of the Bible are related to the multiplication table. All things that are true are part of the truth and stand in a proper and inescapable relationship to God, who is himself the truth.

Second, the Lord indicates by his statement that truth is not only an entity, it is objective. That is, it is there to be observed and discussed, and we can observe it and discuss it without prejudice.

This is involved in Christ's statement that he has come to bear witness to the truth, as one might to any fact submitted in a court of law.

This has implications in two areas. On the one hand, it says something about the way the Christian should approach scientific truth. He may approach it dispassionately and analytically. On the other hand, this also says something about the nature of religious truth. For if truth is an entity and truth is objective, then religious truth is not something beyond the range of analysis and verification. It is not something to be reached by a great "leap of faith." Rather, it is something that may be studied and that will therefore inevitably throw light upon our natures and the nature of the universe. Just as the biologist might look through a microscope to study the nature of the microscopic world, so we look through the microscope of the Word to see our true condition. In that Book we find that God has done what needs to be done by sending his Son as our Savior. Jesus died for us. He rose for us. He reigns for us. That is objective truth. Therefore, it may be studied and applied to our lives as any other truth can.

Third, the words of the Lord to Pilate indicate that truth must come from above, for when Jesus says that he has come to bear witness to the truth, he implies that in the ultimate sense truth is not of this world but rather must come to this world by revelation.

This is so of all truth. It is true of spiritual truth, of course; for apart from the revelation we have in God's Word, no one would even guess what is disclosed there, let alone really know it. We cannot guess what God is like nor what he has done in Jesus Christ for our salvation. It is also the case, however, with scientific truth, for although it is true that God has given us primarily a book of spiritual truth, not scientific truth, he has nevertheless given us minds capable of perceiving the revelation of himself in nature and actually leads the mind to discover what is to be found there. Sometimes scientists are unaware of this. At other times they know it. It is said that Samuel Morse, the inventor of the telegraph, was once seen bowed over the desk where he was working. "What are you doing?" he was asked.

Morse replied, "I am asking God for help. Every time I go into my laboratory I say, 'O God, I am nothing. Give me wisdom. Give me clarity of mind.'" Morse knew that truth comes from God. Consequently, we are not surprised to learn that the very first message sent over his new invention was the thankful and wondering question, "What hath God wrought?"

Fourth, the words of our Lord teach that in the ultimate sense the truth that comes from God has been embodied in a person. No one would ever imagine this. To us truth is abstract and may be supposed always to remain abstract. We think of truth in terms of equations and figures and propositions. But God says that truth is personal. More than that, it is a person and this person is the Lord Jesus Christ. He himself said unequivocably, "I am the way and the truth and the life" (John 14:6). This is the answer to Plato's quest. Plato had said, "It may be that some day there will come forth from God a Word who will reveal all mysteries and make everything plain." That Word has now come. The Lord is that Word. He is the One who has come to reveal all mysteries and make everything plain to those who will come to him.

Chapter 235.
No Fault in Him at All

John 18:38

In the instructions for the observance of the Passover occurring in Exodus 12 and in other parts of the Old Testament, there is a detail that has bearing on the outcome of the trial of the Lord Jesus Christ before Pilate. These passages tell us that the lamb to be killed in the observance of the Passover was to be "without blemish" (Exod. 12:5; cf. Lev. 22:17-25). In order to make sure that it was without blemish it was to be kept in the home for three days prior to the sacrifice, during which time it was to be examined carefully. Only when it was known to be flawless was it to be used in the Passover ritual.

This has bearing upon the trial of the Lord Jesus Christ before Pilate because in the plan of God he was the true Passover Lamb, who died that the angel of spiritual death might pass over all who trust in his sacrifice. He was examined to this end and found to be without blemish. We might say that at the time of his entry upon his public ministry the Lord was taken into the house of Israel for three years. At the beginning of that ministry he had been identified as the Lamb of God by John the Baptist, his divinely appointed forerunner. John had pointed him out, saying, "Behold the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29). From that point on the Lord moved in and out among the people of Israel to be examined by them—by friends and enemies alike. None could find fault with him. Now, in what is virtually the last official word pronounced on earth concerning Jesus, the Roman procurator Pilate comes forth in opposition to the determined will of the Jews and even the careless nature of his own conscience to declare Jesus innocent.

He does it three times. First, at the conclusion of the official Roman trial. In this trial Jesus had been accused of making himself to be "Christ, a king," thus an enemy of Caesar. Pilate found the charge unwarranted. After a careful examination of Jesus as to the nature of his supposed kingdom, he appeared to the crowd and declared, "I find no basis for a charge against him" (John 18:38; Luke 23:4).

The second declaration of Jesus' innocence was after Pilate had sent Jesus to Herod and had received him back uncondemned. "Look, I am bringing him out to you to let you know that I find no basis for a charge against him," Pilate said (John 19:4; cf. Luke 23:14-15).

The last occasion was after Pilate had caused Jesus to be flogged, hoping by this act to satisfy the outraged and vicious mob. Pilate declared, "I find no basis for a charge against him" (John 19:6; cf. Luke 23:22). The leaders of the people were insistent and stirred up the people to cry out repeatedly, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" So at last, Pilate, being unwilling to risk a riot and thus the loss of his own position, gave Christ over to death even though he had found him innocent. However—and this is the point we are making—it is as one uncondemned and, in fact, declared to be blameless that Christ goes to Calvary. It is as God's blameless Lamb that Jesus dies for the sin of this world.

A Universal Verdict

But it was not only by Pilate that this important verdict—"I find no basis for a charge against him"—was given. It has been given by all who have ever examined or been associated with the Lord Jesus. Think of those who had pronounced a verdict of "innocent" upon him.

There is God the Father, first of all. At the beginning of Christ's public ministry John the Baptist had identified the Lord as God's Lamb. Although John was a prophet and therefore one to be believed and trusted, we might well want to ask if John is entirely sure of this identification. After all, Israel had waited for hundreds of years for her Messiah, and the waiting of the world for the One who was to crush the head of Satan was even longer. "Is he really the one?" we might ask. "Is this really the blameless Lamb who is to die for the sin of this world?" The issue is not allowed to stand in doubt, for as soon as John has baptized Jesus, the Holy Spirit in a visible form, like a dove, is seen to light upon him; and God's voice is heard from heaven, saying, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22).

Later, on the Mount of Transfiguration, after Jesus had appeared in his glory with Moses and Elijah, the voice was heard again, declaring, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased. Listen to him" (Matt. 17:5; cf. Mark 9:7; Luke 9:35).

A second verdict of "innocent" was pronounced upon Christ by those who knew him best, his disciples. There was much about him that they did not know or understand. They did not know the purpose of his ministry, nor did they understand the necessity of his death. But one thing they knew. They had never met anyone who could match the moral excellence of his personality or teaching. John called Christ "the righteous" (1 John 2:1). Peter, in those early sermons recorded in the Book of Acts, called him the "Holy One" (Acts 2:27) and "the Righteous One" (Acts 3:14). In his first epistle he says that Jesus was "without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:19). Matthew confessed him as "Immanuel... God with us" (Matt. 1:23). Thomas confessed Christ's perfection by declaring him "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28). All these had rubbed shoulders with Jesus in the closest possible contact. They had done this for the better part of three years. They had seen him in good times and bad, facing the acclaim of the multitudes as well as enduring the insults and outrages of those who were opposed to his teaching. If anyone would have known of a weakness in Christ, these men would have known it. Yet they would unhesitatingly and enthusiastically have confessed with Pilate, "We find no basis for a charge against him."

Again, there is the testimony of the Jewish leaders. These men were enemies for the most part. They had no desire to think of Jesus favorably. In fact, the opposite is the case. They hated him and wished to trap him in some folly for which he could then be openly accused or in some violation of the law for which he could be officially condemned. Yet they could not succeed. And when they at last condemned him it was only because he had openly declared himself to be the unique Son of God, which statement they, without any evidence at all, judged to be blasphemy.

But perhaps we are not looking in the right place. We have spoken of the disciples of Christ, who had full opportunity to observe Jesus but who might be thought to be partial. We have spoken of the leaders, who were certainly not favorable to him but who might be said to have lacked adequate opportunity to observe him at close hand. Was there no one who was both in a position to observe Christ closely and at the same time not predisposed to judge him favorably because of friendship or some similar cause? We have no right to expect such a person, but God in his wisdom has provided such a one in Judas. Judas was one of the Twelve. He was with Christ throughout his ministry, thereby having full opportunity to observe him. Yet after the betrayal Judas attempted to return the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, "I have sinned, for I have betrayed innocent blood" (Matt. 27:4). It was the equivalent of saying, "I find no fault in him at all."

Verdict of the Ages

Is that not the verdict of all who have ever associated with the Lord Jesus Christ? We have spoken of those who lived with him during his lifetime and knew him then. But what of those who have associated with him since—both friends and enemies? Is their verdict not identical?

Let us take Christ's friends first of all. These have trusted him as Savior and have been saved from their sin. But their way has not always been smooth. In the providence of God some have suffered great personal disappointment. Some have lost jobs, some families. Some have lost health. Some, like the Old Testament patriarch Job, have lost everything and have been forced to say, as he did, "May the day of my birth perish, and the night it was said, 'A boy is born!'... Why did I not perish at birth, and die as I came from the womb? Why were there knees to receive me and breasts that I might be nursed? For now I would be lying down in peace; I would be asleep and at rest" (Job 3:3, 11-13). Yet these have not cursed Christ. They have confessed rather that there is no fault in him at all.

Spurgeon writes of this truth, "Do you not think that out of the millions of Christians who have lived hoping in Christ some one would have told us if it is his habit to disappoint his people? Out of so many believers who dwell with Him surely some one or other of them, when they came to die, would have told us if He is not all that He professes to be. Would not some one or other have confessed, 'I trusted in Christ and he has not delivered me; it is all a delusion'? Surely, out of the many we have seen depart we should have found some one or two that would have let out the secret, and have said, 'He is a deceiver. He cannot save, he cannot help, he cannot deliver.' But never one dying believer throughout the ages has spoken ill of him, but all have said, 'We find no fault at all in him.'"

This is even true in a certain sense of Christ's enemies, at least if they have taken the trouble to examine his character and teachings. They may be opposed to Christianity. They may have no desire at all to follow Jesus. Still there are few critics who have not been impressed with Christ's person and there are fewer still who would rail against him.

Do you say that there nevertheless are some? Yes, that is true in a sense. But the last word is not in yet, for one day they will be confronted with Christ in his glory and will be forced to confess, in spite of themselves, that he is who he claimed to be and that he is without fault in his conduct both to themselves and others. Paul wrote of that day, saying that "every tongue" shall confess that "Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:11).

And Yet He Dies

The Lord Jesus Christ passed through every examination that could possibly be made of him and was declared to be blameless. He was weighed in every scale, measured by every standard, by friends and foes alike, and in each case he was found to be innocent. Yet now, although he is officially found to be innocent, he dies. Why is this? Death is the result of sin (Rom. 6:23; cf. 1 Cor. 15:56), but Christ was sinless. Why does the sinless One die?

We may answer the question on two levels. If we look at the question from the human point of view, the answer is that Jesus died as a result of the hatred of the Jewish leaders coupled to the moral cowardice of Pilate. This is only another way of saying that it was because of the rebellion of the human heart against God that Christ was crucified. But this is only one side of the story. The other side, the truly wonderful side, is that Jesus died because God had appointed him to be our sin-bearer.

Recently in my studies I have come across some words that present this truth so well that I quote them here at length. They are by a man who was probably the greatest evangelical preacher in Germany during the middle part of the nineteenth century, Friedrich Wilhelm Krummacher. They have been published in English under the title The Suffering Savior. Krummacher writes, "But tell us now, why did Jesus die? 'It is appointed unto sinners once to die, and after that the judgment'; but he was not a sinner. Even the redeemed have no other way to the heavenly world than through death, because their flesh is corrupted by sin. But in Christ's corporeality this is not the case; and yet he dies, and that in such a dreadful manner! Explain how this is. Take time to reflect. But however long and deeply you may study the subject, we tell you decidedly beforehand that you will not bring forward any rational, convincing, and satisfactory solution to this mystery.

"Hear, therefore, how we view the subject, and consider whether there is room for any other. The monstrous fact that the just and spotless Jesus, notwithstanding his holiness, was condemned to death, would compel us to the conclusion that the doctrine of a righteous God, who rules over all, is a delusion—that the will of man or chance alone govern the world—that there exists no divine retribution upon earth, and that it will not fare the worse with the impious than with the just—I say we should be necessarily compelled to inferences of this kind, if we were not permitted to assume that the immaculate Son of God suffered death in our stead. This view of the subject furnishes the only key to the mystery of the ignominious end of the just and holy Jesus.

"But if we presuppose an atonement made by Christ for sin—and we not only may do so, but are constrained to it by the clear evidence of Holy Writ—then all is plain; all is solved and deciphered, and a sublime meaning and a glorious connection pervades the whole. God threatened Adam in paradise, saying, 'In the day that thou eatest of the fruit of this tree, thou shalt surely die.' We did eat of that fruit and incurred the penalty. But the eternal Son now appears, removes the penalty from us to himself, and we live.

"On Sinai it was said, 'Cursed be everyone who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them.' We did not continue in them, and our fate was decided. But our Surety presents himself, endures the curse for us, and we are justly delivered and absolved. God has resolved to save sinners, notwithstanding he has said, 'I will blot the name of him that sinneth out of my book.' We believe in our salvation, for he inflicted upon Christ the punishment due to us. God promised the crown of life only to the obedient; but after Christ as our representative obeyed in our name, God can bestow the crown on sinners and yet continue holy.

'Thus all becomes clear, and the most striking opposites harmoniously agree. And yet men dare to call our doctrine of the atonement made by Christ irrational, and even absurd. Look how Pilate unconsciously stands in the breach for us, by testifying to the truth that Jesus was not guilty of death. Attempt in a satisfactory and rational manner, if you can, to explain it otherwise than by the atonement made by Christ, how it was that even the holy and immaculate Son of God paid the wages of sin."

No Health in Us

Yes, he is the guiltless one. But we are guilty. Of him it was said, "I find no basis for any charge against him." There was no fault to be found with Jesus. But of which of us can those words rightly be spoken? No fault in me? No fault in you? Impossible! Rather we are riddled with faults. As the ancient collect says, "We have done those things we ought not to have done; we have left undone those things we ought to have done; and there is no health in us." We have rebelled against God's righteous rule. We have broken his laws and have defaced his image in us. We deserve his just condemnation. We deserve to die. But at this point the glory of the gospel comes in. For Jesus, the Righteous One, has died for us that we might be saved from condemnation.

Has he died for you? Do you know that personally? If not, you can know it merely by committing yourself to him. You can say, "Lord Jesus Christ, I know that I am a sinner. I deserve to die for my sin, but you have died for me. I trust you as having become my Savior in your death. Receive me now as one of your followers. I promise to follow and serve you from this time forth, forever." If you will honestly pray that prayer, you are already his, for he has received you, having already done the marvelous work of regeneration in your heart.

Chapter 236.
Christ before Herod

John 18:38

The verdict of Pontius Pilate that the Lord Jesus Christ was innocent of the charges brought against him should have been followed by an immediate release of the prisoner. Or, if Pilate had reason to believe that the Jews would harm Jesus in spite of his judgment, he should have put the Lord into protective custody, as the Romans later did with the apostle Paul (Acts 21:31ff.). But when Pilate announced his verdict publicly the decision met with such opposition from the rulers and the crowds that Pilate immediately backed away from the only proper and noble course and instead attempted to bring about the release of Jesus indirectly.

He made three attempts to do this. One was to have Jesus beaten, thereby hoping to evoke pity from the bloodthirsty mob. A second was to honor the custom of releasing one prisoner at the feast which, he suggested, might be followed by releasing Jesus. A third attempt, the first Pilate tried, was to send the Lord Jesus Christ to Herod Antipas.

Pilate's attempt to pass the buck was unsuccessful, as such attempts usually are. He was attempting to pass the responsibility for dealing with Christ to Herod, but the matter simply came back to him. He could not escape it. No more can those today escape when confronted with the person of Christ and asked to take a stand for him.

Herod Antipas

Herod Antipas was a son of Herod the Great, who had commanded the babes of Bethlehem to be killed in hopes of destroying the so-called "King of the Jews" about whom he had been informed by the wise men (Matt. 2:1-18). Old Herod was a dissolute and dangerous creature. He had had ten wives and had murdered a number of them as well as several of his children. This had led the emperor Augustus to say of him that it was better to be Herod's pig than one of his sons. But however base the father was, this was even more true of the son. Antipas was a libertine of the worst sort. Thus, although he governed adequately for a time, he lacked that ruthless tenacity of purpose that had served his father well and so was eventually removed by the Romans.

Herod Antipas did not rule all that Herod the Great had ruled. One of the father's wills had designated Antipas his sole successor. But there had been various wills, and the matter was finally disposed by Augustus in the following fashion. One son, Archelaus, was given the area of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; that is, the southernmost region. He was termed an ethnarch. A second son, Philip, was given the area of the Decapolis; that is, the region to the east. Herod received the title of tetrach and was given the provinces of Galilee and Perea; that is, the northernmost sector of the father's kingdom.

We know a few more things about Herod. For one thing, he is the ruler who arrested and then later killed John the Baptist. John had criticized Herod for having taken his brother's divorced wife, Herodias, while his brother was still living, and Herod had arrested John for it. At this stage Herod seemed to have some sensibility toward religious things, for he respected John and even listened to him. But after he had killed John, this rapidly degenerated to mere superstition. Thus, when told of Jesus' preaching and works, Herod imagined that he was John the Baptist risen from the dead (Matt. 14:1-2; Mark 6:14-16). Later, whether correct or incorrect, the rumor reached Jesus that Herod was seeking to kill him also (Luke 13:31). Jesus replied, "Go tell that fox, 'I will drive out demons and heal people today and tomorrow, and on the third day I will reach my goal'" (vv. 32-33). "Fox" was an apt designation for Antipas, for he was indeed a crafty and cunning man held under the debilitating influences of a licentious woman.

In Herod's Court

Here we must leave John's Gospel and go to Luke, for Luke alone of all the Gospel writers tells of this incident. His account is as follows: "On hearing this, Pilate asked if the man was a Galilean. When he learned that Jesus was under Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who was also in Jerusalem at that time. When Herod saw Jesus, he was greatly pleased, because for a long time he had been wanting to see him. From what he had heard about him, he hoped to see him perform some miracle. He plied him with many questions, but Jesus gave him no answer. The chief priests and the teachers of the law were standing there, vehemently accusing him. Then Herod and his soldiers ridiculed and mocked him. Dressing him in an elegant robe, they sent him back to Pilate. That day Herod and Pilate became friends—before this they had been enemies" (23:6-12).

This brief account tells us much about Herod. For one thing, it tells us that Herod was aware of much that was going on in his province. We know this because we are told that "from what he had heard" of Jesus "he hoped to see him perform some miracle." Second, it tells us that he had a certain curiosity about Jesus, for he was "greatly pleased" to see him. Third, however, and more seriously, it discloses more of Herod's spiritual decline, for on this occasion the reproving voice of conscience seems to be entirely absent, and we find him looking upon this solemn confrontation as simply an occasion for entertainment. When this turned out disappointingly, the curiosity with which he began soon curdled into stark contempt and cruelty.

Herod's experience should be a warning to many similarly minded persons who frequent places of Christian worship out of curiosity and are only hardened. The Lord did not reveal himself to Herod. He did not speak. God will not reveal the precious things of his Word to anyone's idle curiosity.

Curiosity Not Enough

The true measure of the tragedy which was Herod is seen, in that which in other circumstances might be thought good.

First, there is this matter of Herod's curiosity. God will not reveal the precious things of his Word to idle curiosity, but this does not mean that curiosity itself is all bad or that God will not on occasion use it to draw a person to him. We recall, for example, that Jesus played upon the curiosity both of Nicodemus and of the woman of Samaria in attempting to lead them to the truth about his mission. To Nicodemus he spoke cryptically of the new birth, prompting the aging leader of Israel to ask, "How can a man be born when he is old? Surely he cannot enter the second time into his mother's womb to be born!" (John 3:4). To the woman of Samaria he spoke of living water, causing her to reply, "Sir, you have nothing to draw with and the well is deep. Where can you get this living water? Are you greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well and drank from it himself, as did also his sons and his flocks and herds?" (John 4:11-12). Curiosity itself is not bad, and this much at least can be said concerning Herod, that his curiosity had been stirred regarding Jesus.

How had it been stirred? Obviously by hearing much about him. What Jesus was doing had been the common talk of the kingdom for the space of three years, and much of this had undoubtedly come to the dissolute tetrarch's attention. He could hardly have failed to hear of Jesus' feeding of the four and five thousand, for these feedings had taken place in or near Galilee and had been accompanied by significant popular movements by those who wished to make Jesus king. Jesus had walked on the water in Galilee. He had stilled the storm. He had healed the son of a Galilean nobleman. There were other miracles. Then, in addition to these miracles, Jesus had raised Lazarus from the dead in Bethany just a week before, and the news of this great miracle had apparently spread through Jerusalem like wildfire. Herod may not have heard of all these miracles, but the main ones had undoubtedly been brought to his attention. It was undoubtedly because of this that he wished to see Jesus do some wonder.

Moreover, it was not just through idle rumor that Herod had heard of Jesus. Herod had also heard of him through John the Baptist. We have no record of what John actually said to Herod. But we can hardly imagine that John, having received an opportunity to speak to Herod, would have failed to point to Jesus. Herod may even have heard John's great text and testimony: "Behold the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29).

We note one other fact also. There was in Herod's household one who undoubtedly knew much about Jesus, if indeed he was not a full believer. He is none other than the husband of Joanna, one of the women who traveled about with Jesus and ministered to him out of her substance (Luke 8:3). The husband's name was Chuzas, and he is identified as Herod's steward. If Herod was interested in Jesus, as he undoubtedly was, he would have inquired about him and would undoubtedly have received information about him from his steward. Yet Herod's curiosity remained only an idle curiosity. He made no effort to see Jesus and learn from him, even when his remorse over his treatment of John the Baptist was at its zenith.

Joy and Expectation

There are two more things that might be said in Herod's favor were they not so deeply corrupted. The first is that, in consequence of his curiosity, Herod is said to have rejoiced at seeing Jesus. In fact, we are told that he was "greatly pleased" (Luke 6:8). Again, we are told that Herod was glad because he "hoped to see him perform a miracle. "Are not we who follow Christ also glad in the same expectation? We too hope to see some great miracles done by him. When the gospel is preached, we hope to see those who are dead in trespasses and sins brought to spiritual life. When the teachings of Christ are put forth, we hope to see lives turned about, sin repented of, and many urged on in the straight way which Christ sets before them. Again, upon ourselves we also hope to see some miracle. We wish our eyes opened to some new and marvelous thing out of God's Word. We wish our wills changed that we might seek him with all our heart. We wish to be convicted of sin and urged on in righteousness. We wish to be made like Jesus.

Yes, we desire these things. But this godly joy and spiritual expectation were not the joy and expectation of Herod. He was "exceedingly glad," but it was a frivolous gladness, just as his curiosity was an idle curiosity. He was expectant, but it was a base expectation. He hoped only to see some wonder with which he might later entertain his guests at some low banquet and orgy. Each would have his stories. But Herod's story of a miracle done by the Galilean peasant would top them all.

A Hardened Conscience

That brings us to these points of conclusion. It is not that curiosity, joy, and expectation are bad in themselves. They are good. We might even argue that they have been given to us by God, that they, like all God's good gifts, might lead us to him. What is wrong is that in many persons they have been perverted through the hardening effect of sin.

There is no true approach to God without a painful awareness of one's own sin. This is because God is holy, and we cannot approach him in his holiness without a corresponding exposure of our own corruption. When God approached Adam and Eve in the Garden, after the fall, they hid from him because they knew they were naked (Gen. 3:10). When Isaiah saw God high and lifted up and heard the seraphim singing of his holiness, he fell back, crying, "Woe to me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips; and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5). When Peter caught a glimpse of who Jesus really is on the occasion of his miracle in providing a great catch of fish in Galilee, Peter responded, "Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man" (Luke 5:8). Clearly Herod had undergone this kind of experience (though without profit), for the preaching of John the Baptist concerning the immorality of his life had troubled him.

In proper circumstances the conviction of sin should lead, first, to repentance, and second, to faith in Jesus Christ where alone the penalty and guilt of sin are dealt with. But where this does not take place—where conviction of sin does not lead both to repentance and faith—unconfessed sin hardens, and eventually the one who was once genuinely convicted can regard religious matters only with an idle curiosity or even antagonism.

These were the steps in Herod's fall. First, there was a genuine conviction of sin. But Herod did not welcome this conviction, being unwilling to part from his sin. He wished to be religious and keep his sin too. Therefore, second, he attempted to still the voice of conscience which, in this case, meant stilling the voice of John the Baptist. At first he tried prison. But once launched upon this course, he soon came to the position of murdering John both to satisfy Salome and also to rescue his own imagined honor. Third, having silenced the voice of conscience, which always insists upon the indispensible place of morality in true religion, Herod's religious instincts turned to superstition. He thought that Jesus was John the Baptist raised from the dead. Fourth, superstition turned to raw unbelief, for when Herod finally did have Jesus before him he looked upon him only as one who might be prevailed upon to do a trick for the amusement of himself and his court. Fifth and finally, when Jesus declined to perform for this by now rank profligate and unbeliever, Herod's interest turned to derision, and he and his men of war viciously scoffed at Jesus. Having silenced him who was the Voice, it was no marvel that Herod now failed to hear or appreciate the Word.

God Is Not Mocked

You cannot treat God lightly. You cannot mock him. If you would meet him, you must be serious about the encounter, more serious than you have ever been about anything in your life before, and you must be ready to be changed profoundly by him.

What is God anyway? An intellectual curiosity? Someone who exists to provide you with free entertainment or free blessings? Is he as idle as you? Is he as frivolous? He is the great, holy, omnipotent God of the universe who takes the business of being God seriously. "I am the Lord your God," he says. 'You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:2-3). 'You shall not kill. You shall not commit adultery. You shall not steal. You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor. You shall not covet" (vv. 13-17). "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). "Be holy" (1 Peter 1:16; cf. Lev. 11:44). Jesus said, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me" (Matt. 16:24).

That is what God requires. If you will not do that, then your religious sensibilities will decline, as did Herod's. And the time will come when Jesus will depart from your presence, never to return. On the other hand, if you will repent of your sin and turn to him, then you will find that he has already received you and is at work to lead you in the way of righteousness. Will you come? Will you not turn your back on that sin that holds you in its grip and follow Jesus?

Chapter 237.
Barabbas

John 18:39-40

Christians will agree that if God is truly the sovereign God the Scriptures portray him to be, then nothing in the world is without meaning. The stars have their meaning. So do the fish of the sea, the animals, the events of history. It is true that we may not always see their meaning or understand their purposes. But they are there all the same and can teach us something.

If this is true of the Creation and the events of history in general, as it obviously is, it is certainly true of the events surrounding the arrest, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus Christ. From a secular perspective these events may be imagined to have fallen out at random as a product of the unpredictable interaction of the leaders of Israel with their particular animosities toward Jesus and the character and desires of Pilate. But this is not the case. It is true that the leaders of the people and Pilate did interact and that events flowed from this interaction, but what resulted was no mere accident. Rather it was that which had been specifically predetermined and even foretold prophetically by God. It was foretold that the Messiah would be betrayed by Judas (Ps. 41:9; Zech. 11:12), and be rejected and scorned by his own people (Isa. 53:3). Specific prophecies include the use of false witnesses (Ps. 35:11), Christ's silence before his accusers (Isa. 53:7), his beatings (Isa. 50:6), his being offered gall and vinegar to drink (Ps. 69:21), his being crucified with thieves (Isa. 53:12), his being pierced by a spear (Zech. 12:10), and his burial in the tomb of a rich man (Isa. 53:9). Each of these details teaches particular lessons about the work of Christ and the meaning of the Atonement.

An Important Detail

In the midst of these many predetermined and therefore meaningful details, there is a special story that is fascinating, not only for what it teaches about the death of the Lord, but also for the emphasis the Gospels give to it. It is unusual to find any given event from the life of Christ contained in all four Gospels, for the simple reason that these are not mere history but are specific portraits of Christ emphasizing one or more aspects of his life and ministry. Yet this story, the story of Barabbas, is in all four Gospels. And not only that, it occupies an important place in them (particularly in Matthew, Mark, and Luke). If we count carefully, we discover thirty-eight verses used to tell this story. This is more even than the account of the betrayal of Christ by Judas and certainly more than the accounts of those parts of the trial that only one or two of the Gospels give to us.

On the surface the story is simple enough. In fact, it is so simple that John, who recounts it in the shortest space of all, uses only three verses to do so.

The basis of the story lies in Pilate's desire to see Jesus released even though his accusers were clamoring for his death. He could have insisted on the Lord's release. But Pilate was trying to satisfy the crowds too (which is usually an impossible position to be in), so he began to search about for indirect ways to free Jesus. His first attempt had been to send him to Herod, which he was able to do because Jesus had come from Galilee and might therefore be thought to fall under the jurisdiction of the Galilean tetrarch. In a few moments he would have Christ flogged, thinking that by that act he might evoke a measure of sympathy from the mob. But before this last expedient, he hit upon another idea that at the time must have struck him as particularly fortuitous.

Pilate recalled a custom in Israel according to which—as a symbol of the mercy of God and as a reminder of their own historical deliverance out of bondage in Egypt—the people were permitted to ask at the Passover festival for the liberation of some offender who was at that moment in prison. We may suppose that as Pilate remembered this his face brightened and he moved to seize upon it as some shipwrecked sailor might seize upon a floating plank as his means of salvation. Perhaps he could use this custom to effect the release of Jesus. Pilate therefore searched through his mind to recall some criminal so notable that, were he to make the choice between this one and Jesus, the criminal would never be chosen by the people. He thought of Barabbas, who, we are told, was a robber (John 18:40), an insurrectionist, and a murderer (Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19). Matthew tells us that he was a "notorious prisoner" (Matt. 27:16). Who, Pilate thought, would ever prefer this vile rebel and murderer to the One in whom he had found no fault at all?

It may have been with pride and a certain smugness in the anticipated success of his plan that Pilate now went to the rostrum to offer the people this choice. "It is your custom," he said "for me to release to you one prisoner at the time of the Passover" (John 18:39). "Which one do you want me to release to you: Barabbas, or Jesus who is called Christ?" (Matt. 27:17).

How wise Pilate thought he was, yet how foolishly he acted! For to his immense surprise the crowd, goaded by the rulers, immediately rejected Christ and chose Barabbas. "Give us Barabbas," was their cry (John 18:40).

"What shall I do then with Jesus, who is called Christ?" The people cried out,

"Crucify him!" (Matt. 27:22-23).

It was a disaster. Here Krummacher writes, "The Savior's fate is now no longer in Pilate's hands. The majority of the multitude decides, and he is obliged to abide by its decision. Had he been bold enough to follow the dictate of his own conscience and to have said with calm discrimination, 'Justice shall be done, even though the world should perish; the guiltless Nazarene is free, and those cohorts here will know how to give effect to my decision,' his opponents inwardly rebuked, would doubtless have shrunk back thunderstruck, and the people, roused from their delusion, would have loudly applauded the energetic judge. But Pilate now stands forever as a warning example of the consequence of endeavoring to satisfy both God, who speaks within us, and the world."

The World's Choice

And, of course, it was the world! And the decision of the mob was the world's decision! The world will ever choose a robber, insurrectionist, or murderer to the guiltless Christ. Why? Because Barabbas is of the world and is the world. Barabbas is one of them, and however dangerous he may be, he is at least controllable. They can handle him. But how do you handle Jesus?

Tom Skinner writes of this in Words of Revolution. "Barabbas is the guy who was going to destroy the system. Barabbas was going to burn them out. Barabbas was going to kill them. Why would they want Barabbas? It's very simple. If you let Barabbas go, and he starts another disturbance or another riot, you can always call out the National Guard, the federal troops or the Marines to put his thing down. All you have to do is push a few tanks into his neighborhood and you can squash whatever he's up to. You can find out where he's keeping his guns and raid his apartment. You can always stop Barabbas. But the question is: how do you stop Jesus? How do you stop a Man who has no guns, no tanks, no ammunition, but still is shaking the whole Roman empire? How do you stop a Man, who—without firing a shot—is getting revolutionary results? They figured there's only one answer—get rid of him. They made the same mistake people have made down through the history of man. They thought you could get rid of the idea by getting rid of the man from whom the idea comes. So they said, 'We can get rid of Jesus. We don't want him to rule over us.' "Barabbas would never really ask to run your life. Barabbas would exploit you, but he wouldn't ask to run your life. Jesus would ask to run your life. Jesus would ask for the right to rule over you! And that's the problem. Men would rather be enslaved to tyranny than let Jesus rule their lives. They would rather be exploited than let Christ determine their lives. So they said, 'Give us Barabbas.'"

The crime of Barabbas was the same crime of which the Jewish leaders had accused Christ falsely, and their position in Israel was certainly not enhanced by Barabbas's release. Yet they chose him, so great was their opposition to Jesus.

The Sinner's Salvation

We have looked at the story of Barabbas through two sets of eyes: those of Pilate and those of the leaders of the people. Each view contains great lessons. Yet the greatest lessons are to be seen, not through the eyes of Pilate or even the eyes of the leaders, but through the eyes of Barabbas himself. From this perspective the story of Barabbas is the story of stories, for it is the story of the sinner's salvation through Jesus' death on Calvary.

We notice in the first place, as we have not noticed until now, that the name Barabbas is an Aramaic word meaning "son of a father." Bar means "son," and abba means "father." So the word itself signifies that Barabbas is a representative type of all the sons of all the fathers who have ever been born into this world. As Donald Grey Barnhouse writes in his valuable comments on this story, "We are all of Adam's race. We have been bound over for our sedition against God. We are robbers of his glory. We are murderers of our souls and the souls of others. We find ourselves bound in the darksome prison house of sin. We feel in our hearts that we merit the sentence that has been announced to us and we wait in trembling for the time of judgment. Every man loves freedom. To be put in a cell is a horrible curtailment of human liberty, and the necessity of such confinement shows what society thinks of the terrible outbreaks that endanger the smooth flow of what men call civilization."

Barnhouse continues, "The Roman soldiery had stopped the riot and had taken Barabbas. His blood-guiltiness was established. He was flung in his cell, there to wait the moment of his death. A man who is to be hanged has difficulty in keeping his hand away from his throat where the rope is soon to choke him. I have been told by a chaplain in a prison where men are executed in a gas chamber that the condemned practice long breathing, and sometimes will hold their breath until it seems that their eyes will pop from their sockets. They know that they are going to be put into a gas chamber and that they will hear a little hissing sound of incoming death, and that the breath they are now forcing into their lungs will be the last that they shall ever know. They will hold on and on, straining at the thongs that tie them to their chair, until they are forced by the inexhorable law of breathing to exhale the last breath that contained pure oxygen and take in the death that floats around them.

"Barabbas must have looked at the palms of his hands and wondered how it would feel to have the nails ripping through the flesh. He must have remembered scenes of crucifixion death, and the slow agony of the victims who suffered at times for a day or two before merciful death came to release them. He must have awakened with a start if he heard any hammering in the jail, and his mind must have anticipated the sound of the clanging hammers that would bring death near to him. And then, in his prison, he heard the vague murmuring of the crowd that roared outside like the murmur of a troubled sea. He thinks he hears his own name. He can tell that there are angry cries, and fear rises in his heart. Then he hears the sound of a key in the lock, and a jailer comes to him and releases him from the chain that is wound around him, for the Bible tells that he was bound. He must have thought that his time had come, but the jailer takes him to the door and tells him that he is free.

"In his stupefaction he moves toward the crowd. There is little welcome for him, and he senses the deep preoccupation of the people. If he meets one of his old companions in the crowd, he is greeted with but a moment's word, and then he hears the surging roar, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!' In modern language he would say to his companions, 'What's the pitch? Give me the lowdown!' And he would be briefly answered that the roar is against Jesus, and that he is to be crucified, and that the crowd had cried out for the release of Barabbas.

"Stunned, he walks nearer to the center of the scene and sees the man who is to die in his place. Finally the procession begins toward Golgatha. He follows and sees Jesus fall under the weight of the cross. He sees Simon of Cyrene pressed by the soldiers to fall in line and carry the cross, and finally they arrive at Calvary. What must have been his thoughts? He hears the echoing blows of the hammer striking the nails, and looks down at his own hands. He had thought that this would be his day. He had thought that the nails would tear his flesh. And here he is breathing the air of springtime and looking at the dark cloud that is gathering in the sky. Does he say, 'Those hammer blows were meant for me, but he is dying in my place'? He could have said it in literal truth that day.

'The cross is lifted up and he sees the silhouette against the sky. The sun grows dark and he hears voices that come to him like thunder. 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' The centurion passes near him, and seeing the look upon his face, says, 'Truly this was the Son of God.' And Barabbas, more than before, looks with wonder and amazement at the man who is dying for him. There comes a cry, 'It is finished,' and a little while later he sees the soldiers take down the body and put it in its temporary grave. He goes back to the city, and all the little things that he had expected to see no more come before his eyes with freshness of new creation. 'He took my place. Jesus took my place. They released me, Barabbas, who deserved to die, and they crucified Jesus instead of me. He took my place. He died instead of me.'" Barnhouse concludes, "Barabbas was the only man in the world who could say that Jesus Christ took his physical place. But I can say that Jesus Christ took my spiritual place. For it was I who deserved to die. It was I who deserved that the wrath of God should be poured upon me. I deserved the eternal punishment of the lake of fire. He was delivered up for my offenses. He was handed over to judgment because of my sins. This is why we speak of the substitutionary atonement. Christ was my substitute. He was satisfying the debt of divine justice and holiness. That is why I say that Christianity can be expressed in the three phrases:

I deserved Hell; Jesus took my Hell; there is nothing left for me but his Heaven."

The scriptural key to the scene is found in the words of Paul in 2 Corinthians 5:21, "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God." Jesus died that we might live. He was bound that we, who have all our lifetimes been subject to the bondage of sin, might be set free.

Set Free

Are you set free? Or, if I may put it this way, are you one who has chosen to remain in the dungeon to which your sins have confined you? We have imagined in the previous paragraphs how Barabbas undoubtedly received his unexpected good fortune. We have supposed that he left the prison and returned to freedom. Could we imagine it otherwise?

Suppose word had come to Barabbas that he was now free and that another prisoner, Jesus, would be dying. Suppose he replied this way: "What you are telling me cannot be true. It may apply to someone else, someone who has committed a lesser offense than I. But I am a great sinner and criminal. No, I cannot believe it. I must stay here." And suppose he had resisted when the guards attempted to remove his chains and release him? We can hardly imagine such a response. Yet this is the response of some to whom the gospel of the substitutionary atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ is preached. They think that it is for another and so do not respond to that which to them is life.

Suppose again that Barabbas had acted in this way. Suppose he had said, "I refuse to accept such a pardon, because what I have done was entirely justified. I was right to rob and murder and commit insurrection. I will not go unless the representative of Rome comes to apologize for the way I have been treated and provides me with a bill of absolvement." In that case, Barabbas would have died, for it is a principle of law that a pardon is a gift and no man can ever be compelled to accept a gift. Chief Justice Marshall ruled in the case of the condemned murderer George Wilson, who refused his pardon: "A pardon is a slip of paper. The value of the pardon is determined by the acceptance of it by the person to be pardoned. If it is refused, it is no pardon! Wilson must be hanged." We might judge such a reaction foolish, as it is. But it is a possible one, and the consequences are certain.

Again, suppose Barabbas had responded to the announcement of his liberty that he would prefer to reform himself first of all: "By this means I will prove that I have earned my freedom and truly deserve it." The magistrates would have answered that however good a man he might yet become (or not become), this nevertheless has no bearing on the crimes he has already committed and for which he was condemned to die. Future reformation cannot atone for past sin. Consequently, Barabbas's only hope was in the pardon provided through the death of the innocent Christ.

Did Barabbas reply in any one of these ways? We know he did not. In fact, it is highly unlikely that any one of them even occurred to him, so anxious was he to leave the prison and return to a free life outside.

Why then should you do differently? A pardon is offered. Jesus has died. Will you not accept his death in place of your own and quickly go forth to serve him? Charles Wesley, the brother of the famed Methodist evangelist and preacher, John Wesley, did precisely that and wrote about it in one of our greatest hymns.

> And can it be that I should gain
> An interest in the Savior's blood?
> Died He for me, who caused His pain?
> For me, who Him to death pursued?
> Amazing love! how can it be
> That Thou, my God, > shouldst die for me? He > left His Father's throne > above, So free, so infinite
> His grace!

Emptied Himself of all but love,
And bled for Adam's helpless race! 'Tis mercy all, immense and free, For, O my God, it found out me.
Long my imprisoned spirit lay
Fast bound in sin and nature's night.
Thine eye diffused a quickening ray;
I woke, the dungeon flamed with light! My chains fell off, my heart was free, I rose, went forth, and followed Thee.
No condemnation now
I dread: Jesus, and all in Him, is mine!
Alive in Him, my living Head,
And clothed in righteousness divine,
Bold I approach the eternal throne,
And claim the crown, through Christ my own.

If you have been languishing in the gloomy dungeon of your unbelief, you may do as Wesley and so many others have done. Believe the gospel, and go forth to serve that One who out of the great measure of his love gave himself for your freedom.

Chapter 238.
"Behold the Man!"

John 19:1-5

The eighteenth and nineteenth chapters of John's Gospel deal with the trials of Jesus of Nazareth beginning with his arrest in the Garden of Gethsemane and culminating in his crucifixion, as recorded in John 19:16-30. But strictly speaking, what we have in the first part of chapter 19 is not a trial. In fact, we have not been dealing with a trial in any strict sense since Pilate's initial verdict of acquittal recorded in verse 38 of the preceding chapter. Jesus is still in the hands of the Roman procurator; the words that were to deliver him over to be crucified have not been uttered. But the trial actually ended earlier when Pilate said, "I find no basis for any charge against him."

What occurs in the interval between the formal verdict of acquittal (John 18:38) and the execution of Jesus (John 19:16-30) is a series of attempts by Pilate to escape the people's wishes.
He knew Jesus was innocent of the charges brought against him; but since the rulers wanted Jesus crucified, Pilate (1) sent Jesus to Herod hoping that Herod would solve his dilemma, (2) attempted to release Jesus instead of Barabbas in honor of Jewish custom, and (3) caused Jesus to be beaten, hoping by this means to evoke pity from the leaders and mob. None of these stratagems worked. But each, as we have already begun to see, shows much about the nature of the human heart and its sin as well as about God's plan for the redemption of the race through Jesus' crucifixion.

Each event is pregnant with meaning, for never in the entire history of the world has so much, done in so short a time, been so significant.

What Man Is This?

It was asked on an earlier occasion when Jesus had stilled the wind and waves on the Sea of Galilee, "What manner of man is this?" We may well ask the same question as we see him brought forth by Pilate after the merciless scourging by the soldiers of Rome. Here was One who, though he had been beaten unjustly, nevertheless bore himself with such dignity that the invitation of Pilate to "behold the man" is to see that which clearly overwhelms us. We hear the invitation: "Ecce homo (Behold the man!)" We look, and we conclude, "Never in all the history of the world has there been one like Jesus!"

Let me challenge you to behold him. Behold him first before Pilate, and ask, "Who is this one who stands before Pilate, beaten to the point of death, wearing a purple robe, crowned with thorns, ridiculed as the carnival King of the Jews?"

First of all, he is an innocent man. No crime has been proven against him. And not only has he already been pronounced innocent by Pilate, he is to be pronounced innocent several times more. It was the verdict of all who had dealings with him in these hours. First, Judas declared, "I have sinned, for I have betrayed innocent blood" (Matt. 27:4). Second, Pilate's wife sent to the Roman procurator, saying, "Don't have anything to do with that innocent man, for I have suffered a great deal today in a dream because of him" (Matt. 27:19). Third, Pilate himself declared Christ innocent: "I find no basis for a charge against him" (John 18:38). Fourth, Herod found Christ blameless, for Pilate reported of Herod's verdict, "Neither has Herod, for he sent him back to us; as you can see, he has done nothing to deserve death" (Luke 23:15). Fifth, the dying thief expostulated, "We are punished justly; for we are getting what our deeds deserve. But this man has done nothing wrong" (Luke 23:41). Sixth, the centurion in charge of the crucifixion said, "Surely this was a righteous man" (Luke 23:47). Lastly, the crowds at the cross, seeing the earthquake and the other supernatural signs accompanying his death, exclaimed, "Surely this was the Son of God" (Matt. 27:54).

This is the verdict of all who have looked at Jesus of Nazareth closely. It is the verdict of God and man, friend and foe, ancient and modern—as pointed out in a previous study.

As we look at Jesus before Pilate we also notice that he is a brave man. He had been beaten mercilessly, yet there is nothing cringing or compromising about his bearing. We have never seen a scourging, so it is hard to imagine the suffering involved in it. We should remember that the victim was stripped of clothing and tied to a post in a way that fully exposed the back. Being struck with a long leather thong (into which sharp pieces of lead, bone, and rock had been inserted) literally tore the person's back into strips. Besides, the beating was so prolonged that few remained conscious throughout the ordeal and some died. Jesus bore this. Yet it was after his suffering that Pilate led him forth and called the people to "Behold the man!"

Was there wonder, even admiration in Pilate's voice as he said this? There is room to think so. I suspect that William Barclay is on the right track when he writes: "It must have been Pilate's first intention to awaken the pity of the Jews. 'Look!' he said. 'Look at this poor, bruised, bleeding creature! Look at this wretchedness! Can you possibly wish to hound a creature like this to an utterly unnecessary death?' But even as he said it, we can almost hear the tone of Pilate's voice change and see the wonder dawn in his eyes. And instead of saying it half-contemptuously, to awaken pity, he says it with a dawning wonder and an admiration that will not be repressed." In wartime soldiers will frequently admire the bravery of a defeated enemy, wondering how they themselves might bear up under similar suffering were the roles reversed. Did Pilate, an old soldier, perhaps inwardly respect Christ's fortitude?

But it is not only bravery that we see in the man before Pilate. There is also majesty, and such majesty as befits the Son of God. Behold the man? Yes. But behold the King, too! And here we do not mean merely the mock king of the soldiers' devising. We mean the true King, the King of kings, whose dignity and grace shone through even in the moment of his greatest physical humiliation. This was a great man. But this was also God, as the resurrection was soon to indicate (Rom. 1:4).

Before the Crowds

Jesus appeared that day not only before Pilate. He also appeared before the crowds. Indeed, this seems to be the reason for the scourging; for with the stage presence and sense of audience psychology characteristic of a great trial lawyer, Pilate first seemed to pronounce him innocent and then suddenly produced him to have the crowd see him in his beaten and humiliated state. We know what Pilate expected—an upsurge of pity from the fickle mob. But Pilate miscalculated, for there broke forth a new round of hatred and hostility against Jesus.

Why was this? Why did the presence of Jesus incite such violent hatred? Some writers have suggested that it was an easily understood pattern of psychological reaction: the people saw mirrored in the beaten and disfigured Jesus that moral deformity that they saw, or feared to discover, in themselves. It would be similar to that distaste that so many show for the poor, the deformed, or the dead. There is fear that they will be like them. But this is not the real explanation of the crowd's increasing opposition to and hatred of Jesus. The thing that bothered them about Jesus on this occasion was what had bothered them all along. It was his sinlessness, the awareness of which was heightened by the entirely unwarranted scourging of Jesus and their culpability in that injustice. None care to admit it, but there is in the unsaved person's heart that which leads people to oppose true righteousness.

In his commentary on John, Harry Ironside tells of a meeting of the Synod of the Free Church of Scotland many years ago. One minister was invited to preach the sermon on a particular Sunday morning, and he gave a marvelous oration on the beauty of virtue. He concluded, "Oh, my friends, if virtue incarnate could only appear on earth, men would be so ravished with her beauty that they would fall down and worship her." Many went out saying, "What a magnificent oration that was!"

The same evening another man preached. He did not preach about virtue and beauty. He preached Christ and him crucified. As he closed his sermon he said, "My friends, Virtue Incarnate has appeared on earth, and men instead of being ravished with his beauty and falling down and worshipping him, cried out, 'Away with him! Crucify him! We will not have this man to rule over us!'" The second man was right. We do not like to hear it. We resent those who tell us. But the truth is that the natural man hates God's holiness and will do anything rather than allow the light of Christ to penetrate his own deep darkness.

The Masses Today

Third, I want you to "behold the man" as he appears before the masses today. It is the same man, the same Jesus of Nazareth. But while it is true that some do hate him and openly seek to destroy his influence and even his good name, most in our day simply ignore him and thus add insult to injury, suggesting by their neglect that he is hardly worthy of attention.

Those who work on the campuses of our country think this is the case. I received an appeal letter from the head of a large Christian college organization. It said in part, "Some of these institutions and their faculty are openly hostile to the Christian faith. Their students ridicule the Bible and those who believe it. At other schools, God is simply ignored." I would like to have asked this leader how he would balance the percentages. Are most hostile? Or are most unconcerned? I believe that most are unconcerned, or at least try to be. And if this is true on the campuses, it is even more true of the nation at large. Most people will talk about anything but Christianity. And if we were to judge matters by the secular press and other media, we would be hard pressed to know that Jesus even existed, let alone discover anything accurate or significant about him.

To these we wish to say, "Behold the master! Do not look away. Do not be too busy. It would be tragic were you to gain the whole world and lose your soul." Yet this is precisely what many will do. They will be lost and not even know they are lost until the reality of the final judgment comes grimly upon them.

Jesus spoke of this shortly before his crucifixion. In the sermon given on the Mount of Olives in the middle of his last week in Jerusalem, Jesus used three gripping parables to teach what the final judgment would be like for such people. One parable was about ten virgins who had been invited to a wedding banquet. Five were wise and five were foolish. The five wise virgins prepared for the banquet by buying oil for their lamps. The five foolish virgins did not. As they waited in the long evening hours all the attendants fell asleep. Suddenly a cry went forth, "Behold the bridegroom is coming; go out to meet him." They rose, but the five foolish virgins had no oil for their lamps. On the advice of the wise they set out to buy some. But while they were getting their oil the bridegroom came and the wedding party followed him into the house and the door was shut. Later the five foolish virgins returned and called at the door, "Lord, Lord, open to us."

But he answered, "Truly, I do not know you."

Jesus concluded, "Therefore, keep watch, because you do not know the day or the hour" (Matt. 25:13).

The second parable was about three servants. Their master was to go on a journey. So he called the servants to him and gave each money: to the first, five talents; to the second, two talents; and to the third, one talent —each according to his ability. Then he went away, and the servants who had received five talents and two talents respectively invested the money while the third servant hid his talent in the ground. After a long time the master returned and asked for an accounting. The man who had received five talents produced those talents plus five more. The servant who had received two talents produced two talents plus two more. But the one who had been given only one talent returned only that one to the Lord, saying, "Master, I knew that you are a hard man, harvesting where you have not sown and gathering where you have not scattered seed. So I was afraid and went and hid your talent in the ground. See, here is what belongs to you" (Matt. 25:24-25). The master condemned that servant, taking away his talent and casting him forth "into the darkness" (v. 30).

Finally, the Lord told the parable of the separation of the sheep from the goats. The goats are the lost, and they are condemned because they neglected to feed the Lord when he was hungry, give him drink when he was thirsty, welcome him when he was a stranger, clothe him when he was naked, visit him when he was sick, and comfort him when he was cast in prison. They say, "But when did we see you hungry or thirsty or lonely or naked or sick?"

He replies, "I tell you the truth, whatever you did not do for one of the least of these [my brothers], you did not do for me" (v. 45). On the other hand, he welcomes those who did these things for his brethren.

Each of these parables, though quite different from the others in detail, is nevertheless one with them in its essential features. In each case, there is a sudden return of the Lord which demands an accounting. In each case, there are some who are prepared for his coming and others who are not. In each case, there are rewards and judgments. Most remarkable of all, in each case those who are lost are totally amazed at the outcome. The foolish virgins are astounded that the bridegroom will not open the door to them. The wicked and lazy servant clearly expected the master to be pleased with his zero-growth performance. The goats cannot believe that they have actually rejected Jesus. They say, "Lord, when did we see you hungry or thirsty or a stranger or needing clothes or sick or in prison, and did not help you?" (Matt. 25:44). They are overwhelmed as he sends them away unto "eternal punishment" (v. 46).

Thus it will be with our generation. We have more opportunities to learn about Christ in our day than ever before in human history. Books and magazines and radio programs and movies and television have all told about him. The call has gone forth, "Behold the man! Look to this one for salvation. He loves you, he died for you. He rose again. Turn from your sin and place your trust in him as your Savior!" But many go blithely on and will be overwhelmed in the day of God's reckoning.

Behold the King

Today is the day of God's grace. And the wisdom of the just in this day consists, as Paul expressed it, in knowing nothing among men save "Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor. 2:2). Now we see him offered to us for salvation. His death is our life. But the day is coming when this period of grace will end, and the One who was judged by the tribunals of this world will be Judge.

One author writes, "How long may it be before we hear the sound of another 'Ecce homo!'? But if we then lift up our eyes, a different form will present itself to our view than that which we saw on Gabbatha. The King of Glory will then have exchanged the robe of mockery for the starry mantle of divine Majesty, the wreath of thorns for a crown of glory, and the reed for the scepter of universal dominion." What will it be in that day? Will it be judgment? Or will the rod be extended as a symbol of his gracious favor as he declares, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world" (Matt. 25:34). The answer depends on how you behold him now and whether you will surrender to him as your Lord.

Chapter 239.
Who Died on Calvary?

John 19:6-7

The events surrounding the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth are moving ahead quickly in the nineteenth chapter of John, and before long the teacher of Israel will be crucified. Who is he? Who is this One soon to give his life on Calvary? This question is important because the value of his death depends entirely upon who he was. If he was a criminal and deserved to die, his death means nothing, at least no more than the death of any one of the thousands of other criminals who have been executed down through the long centuries of human history. If he was an innocent man, his death speaks to us merely of the miscarriage of justice; his deportment, only of how a strong man can bravely bear misfortune. On the other hand, if he was God, as he claimed to be, his death has monumental significance.

The Central Issue

We see how inescapable the question is in the verses to which we come now, for although the real charge against Jesus had been veiled in the Jews' previous dealings with Pilate, it now bursts forth in a flood of sudden fury. No less than six separate charges had been brought against him. First, he had been charged with threatening to destroy the Jewish temple (Matt. 26:61). Second, he was accused of being an evildoer

(John 18:30). Third, he was charged with perverting the nation (Luke 23:2). Fourth, it was said that he had forbidden Jews to pay taxes to Caesar (Luke 23:2). Fifth, he was said to have stirred up the people (Luke 23:5). Sixth, he was cited for having made himself a king (Luke 23:2). Here were six serious accusations. But these charges were not the real reason for the hatred of the Jewish leaders for Jesus or their prosecution of the case against him before Pilate. The real accusation is that he had claimed to be the unique Son of God, which they judged blasphemy. The seventh and central charge bursts forth now.

It had been there from the beginning, of course. The very first accusation against Jesus was that he had claimed he was "able to destroy the temple of God and rebuild it in three days" (Matt. 26:61). On the surface this seemed to be only the irrational ravings of a madman. But Christ was not mad, and the leaders of Israel undoubtedly read into his words precisely what he intended. What he was actually saying was that he was God and that, although he would permit the leaders of the nation to kill him, he would rise again in three days. Only this explains the striking repetition of the phrase "in three days" in each of the four Gospels and the later concern of the leaders to seal and guard Christ's tomb (Matt. 27:62-64).

Why were the other charges raised then? They were raised in the Jewish court because, at first, the leaders of the Sanhedrin were unable to secure adequate evidence to convict Jesus of the charge of blasphemy. They were raised in the Roman court because the enemies of the Lord rightly believed that Pilate would never consent to convict Christ on the religious question. Before Pilate, Jesus had to be accused of being an insurrectionist and thus a threat to Caesar.

It was on the ground of insurrection that Pilate conducted the trial. Imagine his surprise then when, after having acquitted Jesus of the charge of insurrection, he suddenly hears the real charge mentioned. Pilate had said, "I find no basis for a charge against him" (John 19:6). Now his accusers reply, "We have a law, and according to that law he must die, because he claimed to be the Son of God" (v. 7). Up to now Pilate had been conducting the trial as if Jesus were only a man and the issues merely human issues. The crux of the matter was in Pilate's challenge to "Behold the man!" Now the ground is shifted entirely, and Pilate must face the entirely new question as to whether Jesus is actually the Son of God.

Was his claim to be the Son of God factual? I ask the question in this way because it is not only Pilate who is forced to face this question. You must confront it too.

The Witnesses Agree

Donald Grey Barnhouse preached a sermon in which he asked our question: "Who died at Calvary?" He pointed out in his sermon that the issue is not merely a matter of saying that the man who was killed was Jesus of Nazareth, because there is no question about that. The question is: Who was Jesus? Was he only a man? Or was he more? Was he God, as some suggested? Barnhouse called attention to this issue and then suggested that the various witnesses to this central issue be brought forward. One by one he called them to the bar and questioned them.

The most important witness to any fact is God himself. So, although there are many witnesses to be considered, we rightly begin here. Does God Almighty bear witness to Christ's deity?

Here we forego the numerous Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah and the question of whether, on the basis of his words and deeds, Jesus may be declared to be that One. Instead we turn to the testimony of God rendered during the days of Christ's earthly ministry. We turn to the moment of Christ's baptism. Here we see the Holy Spirit of God descending upon the Lord Jesus Christ, like a dove from heaven. We hear God speak. He says, 'This is my Son, whom I love; in him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). Has such a testimony ever been rendered to another? We do not know of any. God called Abraham his friend, and David was called a man after God's own heart. But these were nevertheless still men. Here is one called God's Son. The testimony is weighty.

This was at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, before the temptation, the public acclaim, the rejection, the disappointments. What about later, after these things? Perhaps the one in whom God was "pleased" at the beginning will not be so pleasing at the end, after he has rubbed shoulders with the world. We turn to that moment toward the end of Christ's ministry when Jesus stood on the Mount of Transfiguration and was changed from his earthly into his heavenly appearance. In this moment he was clothed with light as with a garment, and in the hearing of Peter, James, and John, God Almighty spoke again from heaven, saying, "This is my Son, whom I love; in him I am well pleased. Listen to him" (Matt. 17:5).

God the Father testifies to Christ's deity.

The second witness to be summoned is Jesus of Nazareth. Any court should be willing to hear a man's testimony about himself. So we turn to Jesus and press our question on him: "Your name is Jesus of Nazareth?"

"Yes."

"What do you say for yourself?"

The Lord replies, "I have already given my testimony. On one occasion the leaders of Israel challenged me to give an accounting of myself, and I did this so clearly that they immediately took up stones to throw at me. I said, 'Before Abraham was born, I am' (John 8:58). On another occasion I taught the people in Solomon's porch and said to them, 'I and my Father are one' (John 10:30). Just this week in my final moments together with my disciples I answered a question raised by Philip, saying, 'Whoever has seen me has seen the Father' (John 14:9). Last night the high priest asked me the question, 'Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' and I replied, 'I am; and you will see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven' (Mark 14:61-62). It is for this claim that I am being tried and for which I will be executed."

The testimonies of God Almighty and of Jesus of Nazareth agree.

We have heard the witness of two members of the Godhead. What about the third member, the Holy Spirit? Before he was crucified the Lord said of the Holy Spirit, "When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me" (John 15:26). This he has done. The entire New Testament is the Spirit's witness to Christ's deity.

Are there other supernatural witnesses from whom we should hear?

There are angels of heaven. What do they say? We hear their voice in the events which surround the birth of the Lord in Bethlehem. Gabriel is one of them. He appeared to Mary before the birth saying, "You will be with child and give birth to a son, and you are to give him the name Jesus. He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High.... The holy one to be born will be called the Son of God" (Luke 1:31-32, 35). Later in the story the angels appear to the shepherds in the fields of Bethlehem and say to them, "Do not be afraid. I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all people. Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord" (Luke 2:10-11).

What of the demons? They know the truth about Jesus even though they are opposed to his rule. What is their opinion of the One who now appears before Pilate? We remember that on one occasion the Lord healed a man who had been possessed by many demons. He was about to cast them out when they replied, "What do you want with us, Son of God? Have you come here to torture us before the appointed time?" (Matt. 8:29). On another occasion the demons fell down before him, saying, "You are the Son of God" (Mark 3:11).

The Human Witnesses

It is not only supernatural witnesses that attest to Christ's deity. There are also many human witnesses, among them those who knew him best. What of these? What of the writers of the Gospels? These men are the historians of Christ's life. They may rightly be supposed to have carefully investigated the things that were being told about him. Some lived with him. They were eyewitnesses of the events they describe. What do these men think of the One who stands before Pilate?

"Matthew, what do you think? You wrote the first of our Gospels. You are a Jew, and the Jews confess one God. You are not likely to ascribe divinity to any man without overwhelming evidence."

Matthew replies, "I believe that Jesus is the divine Savior of whom the Old Testament speaks. I have said so. I said that his birth was in fulfillment of that great prophecy of Isaiah, which says, "The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and they will call him Immanuel... God with us" (Matt. 1:23; cf. Isa. 7:14).

"Mark, what about you? You traveled with Peter. You received firsthand information from him.

What do you think?"

Mark answers that he introduced his Gospel with these words: "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mark 1:1).

Luke was a physician. He was not inclined to flights of fancy or exaggeration. He has given us the most scientific of the four Gospels. Yet Luke favorably records some of the most exalted titles ever given to Jesus: "Son of the Most High" (Luke 1:32), "Son of God" (1:35), and "Christ the Lord" (2:11).

What about John? "John, what is your testimony?"

John tells us that he has written the most explicit words of all. His Gospel starts, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning. Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made. In him was life, and that life was the light of men" (John 1:1-4). John's Gospel concludes, 'Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:30-31).

Are there other human witnesses?

Yes, there are. John the Baptist, who was a first cousin of Jesus, testified, "I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God" (John 1:34).

Martha, in whose home Jesus and his disciples often stayed, testified, "I believe that you are the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world" (John 11:27).

Jesus once asked the disciples, "Who do you say that I am?" Peter, speaking for the rest, declared, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:15-16). Did Jesus recoil from that confession? If there was ever an opportunity in which he could have corrected this "mistaken" notion of who he was, it was then. He could have said, "You are wrong, Peter. I am not God's Son. I am just a man, as you are." But that is not what he said. Instead he replied, "Blessed are you, Simon, son of Jonah; for this was not revealed to you by man, but by my Father in heaven" (Matt. 16:17). The earthly witnesses and the heavenly witnesses agree.

Those at the Cross

It is said that the way in which a man dies throws much light upon who he is and how he lived. It is of interest to know how Christ died and what those who witnessed his death thought of him in his dying moments.

Two who were present were thieves who died with him. One thief was hardened and railed against Jesus, according to Luke's testimony. He said, "Aren't you the Christ? Save yourself and us!" The other thief replied, "Don't you fear God, since you are under the same sentence? We are punished justly; for we are getting what our deeds deserve. But this man has done nothing wrong." He then turned to Jesus and said, 'Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom" (Luke 23:39-42).

The centurion was in charge of the execution party. He is a sober man. He has seen many die. What do you think, centurion? Our soldier replies, "I saw it all. I witnessed the conduct of the prisoner in his agony. No curse escaped his lips. I saw his immolation. While being nailed to the tree he even asked God to forgive those who were killing him, saying they did not know what they did. He suffered bravely, and as he died darkness covered the land, even at high noon. An earthquake came; the rocks were shaken and the graves opened. I saw these miracles. I said, 'Surely this was a righteous man. This was the Son of God'" (Luke 23:47; Matt. 27:54).

What Is Your Verdict?

At last we come to ourselves. We have not seen him in the days of his flesh, but he is proclaimed to us in Scripture and the Holy Spirit bears witness to him in countless Christian hearts. What do we say? Is he the Son of God? I give you my testimony. I look within my heart, and I confess that there is nothing within me to draw me to him. He is a thing apart. Left to myself I should find a lifetime of other pursuits to keep me busy. I could be as skeptical as Thomas or as hostile as the apostle Paul before his conversion. But Jesus spoke to me. He spoke through the Word of God, declaring who he is and what he has done. My heart went out to him, and I confess that he is indeed the Son of God and my Savior.

Is that your testimony? You know the evidence. Will you decide in favor of his claims? Or will you decide against him? The strange thing about this case is that the decision you make will not determine the destiny of the defendant. It will determine the destiny of yourself, the judge.

Chapter 240.
How God Views Human Government

John 19:8-11

There are times in the history of a nation when the government disappoints or even betrays its people and it becomes natural to ask why government exists and how it should function. In recent years we have gone through such a period in the United States. First, there was the war in Vietnam. It was never popular. But as the years of fighting dragged on and the prospects for success increasingly dimmed, opposition mounted and many began to ask whether they could really participate in the armed forces or in war-related activity. Some protested vigorously, even leaving the country to avoid the draft. On the other hand, many people resented those whom they considered "deserters" and argued that the government has a right to wage war and must be obeyed and supported when it does so. Again, there was the Watergate crisis. In this debacle, the progressive revelations of corruption, even at the highest levels of government, made many cynical and fueled an already intense disdain for government or any other form of authority.

What were Christians saying during this period? It would be nice if we were able to point to a united "Christian voice" in these crises. Unfortunately this was not the case. In regard to Vietnam, some were pacifists and some were in favor of fighting. Others were selective pacifists. That is, they were against this war but for some others. In the matter of Watergate, some were ready to pull down the system while others were hardly ready to admit that a breach of trust had occurred.

What is right? How should we view government, particularly in those times when its decisions are unpopular or when it obviously fails to conduct itself morally or do its job?

God or Caesar?

The standard answer to questions regarding a Christian's responsibility to government has always been the reply of the Lord Jesus Christ to his critics: "Give Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's" (Matt. 22:21). The background for this valuable guideline was a question about taxes: "Is it right to pay taxes to Caesar or not?" (v. 17). Christ's reply has therefore rightly been understood to give a binding, affirmative answer in that area. But what should be said beyond this? Does the Christian have duties toward the state in other areas? Are those duties independent of his Christian duties? Suppose the commands of God and the commands of the government disagree? Do we obey Caesar, arguing that God has set him over us and will therefore take care of the consequences of our act? Or do we obey God? The issues are not easy to resolve. And to go back to the matter of taxes, we see that even this is not entirely clear. The question "Should we pay taxes if we know for sure that our tax money will be used for godless or immoral ends?" shows that there are puzzling dimensions in this area also.

It is probably true that there are always going to be gray spots in connection with this subject, if for no other reason than that it is never easy to see the situation clearly. But on the other hand, we do not need to be entirely without guidelines, for the Bible provides them in a number of places. Paul's discussion of authority in Romans 13 is one example. Another is the rather extended discussion between Pilate, the representative of human government, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the representative of divine government, on the occasion of the Lord's trial leading to his crucifixion.

This issue was always at the heart of the trial before Pilate, of course, for Jesus was accused of having made himself "a king" in opposition to the legitimate rule of Caesar; the issue was whether Jesus stood in a right or wrong relationship to Caesar's government. But in another sense, the question of the legitimacy of human government did not really emerge in the earlier stages of the trial because the examination of Jesus disclosed that his was a spiritual kingdom, which Pilate assumed (perhaps too quickly) was none of his affair. Now the situation changes. Pilate begins to interrogate Jesus again, demanding, "Do you refuse to speak to me? Don't you realize I have power either to free you or to crucify you?" (John 19:10).

The Lord replies, 'You would have no power over me if it were not given to you from above. Therefore the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin" (John 19:11).

This statement does not merely separate the two spheres of authority, Caesar's and God's; it brings them into relationship to one another, showing that the authority of government comes not from anything intrinsic to itself but from God. That is, it is a delegated authority. Consequently, there is always the matter of government responsibility and sin.

All Authority from God

Let us take these matters one at a time. First, there is Christ's statement that Pilate's power did not come from himself or, for that matter, even from Caesar but from God. This means that all power comes from God and is to that extent legitimated by him.

One word often translated by "power" is dynamis, which means "explosive power." We get our words "dynamite" and "dynamic" from it. It is used in such verses as Romans 1:16, which tells us that the gospel is the explosive "power of God unto salvation to everyone who believes." A second word frequently translated by "power" is kratos, which means the naked "power of rule." Though it can be legitimate, it can also be illegitimate, as in the case of the devil, whose "power of death" (Heb. 2:14) will some day be taken away by God. Kratos gives us the words "democracy," "plutocracy," "monocracy," and others. If Jesus had used either of these words in this sentence, he would have meant only that all power of rule comes from God, just as all life comes from him.

But Jesus did not use dynamis or kratos in his warning to Pilate. He used an even stronger word, exousia, which means "legitimate authority." Thus, he was saying not only that power in the sense of might comes from God but that human government is divinely authorized and therefore exercises a rule that must be recognized.

When we see this we begin to see, not merely that Jesus was acknowledging the power of Pilate as a bare fact or even pointing out that its source is to be found ultimately in God, but rather that God has legitimized human government and that it is therefore to function properly and be highly respected. He himself respected it, for he courteously answered Pilate's questions and never once suggested that Pilate did not have authority to pronounce a judgment on him.

Pilate pronounced wrongly, as we know. But he had authority to make the pronouncement even if it was wrong. His authority was from God. Jesus did not suggest that it be wrested from him because he made even so great an error as condemning the Son of God. At the very least, then, we are taught here that revolution for the sake of revolution—that is, "I would rather be king than you, so I will try to unseat you"—is unchristian. Rather we are to honor, respect, and be thankful for those who are over us, as Paul suggests in Romans (13:1-7).

One other conclusion needs to be kept in mind: we are to be subject to the higher authorities. That is, Christians should be model citizens. Unfortunately, it is often the case that Christians disrespect authority—elected officials, policemen, and others—and this leads naturally to a light attitude in regard to obeying them. This ought not to be. Rather we should be scrupulous at this point. We should obey the speed limits and all other civil laws, pay our taxes honestly, and do as those who are in positions of authority instruct us. Calvin, who had a justified fear of anarchy because of the troubles of his own time and warned against it, wrote that obedience must be given even to wicked rulers: "We are not only subject to the authority of princes who perform their office toward us uprightly and faithfully as they ought, but also to the authority of all who, by whatever means, have got control of affairs, even though they perform not a whit of the princes' office."

Are There No Limits?

But are there no limits? Suppose the king is a very wicked king, or the president a very wicked president? Is a command from such a king legitimate or should a Christian disobey it? The answer is that there are indeed limits. Therefore, although we must be careful to render every possible measure of obedience to those in authority (usually much more than we would wish), we must still do nothing contrary to the express commands of God in the Scriptures or to that standard of morality arising from them, even though a contrary act is commanded.

Here the second part of Christ's statement comes in, for after instructing Pilate in regard to the ultimate source of his authority, Jesus went on to speak of sin, saying, "Therefore, the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin" (John 19:11). If it were only power (dynamis or kratos) that Pilate had been given, it would be impossible to speak of sin as intrinsic in the exercise of the power, just as it is impossible to speak of sin in the case of the cat that kills the mouse or the germ that kills another germ. But since it is "authority" that Pilate has been given, this is another matter entirely. For authority, being granted by another, necessarily involves responsibility to that other one, and responsibility if it is not properly exercised involves sin against him. In other words, authority enhances human government, but it also limits it, for it is an authority bound by the moral nature of the God from whom it comes.

One limit which the Bible places on obedience to human authority concerns the preaching of the gospel. This is a Christian duty based upon the explicit command of Christ (Matt. 28:18-20). What should happen when authorities demand differently is illustrated in the fourth and fifth chapters of Acts. The disciples had been preaching and doing miracles, and these had created such a stir that they were called before a council of elders in Jerusalem. The authorities examined the disciples, in this case Peter and John; and then, since the miracle they had done in healing a lame man was so evident and the rulers could not deny it, these settled upon the precedent of merely commanding the disciples to keep silence. We read, 'Then they called them in again and commanded them not to speak or teach at all in the name of Jesus."

Peter and John replied, 'Judge for yourselves whether it is right in God's sight to obey you rather than God. For we cannot help speaking about what we have seen and heard" (Acts 4:18-20).

The apostles were threatened in connection with this command, but they went back to their preaching. When the authorities heard of it and learned that they were again back in the temple area teaching the people, they sent guards to bring them before the council (peacefully this time), and they demanded, "We gave you strict orders not to teach in this name. Yet you have filled Jerusalem with your teaching and are determined to make us guilty of this man's blood."

Peter spoke up for all the apostles, "We must obey God rather than men! The God of our fathers raised Jesus from the dead—whom you had killed by hanging him on a tree. God exalted him to his own right hand as Prince and Savior that he might give repentance and forgiveness of sins to Israel. We are witnesses of these things, and so is the Holy Spirit, whom God has given to those who obey him" (Acts 5:28-32). This enraged the Jewish rulers, and they would have killed the disciples had Gamaliel not intervened to counsel tolerance.

These stories indicate that Christians are to give precedence to the preaching of the gospel and are not to cease from it even though commanded to do so by the civil authorities. Of course, they must be willing to suffer the consequences of their persistence even though that should be imprisonment or death.

A second limit the Bible places on obedience to human authorities concerns Christian conduct and morals. No government has the right to command the Christian to perform an immoral or non-Christian act. We are reminded here of the Nazi era in Germany in which Christians living there were faced with a devilish state and its openly antichristian and even antihuman practices. During this period, German citizens were commanded to have no dealings with the Jews in that country. They were not to trade with them, help them, have friendships with them, or acknowledge them in any way. Such a policy was immoral. Thus, although many German Christians obeyed the government in this regard, they did not need to obey and should not have.

Some stood up against these monstrosities. One who did so was Martin Niemoeller who, for preaching the truth, was eventually thrown into prison. We are told that another minister then visited him in prison and argued that if he would only keep silent about certain subjects and respect the government, he would be set free. "And so," he concluded, "why are you in jail?" "Why aren't you in jail?" Niemoeller answered.

Niemoeller's course was the right one, for by his silence the visiting minister was upholding a lie and indirectly encouraging an irresponsible and demonic regime. Similarly, in this country Christians must also speak out against racism, government and corporate corruption, discrimination, and other evils. Moreover, they must staunchly refuse to participate in them in any way even if they are commanded to do so by their government or by a business superior.

The Greater Sin

Yet we have a warning even here, for although the Lord Jesus exercised his right as the ultimate judge of the world to boldly point out Pilate's sin—it must have astonished him—he spoke at the same time of the sin of the "church" of his day and indicated that its sin was greater.

It is an interesting word: "greater." It suggests that Pilate's sin was great; he was sinning against his conscience (he knew Christ was innocent) and against his divinely given responsibility (he had pronounced Jesus innocent). It affirms that the sin of the religious leaders was greater; they were sinning out of hate-filled hearts and against their own law (which should have protected Jesus). It may imply that the sin of Judas was greatest; he was closest to Christ and therefore sinned against the background of the greatest knowledge. Taken together the parts of the comparison teach that the greatest danger lies, not with the state, but with those who are closest to spiritual things. Others may sin out of ignorance or neglect or cowardice. But religious people are inclined to sin out of arrogance or pride or actual hatred of God and God's truth—even when they think they are most moral.

Let us look to ourselves and to the truth of God which we profess. It is not enough to have the name of Christian. That in itself does not give us any superior insight into morality or any point of leverage from which to speak against or disobey the government which God has set up. We can only do that as we respond, painfully at times, to his own voice which comes to us in Scripture, for then we are gripped, not by a lesser authority than that of the state (that is, our own), but by a greater, even the overriding and only infallible, authority of God.

Chapter 241.
Christ's Fate Sealed

John 19:12

It is not always easy to know when a Christian's obligation to obey God requires disobedience to the state. If God and state were always diametrically opposed, the decision would be easy. We would obey God and disobey the state in all situations. But this is not the case. The state is often if not usually right. And what is more, it has been instituted by God and is invested with God's authority. Consequently, under normal circumstances we are to obey the government even when those who form it seem unjust. Yet what are "normal circumstances"? We are not to obey without question. How then do we decide when a particular demand by the state is wrong and requires firm Christian rebuke and opposition? We began to deal with this question in the previous study by showing that the authority of the state is limited in at least two important areas. First, it has no right to forbid the proclamation of the gospel. If it does, we must resist, knowing that we have been given a commission to preach the gospel from Jesus himself. Second, the state has no right to command an immoral act.

But it is right here that further problems develop; for if we know our hearts, we know that it is extremely easy to consider the state hopelessly immoral, simply because it is doing something we do not like—because we are arrested for speeding, for example, or because we are taxed more than we think reasonable—and therefore resist it unjustly. Or again, we may attempt to throw off its authority, not because that authority is being exercised tyranically or in clear opposition to the commandments of God, but simply because we do not countenance the authority of any other human being. We saw that Jesus alerted us to precisely this danger in John 19:11 by indicating that, although the sin of Pilate was great, the sin of the religious leaders was greater in that they sinned out of pride and against a greater knowledge. It seems from this comparison that the closer we are to spiritual things, the greater the danger of acting from impure motives becomes.

So what do we do? We are helped here by the unfolding of the story of Christ's appearance before Pilate, for Pilate, by contrast, shows what we should do.

Fear of Caesar

Pilate did not want to condemn Jesus; of that we are certain. That he did not want to see him executed is a bit puzzling, for he was not intrinsically strong on justice and certainly did not have any high regard for the Jews or Jewish prisoners. However, he was certainly trying to get Christ off, whatever his reasons may have been. First, he pronounced him innocent. Then, when he met with violent and almost revolutionary opposition to that decision, he tried a series of expedients: sending him to Herod, suggesting his release rather than the release of Barabbas, causing him to be beaten and then produced suddenly to evoke sympathy from the cruel mob. After these things, even after Jesus' pointed rebuke to Pilate's arrogance in verses 10 and 11, Pilate tried again to release him, for the text says, "From then on, Pilate tried to set him free, but the Jews kept shouting, 'If you let this man go, you are no friend of Caesar. Anyone who claims to be a king opposes Caesar'" (v. 12).

If Pilate was as unwilling to pass the death sentence as this verse and the other incidents show, how is it that he was eventually prevailed upon to do so? The verse gives the answer. The Jews, perceiving that Pilate could not be made to do their will save but by the strongest measures, implied that if he did not condemn one whom they considered to be a traitor, they would denounce Pilate to Caesar; and Pilate, who feared this more than anything else, complied.

Pilate is seen here in his most contemptible stance, and yet he is also most pitiable. Pilate was the governor. He spoke for Caesar and had the legions of Caesar at his call to enforce all his bidding. Yet this one who should have been above fear is riddled by it and thus made weak-kneed in the greatest moral encounter of his career. Of what was the governor afraid? He was afraid of three things. First, he was afraid of Christ. We see this in verse 8; for we are told that after Pilate had heard that Jesus made himself out to be the Son of God, "he was even more afraid" and determined anew to release him. This was certainly not the kind of holy reverence for Christ that a true follower of the Lord might have, but it was a true fear. Pilate thought that Jesus might actually be more than a man, perhaps one of the half-human, half-divine gods of Greek and Roman antiquity, and so move fate against him if he judged unfairly.

Second, Pilate was afraid of the people. He did not like them, of course. His many dealings with the Jews showed his consummate disdain and even hatred for them. Yet he knew their power and feared to have them united against him. If he had not feared the people, he would have released Jesus quickly and would have shown no concern for pacifying them.

Third, and most significant, Pilate feared Caesar. And with cause! The suspicious nature of Caesar Tiberius was well known, and Pilate had already had other confrontations with the Jews which had worked to his disfavor before the emperor. What if Caesar should disapprove of his handling of this matter? What if the leaders of this people should send another delegation to Caesar saying that Pilate had refused to deal forcefully with one who was guilty of high treason? If Pilate had possessed a clean record, he could perhaps have overlooked a threat based on such false charges. But his record was not clean; and it was quite possible that Pilate would lose his position and even his very life if such an accusation were made. Indeed, we know that years later Pilate was removed from office by the Proconsul of Syria and banished to France where he later died.

Pilate's failure suggests the answer to the questions raised earlier. Pilate feared man!

Consequently, he was unable to do the just thing and even fell so low as to pronounce sentence on the very Son of God. We will do better only when we fear God over man and act justly regardless of the consequences.

God Is Sovereign

But we need to spell this out a bit further. What specifically does it mean to fear God more than man? And how can we personally be brought to the place where we do so? There are three requirements.

First, we must have it fixed in our minds that God is truly sovereign in human affairs. We know this because the Scriptures teach it. But in addition to knowing it, we must also have it planted in our minds so firmly that we can actually trust God when the crunch comes. Daniel was one who was able to do this. As we read his prophecy we realize that he was familiar with the concept of the sovereignty of God, for he witnessed the rise and fall of several great empires and was told in visions that it was God himself who was doing this. We think, for instance, of that great vision of the statue whose head was of gold, whose breast and arms were of silver, whose stomach and thighs were of bronze, whose legs were of iron, and whose feet were iron mixed with clay. Nebuchadnezzar had dreamed of this statue but had forgotten his dream. He demanded that his astrologers and sorcerers tell him its meaning, but they were unable to do this since they did not even know what the dream was. At last he sent for Daniel. Daniel asked for time, and that night God revealed to him Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation. Daniel then interpreted the dream to Nebuchadnezzar, showing it to be a prophecy of four succeeding world empires, the last of which was to be overturned by the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Daniel obviously knew God's sovereignty in the matter of the setting up and taking down of kings. But it was not only intellectually that Daniel knew this. He knew it experientially too and therefore was not afraid to stand by his convictions.

Darius, who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar's son Belshazzar, was a kind man and a friend of Daniel. But he was tricked into signing a law according to which no one was to ask a petition of any god or man for the period of thirty days, except King Darius. When Darius signed the law he was not thinking of Daniel. But soon word was brought that Daniel was continuing his practice of prayer to the God of Israel three times daily. Daniel was caught, and the king was caught too, for he had signed the order according to the law of the Medes and Persians which could not be altered. Daniel was thrown into a den of starving lions, the penalty for violating the emperor's decree.

We know that God delivered Daniel from the lions, just as he had earlier delivered his three companions from the burning fiery furnace. But the fact that God would deliver him and the others was not known to Daniel and his friends at the time the moral stances were taken. What gave these men the ability to do this, particularly when so many plausible arguments might have been raised in favor of compliance?

The answer is found in Daniel's personal knowledge of the truth of God's sovereignty. God was in control. Consequently, God was able to and certainly would accomplish what he had chosen to accomplish in these situations. Here is the way the friends of Daniel put it when called before Nebuchadnezzar on the occasion of their refusal to worship the statue on the plain of Dura. They said, "O Nebuchadnezzar, we do not need to defend ourselves before you in this matter. If we are thrown into the blazing furnace, the God we serve is able to save us from it, and he will rescue us from your hand, O king. But even if he does not, we want you to know, O king, that we will not serve your gods or worship the image of gold you have set up" (Dan. 3:16-18).

These men were able to resist the unjust demands of the powerful rulers of their day because they trusted an even more powerful ruler. Moreover, they were determined that in the ultimate analysis he (and not they) would control their lives.

Informed by Scripture

A second requirement for responsible action in the area of God and government, is that we must be thoroughly informed by Scripture. To want to do the right thing is not enough. We must know what the right thing is, and there is no way to know that apart from God's specific revelation of his standards in the Bible. We admit as we say this that even then there are areas that are ambiguous. The matter of fighting in wartime is one. Christians have been divided at this point, often with the best of intentions. Answers in the areas of abortion, artificial prolongation of life, legal defense of criminals, covert government activities, and others are not always as apparent as we might wish they were. But without the Bible there are no sure answers at all! Consequently, there is no substitute (even for the busiest of Christians) for studying the Bible and conscientiously striving to submit one's own thoughts to it.

Some would suggest that we must trust in conscience. But conscience is an unsure guide. At best, conscience tells us that we should do right when we know the right. But it does not know what is right unless the light of God's revelation shines upon it. One writer compares conscience to a sundial, which is made for the sun just as conscience is made for God's revelation. In the light of the sun a sundial may give pretty good time. But suppose it is consulted by moonlight. By moonlight it may indicate that it is ten o'clock when actually it is three in the morning. Again, by using a candle or a flashlight the sundial may be made to tell any hour one desires. It is reliable only when the light of the sun shines upon it. In the same way, the conscience is useful only when the light of God shines on the human soul from the pages of God's Book, the Bible.

We need this book, and we need to grow in our understanding of it. If we do grow in our understanding, God will increasingly show his way to us, pointing out our sin and that of our society and quickening our will to do what is right before him.

Self-Surrender

One more thing is needed if we are to know what is right and actually do it, even when confronted by a contrary claim by our government or some other strong social pressure. What we need is to be willing to surrender everything. It is possible to have followed the first two steps suggested—to trust in God's sovereignty in human affairs and to study the Bible to such a degree that we know what is right—and yet fail at the crucial moment simply because the proper course is too costly.

This is what was wrong with Pilate after all. We cannot say that Pilate really believed in the sovereignty of God, but he had something like it. He believed in the power of the gods or else in some form of ultimate retribution. Otherwise he would not have been afraid when told that Jesus claimed to be God's Son. In the same way, we cannot say that he knew the moral standards of the true God as revealed in the Bible, because he had undoubtedly never read the Bible. Still he knew what was right in this situation, yet went against it. Why? If it was not from a fear of God and not from a failure to know what was right, it can have been only from the fear he would lose his position. It was this above all else that he valued. Pilate had to choose between what was right and what the world wanted. When the issue was clearly defined, he did not hesitate to choose the world and its rewards.

I think in contrast of Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, the Russian writer who was unjustly confined in the Soviet Union's notorious prison system for eleven years and lived to tell about it in The Gulag Archipelago. He saw suffering such as few free people have ever seen. He saw the dehumanizing practice of the Soviet guards and the equally dehumanizing practices of some of the prisoners. He saw some break and others grow strong. He asks, "So what is the answer? How can you stand your ground when you are weak and sensitive to pain, when people you love are still alive, when you are unprepared? What do you need to make you stronger than the interrogator and the whole trap?"

Solzhenitsyn answers, "From the moment you go to prison you must put your cozy past firmly behind you. At the very threshold, you must say to yourself: 'My life is over, a little early to be sure, but there's nothing to be done about it. I shall never return to freedom. I am condemned to die—now or a little later. But later on, in truth, it will be even harder, and so the sooner the better. I no longer have any property whatsoever. For me those I love have died, and for them I have died. From today on, my body is useless and alien to me. Only my spirit and my conscience remain precious to me.' "Confronted by such a prisoner, the interrogation will tremble.

"Only the man who has renounced everything can win that victory."

Pilate failed to do the right, not because he did not know what was right—he did—but because he feared to have it suggested that he was not Caesar's friend. What irony! He wanted so much to be a friend of Caesar. But he was not Caesar's friend; he barely knew Caesar. And what is even more significant, Caesar was not his friend at all.

Pilate had no friends anywhere, and yet there stood before him One who, although he was God Almighty and the King of kings, nevertheless stooped to be the friend of sinners. Is he your friend? If not, may I commend him to you? He is a King! He will demand your total allegiance and faithful service, perhaps even to death. But he does not demand of you what he was unwilling to undergo himself. He died for you, and he promises that no matter what you may go through for his sake and the sake of righteousness, he will go through it with you, thereby proving himself to be "a friend who sticks closer than a brother."

Chapter 242.
No King but Caesar

John 19:13-15

There is probably no point in the entire life of the Lord where the sovereignty of God is more evident than in the final minutes of his trial before Pilate. Pilate was convinced that Jesus was innocent. He had said so (John 18:38; 19:4, 6). He wished to release Jesus and actually set about to get him released. Yet, in spite of his personal convictions, will, and efforts, Christ was crucified. Why? The answer is that God had decreed from all eternity that Pilate should sentence Christ to death, and therefore not all the powers of earth and hell combined could thwart it.

This does not absolve Pilate from responsibility, as we have seen. He was to blame. Yet it does cause us to see beyond the evils of the human court to the blessed purposes of God the Father in Christ's sacrifice.

A Crucial Moment

The sovereign presence of God in this crucial moment was undoubtedly clear to John, for he has marked the point by time references, the first specific references to day and time since the start of chapter 13. Up to this point there has been much movement and uncertainty. There have been various trips by Jesus, followed by the various movements of the arresting party. There was the trial before the Jewish court (in three parts) followed by the trial before the Roman court (again in three parts). Now this comes to an end, and Pilate takes his place to render final judgment. John says, "When Pilate heard this, he brought Jesus out and sat down on the judge's seat at a place known as the Stone Pavement (which in Aramaic is Gabbatha). It was the day of Preparation of Passover Week, about the sixth hour" (John 19:13-14).

This last sentence—"It was the day of Preparation of Passover Week, about the sixth hour"—is intended to mark this historic moment by citing both the day and hour. Yet at both points it has been a puzzle for serious scholars.

The problem with the reference to the day is this. The phrase "the day of Preparation of Passover Week" most naturally designates the period immediately preceding the Passover meal, when the preparations for it (including the killing of the Passover lamb) were being made. John is saying that Jesus was crucified on the morning of the day the Passover feast began. By the most common dating of the crucifixion this would be Friday morning. By my dating, explained in detail earlier in these volumes, it would be Thursday morning after a trial beginning

Wednesday night. However, in either case (whether on Thursday or Friday), John's description of the crucifixion as before or at the very time of the Passover seems to conflict with Matthew, Mark, and Luke's description of the Last Supper as a Passover meal. This is a problem because Jesus clearly cannot have eaten the Passover meal on the Passover and have been crucified on that same Passover day.

What is the solution? A number of very good explanations have been offered, and it is perhaps impossible to decide finally on any one. Leon Morris, who offers a very helpful discussion of the options, feels that the apparent discrepancy is due to the existence of two different calendars at the time of Christ. In this view Jesus observed the Passover on one day in accord with one calendar, the calendar apparently followed by the sect that wrote and preserved the Dead Sea Scrolls, and was crucified prior to the official Passover observed on a different day by mainstream Judaism.

My belief is that John is correct in showing that Jesus was crucified before the official beginning of the Passover, that is, at a time when the Passover lambs were being killed in preparation for it, and that the other Gospels refer to a meal with Passover characteristics but actually held one day earlier. We notice, for example, that none of the accounts mention the characteristic foods of Passover, namely, the Passover lamb and bitter herbs. Again, we note the concern of the Jewish leaders to effect the arrest, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus before the sacred days of Passover week began.

According to my understanding, the Last Supper was eaten on Wednesday night, April 5, A.D. 30, and the crucifixion took place the next morning, April 6 by our reckoning.

Here we come to the second problem. John speaks of the moment at which Pilate gave his final verdict as "the sixth hour," while the Synoptics apparently fix it earlier, Mark in particular saying that it was "the third hour" when they crucified him (Mark 15:25). In ancient times hours were usually reckoned from sunrise. So John would be saying that Jesus was condemned around noon, that is, about six hours after a 6:00 A.M. sunrise; and Mark would be saying that he had been condemned and was actually on the cross by 9:00 A.M.

One attempt to solve this difficulty is to suggest that John is reckoning time by Roman rather than Jewish standards, according to which, so it is said, time was computed as we compute it, that is, from midnight. If this is so, John's reference is to 6:00 A.M. rather than noon. But does this really solve the difficulty? It is questionable, in the first place, whether the Romans actually reckoned time in this way. Morris and others believe that they did so only in legal documents. But even if they did and even if John is adopting their system, there is still a difference between John and Mark of three hours. Moreover, it is then difficult to see how the many events recorded by the various Gospels could be packed into so short a time span. Assuming that the Sanhedrin began their official trial at dawn (or even slightly before dawn), it is still necessary to have time for the presentation of Jesus before Pilate, the sending of Jesus to Herod and Herod's mocking of him, the second appearance before Pilate, the discussion and choice regarding Barabbas, the scourging, and then a final interrogation by Pilate. Could this all have taken place by 6:00 A.M. or even before 9:00 A.M.? It is doubtful. Rather we shall probably be closer to the truth if we imagine the greater part of the morning to be filled with such things.

Does this mean that Mark is wrong then? Not necessarily. In the first place, we need to recognize that no one in antiquity had watches and therefore that time was always reckoned in the most general categories. Second, the day as a whole was divided, like the night, into four portions of three hours each. The nighttime periods were designated as the four watches. The daytime periods were referred to generally by the first hour of each period: the first hour, the third hour, the sixth hour, and the ninth hour. This explains why the New Testament mentions almost no hour except the third, sixth, and ninth, and why the expressions "nearly" or "about" are so frequent. Bearing these facts in mind, we may say that Mark and the other synoptic Gospels indicate that Jesus was crucified during that period of the day designated as "the third hour," between the hours of 9:00 A.M. and noon, while John, who says "about the sixth hour," indicates that it was in fact getting on toward midday when the trial before Pilate was completed.

Repeating History

Having placed the moment of the official verdict to his own satisfaction, John immediately goes to the overriding issue. Jesus had been accused of having made himself a king. So Pilate now asks, "Shall I crucify your king?" The question is fraught with irony. There is irony on Pilate's side, for his question is meant to be contemptuous—who else but a beaten, itinerant preacher would be a Jewish king? But John, on his part, also records the words with irony, for this One actually is the King of Israel.

John then records that the chief priests answered, "We have no king but Caesar."

Nothing could be more ludicrous on the lips of the priests of Israel than this protestation. It means, "We are loyal to Caesar and to Caesar alone." But actually they hated Caesar and maintained that only God was their king. Why would they say such a thing? One would think they would have choked on it as they said it. Yet so great was their hatred of Jesus that they would rather deny their own convictions than see him escape crucifixion. Still, the leaders of Israel spoke truer than they knew. They thought that they were loyal to God and hated Caesar. But it was the Son of God, God incarnate, whom they were rejecting; so they are actually showing that indeed they do not honor God and instead choose Caesar.

Something similar had occurred early in Israel's history. The government then was a theocracy; that is, Israel was ruled by God directly through spokesmen and spokeswomen, such as Moses, the many judges, and prophetlike figures such as Samuel. This was God's design. It was good for Israel. However, the day came when, as Samuel grew old, the people looked at the nations around them and felt cheated because these had kings and they did not. They therefore came to Samuel and said, "Give us a king to lead us" (1 Sam. 8:6).

We are told that the request displeased Samuel and the Lord as well. However, when Samuel asked God what he should do the Lord replied, "Listen to all that the people are saying to you; it is not you they have rejected, but they have rejected me as their king" (v. 7).

Someone has said that human beings never learn anything from history except that they never learn anything from history. That is true in this case, for apparently nothing was learned from this earlier rejection of Jehovah's rightful and blessed rule. Earlier they had rejected Jehovah. Now they reject Jehovah's Son, in consequence of which they have since been "many days without king or prince, without sacrifice or sacred stones" (Hosea 3:4). It is a sad report, but it is a true report concerning Israel.

A Human Report

Yet it is not a Jewish report alone, for the rejection of God and Jesus is not a Jewish verdict alone. It is the verdict of the human race. What else does the fall of man mean if it is not the willful rejection of God's rule? It means, "We will not abide by his restrictions." What does the crucifixion of Jesus mean (both by Jewish and gentile hands) if it does not mean, "We will not have this man to rule over us"?

Do we doubt that this includes the Gentiles as well as the Jews? If so, we need turn only to the second psalm to see that view devastated. In that psalm the writer is viewing, not the rebellion of one man and one woman against God, not the rebellion of a few Jewish leaders and one gentile ruler against Jesus, but rather the collective rejection of the Creator by the united political kingdoms of this world. The psalmist asks, "Why do the nations conspire and the peoples plot in vain? The kings of the earth take their stand and the rulers gather together against the Lord and against his Anointed One. 'Let us break their chains,' they say, 'and throw off their fetters'" (2:13). The Lord is Jehovah. His anointed is Christ. So we are confronted in these verses with what R. C. Sproul calls "a massive conspiracy to overthrow the authority of God and His Anointed One."

Sproul continues by asking, "Why the hostility? Why do the kings rattle their swords in belligerence? The answer is obvious: they despise the rule of God which restricts their freedom. Again the goal is autonomy. The rule of God is regarded as ropes and chains binding them and keeping them from unbridled pursuance of their desire. So the secret weapons are unveiled, the battleships come out of dry dock, the nuclear stockpile is tapped, and the troops are mobilized as the whole world joins the cosmic-liberation movement. With the infantile resolve of the child who seeks to quench a blazing fire with a straw, the rulers set themselves against the sovereignty of God."

What is God's answer? The response is not panic. It is not a flurry of preparation to resist the impending invasion of his rights. Instead we read, "The One enthrones in heaven laughs; the Lord scoffs at them. Then he rebukes them in his anger and terrifies them in his wrath" (2:4-5). The verses show that the Lord is temporarily amused by this insanity. But the laughter quickly gives way as he moves to enthrone his Son and unleash his final judgments.

A Nation under God

This brings us to the final lessons of this section. We remember in view of the references to a king and Caesar that this entire section has been dealing with the relationship between God and human rulers. We remember that God is over all and that the authority of the state, while a legitimate authority, is nonetheless subject to him. But here is a progression. In the words of the Lord we have the proper picture: God and Caesar, with God in the dominant position. In the reaction of Pilate to the threat of the Jews ("If you let this man go, you are no friend of Caesar") we have a warped position: God and Caesar, but Caesar in the dominant position. In these verses, with which the issue of God and state is closed, we have the worst stance of all. Now it is no longer God and Caesar, in whatever relationship. It is Caesar alone. God is forced out of the picture entirely. Nothing is worse than this. Tyranny is not worse, for even under the worst of tyrants, if God is in the picture, he can at least be appealed to for help and the injustices may be corrected.

Without God, what is there? Nothing but the rapacious lust and cruel arrogance of human beings.

We may be more specific. Without God in the picture, there is no check on Caesar. We need a check. In America we recognize this secularly, for we have developed a system of checks and balances according to which one branch of government has control on another. Thus, the Congress makes laws that govern all citizens, but the judicial branch can declare them unconstitutional. Again, the president appoints Supreme Court judges, but Congress has the authority to impeach the president. Again, the President may initiate programs, but Congress must fund them. We recognize the need of checks and balances on the secular level because we know by experience that people in positions of power are untrustworthy. But if this is true on the merely human level, how much more true is it on the cosmic level. The united voices of the rulers of even so great a land as ours cannot be ultimate. God is ultimate. So if we forsake God, we are at the mercy of our governors.

Second, without God in the picture, we have no sure means of guiding government properly. This is not the same thing as a need for checks on our rulers. We need checks to keep government from becoming a law unto itself and therefore abusing and tyrannizing the governed. But suppose the government is not tyrannous. Suppose it operates well, as our government generally does. Even then it needs God, for it is only from God that we can receive a system of morality and a wisdom beyond our own. Only this is able to lead us upward to the fullness of those domestic blessings that God has for a people who sincerely seek his face.

There is an attempt in America today to remove every possible vestige of religion from national life. Will God be our God nationally? Or will we force him from national life? We can do either. We can have "no God but Caesar." But God help us if that happens! And God save us from it for Jesus' sake.

Chapter 243.
The Story of Two Thieves

John 19:16-18

The trial of Jesus began with the arrest in Gethsemane late in the evening of what we would call
April 5, A.D. 30, and ended with his crucifixion on Golgotha the next day, April 6. According to Jewish reckoning, this was all done on the fourteenth of the month of Nisan. The trial was a double trial, as we have seen in our studies of it. There was a Jewish trial and a Roman trial. In the Jewish trial, Jesus was examined on the charge of blasphemy. We have seen that if Jesus were merely a man, this charge and the condemnation that followed it were just, for Jesus had made this claim. In reality, however, the trial was unjust; for the laws of Judaism were repeatedly violated, and no defense in support of Jesus' claim was admitted. In the Roman trial, Jesus was examined on the charge of insurrection and treason, for having made himself "a king." This trial, in contrast to the Jewish trial, was legally exact. But the result was murder, for having acquitted the prisoner of all guilt, Pilate nevertheless gave Jesus over to be crucified.

So much for human justice. Now we are to see the justice of God unfold in his punishment of sin in Christ, so that on the basis of the death of the innocent Christ divine love might go out to embrace and fully save the one who trusts him.

The Crucifixion

We do not want to dwell on the crucifixion itself, for John does not do so and neither do the other Gospel writers. We need only note that there was no more terrible death than crucifixion.

William Barclay, late author of the popular "Daily Study Bible" series, states the matter clearly.

"Even the Romans themselves regarded it with a shudder of horror. Cicero declared that it was 'the most cruel and horrifying death.' Tacitus said that it was a 'despicable death.' Crucifixion was originally a Persian method of execution. It may have been used because, to the Persians, the earth was sacred, and they wished to avoid defiling it with the body of a criminal and an evildoer; so they nailed him to a cross and left him to die there, and then left the vultures and the carrion crows to complete the work. The Carthaginians took over crucifixion from the Persians; and the Romans learned it from the Carthaginians. Crucifixion was never used as a method of execution in Italy; it was only used in the provinces, and there only in the case of slaves. It was unthinkable that a Roman citizen should die by such a death. Cicero says: 'It is a crime for a Roman citizen to be bound; it is a worse crime for him to be beaten; it is well nigh parricide for him to be killed; what am I to say if he be killed on a cross? A nefarious action such as that is incapable of description by any word, for there is none fit to describe it.' It was that death, the most dreaded death in the ancient world, the death of slaves and criminals, that Jesus died."

The method of crucifixion is detailed in the New Testament and in other ancient documents. After sentence was passed, the victim was first subjected to scourging, a punishment so severe that some died under it. In Jesus' case the scourging took place before the final passing of sentence so as to evoke pity from the mob. Next the horizontal bar of the cross was bound to the condemned man's back. He was then led through the city to the place of crucifixion accompanied by a centurion and four soldiers who made up the execution party. A placard describing the crime for which he was to die was carried before him.

Arriving at the place of crucifixion, the victim was stripped of his clothes, which became the property of the soldiers. The crossbar was then hoisted upward to rest upon the upright bar which had already been prepared to receive it. The victim's hands were nailed in place. In most cases the feet were also nailed or bound to the cross. As a result of this he could raise himself up from time to time, thereby alleviating the strain upon his arms and diaphragm. After hours or even days of such torture, the victim would die of shock, exposure, loss of blood, or suffocation.

Three Died on Calvary

It is interesting that as John tells the story of Christ's crucifixion he does so with great restraint, not at all emphasizing the physical aspects of the crucifixion. One reason for this is that the physical aspects were well known to his contemporaries and so needed little elaboration. But the more important reason is that John (like the other Gospel writers) has more important things to emphasize. There is the fulfillment of prophecy, for example. There are the words from the cross. One striking point, significantly mentioned in all four Gospels, is that Jesus was not the only one to die that day. He was accompanied in his death by two thieves.

Theirs is an interesting story, though John himself does not elaborate upon it. Apparently they had been guilty of robbery, which may have been part of a wider revolutionary activity on their part. The word used to describe them was also used of Barabbas (John 18:40), and it can also mean "an insurrectionist." Whatever their specific crime may have been they were caught and were now sentenced to die with Jesus. As he was nailed to the cross, they were also nailed. As he was lifted up, they were also lifted up. The pain was excruciating, and these two robbers, being filled with anguish and despair, must have cried out intensely cursing God, the Romans, the Jews, even their own fathers and the mothers who gave them birth.

But the Jews were not minding these robbers. They were thinking of Jesus, and they were adding insult upon insult to his sufferings. 'You who are going to destroy the temple and build it in three days, save yourself! Come down from the cross if you are the Son of God" (Matt. 27:40). "He saved others; let him save himself if he is the Christ of God, the Chosen One" (Luke 23:35). "Let this Christ, this King of Israel, come down now from the cross, that we may see and believe" (Mark 15:32). As they listened to these taunts the thieves turned their thoughts from themselves to Jesus and joined in the jeering. Matthew tells us that "the robbers who were crucified with him also heaped insults on him" (Matt. 27:44). Luke even gives the words of one: "Aren't you the Christ? Save yourself and us!" (Luke 23:39).

Suddenly something wonderful happened, a miracle. God began to work in the heart of one thief so that his cursing died down, he fell to thinking, and at last began to understand the truth about himself and Jesus. Earlier he had been cursing. Now he turned to his companion and rebuked him for the evil things he now understood him to be speaking. "Don't you fear God, since you are under the same sentence? We are punished justly, for we are getting what our deeds deserve. But this man has done nothing wrong." He then turned to Jesus and voiced his new-found faith, 'Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom."

What did Jesus answer? Did Jesus say, "It's too late for that now; you should have thought of that when you were joining that revolutionary band"? Did he say, "I appreciate your confidence, but I don't know; if we get through this, I'll see what I can do for you"? Did he say, "We're both in the same boat, mister; we just have to grit our teeth and bear it"? We know he did not. Instead he said in quiet confidence, "I tell you the truth, today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43).

In speaking to this thief, Jesus speaks to us too. For he not only shows the way to be saved; he also gives assurance of salvation.

A Sea Captain Is Saved

Donald Grey Barnhouse was working in his study at the church one day when the janitor came to him and said, 'There's a gentleman out here who wants to see you." He gave him the man's card, and Barnhouse saw that he was the British sea captain of the Mauritania, which was at that time the largest ocean liner crossing the Atlantic. Barnhouse took the card and went out to meet him.

The captain explained why he had come. "I'm captain of the Mauritania, as you can see from my card, and I go back and forth across the Atlantic about twenty-three times a year. Every other Sunday on the way down the coast of Newfoundland I get your radio broadcast out of Boston.

Last Sunday, when I listened to you, I said to myself, 'I've got twenty-four hours when I land in New York. I'm going over to Philadelphia to see that preacher.' So I took the train this morning from New York and I just came down on the chance that I might see you."

Barnhouse said, "Sir, have you been born again?"

He said, "That's why I came down to see you."

By this time Barnhouse and the captain had reached the prayer-meeting room, where there was a blackboard. So Barnhouse took a piece of chalk and drew three crosses. "Let me put it very simply for you," he said. "You know that when Jesus Christ died on the cross there was a thief on either side?"

"Yes."

"And each was a sinner. He had sin in him." As he said this Barnhouse wrote the word "in" under both of the side crosses, representing those of the two thieves. Under the center cross he wrote, "not in!" "This man did not have sin in him. Christ was the spotless Lamb of God. Now," he continued, pointing to the first and third crosses, "in addition these men had sin on them." He wrote "on" over both crosses.

A puzzled expression came to the captain's face.

"Let me show you the difference between sin on you and sin in you," Barnhouse said. "Do you drive a car?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever gone through a red light?"

"Yes, I have."

"You were guilty, weren't you?"

"Yes."

"Did the police catch you?" Barnhouse asked.

"Well, no, they didn't."

"But you had that sin in you, didn't you?" Barnhouse continued. "And if the police had been there and had given you a ticket, then you would have had that sin on you as well. That's the difference between having sin in you and having sin on you. All of us have sin in us. We are all guilty. All of us also have sin on us. We are under God's judgment. This first thief had sin in him and sin on him. This second thief had sin in him and sin on him. They were exactly alike."

Barnhouse then wrote the word "on" over the cross of Christ. He said, "Christ also had sin on him. But he did not have sin in him. That sin which is on him is not his sin; it is my sin—and that of this thief." He then turned the chalk sideways and rubbed it through the word "on" over the cross of the believing thief and drew a big arrow pointing to the cross of Christ. "God justified this thief by putting all the guilt of his sin over here on Jesus Christ."

He went on to say, "Now, Christianity is simply this. Here is the perfect Christ who came and died on the cross. And here are two types of people, represented by these two thieves. Both are alike. Both have sin in them. Both have had sin on them. But in the one case, the sin that was on him is now on Christ. Sir, I am like this thief. My sin was on me, but now it is on Christ. You are either like this first thief or like this second thief. Sin is in you, in me, and it is either on yourself or it is on Christ. God says that Christ came to take away your sins. Which are you like?"

The captain was a tall, cultured man and evidently not one easily to give way to emotion. But he was greatly moved and was evidently trying to keep back tears. At last his hand moved forward, and he pointed to the cross of the repentant thief. He said, "By the grace of God, I am like this thief."

Barnhouse replied, "Your sin is on Christ. God says so."

He said, "God says so." Then he reached out and took Barnhouse's hand to say good-bye. "That's all I want," he added. "I can go back now." Instead Barnhouse asked him to stay, and they spent an hour or so talking about what he should do next in the Christian life.

Our Story

I tell that story at some length because the story of the believing thief, as told by Luke, and the story of the believing sea captain, as told by Barnhouse, is our story too if we have truly believed on the Lord Jesus Christ as our Savior. If it is not your story, I pray that it might be before this study is finished.

The believing thief did three things. First, he recognized his own need, and by that I mean his spiritual need and not merely his physical one. On the physical side there were many things he needed. He needed deliverance, medical attention, drugs. Failing these things, he at least needed sympathy knowing that he was about to die. But this is not what he recognized and confessed so openly. What he recognized was that he was a sinner and that he needed a Savior. At other times in his life he might have tried to explain this need away. But here he recognized it. He confessed, "Don't you fear God, since you are under the same sentence? We are punished justly, for we are getting what our deeds deserve."

Second, having recognized that he was a sinner and that he needed a Savior, he recognized that Jesus was that Savior. He may not have been able to explain the theology of justification, as I have just explained it. But he knew that Jesus was the innocent Son of God and the Savior. He showed this by saying, "This man has done nothing wrong" and by referring to the coming of Christ in his "kingdom."

Finally, having recognized his need of a Savior and that Jesus was that Savior, he committed himself to him personally. He said, 'Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom." And the Lord did remember him. He remembered him on the spot, for he accepted him right then and promised that on that very day, after each had died, they would be together in paradise.

If you would be like that thief—if you would have your sin on Christ rather than on yourself and therefore be able to receive the promise of being with Christ and God the Father eternally—you need to do what he did. First, admit your sin. Second, see Jesus as your Savior. Third, commit yourself to him personally. You need to say, "Lord, I know that I cannot get to heaven on my own record, for I am a sinner, and my record condemns me. I need you as my Savior, and I ask you to accept me as one for whom you died. Receive me. Remember me in the day of your judgment." If you will pray that prayer, you can be certain that Jesus has received you just as he received the repentant thief. From a human point of view everything was against him. Yet he called upon Jesus, and Jesus, in what was his last interview upon earth, heard him, received him, and promised him an entrance into paradise.

Will you call upon him? You can never be too sinful or call so late that Jesus will not hear. He is listening for that call now.

Chapter 244.
This World's King

John 19:19-22

Of the four Gospel writers, John alone (as far as we know from Scripture) was an eyewitness of Christ's crucifixion, so it is not surprising that his account contains details that are missing from the first three Gospels. He alone tells of how Jesus lovingly entrusted Mary to his care. He alone tells of two of Jesus' sayings from the cross: "I thirst" and "It is finished." No other but John tells us that in being crucified along with two thieves, Jesus was "in the midst." He alone tells that Christ's side was pierced by a soldier's spear and that there came forth blood and water. He alone distinctly tells us that Jesus set out for Golgotha carrying his own cross, which afterward Simon of Cyrene had to carry, as the Synoptics tell us.

These details of the events of the crucifixion vary in importance, as John himself seems to indicate by the prominence or lack of prominence he gives them. Among those that are very important is a detail concerning the title that Pilate had placed over Christ's cross.

In Three Languages

There is nothing unusual in the mere fact that John mentions the title that was placed above the cross. This title was standard procedure in cases of crucifixion, and each of the other Gospel writers likewise mentions the placard. According to Matthew, "Above his head they placed the written charge against him: THIS IS JESUS, THE KING OF THE JEWS" (Matt. 27:37). Mark writes, "The written notice of the charge against him read: THE KING OF THE JEWS" (Mark 15:26). Luke puts it this way, 'There was a written notice above him, which read: THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS" (Luke 23:38). Each of these accounts tells us that there was a placard designating the crime for which he was crucified, and each gives us the substance of it. What John tells us and the others do not is that it was written in three languages. John says, "Pilate had a notice prepared and fastened to the cross. It read: JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS. Many of the Jews read this sign, for the place where Jesus was crucified was near the city, and the sign was written in Aramaic, Latin and Greek" (John 19:19-20).

This is an interesting detail. For one thing, it provided us with one explanation of why the precise wording of the title in each of the Gospels differs from that in the others. The difference is not great, of course. But the suggestion has been made that it is due to the evangelists having translated different versions of the title. Pink suggests that Matthew most likely translated the Hebrew, Luke the Greek, and Mark and John the Latin.

My own opinion is that this explanation, while possible, is unnecessary. It seems more likely that each writer simply gives a selected translation. The full text would have been: "This is [translated by Matthew and Luke] Jesus [given by Matthew and John], of Nazareth [added by John alone], the King of the Jews [provided by all four writers]."

John's intention in providing this detail is not, however, to explain to us how the wording of the other Gospels might have come to differ slightly. Rather it is to show that Jesus, while dying as a Jewish King, nevertheless had a relationship to the world beyond Israel. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin were the major languages of the then known world. So John is actually declaring that Jesus is a King for everyone. He is not merely a Jewish Savior, though he is that. He is the Savior of the Greeks and of the Romans as well. He is the Savior of the world.

This World's Savior

Once we have seen this we immediately think of the strong emphasis on this truth throughout John's Gospel. We think, first, of John's prologue. "The true light that gives light to every man was coming into the world. He was in the world, and though the world was made through him, the world did not recognize him. He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him. Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (1:9-12). In these verses, from the very beginning of the Gospel, John is indicating that the provision for salvation from sin about which he is writing in the Gospel is not for the Jew only but instead is for all men and women. All have rejected Jesus. But from that vast number, composed of both Jew and Gentile, God has elected a great mixed race to be his spiritual children.

Later on in this same chapter the ministry of John the Baptist is unfolded in detail, and John's testimony to Jesus is recorded. John declared, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29). The sacrifice of lambs, particularly at the Passover, was an exclusively Jewish institution. It would have been natural for John to have said, "Behold the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of Israel." But this is not what John said. John recognized the universality of Christ's mission and so identified him as the world's sin-bearer.

The theme occurs again in John 3, the chapter that recounts Jesus' conversation with Nicodemus.
In these verses, Jesus speaks to Nicodemus of the nature and necessity of the new birth. Then John continues: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him" (3:16-17). After this he repeats the idea of Jesus being the world's light (vv. 19-21).

In chapter 4 we have an example of Jesus going beyond the strict bounds of Judaism to reach a woman from Samaria and, through her, her entire town. In this account there is an interesting contrast between Jesus' open and unprejudiced attitude toward others and the suspicion and vain superiority of his own disciples toward the Samaritan woman. They were practically on her own level of understanding and certainly on the same level when they stood before God. Yet the disciples looked down on her. Jesus, who was infinitely above them all, stooped to reach her and lift her up to believe on and eventually be with him. It is significant that the story goes on to tell of the witness of the woman to her friends and fellow citizens of Samaria, at the end of which these declare forcefully, "We no longer believe just because of what you said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Savior of the world" (4:42).

In chapter 6 he is the "bread of life" given for "the life of the world" (vv. 32-35, 48-51). In chapters 8 and 9 Jesus is "the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5). In chapter 10 he is the shepherd whose task is to gather his own out of Judaism and the other folds of this world. He is to lead them into that one new fold, which is the church (10:16).

In chapter 11 John reports the unwitting prophecy of Caiaphas, the high priest, who in calculating self-interest declared, "You know nothing at all! You do not realize that it is better for you that one man die for the people than that the whole nation perish" (11:49-50). Caiaphas was not thinking of the Gentiles when he made this statement. In fact, he was not even thinking of Israel, though he claimed to be making his suggestion for the good of the Jewish people. Caiaphas was thinking of himself and of his own position and prestige. Yet, as John indicates, "He did not say this on his own, but as high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus would die for the Jewish nation, and not only for that nation but also for the scattered children of God, to bring them together and make them one" (vv. 51-52).

In the next chapter John alone of the Gospel writers tells of the Greeks who came to Jesus and to whom Christ declared, "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified" (12:20-23). At the end of the chapter, he reports Jesus as saying, "I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness" (v. 46). It is difficult to imagine how the universal scope of Christ's death could be more fully or more consistendy presented.

Salvation for All

We should be glad that it is so presented, for it is John's way of saying that there is no respect of persons with God. Paul has written this truth theologically (cf. Rom. 2:11). But John demonstrates it practically, showing that God offers salvation to the Greek and Roman as well as to the Jew. He saves the thief on the cross as well as the centurion who commanded the execution party. He proclaims his grace to the high and low, the rich and poor, the intellectual and ignoramus, and so on for whatever categories you or I may see fit to impose on the race.

Besides, if we stop to analyze it, we can see that this is the only path open to a God of perfect justice. Barnhouse has written on this point, "There can be but one just method of salvation, and that is the method which God has devised in the infinite bounty of his being, and has brought to us by the goodness of his heart and the sacrifice that flows from his loving kindness. God says to the human race in sum: I will not look at what you have been. It makes no difference how you may have sunken in sin or how you have walked according to your standards. I will not take account of the arrogance of your pride or of the filth of your wallowing. I will not look at what you call iniquity, nor will I look at what you call goodness. I will bring you all to the gate and count you all as equal. I will ask you to admit that your gradations of human efforts and human attainments must be discarded and that you come, one and all, as bankrupts. Just admit that though you may have everything that satisfies your neighbors you have nothing that satisfies me. Then, says God, I will do everything for you and put righteousness to your account as a free gift without respect of persons."

What God has done may be remembered in this fashion. We are studying the significance of the placard that Pilate caused to be erected over Christ's cross, the placard that designated his supposed crime. But we may remember that according to the Scriptures God saw another title over that cross, though the message of that invisible placard was different.

Paul tells us about it in Colossians. He writes, "When you were dead in your sins and in the uncircumcision of your sinful nature, God made you alive with Christ. He forgave us all our sins, having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross" (Col. 2:13-14). What is Paul getting at here? He is using the image of the placard placed over the cross of a dying criminal to say that although you and I have violated the holy law of God given at Sinai and therefore deserve to die for it, we do not need to die. For Jesus, the innocent One, took our place and died for our trespass. His cross bore the placard of our crime. In him our violation of God's just law was punished, and God can therefore reach out to justify the one who trusts him, regardless of that person's nationality, intelligence, race, or any other factor.

Have you reached out to trust him? If you are pleading your attainments or heritage, you are not trusting him. You are trusting yourself, and you cannot come. It is only when you turn from these that you find the way open. The Greek and the Roman, the Jew and the Gentile are on the same ground. "The sinner and the saintling, the powerful and the powerless, the judge and the judged, the lawyer and the lawless, the noble and the nobody, the proprietor and the pauper, the doctor and the dunce, the strong and the stripling, the glamorous and the gawky, the sophisticate and the savage, the worthy and the worthless—all may be saved from whatever their supposed class background."

Lord of All

There is one more point. I have been writing about Jesus as the Savior of the world, for this is what John suggests by recording that the title placed over the cross was in the three main languages of the day. But I am sure you have noticed that the title did not actually refer to Jesus as the Savior. It actually referred to him as King—King of the Jews and of the remainder of the world as well. This suggests that his accomplishments as Savior and his identification as Lord go together. Or, to say it in other words, you cannot have Christ as Savior without having him as Lord also; he cannot be Lord unless he is Savior.

Is he your Lord? You say, "I think so, but what does that mean? What is he Lord of specifically?" I think there is an answer to that question in the significance of the languages in which the caption of the cross was written. The first language mentioned by John is Hebrew. Hebrew was the language of religion and morality. There were religions in Greece and Rome too, of course. But Hebrew was preeminently the language of religious faith, for it was in Hebrew that God had given the Old Testament, in which the only faithful representation of himself and the way of salvation was provided for the ancient world. Proclaiming Jesus

King in Hebrew suggests that he is King of religion. He is himself the only true representation of God and the only sure and certain proclaimer of the way to be just before him. Jesus is Lord in this area. Consequently, if he is your Lord, he must be the One who determines what you believe concerning God and salvation. You should not say, "I think so-and-so" if Jesus is truly your King. Rather, your question must be, "What does he think? What is his teaching?"

Greek is the second language. This was the language of science, culture, and philosophy. It was the language of beauty. If Jesus is Lord in this area, then his outlook must prevail as you look out upon our culture. Is what you see what he desires? Is our culture's world-and-life-view his view? If it is not—and it is certain that it is not—then you must side with your Lord regardless of the world's opinion either of him or of you.

Finally, there is Latin, the language of law and good government. This reminds us that Jesus is the supreme lawgiver and law administrator. His laws must govern your conduct, and you must be obedient to him, even though his commands may be countermanded by the state or any other human authority.

Pilate put his inscription on the cross primarily to irritate the leaders of the Jewish people, and it did irritate them. It irritated them so much that they came back to him and requested that the wording be changed. They wanted the sign to read, "He said, 'I am King of the Jews.'" These leaders hated Jesus so much that in his death they did not want to give even the appearance of recognizing his kingship. The accusation—JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS—revealed their nature as it truly was. But notice that it did that for Pilate too, for in response, the cowardly recalcitrance of Pilate emerged clearly so that the one who did not have courage to acquit One whom he knew to be innocent nevertheless stupidly dug in his heels and responded, "What I have written, I have written" (John 19:22).

The cross always reveals men as they are. It reveals the soldiers' nature, the nature of the crowds, that of the faithful women and John, who was also in the city of Jerusalem at this period. It reveals our hearts as well.

We cannot be hypocrites before that cross. It is too great, its scope too universal. What does the cross show you to be? Does it show you to be a sinner—without hope, under condemnation—because you have no part in the Savior? Or does it show you to be his follower? God grant that if you have not yet done so, you might find him as Savior and begin to follow him as your rightful King and Lord.

Chapter 245.
Scripture Fulfilled in Christ's Death

John 19:23-24

At an earlier point in our study of John's Gospel I quoted some words of Martin Luther that I wish to quote again here because the point of the earlier passage and the point of this one are similar.

Luther had been preaching a sermon on John 5:39, the verse in our study of John at which I quoted him earlier; it said of the Scriptures, "And they are they that testify of me." Luther noted this and then added, "Here Christ would indicate the principle reason why the Scripture was given by God. Men are to study and search in it and to learn that He, He, Mary's Son, is the one who is able to give eternal life to all who come to Him and believe on Him. Therefore he who would correctly and profitably read Scripture should see to it that he finds Christ in it; then he finds life eternal without fail. On the other hand, if I do not so study and understand Moses and the prophets as to find that Christ came from Heaven for the sake of my salvation, became man, suffered, died, was buried, rose, and ascended to Heaven so that through Him I enjoy reconciliation with God, forgiveness of all my sins, grace, righteousness, and life eternal, then my reading in Scripture is of no help whatsoever to my salvation. I may, of course, become a learned man by reading and studying Scripture and may preach what I have acquired; yet all this would do me no good whatsoever. For if I do not know and do not find the Christ, neither do I find salvation and life eternal. In fact, I actually find bitter death; for our good God has decreed that no other name is given among men whereby they may be saved except the name of Jesus (Acts 4:12)."

Luther's point is that the Scriptures are, both in their general outline and in specific details, God's Word to us about Jesus. It is undoubtedly this keen spiritual insight that made him the tower of strength and winsome exegete that he was. Luther believed that the Bible was God's Word and that it was about Jesus. Consequently, whenever he approached the Bible, he knew from the start who was speaking in it and what its theme was.

It would be good if all who pretend to teach the Bible in our day had a similar insight and conviction. Unfortunately, they do not. Instead of reading the Bible as the Word of God, many read it as the words of Isaiah, Matthew, John, Paul, or even "Second Isaiah," "the Deuteronomist," "Q," or some other supposed source. Instead of seeing the Bible as a book about Jesus, they see it as a collection of works with varying and sometimes even conflicting themes. As a result, the Bible does not make sense to such people, and they find it confusing. Moreover, they often also fail to believe it and in the Christ presented in its pages. Failing to believe in him, they miss salvation.

Four Prophecies

This was not the case with the apostles. Undoubtedly, there were times early in their lives and experiences of Jesus when the Bible they had (the Old Testament) was confusing. They read it and heard it taught, like most pious Jews of their day. But they did not understand it. Specifically, they did not understand its prophecies of the coming Messiah. This was even true during their three-year association with Jesus. But when he died, rose again, and came to them after those events to explain how all that had happened to him had been prophesied beforehand in the Scriptures, their confusion vanished and their outlook changed. Now they knew that the Bible was indeed about Jesus, and they saw it in a new light. In fact, they now saw prophecies of his life on many of its pages.

This was true of John, no less than the others. Much that had happened to Jesus up to this point had been in fulfillment of Scripture. One commentator has pointed out that no less than "twenty Old Testament predictions relating to events that would surround the death of Christ, words written centuries before his first advent, were fulfilled with precision within a twenty-four-hour period at the time of his crucifixion." John has not drawn attention to this fulfillment of Scripture before this. Now he begins to note the events of the crucifixion which were in fulfillment of specific Old Testament prophecies, suggesting (1) that God was in charge of these events, (2) that the Scriptures do not fail, and (3) that Jesus is indeed the anointed One of God, the Messiah. There are four such prophecies:

1. The division of Christ's clothing among the soldiers of the execution party and the casting of lots for his seamless inner garment. John describes this in verses 23 and 24. It is prophesied in Psalm 22:18.
2. The giving of a vinegar solution to Jesus to drink, in fulfillment of Psalm 69:21. Jesus provoked this act by exclaiming, "I thirst." John tells of this fulfillment in verses 28 and 29.
3. The breaking of the legs of the two thieves coupled with the decision not to break Jesus' legs. John describes this in verses 31-33 and 36. It was prophesied in Psalm 34:20.
4. The piercing of Christ's side with a spear. John mentions this in verses 34-35, and 37. It is prophesied in Zechariah 12:10.

Clearly John believed, as did the other writers of the New Testament, Martin Luther and the vast host down through history who followed in their train, that the Bible is God's Word about his Son, our Savior Jesus Christ. It is where we meet him, learn of him, believe in him, and grow into the fullness of the faith. Through a study of the Word this happens. Without it, none of these things take place.

Psalm 22:18

The first of John's references to the fulfillment of Scripture in the events surrounding Christ's death is the matter of the dividing of his clothing, which John notes as a fulfillment of Psalm 22:18. It is that which we primarily want to look at in this study.

We have already seen that a condemned man was customarily taken to the place of execution by a detachment of four soldiers under the command of a centurion. It was the prerequisite of these soldiers to receive the clothes of the victim. William Barclay points out in his commentary that the Jews normally wore five articles of clothing: the shoes, turban, girdle, tunic, and outer robe. He suggests that, since there were four soldiers and five articles of apparel, each had one, and one article (the inner garment or tunic) was left over. This may have been the case, or it may have been that the first four items were torn apart or otherwise divided. Regardless of that, the inner garment was without seam, being woven in one piece from top to bottom. It could not be divided. So the soldiers cast lots or gambled for it. John notes this, saying, "'Let's not tear it,' they said to one another. 'Let's decide by lot who will get it.' This happened that the scripture might be fulfilled which said, 'They divided my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing.'"

Many have read a great deal into this reference. In the early church, the mention of Christ's seamless robe suggested to Origen the wholeness of Christ's teaching. Cyprian thought that it symbolized the unity of the church. To Cyril it meant the virgin birth. In more recent times and with greater reason, it has been understood as suggesting the perfect righteousness of Christ now imparted to the sinner as the basis of his justification.

There may be some truth in each of these explanations, but I doubt that John or any other of the Gospel writers had them in mind. What they are concerned to emphasize is that this specific detail of the crucifixion, like all the other details, was planned for and prophesied by God. Consequently, neither this nor any other aspect of the death of Christ was accidental.

The Suffering Savior

This is not to say that no more may be learned from this prophecy, however. On the contrary, Psalm 22 in particular seems to have been on the Lord's mind during these final hours of his earthly life. Therefore, it gives us a clue as to what he thought his suffering meant and what was to be accomplished by it.

A number of years ago in an article for Eternity magazine, I pointed out the significance of this psalm for understanding what occupied the anguished mind of Christ during the dark hours of Calvary. I would like to share some of those earlier conclusions here. I noted in the first place that, although there is no reason why we should know what was in Christ's mind during those three hours of darkness, between noon and three in the afternoon, when he died, there are nevertheless several clues which relate his thoughts to this psalm and thereby indicate that he was thinking of it. The first clue is that at the beginning of the period of darkness Jesus cried out with a loud voice, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mark 15:34), a direct quotation of Psalm 22:1. The second clue is that at the end of three hours of darkness he cried out again, saying, "It is finished" (John 19:30). This phrase is a quotation of the last verse of Psalm 22 (v. 31).

The English reader will not find this phrase in the most common English translation of Psalm 22, but it is a legitimate translation of the one Hebrew word that occurs there. The verse itself can read, "They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that it is finished."

This has great implications, for it means that during the hours in which the Lord hung upon the cross his mind traversed the scope of the psalm. He thought of the alienation of the One who was made sin for mankind.

He passed on to reflect on the description of suffering the psalm includes. He thought of the final section that speaks of the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles. Only after that did Jesus utter the phrase that marks the psalm's ending.

In this psalm there are three pictures of Christ that partially explain his suffering. The first verse speaks of Christ as having been forsaken. I have read good books suggesting that Jesus was not really forsaken by God, that he only imagined he was forsaken, that Jesus almost lost his faith in God but he recovered it later when he knew that God had sustained him. This is wrong. Christ was bearing the penalty for sin, which is death (Rom. 6:23), and death means separation from God. What is death? Certainly not physical death alone, but spiritual death! And spiritual death is the separation of the soul from the source of life, which is God. That is the penalty Christ bore for human sin—separation from God. So when he cried out in a loud voice, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" it was the cry of one actually abandoned by the Father.

You and I can never pretend fully to understand this. We cannot imagine how there can be a division in the Godhead. How can God the Son be forsaken by God the Father? It is a great mystery. But it is true nevertheless. Christ was forsaken, and it was only by this means that he accomplished our salvation.

The second picture of the suffering Savior comes from Psalm 22:6: "I am a worm and not a man, scorned by men and despised by the people." Why a worm? Why this unusual image? To understand this image one must realize that the Hebrew word for worm had come to refer almost exclusively to a special kind of worm from which the people of the Near East derived a valuable crimson dye. It was much like an insect that exists in Mexico today called the cochineal. The worm known to the Hebrews was the tola. The dye was formed from its blood, released when the animal was crushed. In Hebrew the word for scarlet literally means the "splendor of the tola."

The tola is referred to several times in Scripture. It is the worm that spoiled the manna in the wilderness. The scarlet dye for the linen of the wilderness Tabernacle came from the blood of the tola. It is said of Saul in 2 Samuel that he dressed the women of Israel in scarlet, that is, he introduced a period of such prosperity that all their robes could be dyed.

This image throws light upon Christ's thoughts, for when Jesus thought of himself as the tola, he thought of himself as the worm who is crushed for God's people. His blood was shed for us that we might be clothed in bright raiment.

The third image refers to execution. The psalm says, "Rescue me from the mouth of the lions, save me from the horns of the [unicorns]" (v. 21). The animal mentioned in this verse is not really a unicorn, for a unicorn does not exist (in spite of the fact that the translators of the King James Bible probably thought so). Actually it is a type of wild ox with long pointed horns to which victims are said sometimes to have been bound for execution. As Jesus thought about this image, he may have reflected on the forensic aspect of his death and remembered that God was putting him to death for our sin.

Christ's Soul Satisfied

Forsaken! Crushed! Executed! These ideas all help to explain Christ's crucifixion. But there is a more moving concept to come. That Jesus was, even just before his crucifixion, thinking of other people, can be seen in his words to the women when he was on the way to Golgotha ("Weep for yourselves," Luke 23:28) and in his words to Mary and John shortly after the cross was erected ("Dear woman, here is your son.... Here is your mother," John 19:26-27). From noon until three in the afternoon, when God shrouded the cross with darkness, his mind turned to the meaning and purpose of his suffering. His thoughts were of himself. But his mind eventually turned back again to other people as he went on to think of the fruit his work would produce in those who would later become Christians.

First, he thought of his disciples. We know this because immediately after the verse that speaks most clearly of Christ's death, the psalm goes on to say, "I will declare your name to my brothers; in the congregation I will praise you" (v. 22). Not long before his crucifixion Jesus had prayed for his disciples—in the long prayer recorded in John 17. Now, even while he is dying, he thinks of them again. Before they had been only followers. Now they are brethren, because by his death they were to become sons of God and coheirs with him of God's glory.

At the very end Jesus looked to the spread of the gospel beyond his disciples, even beyond Judaism, to the Gentiles. This is suggested by the contrast between verses 22 and 25 of this psalm. Verse 22 says, "I will declare your name... in the congregation." In the context of the psalm this obviously means the congregation of Israel. Verse 25 speaks about "praise in the great assembly. "With equal clarity this speaks of the spread of the gospel beyond Israel to the Gentiles. The psalm goes on to say, "All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord, and all the families of the nations will bow down before him" (v. 27).

That verse is wonderful to me, for I am included in that number. And so are you, if you are a Gentile who believes in Jesus. He was thinking of you as he hung on the cross. He died for you. He died for you personally. If you do not believe in him, he wants you to come to him. It may help you to know that in the moment of his death he looked forward to the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles. And his soul was satisfied.

Chapter 246.
Words from the Cross

John 19:25-27

There is something particularly solemn and significant about the last words of men and women. The reason is that, in the face of death, what a person is often comes clearly to the surface and is reflected in speech. For example, Napoleon Bonaparte, the famous French general and emperor, said while waiting for his death, "I die before my time, and my body will be given back to the earth. Such is the fate of him who has been called the great Napoleon. What an abyss between my deep misery and the eternal kingdom of Christ."

Voltaire, the noted French infidel, is reported to have said to his doctor, "I am abandoned by God and man! I will give you half of what I am worth if you will give me six months' life."

Thomas Hobbes, the skeptic who corrupted the faith of some of England's great men, exclaimed, "If I had the whole world, I would give it to live one day. I shall be glad to find a hole to creep out of the world at. I am about to take a leap into the dark."

These statements and others by similarly well-known men reveal more about their true outlook on life and their true hope than anything they might have said in more fortuitous moments. They are often quite grim. Fortunately, one can hardly think of these sayings without thinking of the even more famous words of Jesus of Nazareth, the founder of the Christian faith, who in his death spoke words not of despair but of hope and thereby revealed much about his own personal faith and that of Christianity.

The Final Analysis

I have always considered it unfortunate that the seven sayings of Jesus on the cross have been termed his "last words." The implication is that Jesus did not rise again; but he did rise again, and he returned to his disciples to say many more things to them. In fact, these last teachings are actually more important than those from the cross, for they have much more to say about Christianity. On the other hand, the sayings from the cross (although wrongly termed the "last words") are nevertheless significant. They are significant because they show that (1) Jesus was in clear possession of his faculties until the very last moment, when he delivered up his spirit to the Father, (2) he understood his death was intended to provide salvation for the world, and (3) he knew his death would be effectual to that end. Moreover, the words also show his habitual concern and love for other persons, even at the moment of his most acute suffering.

The words from the cross are these:

1. "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34). These words are a prayer for God to forgive those who were crucifying him. They show the merciful heart of the Savior.

2. "I tell you the truth, today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43). These words were spoken to the believing thief and were a confident promise of salvation.

3. "Dear woman, here is your son.... Here is your mother" (John 19:26-27). In these words Jesus commended his mother, Mary, to the care of the beloved disciple.

4. "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mark 15:34; Matt. 27:46). In this saying the true nature of the atonement is made clear and the deep anguish of the Lord is revealed to us.

5. "I thirst" (John 19:28). This request shows the true humanity of the Lord. But even more important, it shows his desire that every fact of his death (as of his life) be in accord with Scripture.

6. "It is finished" (John 19:30). These are the most important words of all, for they refer not merely to his life, perfect and exemplary as it was, but to his completed atonement for sin. Because of this we can be sure of salvation.

7. "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit" (Luke 23:46). These words show Jesus to have been in control of his life until the last and indicate that the relationship between himself and the Father, which earlier had been broken as he was made sin for us (Mark 15:34), was restored.

Two Christ Loved

Not one of the Gospels contains all seven of these statements, however. Matthew and Mark each contain one, though they allude to others. Luke and John each contain three, but their lists are different and neither one mentions the saying that Matthew and Mark contain ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"). John includes the words regarding Jesus' mother and the beloved disciple, "I thirst," and the final affirmation that the work of the atonement was finished.

It is easy to understand why John includes the words of the Savior to Mary and the corresponding words to that disciple into whose care she was committed. The reason is that John was himself that disciple. Consequently, the charge was his charge and the importance of it came home to him as to no other.

Let us think of these two whom Christ loved possibly more than any other two people upon earth. Let us think, first of all, of Mary and of the pain that was hers in this moment. One commentator wrote, "What sorrow it must have caused her when, because there was no room in the inn, she had to lay her newly-born Babe in the manger! What anguish must have been hers when she learned of Herod's purpose to destroy her infant's life! What trouble was given her when she was forced on his account to flee into a foreign country and sojourn for several years in the land of Egypt! What piercings of soul must have been hers when she saw her Son despised and rejected of men! What grief must have wrung her heart as she beheld him hated and persecuted by his own nation! And who can estimate what she passed through as she stood there at the cross? If Christ was the Man of Sorrows, was she not the woman of sorrows?" An anonymous poet of the Middle Ages has expressed the sorrows of Mary in these words:

Near the cross her vigil keeping,
Stood the Mother, worn with weeping,
Where He hung, the dying Lord:

Through her soul, in anguish groaning,
Bowed in sorrow, sighing, moaning,
Passed the sharp and piercing sword.
O the weight of her affliction!
Hers, who won God's benediction,
Hers, who bore God's Holy One:
O that speechless, ceaseless yearning!
O Those dim eyes never turning From her wondrous, suffering Son!

As we think about these words and about the scene they describe, we recall the saying of the aged Simeon, spoken when the infant Jesus was presented in the temple by Joseph and Mary. God had revealed to him that he would not die until he had seen the Lord's Christ, and now, coming into the temple area at the very moment when Jesus was being presented, he took him up in his arms and blessed him. Then, after uttering that psalm of praise known as the Nunc Dimitis, he turned to Mary and said, "This child is destined to cause the falling and rising of many in Israel, and to be a sign that will be spoken against, so that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed. And a sword will pierce your own soul too" (Luke 2:34-35). What strange words those were! A piercing sorrow for one highly favored by God? How unlikely it all seemed, particularly at the time Simeon spoke! Yet it all came to pass. Here at the cross we see the fulfillment of Simeon's words.

One lesson we learn from this scene is the certainty of the fulfillment of prophecy. God says, "My purpose will stand, and I will do all that I please ... what I have said, that will I bring about" (Isa. 46:10-11).

Another lesson is that sorrow, even such acute sorrow as this, may come even to those who are greatly loved by Jesus. When it comes to us, as it may, we must not think that it is because of God's disfavor. We think of the story of the death of Lazarus and of those words to Jesus with which the account begins, "Lord, the one you love is sick" (John 11:3). Jesus loved Lazarus and his sisters. Yet Lazarus grew sick and eventually died, and the grief of the sisters was great. Love and sickness are not incompatible in God's economy. God's favor and sorrow sometimes flow along together.

But again, this is not all we can say, for although it is true that the beloved of God often suffer for God's sometimes hidden purposes, it is nevertheless true that we take comfort in his knowledge of our sorrows and his solace for us in the midst of them. In these words we notice that Jesus was aware of Mary (even in his own sorrow), cared for her, and acted to provide what was needful.

The Beloved Disciple

The other person involved in this episode is John, the beloved disciple. He is here at the cross. But the background for his appearance is the contrasting picture of the scattering disciples at the time of the Savior's arrest in Gethsemane. The Lord had warned the disciples of their approaching cowardice—"This very night you will all fall away on account of me, for it is written: 'I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock will be scattered'" (Matt. 26:31).

They all protested. Peter said, "Even if I have to die with you, I will never disown you." The rest of the disciples agreed (v. 35). But Jesus was right, and they were wrong. They had forsaken him, John included; Jesus was left to the scorn and cruelty of his enemies.

Yet notice, the cowardice of the disciples was only temporary. Later, after his resurrection, they would seek him at the appointed place in Galilee (Matt. 28:16) and would speak boldly on his behalf. And here, even before the resurrection, there was at least one who sought him out even while he hung on Calvary. Why? It is not difficult to discern why. That which brought John to Calvary was the same thing that brought Mary there, and the other women—Mary, the wife of Cleopas, and Mary Magdalene. It was that which later brought these and others to the tomb and which brought Mary Magdalene back even after she knew that the body of Jesus was no longer in the garden. It was love, love for Jesus. Thus, although they can do nothing at all, they still want to be as near to him as possible and linger to the end. Mary loved him. Hers was a mother's love. John loved him too; this was "the disciple whom Jesus loved" and who, quite naturally, loved him in turn.

Do you love him? I do not ask whether you have forsaken him in some moment of danger. I do not ask whether you have served him as you should have done or have failed to serve him. I do not ask whether you have denied him. I only ask, Do you love him? If you answer yes, then come to him regardless of what terrible thing you may have done in your life or regardless of what good thing you may have failed to do.

John came to him in spite of his earlier failure. What did he find? Did Jesus rebuke him? Did he look with scorn on one who could not watch with him even one short hour and then forsook him when the moment of testing came? Not at all! Jesus did not rebuke John on his return, any more than he rebuked Peter or any of the others. Instead, he gave John an unmistakable privilege. He committed his mother to his charge. If you are one who has deserted Christ, do as John did and as Arthur W. Pink admonishes in his remarks on these verses: "Cease then your wanderings and return at once to Christ, and he will greet you with a word of welcome and cheer; and who knows but what he has some honorous commission awaiting you!"

"Jesus, Therefore"

We have spoken of Mary in this study and of John too. But clearly, the central figure in this moving drama is Jesus. He is the One who knows Mary's sorrows. He is the One who knows John's love. Now he speaks out of his own love to provide for each one.

The one who hangs on the cross is even at this late moment still providing for others. He is stripped of everything, yet he leaves rich legacies. To his executioners, who even now stand guard over him, he bequeaths a prayer for pardon—"Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34). To the dying but believing thief he grants the promise of salvation—"Today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43). In his words to John and Mary he grants a continuing legacy of the most tender love. By this word he gives a son to his mother and a mother to his friend.

It is customary in Catholic theology to see this word as a commending of John, and through him all Christ's disciples, to the patronage of Mary. For example, Bishop Fulton J. Sheen remarks, "When our Lord spoke of John, he did not refer to him as John for then he would have been only the son of Zebedee. Rather, in him all humanity was commended to Mary, who became the mother of men, not by metaphor, or figure of speech, but by pangs of birth." Actually the opposite was the case. Jesus did not commend John to Mary, but Mary to John. The real meaning of this episode is that Jesus was caring for his mother and thus fulfilling the Old Testament commandment to "honor your father and mother" (Exod. 20:12). So must we honor that commandment. We are under a God-given obligation to honor our parents, and that obligation does not cease even though we should come of age or move far from them.

We note too that spiritual responsibilities do not remove these obligations. What could be more of a spiritual responsibility than that which the Lord himself was fulfilling? At the very moment at which he spoke these words our Lord was dying for sinners. He was offering himself as satisfaction to the outraged justice of almighty God. Yet even at this moment, he does not fail to provide for her who was his mother.

There is one thing more. When Jesus commends Mary to John, he bypasses his own unbelieving brethren and leaves her to the care of the beloved disciple instead. Is this accidental? Is it only because John happened to be near the cross at this moment? It is hard to think so. Rather, we sense that the Lord is here bringing into existence a new family based on his atonement. As Mariano Di Gangi writes, "Our Lord brings into being the brotherhood of believers. He fashions the fellowship of the household of faith. This is the new society, which is not segregated according to race or nationality. It is not predicated upon social standing or economic power. It consists of those whose faith meets at the cross, and whose experience of forgiveness flows from the cross."

This is our fellowship if we are truly Christ's followers. We should conduct ourselves as those who are members of it by caring for and loving one another. Jesus said, "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another" (John 13:35).

Chapter 247.
"I Thirst"

John 19:28-29

It is hard for those of us who have grown up in western lands to understand the horror of thirst or the importance of water to those who live in the world's desert areas. But if this is true in regard to normal circumstances, which it is, how are we to appreciate the thirst of the Lord Jesus Christ on Calvary?

In lands like ours water may be a thing of beauty or a pleasant delight. But it does not speak of life itself, which it did to those who lived in biblical lands. "Fierce thirst, and the benediction of the water which quenches it, are intensely real in the Bible," writes E. M. Blaiklock in an essay on this theme. "In Genesis the herdsmen of the patriarchs strive with the alien for the wells laboriously cut in the hot rock. In Exodus, the panic of thirst shakes and threatens Moses' leadership. Psalmists and prophets liken joy, happiness, life itself, God's grace, to the blessed stream and the fountain filled. At Sychar, and in the Temple court, the Lord likens water to eternal life; on the Mount he promises fulfillment only to those who thirst for righteousness, and the words are caught up by the closing pages of the Bible."

In biblical lands thirst was a horrible reality. We cannot fully understand it. Yet we must try if we are to appreciate the second of the three words from the cross which John includes in his narrative. The Bible describes Christ's thirst by saying, "I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint. My heart has turned to wax; it has melted away within me. My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue sticks to the roof of my mouth; you lay me in the dust of death" (Ps. 22:14-15). It was in the midst of suffering like this that our Lord cried out "I thirst" and was given a sponge dipped in a cheap wine like vinegar, as John indicates.

Christ's True Humanity

If it does nothing else, this incident reminds us forcefully of the Lord's true humanity, which we are sometimes in the habit of forgetting. The liberal church tends to forget Christ's deity or else denies it outright. Evangelicals do not do this; they tend to suppress the Lord's humanity, considering him so much God that he can hardly be human. But Jesus was both. He was very God of very God and very man of very man, as the creed confesses. He was not a deified man or a humanized God. He was the God-man, forever God and now forever man. In his incarnation he took our humanity to himself.

Pink writes, "While here on earth the Lord Jesus gave full proof of his deity. He spoke with divine wisdom, he acted in divine holiness. He exhibited divine power, and he displayed divine love. He read mens' minds, moved mens' hearts, and compelled mens' wills. When he was pleased to exert his power all nature was subject to his bidding. A word from him and disease fled, a storm was stilled, the devil left him, the dead were raised to life. So truly was he God manifest in the flesh, he could say, 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' "So, too, while he tabernacled among men the Lord Jesus gave full proof of his humanity—sinless humanity. He entered this world as a babe and was 'wrapped in swaddling clothes' (Luke 2:7). As a child, we are told, he 'increased in wisdom and stature' (Luke 2:52). As a boy we find him 'asking questions' (Luke 2:46). As a man he was 'wearied' in body (John 4:6). He was 'an hungered' (Matt. 4:2). He 'slept' (Mark 4:38). He 'rejoiced' (Luke 10:21). He 'groaned' (John 11:33). And here in our text he cried, 'I thirst' That evidenced his humanity. God does not thirst. The angels do not. We shall not in glory—'they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more' (Rev. 7:16). But we thirst now because we are human and living in a world of sorrow. And Christ thirsted because he was man—'Wherefore, in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren' (Heb. 2:17)."

The Problem of Suffering

But it is not only Christ's humanity that we see in this incident. We also see answers to the problem of human pain and suffering, which is one of life's great puzzles. We know that life is filled with sorrow. How are we to deal with it? What is the biblical approach? What are the biblical answers? Not all the answers are given in this incident—it is possible that some are given nowhere—but Christ's words at least point us in the right direction.

There have been four major historical approaches to the problem of suffering apart from the biblical approach. The first is an attempt to deny that evil exists. In antiquity this view was developed in a philosophical system known as Docetism. It built upon common Greek philosophy, in which "spirit" was considered to be good and "matter" evil. It was inherent in this distinction that the spiritual world was more real than the material world. The Docetists simply went a bit beyond this to deny the ultimate reality of matter. In their view, in the ultimate analysis suffering and evil were an illusion. In our day the same approach is taken by Christian Science and by some of the Eastern religions.

What is the biblical response to this denial of evil and suffering? Quite simply, the Bible denies that answer. It acknowledges the reality of evil and the horror of suffering. The very fact that the Lord endured the suffering of the cross is disproof of that solution.

The second major approach to the problem of suffering may also be traced to Greek philosophy, to Stoicism. Stoicism was the philosophy of the "stiff upper lip." It acknowledged evil, just as it acknowledged good. But it was fatalistic. It believed that good and evil enter a person's life according to fixed mechanical laws. Nothing can be done about it. Therefore, the only possible response to evil (and good) is simply to control one's response to what happens. The proper way to live is to repress one's responses to the degree that good things do not make us joyous nor bad things make us sad. But this is not the biblical approach either. The Bible does not ask us to be stoics. Rather, it calls upon us to weep with those who weep and rejoice with those who rejoice. Jesus enjoyed himself in joyous company. Again, he was able to weep when there was suffering.

The third approach is the "pleasure first" philosophy of hedonism. In this view also evil and good are real, as in Stoicism; but the solution proposed is to fill up life with so much pleasure that suffering is simply overshadowed. We are to avoid suffering. We are to do everything in our power to have good times and good experiences. Is this biblical? Not at all. True, the Bible acknowledges good times and pleasures and encourages us to be thankful to the Lord for them. But we are not told to avoid the sufferings of life. Rather, we are to identify with those who are suffering and enter into their sufferings in order to help them by taking some of their pain to ourselves. If the Lord had followed the course of the hedonists, he would not have become a man at all.

Fourth, there is the approach that is taken by modern existentialism, particularly the variety that regards human existence as ultimately absurd. In this philosophy, life has no meaning at all. But since we are still faced with the problem of living (if we do not opt for suicide, which Albert Camus has termed the "only ultimate philosophical question"), the only way to do so is by "dialectical courage." This means to go on with a smile as if life is filled with joy and meaning, even though we know it is not.

It is this approach, perhaps more than any other, that urges Christian people to respond biblically. But in doing so we have to be very cautious. The first thing we want to say is that suffering is not meaningless, because in a universe ruled by God nothing is meaningless. Suffering is linked to sin and is therefore, in some sense, a consequence of it. There was no suffering before the fall. There is no suffering in heaven. There will be none in the redeemed earth, where there will also be no sin. But while this is true, we must nevertheless be careful not to establish a simple one-toone relationship between a person's suffering and the same person's sin. It is true that we all suffer. It is true that we all sin. But our suffering is not necessarily for our own sin, nor in direct proportion to it. Therefore, the one who suffers most is not necessarily the greatest sinner. Nor is the one who suffers less more innocent.

Right here our Lord's pain is instructive, for although his suffering was closely linked to sin—he was suffering for sin, and it was sinful men who had caused him to suffer—his suffering was nevertheless not for his own sin, for he had none. We conclude then that although there is meaning in suffering, although it is linked to sin and is never allowed into a believer's life except for God's own, sometimes hidden purposes, it is nevertheless not always possible to tell what this meaning is. Above all, we must be cautious in explaining to someone else why he or she is suffering.

Yet there is more we can say: suffering can be redeemed. It is not the last word. We do not need to be defeated by it. R. C. Sproul writes, "That is why no true Calvinist would ever hide behind the doctrine of God's sovereignty in the face of social responsibility, in the face of the responsibilities of the agents of alleviation of suffering in this world. We know that suffering can be redeemed and that we can be used of God to bring that redemption to bear. So we are concerned about feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, healing the sick, visiting and caring for the orphan and the widow. Ultimately we know that suffering is fully redemptive in the hands of God."

How is that true? It is true because Jesus entered into our suffering and finally died that we might be delivered from sin and its effects. At this point his physical thirst becomes symbolic of our spiritual thirst and his death the means of alleviating it. Horatius Bonar once wrote of that means:

I heard the voice of Jesus say,
"Behold, I freely give
The living water; thirsty one,

Stoop down and drink, and live."
I came to Jesus, and I drank
Of that life-giving stream;
My thirst was quenched, my soul revived, And now I live in Him.

If you have not come to Christ, then you need to respond to that One who died for your salvation.

Jesus and the Scriptures

This incident teaches something else also, something entirely different from these first lessons. It concerns Jesus' attitude to the Scriptures and his conscious attempts to fulfill them.

We know from the Gospels and also from study of various Old Testament passages that many significant details of the Lord's death were clearly prophesied and therefore fell out in strict conformity to the will of God. Pink writes, "Every important detail of the great Tragedy had been written down beforehand. The betrayal by a familiar friend (Ps. 41:9), the forsaking of the disciples through being offended at him (Ps. 31:11), the false accusation (Ps. 35:11), the silence before his judges (Isa. 53:7), the being proven guiltless (Isa. 53:9), the numbering of him with the transgressors (Isa. 53:12), the being crucified (Ps. 22:16), the mockery of the spectators (Ps. 109:25), the taunt of nondeliverance (Ps. 22:7, 8), the gambling for his garments (Ps. 22:18), the prayer for his enemies (Isa. 53:12), the being forsaken of God (Ps. 22:1), the thirsting (Ps. 69:21), the yielding of his spirit into the hands of the Father (Ps. 31:5), the bones not broken (Ps. 34:20), the burial in a rich man's tomb (Isa. 53:9)—all plainly foretold centuries before they came to pass. What a convincing evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures!"

But we notice as we study the incident of Christ's thirst, comparing it with this or any other list of fulfilled prophecies, that it has a unique quality. The Lord had nothing to do with some of these fulfillments; they fell out in simple correspondence to God's will (the false accusations, the verdicts at the trials, the crucifixion with thieves, the gambling for his garments, the fact that his bones were not broken). In others Christ played a part (in being silent before his judges, in praying for his enemies, in yielding his spirit into the hands of the Father). But here, in this unique incident of his crying out "I thirst," we are told that Jesus did so specifically in order that "the scripture might be fulfilled" (v. 28). That is, though the Scriptures certainly would be fulfilled, Jesus did not consider this a reason to do nothing, when it was within his power to bring about the fulfillment through his own action.

We know from one of our earlier studies that Jesus had been meditating upon the Scriptures during the hours of his agony. He had been thinking of Psalm 22 especially. Apparently his mind had also run over other prophecies, almost, it would seem, checking them off to assure himself that everything prophesied concerning his life had been accomplished. Was there anything in Genesis that had been left undone? No. Exodus? No. Deuteronomy? No. At last he reached Psalm 69 where it is said in verse 21, 'They put gall in my food and gave me vinegar for my thirst." Already they had offered him gall to deaden his pain (Mark 15:23), but there had been no offer of vinegar for his thirst. Therefore, he calls out "I thirst" that this might be completed.

This was the last prophecy. So we are told, "When he had received the drink, Jesus said, 'It is finished.' With that, he bowed his head and gave up his spirit" (v. 30).

Fulfilling the Scriptures

The application for those who believe in the Scriptures is this. If we believe the Bible is God's Word, we believe that the prophecies it contains will come true. But do we sit back and do nothing, as some might recommend? Or do we actively seek to participate in fulfilling prophecy?

Let me give some examples. In John 17:17, Jesus prays for the sanctification of his people, saying, "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth." We will be sanctified. But does this mean that we are therefore to do nothing to seek to grow spiritually? Not at all. The means of our sanctification are specified in this verse. They are study of, meditation upon, and memorization of God's Word. This is our responsibility. So although ultimately we will all be made like Jesus (1 John 3:2-3), in the meantime we will be sanctified only as we use the means God has placed at our disposal.

In the same prayer Jesus prays for the unity of the church: "My prayer is not for them alone. I pray also for those who will believe in me through their message, that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me" (vv. 20-21). This petition is for the present time. It is that "the world may believe." But what then? Are we free to do as we please, attack our brothers and sisters in Christ, destroy or weaken our unity? Not at all. Rather we must work at this, making "every effort to keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace" (Eph. 4:3).

Again, we must work at the missionary mandate. We are told by the Lord that the "gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations; and then the end will come" (Matt. 24:14). Nothing could be clearer: The gospel will be preached. This is the prophecy. But the prophecy does not relieve us of the responsibility of participating in its fulfillment by becoming agents through which it comes to pass.

Is prophecy a deterrent to human action? Not at all. It is a stimulus, for none are so bold in God's service as those who know the outcome in advance and encourage themselves by claiming God's promises.

Chapter 248.
No Death like Jesus' Death

John 19:30

If Christ is Christianity and if the final week of Christ's life is its center, then the center of that week is certainly the moment of Christ's death on Calvary. That moment is therefore the focal point of all history, and the words "It is finished" are an important expression of it.

The importance of those words, the sixth in the series of seven spoken from the cross, is that they point to Christ's death as an achievement. Elsewhere in the Gospels we are told that Jesus uttered a loud cry just before his death (Matt. 27:50; Mark 15:37; Luke 23:46); since two of the Gospels also tell us that Jesus had been given a drink just before this, it would seem that this was Christ's cry. In other words, Christ's words were not the final gasping sob of a defeated man or even the firm deliberate declaration of one who was resigned to his fate. They were a triumphant declaration that the turning point in history had been reached and that the work that Jesus had been sent into the world to do had been done.

It is this that makes Christ's death unique. As an example of patient endurance of abuse and suffering, it may perhaps be matched by other deaths. As a fitting end for One who, like the prophets, bore a faithful witness to God's truth even when that truth was rejected, it may perhaps be paralleled. But Christ's death cannot be matched in its fullest sense, because Jesus (and no other) achieved our salvation by his suffering. The apostle Paul speaks of it, saying, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). Again he writes, "But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. There is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his righteousness at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus" (Rom. 3:21-26).

Because Christ's atonement is so important, we need to consider it at some length. In this and the following studies we will look at the nature, necessity, perfection, and extent of the atonement.

Christ's Death a Sacrifice

When we consider the nature of the atonement we immediately find ourselves in the midst of a world of biblical ideas and imagery without which its nature cannot really be understood. Central to this world of ideas and imagery is the notion of sacrifice and the accompanying thought of substitution. Sacrifice has to do with the death of an innocent victim, usually an animal. Substitution means that this death was in place of the death of someone else.

The background of this concept lies in the truth that all who have ever lived are sinners, having broken God's law, and that the penalty for sin is death. The Bible declares, "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one" (Rom. 3:10-12). Moreover the Bible declares that the penalty for sin is death. It says, "The soul that sins will die" (Ezek. 18:4). This death is not merely physical death, though it is that. It is spiritual death as well. Death is separation. Physical death is the separation of the soul and spirit from the body. Spiritual death is the separation of the soul and the spirit from God. This is what we deserve as a consequence of our sin. But Jesus took that death to himself by his sacrifice. He became our substitute by experiencing both physical and spiritual death in our place.

There is a very vivid illustration of this principle in the early chapters of Genesis. In these chapters Adam and Eve had sinned and were now in terror of the consequences. God had warned them. He had said, "You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of food and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:1617). At this point they probably did not have a very clear idea of what death was, but they knew it was serious. Consequently, when they had sinned through disobedience and then later had heard God walking toward them in the garden, they tried to hide.

They could not hide from God. No one can. So we are told that God called them out of hiding and began to deal with their transgression. What should we expect to happen as a result of this confrontation? Here is God who has told our first parents that in the day they sinned they would die. Here also are Adam and Eve who have sinned. In this situation we should expect the immediate execution of the sentence. They had sinned. So if God had put them to death in that moment, both physically and spiritually, banishing them from his presence forever, it would have been just.

But that is not what we find. Instead, we have God first rebuking the sin and then, wonder of wonders, performing a sacrifice as a result of which Adam and Eve were clothed with the skins of those animals. This was the first death that anyone had ever witnessed. It was enacted by God. As Adam and Eve looked on they must have been horrified. "So this is death," they must have said. "How horrible!" Yet even as they recoiled from the sacrifice, they must have marveled as well, for what God was showing was that although they themselves deserved to die it was possible for another, in this case two animals, to die in their place. The animals paid the price of their sin. Moreover, they were now clothed in the skins of the animals as a reminder of that fact.

This is the meaning of sacrifice: substitution. It is the death of one on behalf of another. And yet we must say, as the Bible teaches, that the death of animals could never take away the penalty of sin (Heb. 10:4). These were a symbol of how sin was to be taken away, but they were only a symbol. The real and effective sacrifice was performed by Jesus Christ. We sometimes read in theological literature that the ideas of sacrifice and substitution are alien to our culture and therefore that we cannot use these terms to speak of the meaning of Christ's death anymore, at least if we want to be understood. But we must not think that it was any easier for those who lived in earlier stages of the world's history to understand them. These concepts have always been difficult; that is why God took so much time and such elaborate means to teach them.

Stilling God's Wrath

A second word for understanding the meaning of Christ's death is propitiation (Rom. 3:25). Propitiation also relates to the world of sacrifices. But unlike substitution, which refers primarily to what Jesus did in reference to us (he died in our place), propitiation describes that death in terms of its bearing upon God. The background for this term is the wrath of God which is directed against all sin. Propitiation refers to the work of the Lord Jesus Christ in which the justified wrath of God against the sinner was stilled or turned aside and the love of God was enabled to go out to save him.

An Old Testament illustration is helpful. It is the ark of the covenant and the sacrifice which involved it. The ark of the covenant was one of the pieces of furniture for Israel's wilderness tabernacle. It was a chest about a yard long, covered with gold and closed by a solid gold covering known as the mercy seat. The mercy seat had two figures of cherubim standing on either end looking inward. The cherubim had wings which stretched out over the ends of the ark and then came together over the top. The stone tables of the law of Moses were kept within this ark, and the ark itself was kept within the Holy of Holies, the most sacred part of the tabernacle.

The most significant thing about the ark of the covenant is that it was thought of symbolically as being the earthly dwelling place of God. God was thought to dwell in the space between the outstretched wings of the cherubim above the mercy seat. And of course, this is why no one but the high priest was ever to enter the Holy of Holies, and even he was to enter only once a year on the Day of Atonement. God was holy, and sinful men and women who came into his presence would be consumed.

The picture of that ark is a terrible picture, as it was meant to be. There we see God dwelling between the outstretched wings of the cherubim. There we see the law, which we have broken. As God looks down upon the affairs of men this is what he sees—the broken law. So the picture tells us that God in his holiness must judge sin and that sinners are subject to his judicial wrath.

But that is not all, for now the Day of Atonement comes, and on that day the high priest takes the blood of a sacrifice and, bearing it carefully according to all the regulations for this ceremony (for violation of these regulations entailed death), enters the Holy of Holies where it is now sprinkled upon the mercy seat between the presence of God and the law. What is symbolized now? Gloriously, the picture is now no longer of wrath directed against the violators of God's law but rather a picture of mercy in which the wrath of God against sin is satisfied and the sinner is spared. Now when God looks down from between the wings of the cherubim he sees, not the law we have broken, but the blood of the sacrifice. An innocent has died. He has borne our penalty. Thus, we can live.

In discussing sacrifice, I pointed out that the blood of animals could not actually take away sin but that these pointed forward pedagogically to the work of Christ on Calvary. That also applies here. The blood of the sacrifice sprinkled upon the mercy seat by the high priest did not remove sin, but it pointed forward to the One whose death would remove it: Jesus Christ. When he died God's wrath against sin was literally propitiated, which God himself demonstrated by tearing the veil of the temple, separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies, in two from top to bottom. Thus did God show that the way into his presence was now open for all who should believe in Jesus.

An interesting sidelight on this meaning of God's death is the speed with which blood sacrifices disappeared in the ancient world once the gospel of Christ was proclaimed. At the time of Christ's death sacrifices were performed everywhere—in the Roman and barbarian worlds as well as within Judaism. But, as Adolf Harnack once pointed out in a striking passage, "Wherever the Christian message... penetrated, the sacrificial altars were deserted and dealers in sacrificial beasts found no more purchasers.... The death of Christ put an end to all blood-sacrifices." Why did this happen? Harnack explains, "His death [Christ's] had the value of an expiatory sacrifice, for otherwise it would not have had strength to penetrate into that inner world in which the blood-sacrifices originated." Sacrifices ceased because the death of Christ alone met the need they were supposed to satisfy.

Reconciliation

A third word used for describing the effects of Christ's death is reconciliation. Second Corinthians 5:18-19 provides us with a key passage: "All this if from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ and gave us the ministry of reconciliation: that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men's sins against them. And he has committed to us the message of reconciliation."

Reconciliation means "to make one," so the background for this term is the broken relationship between ourselves and God because of sin. We have already seen one example of this in Genesis, for when Adam and Eve sinned and God came to them in the Garden, our first parents hid from God. This had not been the case before their disobedience. Before there had been openness. They had talked with God joyously. Now the relationship that they had enjoyed was broken, and they showed their deep psychological awareness of this by hiding. In a sense men and women have been hiding ever since. We hide through a self-imposed ignorance of spiritual things, through our supposed sophistication or culture, or even (strange as it may seem) through religion—for many religious experiences are attempts to get away from God rather than attempts to find him.

But God comes to us; that is the glory of the gospel. Moreover, when he comes he does what is necessary to heal the broken relationship and bridge the gap. In Eden it was the inauguration of sacrifices. On Calvary it was the ultimate bridge to which the earlier sacrifices pointed. Paul writes, "For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5). He means that it is on the basis of Christ's death that the reconciliation takes place.

Bought with a Price

The final word of those most significant for describing the death of Christ is "redemption." "Redemption" is derived from two Latin words: re, meaning "again," and emere, meaning "to buy." So redemption means "buying again" or "buying back," as in redeeming something that has been pawned or mortgaged. We use the word of material things. The Bible uses the word to signify that we are God's, but have nevertheless fallen into bondage as a result of our sin and now must be purchased out of that bondage by Christ's sacrifice.

Our bondage is to sin's penalty and power. Christ's death frees us from both. On this subject John Murray writes, 'Just as sacrifice is directed to the need created by our guilt, propitiation to the need that arises from the wrath of God, and reconciliation to the need arising from our alienation from God, so redemption is directed to the bondage to which our sin has consigned us. This bondage is, of course, multiform. Consequently redemption as purchase or ransom receives a wide variety of reference and application. Redemption applies to every respect in which we are bound, and it releases us unto a liberty that is nothing less than the liberty of the glory of the children of God." Paul speaks of that redemption in Romans: "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24). Peter speaks of it in even more explicit terms: "For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18-19).

"It is finished," Christ's declaration from the cross, is particularly appropriate for understanding his death as redemption; for one of the meanings of the Greek word tetelestai, which underlies it, is "Paid in full!" The word was used in this way in secular business transactions.

Here we come back to the point with which we began. What makes the death of Christ so unique and indeed marks it out as the focal point of history is that it accomplished precisely what needed to be accomplished in regard to our salvation. We deserved to die for sin; Christ died for us. We were under the just wrath of God by reason of our transgressions; Christ bore that wrath in our place. We were alienated from God; Christ reconciled us to him. We were sold under sin; Christ bought our freedom by paying sin's price. From one perspective all this is spiritual. It has to do both with moral matters and with spiritual relationships. But from another point of view, this is as concrete and historical as the birth of Julius Caesar or the death of Socrates.

Chapter 249.
Why Did Jesus Die?

John 19:30

Those who know anything at all about Christianity know that Jesus died to save us from sin, and they know that the source of the decision to save us from sin was God's love. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16). But why was it necessary for the love of God to achieve its end in this way? Why Jesus? And why the cross? This was the question raised by Anselm of Canterbury in his famous essay Cur Deus Homo? ("Why God Became Man"), in which he asked, "For what reason or necessity did God become man and, as we believe and confess, by his death restore life to the world, when he could have done this through another person (angelic or human), or even by a sheer act of will?" Was the cross necessary, or could God have saved the human race through another person or even by a sheer act of will? One writer puts it like this: "If we say that he could not, do we not impugn his power? If we say that he could but would not, do we not impugn his wisdom? Such questions are not scholastic subtleties or vain curiosities. To evade them is to miss something that is central in the interpretation of the redeeming work of Christ and to miss the vision of some of its essential glory. Why did God become man? Why, having become man, did he die? Why, having died, did he die the accursed death of the cross?"

Two Necessities

In the history of Christian doctrine there have traditionally been two ways in which the necessity of the death of Jesus has been spoken of. One is what we might call circumstantial necessity. The other is absolute necessity. Let me explain.

The view that we call circumstantial necessity maintains that God, being free and infinite, always has an infinite number of possibilities open to him. Consequently, although he chose to save men and women by the death of Christ, he did not need to do so and could actually have saved them in an infinite number of other ways. If we ask at that point how we can then speak of a "necessity" in the atonement at all, the answer is that because of the circumstances under which God operated, this was the way (chosen out of many ways) that the greatest number of advantages would occur, including the greatest possible glory being given to God. God could have saved us without Christ's having died. But he could not have done so and yet have showed the greatest measure of wisdom and love in the circumstances. When we read that "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" of sins (Heb. 9:22), that is indeed true. But it is true only because God has chosen to do things that way. He could have saved us without blood shedding.

The other way to talk about the necessity of Jesus' death is to see it as an absolute necessity. This means literally that, having elected to save some of Adam's fallen race, God had no other means at his disposal than the sacrifice of his beloved Son. This does not mean that God had to send Jesus. He could have elected not to save anyone. But having elected to save them, he was under the necessity of accomplishing this by the death of his Son, a necessity arising out of the perfections of his own nature.

At first glance it might be thought presumptuous for us to speak thus of something being absolutely necessary for God. "After all," someone might object, "who are we to tell God what he can or must do?" But this is not the way in which this statement is made. Obviously we cannot tell God to be or do anything. Yet he has revealed something of his nature in Scripture, and it is not impudent or improper to inquire on the basis of that revelation whether God can or cannot do a thing, particularly when it is as central to the Christian faith as the atonement. For example, is it possible for God to lie or speak falsehood? If we answer no, as we should, we are not limiting God by telling what he can or cannot do. We are simply acknowledging that deceit is impossible for one who is characterized by utter truth, as God declares himself to be. Far from dishonoring him in this, we actually honor him. Moreover, we are led to a valuable conclusion; for, on the basis of God's inability to lie, we perceive that he can always be trusted.

It is not improper or even impractical to conclude that God was under an absolute necessity in the matter of Christ's death. He may not have been. But the answer to whether he was or not is to be determined solely by the teaching of the Scripture and not by any prior conclusions as to what is required by our understanding of God's freedom.

The Divine Necessities

When we turn to the Bible we find a number of necessities pertaining to God which bear upon our subject. They are like the necessity for God to speak truth, being Truth, but they relate primarily to the matter of salvation.

The first of these necessities is the hatred of God for sin, which we may express by saying that God must hate sin if he is to be as he declares himself to be in Scripture. The background for this necessity is the holiness of God. In Scripture God is more often called holy than anything else.

This is the epithet most often affixed to his name, for instance. We do not often read of his "loving name," "mighty name," or "eternal name." But we are often reminded of his "holy name." Moreover, this is the attribute of God which is invariably mentioned in any vision men have of him. Isaiah, in his great vision of the Lord "high and lifted up," stressed the holiness of God more than any other attribute. "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty," cry the seraphim. Isaiah's immediate reaction was to bemoan his own sinful condition: "Woe is me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5; cf. vv. 1-6).

The holiness of God lies at the core of his being, then, and the dismay of Isaiah was the recognition that in his holiness God cannot be indifferent to anything which opposes it. Holiness involves the elements of majesty and will. When we ask, "What is that will primarily set on?" the answer is: God's majesty. Thus, God's will is inevitably directed against anything which would attempt to diminish that majesty or flaunt it. That is what sin tries to do. So God is against sin; he is wrath toward it.

Many people today do not like the idea of wrath. But like it or not, Scripture teaches that it is a necessary aspect of God's nature in relation to sin. The Old Testament alone has nearly six hundred important passages concerning God's wrath. His wrath is directed against injustice, corruption, and offenses against his own glory and majesty. The New Testament has equally important passages. Romans 1, for example, speaks of God's wrath revealed "against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (v. 18). Other passages speak boldly of "the wrath to come" (1 Thess. 1:10; 2:16; cf. 5:9; Rom. 2:5). The teaching of these passages is that God will not and cannot look with indifference upon the unrighteous.

A second necessity of the divine nature relating to the matter of salvation is the obligation of God to do right. This obligation is based upon God's role as ruler and judge of creation. "Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?" asked Abraham rhetorically on the occasion of God's revelation to him of the pending judgment of Sodom (Gen. 18:25). The answer was obvious: the Sovereign must do right. In fact, Abraham used this necessity to plead for the salvation of Sodom. God had told Abraham that he would destroy Sodom, and Abraham remonstrated, "Will you destroy the righteous with the wicked? Sup pose there are fifty righteous within the city: will you also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are in it? Far be it from you to do this, to slay the righteous with the wicked. Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

Here are two divine necessities pertaining to salvation: first, that God must hate sin, and second, that the Judge of the earth must do right. What is right where sin is concerned? The answer is judgment, as the destruction of Sodom indicates. True, we do not see the fullness of that judgment now, for God has largely withheld his judgment. Yet it must come. It must come later if not sooner; and when it comes, it must result in the eternal destruction of the sinner.

The Divine Solution

We know from the biblical record that God elected not to destroy every sinner. Out of his great love he decided to elect a great company to salvation. But the question arises: How can he do this without violating these two necessities of his very nature? How can he save those who actually deserve his just judgment? There is only one way: another must suffer the judgment in place of those who stand condemned. We hear that answer, and we are momentarily relieved. But then we ask, "Who?" and despair settles on us once again. Who is equal to such a task? Who is willing to do it? The answer is: God's own Son; the only One both able and willing to become man and to die for sinners.

Anselm, whom we mentioned earlier, put it like this: First, he said, salvation had to be achieved by God, for no one else could achieve it. Certainly men and women could not achieve it, for we are the ones who have gotten ourselves into trouble in the first place. We have done so by our rebellion against God's just law and decrees. Moreover, we have suffered from the effects of sin to such a degree that even our will is bound, and therefore we cannot even choose to please God, let alone actually please him. Our only hope is God, who alone has both the will and power to save. Second, said Anselm, apparently contradicting this first point, salvation must also be achieved by man, for man is the one who has wronged God and must therefore make the wrong right. Given this situation, salvation can be achieved only by one who is both God and man, that is, Jesus.

Anselm put the argument in these words: "It would not have been right for the restoration of human nature to be left undone, and ... it could not have been done unless man paid what was owing to God for sin. But the debt was so great that, while man alone owed it, only God could pay it, so that the same person must be both man and God. Thus it was necessary for God to take manhood into the unity of his person, so that he who in his own nature ought to pay and could not should be in a person who could. ...The life of this man was so sublime, so precious, that it can suffice to pay what is owing for the sins of the whole world, and infinitely more."

Only thus was it possible for God to be both 'just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus" (Rom. 3:26). This is the ultimate necessity indicated in those well-known verses in John's Gospel. "Just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up, that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life. For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him" (3:14-17). These verses say that apart from the death of Christ and faith in him, the race is lost. Given the desire of God to save us, there was just no other option.

Curse of the Cross

Yet there is still one matter. At the start of this chapter we asked, "Why was it necessary for the love of God to achieve its end in this way? Why Jesus? And why the cross?" Thus far we have answered the first half of that question; we have seen why it was necessary for the price of our salvation to be paid by Jesus. But we still have not answered why that sacrifice had to be made on Calvary. Why this death? Why this particularly horrible form of suffering?

The answer to that question is given in the Book of Galatians, in which Paul says, "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us; for it is written: 'Cursed is everyone who is hung on a tree'" (Gal. 3:13). What does this mean? Well, it is the Bible's answer to an objection to God's way of salvation that we might still make even after we have understood the nature and necessity of the atonement. We might understand that Jesus was the innocent Son of God and that he was therefore the only One who could take our place on Calvary, the just for the unjust. We might understand that God judged him in our place. "But that is still not right," we might argue. "Even if Jesus died willingly, it was still not right for God to punish one who was innocent of all wrongdoing." At this point Paul's answer comes in, for he points out that in the Old Testament there is a verse (Deut. 21:23) that pronounces a curse on anyone hanged on a tree as a means of execution. This may not have meant much to those who lived in that day, but it was part of the law of Israel. Thus, when the Lord Jesus Christ was taken and hanged on a tree, he thereby became a technical violator of the whole law (though through no fault of his own) and could be justly punished. In this way God remained just in his execution of Christ, and Christ remained innocent.

God's Love Commended

The conclusion to this study is that the achievement of our salvation at such cost flows from the love of God and that the love of God is thereby commended to us so that we might believe on Jesus. To save us it was necessary to pay this cost. Yet God did not hesitate to provide the sacrifice of his Son, so great was his love for us. Can we despise that love? Can we ignore it? The Bible says, "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

This, of course, is the bottom line of the entire discussion, and it is this that makes it meaningful. Our discussion of the necessity of the atonement has involved us in some careful theological distinctions, and some of this is admittedly difficult for some people, for not all are theologians. Yet the bottom line is not difficult at all. Let me put it like this. The week before I first preached this material in my regular exposition of John on Sunday mornings at Tenth Presbyterian Church, I was discussing these themes at the dinner table to see how the people who were there would react to them. They did very well. But at the end a ten-year-old friend of one of my daughters asked, "What is the main point of your sermon?" It was a question her parents had been teaching her to ask so she could follow the messages better, and (I think) she wanted to get a head start. I replied that the answer was a simple one; for although the theology is difficult, the point itself is not. It is simply this:

There was no other good enough To pay the price of sin;
He only could unlock the gate
Of heav'n and let us in.
O dearly, dearly has
He loved! And we must love Him too,
And trust in His redeeming blood, And try His works to do.

Christ has loved us so much that he did not hold back from doing what needed to be done. Because of this we, on our part, should serve him without reservation.

Chapter 250.
"It Is Finished"

John 19:30

One of the goals of Greek oratory, to which the Greek language generally lends itself, is to say much in few words—"to give a sea of matter in a drop of language." That goal is reached in the sixth of Christ's sayings from the cross: "It is finished!" In English this is only three words, in Greek just one. Yet this word sums up the greatest work that has ever been done. Spurgeon said, "It would need all the other words that ever were spoken, or ever can be spoken, to explain this one word. It is altogether immeasurable. It is high; I cannot attain to it. It is deep; I cannot fathom it."

We have been trying to study it, however, and to that end we have looked at, first, the nature and, second, the necessity of the atonement. In this chapter we deal with its perfection, the aspect of Christ's death that is perhaps more directly suggested by this word than any other.

Pink writes, "This was not the despairing cry of a helpless martyr; it was not an expression of satisfaction that the termination of his sufferings was now reached; it was not the last gasp of a worn-out life. No, rather was it the declaration on the part of the Divine Redeemer that all for which he came from heaven to earth to do, was now done; that all that was needed to reveal the full character of God had now been accomplished; that all that was required by the law before sinners could be saved had now been performed; that the full price of our redemption was now paid." To be sure, as Jesus spoke these words he was not yet dead. But his death was only moments away, and in any case he here speaks anticipatively of the work now done.

What did this dying utterance of the Lord mean? What was finished? How does this relate to us and our salvation?

Christ's Work Done

There are a number of things we can point to as having been finished in the moment of Christ's death. The first and most obvious one is Christ's sufferings. These had not taken him by surprise. Long before this the Lord had said, "I have a baptism to undergo, and how distressed I am until it is completed!" (Luke 12:50). Centuries before, Isaiah had written of him, "He is despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief (Isa. 53:3). Suffering marked Christ's life. He had thirsted and hungered. He had ministered for three years without even a place to lay his head. He was scorned, accused, beaten, and now subjected to the horror and indignities of the cross.

No one ever suffered as Jesus did. Yet now it is finished. No snarling enemies will spit in his face again. No soldiers will ever scourge him again. No priests will mock him. It is finished; he sits on heaven's throne, waiting until all his enemies are made his footstool. Spurgeon wrote: "Now Judas, come and betray him with a kiss! What, man, dare you not do it? Come, Pilate, and wash your hands in pretended innocency, and say now that you are guiltless of his blood! Come, ye scribes and Pharisees, and accuse him; and oh, ye Jewish mob and Gentile rabble, newly-risen from the grave, shout now, 'Away with him! Crucify him!' But see! they flee from him; they cry to the mountains and rocks, 'Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne!' Yet that is the face that was more marred than any man's, the face of him whom they once despised and rejected."

The head that once was crowned with thorns Is crowned with glory now;
A royal diadem adorns The mighty
Victor's brow.
The highest place that heav'n affords Is his,
is his by right,
The King of kings, and Lord of lords, And heav'n's eternal Light.

How glad we must be that none can despise him, that the sufferings of which the Savior's life were once full are finished.

The second thing we can point to as finished in the moment of our Lord's death was his work, that which he had been sent into the world to do. This work centered in the atonement, which we will come to in a moment, but it was more than this. It was also his entire life, undergirded by his utter obedience to the Father and filled with teachings and good works. This work was before him constantly. We are told by the author of Hebrews that on the occasion of his coming into the world he said, "Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me; with burnt offerings and sin offerings you were not pleased. Then I said, 'Here I am—it is written about me in the scroll—I have come to do your will, O God'" (Heb. 10:5-7). In John 4:34 we read, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work." He spoke of the works that God had given him to do (John 5:36) and of the words that God had given him to speak (John 8:26; 14:24). He said, "The words I say to you are not just my own. Rather, it is the Father, living in me, who is doing his work" (John 14:10). Then, in his great high priestly prayer recorded in John 17, he said, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (v. 4).

Throughout his lifetime Jesus had this work in mind, and he devoted himself to doing it. Now it is done, and he points with satisfaction: "It is finished!" None of us can say that fully of our work, but Jesus said it of his. His work was done perfectly.

The third area to which these words apply is the prophecies of his first coming. We cannot say that all the prophecies concerning the Lord are finished, for some pertain to work he is yet to do—at his second coming. But those that refer to his Gospel ministry are finished. In fact, it is in direct connection with one such prophecy that these words were spoken. Psalm 69:21 speaks of vinegar being given to the dying Messiah in his thirst. So Jesus, noticing that this had not been fulfilled, said, "I thirst," and thus provoked its fulfillment as soldiers rushed to offer him a vinegar-wine solution. Immediately afterward we read, "When he had received the drink, Jesus said, 'It is finished'" (John 19:30).

It had been prophesied that the Messiah was to be born of a woman without benefit of a human father (Isa. 7:14; Gal. 4:4). This was completed. It had been foretold that he was to be the seed of Abraham and of the line of David (Gen. 22:18; 2 Sam. 7:12-13), that he should be born in Bethlehem (Micah 5:2), and he was so born. Old Testament writers had spoken of his flight into Egypt and a subsequent return to his own land (Hosea 11:1; cf. Isa. 49:3, 6). It so happened. Christ's appearance was to be preceded by that of one like Elijah (Mal. 3:1). John the Baptist filled this role. Christ's miracles were foretold—that "the eyes of the blind" should be opened, "the ears of the deaf' unstopped, "the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing" (Isa. 35:5-6). Jesus performed all these miracles. His triumphal entry into Jerusalem had been foretold (Zech. 9:9). He was to be hated (Ps. 69:4) and rejected by his own people (Isa. 8:14). A friend would betray him (Ps. 41:9). He was to be numbered with the transgressors (Isa. 53:12), pierced through hands and feet (Ps. 22:16). Soldiers were to divide his garments and cast lots for his outer cloak (Ps. 22:18). All this had been completed. There was nothing of all that had been written of him that was left undone.

Moreover, this is not just a conclusion based on our own imperfect knowledge of the Old Testament texts. This is the teaching of Scripture itself. Three times in Scripture the very word that is used in John 19:30, translated "it is finished" (teleō), is used of this fulfillment. Luke 18:31 —'Jesus took the Twelve aside and told them, 'We are going up to Jerusalem, and everything that is written by the prophets about the Son of Man will be fulfilled.'" Luke 22:37— "I tell you that this must be fulfilled in me." Acts 13:29—"When they had carried out all that was written about him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in a tomb. But God raised him from the dead."

Certainly, nothing that was to be fulfilled in the life and ministry of the Messiah was left lacking in Jesus.

A Perfect Atonement

Having said all this, we must nevertheless add that the primary reference of these words is to the atonement. This was the acme of his sufferings, the chief of his works, and the primary focus of the prophecies. Moreover, this has major doctrinal significance; for if the work of the atonement is finished, then salvation is secured for us by God and there is nothing that we can add or hope to add to it. Indeed, we dare not attempt to add anything if we would be saved.

This is the point of the atonement that has always figured prominently in Protestant presentations of the meaning of the death of Christ, as over against Roman Catholic theology. The Roman church (and many unsound protestant churches too, for that matter) maintains that the death of Christ does not relieve the believer in Christ of making satisfaction for sins he has committed.

More precisely, it distinguishes between sins committed before and after baptism, and between temporal and eternal punishment for those sins. So far as sins committed before baptism are concerned, both the temporal and eternal punishment are blotted out through the application of the benefits of Christ's death to the individual through the baptismal rite. So far as sins committed after baptism are concerned, the eternal punishments are blotted out. But the temporal punishments require the making of satisfaction by the individual himself either in this life (through a faithful use of the sacraments and by a meritorious life) or else in purgatory. While this system of salvation allows the greater part of the work to be God's and even acknowledges that the faithfulness and merit of the believer are attained only through the prevenient grace of God, it nevertheless requires the individual to contribute to his own salvation in some measure. So it is not possible to say that the work of Christ is finished. More is needed. This outlook is evident in the Mass, in which the sacrifice of Christ is reenacted constantly.

Thus, Protestant thought has always contended rightly that "the satisfaction of Christ is the only satisfaction for sin and is so perfect and final that it leaves no penal liability for any sin of the believer." True, the believer often experiences chastisement for sins done in this life (though never in full measure to what he has deserved). But this is not satisfaction. It is discipline only; it is given to help us grow. Even in times of severe chastisement it is still true that "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1).

This is the burden of the Book of Hebrews, to give just one other biblical example. For, having demonstrated the uniqueness of Christ's person, office, and mission, the author of that book states, "But when this priest had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God. Since that time he waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy" (Heb. 10:12-14). What can be clearer than that? What can be greater? "From whatever angle we look upon his sacrifice we find its uniqueness to be as inviolable as the uniqueness of his person, of his mission, and of his office. Who is God-man but he alone? Who is great high priest to offer such sacrifice but he alone? Who shed such vicarious blood but he alone? Who entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption, but he alone?" In light of those qualities and achievement it is arrogant to think that we can add anything.

> Jesus paid it all,
> All to him I owe;
> Sin had left a crimson stain; He washed it white as snow.

"But then, what is left for us to do?" someone asks. Nothing but to believe in God's Word and trust Jesus! Jesus himself said it. When some of the Galileans asked him on the occasion of his multiplication of the loaves and fish, "What must we do to do works of God? "Jesus replied, "The work of God is this: to believe in the one he has sent" (John 6:28-29).

Pink tells a story that may be helpful in this regard. A Christian farmer, deeply concerned over an unsaved neighbor, who was a carpenter, was trying to explain the gospel, especially the sufficiency of the finished work of Christ. But the carpenter persisted in believing that he had to do something himself. One day the farmer asked his friend to make a gate for him, and when it was finished he came for it and carried it away in his wagon. He hung it on a fence in his field and then arranged for the carpenter to stop by and see that it was hung properly. The carpenter came. But when he arrived he was surprised to see the farmer standing by with a sharp axe in his hand. "What is that for?" he asked.

"I'm going to add a few strokes to your work," was the answer.

"But there's no need to do that," the carpenter protested. "The gate is perfect as it is. I did everything that was necessary." The farmer took his axe and began to strike the gate anyway, keeping at it until in a short while it was ruined. "Look what you've done," cried the carpenter.
"You've ruined my work!"

"Yes," said his friend. "And that is exactly what you are trying to do. You are trying to ruin the work of Christ by your own miserable additions to it." God used this lesson to show the carpenter his mistake, and he was led to cast himself upon what Christ had done for him.

What Work for Jesus?

Yet I must not leave the impression that, having believed on Christ, there is then nothing for the Christian to do or that his conduct after he has become a believer in Christ does not matter. Let us say clearly that nothing we have done or ever will do can enter into the satisfaction that Christ made on the cross. His work is perfect; the atonement is done. But what do we say in that case?
Do we say, "Well, if Christ has finished it, I will fold my hands and do nothing"? Not at all! Rather do we say, "If Jesus has finished such a great work for me, tell me quickly what work I can do for him."

Do we need a biblical example? We find one in Saul of Tarsus. When he was struck down on the road to Damascus, his first question concerned the identity of the One who was revealing himself to him. He asked, "Who are you, Lord?" But as soon as he had learned the answer—"I am Jesus, whom you persecute"—and had believed on the One who spoke, Paul's next question was: "Lord, what do you want me to do?" (Acts 9:5-6). Christ had a work for him to do. He was to be an apostle to bear the name of Christ "before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel" (v. 15).

This will not necessarily be your task. You are not an apostle, nor am I. But we each have a work to do. If we have been put in this world by Jesus and have not yet been taken home to be with him, we may be certain that we have not yet finished that work. So get on with it. Did he finish his work? Then you and I must finish our work too. Of course, there are discouragements. Of course, there is suffering and weakness and disappointment. But we must not give in to these. We must keep on until that moment when we, upon our deathbed, can say as did Paul, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day— and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing" (2 Tim. 4:7-8).

I leave you this challenge from the pen of Spurgeon: "As long as there is breath in our bodies, let us serve Christ; as long as we can think, as long as we can speak, as long as we can work, let us serve him, let us serve him with our last gasp; and, if it be possible, let us try to set some work going that will glorify him when we are dead and gone."

Chapter 251.
For Whom Did Christ Die?

John 19:30

For whom did Christ die? Did he die for all human beings, and thus all will be saved (the view of universalism)? Did he die for all, but, for whatever reason, not all will be saved (the view of Arminianism)? Or did he die only for certain individuals, all of whom will be saved (the view of Calvinism)? Each of these views involves problems, so that many people would rather not deal with the question. But we cannot avoid it, at least in this series of studies. It is an area of the atonement with which theology has always dealt. Besides, it is suggested by our text and by the gospel. Our text contains Christ's sixth cry from the cross, "It is finished." But what was finished? In our last study we answered that it was, above all, the atonement. But what was the atonement? Was it the actual payment of the price for the sins of some or of all people, as the result of which they are saved? Or was it potential atonement only, that is, something that makes it possible for people to be saved but that in itself saves no one?

The Gospel of John gives us the most difficult answer, for it (perhaps more than any other Gospel) presents that view of Christ's work generally known as "limited atonement." We think of John 10, in which Jesus says, "I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd gives his life for the sheep" (v. 11). A few verses later he explicitly excludes certain of his hearers from that number—"You are not my sheep" (v. 26). Similarly, in John 17 the Lord explicitly prays for those "you have given me," a phrase repeated six times with only slight variations. This phrase does not include everyone because those who have been given to Christ are carefully distinguished from "the world" (vv. 6, 9, 11-18).

It would be easier to skip this subject; but as in the matter of the necessity of the atonement, we would do so to our own hurt. Actually the subject is important and profitable; for what is at stake is nothing other than the nature of the atonement itself, as we will see when we study it.

"The World" and "All Men"

But first we must deal with a primary matter. This is the view that the whole discussion is wrongheaded simply because, so it is said, the Bible gives a clear answer to the question. Is it not true, one might ask, that the Bible often uses universal terms when speaking of Jesus' death? Take Isaiah 53:6. It says, "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all." Does this not say that all have sinned and that it is for these, all of them, that Christ died? Again, there is Hebrews 2:9, "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, now crowned with glory and honor because he suffered death, so that by the grace of God he might taste death for everyone." Or perhaps 1 John 2:2, which seems even more unmistakable. "He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world." Do these verses not teach unambiguously that Jesus died for everyone?

Not necessarily. The reason this is not necessarily the case is that the Bible habitually uses these terms in less than an inclusivistic sense. For instance, the word "world" is sometimes used of the whole fabric of heaven and earth (Job 34:13). Sometimes it refers only to the earth (Ps. 24:1; 98:7), or only to the heavens (Ps. 90:2). There are texts in which it does mean every single human being (Rom. 3:6, 19). But again, it sometimes refers only to one large group (Matt. 18:7; John 4:42; 1 Cor. 4:9; Rev. 13:3). This last is probably the dominant meaning, just as it is in our use of the same word in English. To give an example, when the Pharisees say among themselves, "Look how the world has gone after him" (John 12:19), meaning Christ, they do not mean every person on earth or even every person in Israel. They only mean a very large group of the citizens of Jerusalem. If we insist that "world" always means "every human being," we are going to have trouble explaining how under Caesar Augustus "all the world" went to be taxed. Did everyone go—barbarians, prisoners, slaves, or others outside the Roman sphere of influence?

The point we are making is that the use of words like "all men," "the whole world," and "us all" does not in itself settle the matter. Rather, the meaning of each phrase must be determined from the context. Thus, in the case of Isaiah 53:6, it can be argued very cogently that the passage is written of God's people, all of whom certainly have gone astray (which is also true of those who are not God's people) and have been redeemed (which is not true of those who are not God's people). Similarly, in Hebrews 2:9, the reference is to the "many sons" who shall be brought to glory, as specified in the very next verse. Believers in particular redemption have usually explained 1 John 2:2 in terms of John's emphasis in writing. He is trying to show that the propitiation Christ made was not for Jews only, which might be expected, but for Gentiles as well.

The point here is not whether this particular interpretation of these verses is the correct one, though I believe it is. The point is only that they may be so interpreted. Consequently, the matter of limited versus unlimited atonement must be resolved on other grounds.

The Central Question

The central question in this entire discussion is not how many verses may be lined up on one side or the other or even whether or not Christ's death has sufficient value to atone for the sins of the world. The answer to the last question is obvious: Christ's death has sufficient value to atone not only for a million worlds such as ours but more besides. The question is only: Did Christ's death actually atone for the sins of anyone? Did it actually propitiate the wrath of God toward any specific group of individuals? Did it actually reconcile any single person to God? Did it redeem anyone? If it did, whom? When the question is asked in this way we can see that there are only three possible answers:

1. Christ's death was not an actual atonement but rather that which makes atonement possible. It becomes actual when the sinner repents of sin and believes on Jesus.
2. It was an actual atonement for the sins of God's elect, with the result that these are saved.
3. It was an actual atonement for the sins of all human beings, so that all are saved.

We can dismiss the third possibility immediately, for the Bible clearly teaches that not all human beings are saved and conversely that some specifically are lost. Pharaoh is an example. So is Judas. So is the rich man in Christ's parable of the rich man and Lazarus. In Revelation we have descriptions of God's final judgment on such persons. With this possibility eliminated, the choice is between numbers one and two—an actual atonement for the specific sins of the elect and an indefinite atonement for no sins in particular. What, then, is the way in which the Bible speaks of Christ's sacrifice?

The answer has already been given in our earlier studies. We talked of sacrifice and substitution, and the point was that Christ actually became a sacrifice and substitute on the basis of which those who were appointed to salvation were saved. We talked of propitiation, reconciliation, and redemption. Each of these points to a specific aspect of that which Christ accomplished. Christ did not come to make propitiation possible; he came to propitiate God's wrath against sin. He did not come to make reconciliation possible; he came to make reconciliation. He did not come to make redemption possible; his shed blood was the price of redemption.

John Murray poses the issue like this: "The very nature of Christ's mission and accomplishment is involved in this question. Did Christ come to make the salvation of all men possible, to remove obstacles that stood in the way of salvation, and merely to make provision for salvation? Or did he come to secure the salvation of all those who are ordained to eternal life? Did he come to make men redeemable? Or did he come effectually and infallibly to redeem? The doctrine of the Atonement must be radically revised if, as atonement, it applies to those who finally perish as well as to those who are the heirs of eternal life. In that event we should have to dilute the grand categories in terms of which the Scripture defines the Atonement and deprive them of their most precious import and glory. This we cannot do. The saving efficacy of expiation, propitiation, reconciliation, and redemption is too deeply embedded in these concepts, and we dare not eliminate this efficacy. We do well to ponder the words of our Lord himself: 'I have come down from heaven, not to do my own will but the will of him who sent me. And this is the will of him who sent me, that of everything which he hath given to me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up in the last day' (John 6:38-39). Security inheres in Christ's redemptive accomplishment. And this means that, in respect of the persons contemplated, design and accomplishment and final realization have all the same extent."

This is called "limited atonement." But this is not a good designation, for all theologians limit it in one way or another. The Calvinist limits its scope. The Arminian limits its power. The question is rather: How does the Bible portray Christ's sacrifice? The answer is that it is portrayed as actually accomplishing that for which God ordained it. It is because it was actual that Christ looked upon "the suffering of his soul" and was "satisfied" (Isa. 53:11).

Belief and Unbelief

I can see only one possible way of avoiding this conclusion, and even that is not actually a possibility when it is once examined. It may be argued by someone that the atonement is actual and also for the sins of the whole world but that all are not saved, not because their sins are not atoned for, but because they do not believe in Christ and hence will not accept the gospel. "It is like a gift," the person might say. "It has been selected and paid for, but no one can be forced to take a gift. The world has been saved, but many persons will not be saved simply because they do not believe in Jesus."

Does that sound reasonable? It does until you ask about the nature of unbelief. Is it merely the morally neutral choice of deciding not to accept salvation? Or is it a sin? The answer is: a sin. In fact, it is the most damning of all sins. And this means simply that if Christ died for all sin and if this includes even the sin of unbelief (as it must if he truly died for all sin), then all are saved whether they respond to the gospel or not. Pharaoh, Judas, Muslims, Hindus, pagans will all be in heaven. John Owen, the greatest of the Puritan theologians, who did for this doctrine what Anselm did for the necessity of the atonement, wrote: "You will say, 'Because of their unbelief; they will not believe.' But this unbelief, is it a sin, or not? If not, why should they be punished for it? If it be, then Christ underwent the punishment due to it, or not. If so, then why must that hinder them more than their other sins for which he died from partaking of the fruit of his death? If he did not, then did he not die for all their sins. Let them choose which part they will." If Jesus died for all the sin of the whole human race, unbelief included, then all are saved, which the Bible denies. If he died for all the sin of the race, unbelief excluded, then he did not die for all the sins of anyone and all must be condemned. The only viable position is that he died for the sin of the elect only.

And, of course, this is what the Bible teaches.

Matthew 1:21—"You are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins."

Matthew 20:28—"The Son of man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many."

John 13:1—"It was just before the Passover Feast. Jesus knew that the time had come for him to leave this world and go to the Father. Having loved his own who were in the world, he now showed them the full extent of his love."

Galatians 3:13—"Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us."

Ephesians 5:25—"Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her."

Romans 8:28-32—"And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified. What, then, shall we say in response to this? If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?"

Repent and Believe the Gospel

Some will argue that if Christ did not take away the sins of all the world, then it is not possible for Christians to offer salvation to all indiscriminately. In fact, it is not possible to offer salvation to anyone, since we do not know whether the person is one for whom Christ died.

There are two answers. First, we are to offer salvation to everyone because we are told to do it and because we have ample biblical examples to that effect. We must say as Ezekiel, "As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that they turn from their ways and live. Turn! Turn from your evil ways! Why will you die, O house of Israel?" (Ezek. 33:11). Or as Isaiah, "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat" (Isa. 55:1). Or as Jesus, "Come to me, all you who are weary and are burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). This is our great commandment and pattern.

The second answer is that, strictly speaking, the gospel is not so much an offer that people may politely accept or refuse according to their own pleasure as it is a command to turn from sin to Jesus. We have gotten into the habit of making the gospel into an offer because this is more socially acceptable in our culture, and God clearly uses our culturally conditioned efforts. But strictly speaking, the gospel is not something lying around for people to take or leave as they choose. They are called to repent. We are to call them. Only after they repent and turn to Christ can we know that they are those for whom Christ died.

Spurgeon was a great Calvinist. He believed in limited atonement. But it did not stop him from being one of the most effective evangelists of his age. He did not lie; he did not say, "Because you all are elect, Christ died for you." It was enough to say, "You are a sinner, and Jesus died for sinners just like you and me. If you would be saved, repent and believe the gospel."

God honors truth. Therefore, we will speak the truth. And what a wonderful truth this is! We proclaim not a mere possibility of salvation, but salvation itself. We preach that Jesus died for his people. He actually died in their place. He propitiated the wrath of God for them. He reconciled them to God. He redeemed them from the terrible bondage of their own guilt and wickedness. He is therefore a sufficient and suitable Savior. If he is your Savior, you will certainly come to him. Will you not come now? Do not say, "But I am not one of the elect." You do not know that. Just come to Jesus. Jesus has done everything necessary to save sinners. Are you a sinner? Then come to Jesus. He is the Savior. Come!

Chapter 252.
Christ's Side Pierced

John 19:31-37

We have noted a strange irony in the arrest, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus: the leaders were adhering to the minutest requirements of their law while breaking its intent in hounding an innocent man to death. They would try for the open formality of two trials and an official condemnation, but they would break scores of legal safeguards and would even neglect to hear a defense for the accused. They would refuse to enter into Pilate's judgment hall lest they be defiled and be unfit to eat the Passover, but they would defile themselves with the blood of the true Passover, Jesus Christ.

"Religious scruples may live in a dead conscience," said Spurgeon. Indeed they may. In fact, they may live for a long, long time. In the incident recorded in these verses, from the moments immediately following the death of Christ, we see the same principles operating.

It was the custom of the Romans, like the Carthaginians and Persians before them, to leave the body of the crucified upon the cross to rot and be devoured by birds. But in Palestine, where many things were governed by Mosaic rather than Roman law, victims were allowed to be buried. The law said, "If a man guilty of a capital offense is put to death and his body is hung on a tree, you must not leave his body on the tree overnight. Be sure to bury him that same day, because anyone who is hung on a tree is under God's curse. You must not desecrate the land the Lord your God is giving you as an inheritance" (Deut. 21:22-23). Moreover, the law said that executions were not to take place on a religious feast day, which the Passover was. In respect for these laws (though they had shown little enough respect for the Lawgiver), the religious leaders now came to Pilate, requesting that the legs of the victims be broken to hasten their deaths. When his legs were broken, the crucified man could no longer press down with his feet in order to hoist himself upward and thus relieve the pressure on his diaphragm, and he would die quickly by suffocation.

Pilate did not care for the bodies, of course. So he granted the leaders' wishes. On his order soldiers were dispatched to break the legs of the three sufferers. The legs of the thieves were broken, but when the soldiers came to Jesus they discovered that he had already died and so did not break his legs. Instead, one of them thrust a spear into his side, presumably to make sure that he really was dead, as a result of which blood and water came forth. In these verses the writer of the Gospel records these facts, indicating that they occurred in fulfillment of the Scriptures. He draws special attention to the issue of blood and water, saying that "the man who saw it has given testimony, and his testimony is true. He knows that he tells the truth, and he testifies so that you also may believe" (v. 35).

Who Is the Witness?

This verse, in which the testimony of an eyewitness is appealed to, has puzzled commentators. The difficulty is due to that fact that the witness is not specifically identified and that it is not even possible to say for certain whether one or two individuals are involved.

Three interpretations are possible. First, the writer may be referring to himself as an eyewitness of the events he describes. Second, he may be distinguishing between himself as the author and a second party who is the witness. In that case he would be saying that the testimony of the witness is authentic or genuine (alēthinos), and that he, the author, can confirm that it is true (alēthēs). The third possibility is that the author is calling God to witness, presumably because the fact that he is recording was observed by only one individual. Moffat captures this meaning in his version, for it reads, "He who saw it has borne witness (his witness is true; God knows he is telling the truth), that you may believe." Some scholars, represented by Erasmus first and by Bultmann at the present time, vary this slightly by suggesting that the second personality is Christ.

What can be said for these views? Any one of them is possible, but the balance of evidence is probably in support of the first: that the reference in both cases is to the eyewitness, who must in turn be identified as the beloved disciple and the author of the Gospel.

It is difficult to see how the identity of the witness as the beloved disciple would have been denied at all were scholars not at one time looking for arguments to show that the apostle John was not the author of the Gospel that bears his name. To begin with, the beloved disciple has just been mentioned as being present at the cross, for it was into the keeping of this one that Jesus entrusted his mother (vv. 26-27). Again, John is the only disciple of the Twelve who is mentioned as being at the cross; he is referred to on several occasions throughout the narrative of these last hours (13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20) and is likely the unnamed disciple who secured Peter's admission to the court of the high priest. The two appear together again in John 20 and
21. So far as 19:35 is concerned, it is significant that the way of referring to the witness here is directly parallel to the last verses of the Gospel in which the "disciple whom Jesus loved" is identified as "the disciple who testifies to these things" (21:24). There is no reason to reject the further conclusion that this same disciple is also the apostle John; for on two occasions at least the beloved disciple must be identified as one of the Twelve (in the account of the Last Supper and in the closing event of chapter 21), and his close association with Peter as well as the fact that the apostle John is unmentioned by name anywhere else in the Gospel more than suggests the identification.

Some have thought it strange that, having introduced himself into the narrative in this way, the author should then add "and he knows that he tells the truth." But it is not really strange. The author (if he is John, Zebedee's son) has already been presented as a historical figure present at the crucifixion: thus, there is now every reason for him to draw attention to himself in this capacity. If this is his concern, it is possible that the solemnity with which he writes may be due, not primarily to any supposed mystical or sacramental significance of the blood and water, though it may include it, but to the fact that he can produce only one witness. He knows that normally it is on the testimony of two or three witnesses that a truth is established (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; 19:15; cf. John 8:13-18).

Blood and Water

But why should this particular incident receive the attention it does? Indeed, why should it be emphasized at all? The death of Jesus, the central point of the Gospel, has been recorded in just one verse entirely without editorial comment on John's part. Now a seemingly minor matter, the fact that the legs of Jesus were not broken and that blood and water flowed from his side when pierced, receives "disproportionate" attention. We can be sure that the emphasis is for some good reason, even though we may not know what it is. Moreover, we can be sure that it is profitable for us to examine these verses and search the meaning out.

Let me suggest three interpretations of the blood and water that I do not consider to be the right emphases and then suggest four important meanings from which we can learn.

One wrong meaning, which is nevertheless quite popular today, is that the issue of blood and water from Christ's side signifies the two sacraments. No less weighty a scholar than Oscar Cullmann has forcefully argued this. But it is not convincing. In addition to the fact that John does not really use the words "blood" and "water" in this way (though Cullmann thinks he does), it is a rather fatal defect in this interpretation that the early church did not use "water" to mean "baptism" or "blood" to signify "the Lord's Supper." This is an interpretation that arises from the perfectly understandable concerns of sacramentalists, but it is not really suggested by the Gospel.

A second wrongheaded approach is that which sees the incident mystically. That is, as Eve issued from the side of Adam, so the church issues from the side of Christ, the second Adam. That may have homiletical or devotional value, but that is not what John meant.

A third approach, which has had much popularity among certain groups of evangelicals but which I still believe to be mistaken, is medical. Over a hundred years ago a doctor in England by the name of William Stroud published a book entitled A Treatise on the Physical Cause of the Death of Christ. He argued that Jesus' death was due to a ruptured or broken heart. Such a condition may be caused by great mental agony, he argued. He said that it "is usually attended with immediate death, and with an effusion into the pericardium (the capsule containing the heart) of the blood previously circulating through that organ; which when thus extravasated, although scarcely in any other case, separates into its constituent parts, so as to present the appearance commonly termed blood and water." The trouble with this is not the validity of the explanation of how "blood and water" actually issued from Christ, though other doctors have questioned Stroud's thesis, but that the event has no meaning as Stroud explains it. The appeal of the explanation is the suggestion that Jesus died of a "broken heart." But that is not how Jesus died, according to the Gospel accounts. He died triumphantly, having dismissed his spirit. Moreover, even if the dismissal of his spirit might be assumed to have been effected by what we call a coronary thrombosis, this medical fact would be unknown to John and is therefore obviously not the reason why he has recorded it so solemnly in his narrative.

The Essential Points

Why did John record this incident? I would suggest that it was for any or all of the following reasons, each of which is suggested by the text itself or by other important New Testament passages.

1. The entire unfolding of events (which, we must remember, involved the failure of the soldiers to break the legs of Jesus as well as the piercing of his side by a spear) testified beyond any doubt that Jesus was really dead. The breaking of the legs was to hasten death, as John indicates. The only reason Jesus' legs were not broken was that he was already dead. But lest there be any doubt, the spear was thrust into his side by the soldier—all carefully recorded by the witness. Why was this important? It was important in view of the later claims regarding the resurrection. Jesus had not merely swooned to revive later in the cool of the tomb and then emerge to appear to his disciples as if he had been raised from the dead. He had really died, and he was really resurrected. This was one reason why the details were important. But they were also important in view of Gnostic teachings that had begun to infiltrate the church by the time of John's writing. The Gnostics denied that Jesus was a real man and possessed a real body. This incident proves the Gnostics wrong and shows by contrast that Jesus actually tasted death for us.

We have it in our creeds. One of the earliest Christian creeds is found in 1 Corinthians: "For what I received I passed on to you as of first importance: that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, that he was buried..." (1 Cor. 15:3-4). Similarly, the Apostles' Creed affirms that Jesus "suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried." The gospel includes a real death for sin and also a real resurrection.

2. The events John records mark the fulfillment of Scripture. If we look at the verses at face value, we can hardly miss seeing that it is this that John emphasizes. It was a remarkable fulfillment of Scripture too, because it was complicated and improbable. There were two prophecies involved: Psalm 34:20 ("He protects all his bones, not one of them will be broken") and Zechariah 12:10 ("They will look on me, the one whom they have pierced"). One was negative; the other was positive. The one said that the Savior's bones must not be broken; the other said that the Savior must be pierced. Moreover, it was the exact opposite of these two prophecies that the soldiers set out to fulfill. They had come to break Jesus' legs along with the legs of the two thieves, and they had no intention at all of piercing him with the spear. Yet they ended up fulfilling the prophecies. How can brutal men be kept from one act of violence, for which they had specific commandment, and be led to enact another for which they had no commandment? There is only one answer. By overruling circumstances, the God who inspired the prophecies made sure that they were fulfilled.

Will he not do so with all the prophecies of his Word, including those that involve us for whom Christ died? Then let us trust God's Word. Spurgeon wrote, "That our Lord's bones should remain unbroken, and yet that he should be pierced, seemed a very unlikely thing; but it was carried out. When next you meet with an unlikely promise, believe it firmly. When next you see things working contrary to the truth of God, believe God, and believe nothing else. Let God be true and every man a liar. Though men and devils should give God the lie, hold you on to what God has spoken; for heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one jot or tittle of his word shall fall to the ground."

3. The fact that Jesus' bones were not broken also points to him as the Passover Lamb slain for the sins of his people. A moment ago we quoted Psalm 34:20, which tells us, "He protects all his bones, not one of them will be broken." This is the verse John refers to; there is no other quite like it in the entire Old Testament. But if we are candid, we must admit that a careful reading of this psalm does not at once suggest that this verse should be applied to the Messiah. It refers rather to the righteous man about whom David is writing. What is wrong then? Is this a case of invention on John's part? Not at all. It is true that he is referring to this psalm, but he is thinking of something greater. He is remembering that in the institution of the Passover it was explicitly indicated that not a bone of the Passover lamb should be broken. Exodus 12:46 declares, "It must be eaten inside one house; take none of the meat outside the house.

Do not break any of the bones." Again, Numbers 9:12 says, "They must not leave any of it till morning or break any of its bones." This seemingly pointless detail in the Passover ritual and this seemingly pointless detail in the death of Jesus combine in God's providence to identify Jesus as the Passover Lamb through whom we have a spiritual deliverance.

John has seen this all along, of course, and he has described the events of the crucifixion in such a way that the timing of Christ's death at the very time the Passover lambs were being killed is kept in view. In fact, at the very beginning of this section John indicates that these things were done because it was "the day of preparation" of the Passover.

Every Jew knew the significance of the Passover. This was the event in which God delivered the people from their slavery in Egypt. God had said that on this night he would bring the last of his ten great judgments upon Egypt, a judgment in which the firstborn of every household would be killed. God would send his angel to slay the firstborn throughout the whole land. The Jewish homes would be spared only if they followed these instructions. They were to take a lamb, which was to have been kept in the home for three days and was to be without blemish or spot, and were to kill it. Then they were to take the blood of the lamb and spread it upon the doorposts and lintel of the house. The angel of death would come, but wherever he would see the blood he would "pass over," and the inhabitants of that house would be spared. This was the great national event and festival that the Jews were beginning to remember the day that Jesus of Nazareth was killed. What John is indicating (and God who speaks through him) is that Jesus is the perfect fulfillment of that important Old Testament figure. We are sinners. We deserve to die. The angel of God's judgment is coming. But Jesus has died in our place. His blood has purged our sin; now, because of his death, the angel of judgment will pass by all who trust in him.

4. This leads to the fourth reason John wrote these verses, particularly the verses that mention the water and blood. John calls attention to this incident as fulfilling the prophecy in Zechariah 12:10. Many students have stopped with that verse. But the meaning of what John is saying is to be found just five verses farther in the passage, namely Zechariah 13:1, which really belongs with the preceding section. That verse speaks of a day when "a fountain will be opened to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to cleanse them from sin and impurity." Certainly John knew this verse. Moreover, he knew from the Old Testament how important "blood" was for cleansing from sin (e.g., Lev. 17:11) and how important "water" was for purification from uncleanness. Therefore, when he saw these two elements issue from the pierced side of Christ and recalled this prophecy, he recognized it as teaching that all deliverance and cleansing from sin and its defilement are to be found in Jesus' death.

Someone else recognized it. William Cowper, the English poet, wrote the great hymn "There Is a Fountain Filled with Blood" in commemoration of this incident.

There is a fountain filled with blood Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners plunged beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains.
The dying thief rejoiced to see That fountain in his day,
And there may I, as vile as he, Wash all my sins away.
E'er since by faith I saw the stream Thy flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming love has been my theme
And shall be till I die.

Dear dying Lamb, Thy precious blood Shall never lose its power,
Till all the ransomed church of God Be saved to sin no more.

John the apostle, William Cowper, and countless others have seen these truths and have rejoiced in Christ's death as that through which we have salvation. In one sense, every believer has rejoiced in these truths, even though he or she may not have understood these particular verses as I have interpreted them. Are you one of that number? Are you one who by faith has spread the blood of the perfect Passover upon your doorpost? Have you believed in Jesus? If not, may the spear that pierced Christ's side prick your heart also. May your heart be broken as you look at him. This was John's purpose in recording these verses: that you might look to Jesus and trust him. There is salvation in such a believing look. Look to Jesus. There is life in this moment for all who believe on him.

Chapter 253.
With the Rich in His Death

John 19:38-42

The verses that conclude the nineteenth chapter of John are not the first in which we meet with secret discipleship, but they give the saddest and most striking example of that condition. Secret discipleship is discussed first in John 12, where the author, after having summarized the rejection of Jesus by his own people in accordance with Isaiah's prophecy, adds, "Yet at the same time many even among the leaders believed in him. But because of the Pharisees they would not confess their faith for fear they would be put out of the synagogue; for they loved praise from men more than praise from God" (vv. 42-43). The verses in John 12 do not name these secret believers—they were secret believers, after all. But we find two examples in John 19:38-42— Joseph of Arimathaea and Nicodemus.

We do not know a great deal about either of these men, but what we do know is significant. We know that they were each rich and prominent. Both were members of the Sanhedrin. They believed in Jesus, at least to some degree, though whether or not they were born again we cannot tell. Nicodemus had confessed at the beginning of Jesus' ministry that he was at least "a teacher from God" (John 3:2). But the fear which had kept him from coming to Jesus openly on that occasion—he came by night, a fact that John reiterates each time he mentions him—also kept him from Jesus during his earthly ministry and kept him silent while Jesus was being condemned and crucified. Joseph of Arimathaea is described as "a disciple" (John 19:38; cf. Matt. 27:57), "a prominent member of the Council, who was himself waiting for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43), "a good and upright man" (Luke 23:50). We are told that he "had not consented" to the decision of those who had condemned Jesus (Luke 23:51). Yet Joseph's protests were apparently silent ones, and we cannot really say that he was converted either. He may have been; the description is a bit more hopeful in his case than in that of Nicodemus. But we cannot be sure. Neither is mentioned again in the New Testament or in other early Christian documents.

Do you say, "But these were at least in Jerusalem caring for the body of the Lord when his more open, vocal disciples had fled"? That is true, but it says more about the failure of the Twelve than it does about the discipleship of Joseph and Nicodemus. Many memorials have been built, many stained-glass windows installed, many chairs of theology endowed by those who have come no closer to the possession of eternal life than to have a guilty conscience. Are you one who is like Nicodemus or this counselor from Arimathaea? If so, I hope to disturb you by showing how close you are to those millions who adhere to Christianity but have no saving faith at all. I hope to move you to become something more in Christ's church than a funeral director. I should like you to become a witness to the living God.

How will I do this? In two ways. I want to show first the cause of secret discipleship, and also how unnecessary and dangerous this is. Then I want to show the sad results of a failure to confess Christ openly.

Fear of the Jews

There is no mystery as to what kept Joseph of Arimathaea and Nicodemus from confessing Jesus. It was fear, "fear of the Jews," as John tells us. When I read this explanation in John 19, I cannot help contrasting it with the slightly different explanation John 12 gives of the same failure to confess Jesus openly. There it was said that many did not confess him because "they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God" (v. 43). That leads me to think that fear of ridicule lives on as a deterrent even after the vanity of seeking praise from others is gone.

We may suppose that in their early days Joseph and Nicodemus may have pursued the kind of life they did in order to be well thought of. Certainly many do it today. Some seek it through wealth, because the rich are generally courted by the less fortunate. Some seek it through prestigious titles and positions—by being a member of the Sanhedrin or city council or bar or civic organization. But these things fade in time, and perceptive people are eventually disillusioned by the emptiness of human honors. What then? Do they come to their senses and abandon vanity for things that are worthwhile? Sometimes, but not always or even usually. The reason most do not is that fear of what others may think or do deters them. Many who would not fail to confess Christ because of their desire for praise, nevertheless fail to confess him because they think that someone might despise them or laugh them to scorn.

Alexander Maclaren has excellent thoughts on this subject. 'There is nothing in the organization of society at this day to make any man afraid of avowing the ordinary kind of Christianity which satisfies the most of us; rather it is the proper thing with the bulk of us middleclass people, to say that in some sense or other we are Christians. But when it comes to a real avowal, a real carrying out of a true discipleship, there are as many and as formidable, though very different, impediments in the way today, from those which blocked the path of these two cowards in our text. In all regions of life it is hard to work out into practice any moral conviction whatever. How many of us are there who have beliefs about social and moral questions which we are ashamed to avow in certain companies for fear of the finger of ridicule being pointed at us?... The political, social, and moral conflicts of this day have their 'secret disciples,' who will only come out of their holes when the battle is over, and will then shout with the loudest."

Why is it that in a day when every vice of humanity is coming "out of the closet" and clamoring for recognition as a pure and natural expression of the essentially "good" human spirit, many believers (or alleged believers) fail to come out for Christ? It is fear, fear of what someone may say.

How unnecessary and dangerous this is! It is unnecessary because there is no danger in ridicule. It may be unpleasant, distasteful. We may naturally prefer a different treatment from our contemporaries and peers. But there is no danger in it. In fact, the opposite is true. When we take a stand for righteousness, we are most secure. It is when we are silent that we are most in danger, not only in this life but in regard to the life that is to come.

If you are holding back from an outright confession of Christ and a determination to stand with him whatever may come, you are probably rationalizing your failure in this fashion. You are saying, "My testimony will not do any good. What matters is that I am God's child, and I can be that in silence." Can you? Can you have confidence that you are really born again if you will not confess Christ openly? You know the Scriptures: "If anyone comes after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me" (Luke 9:23); "Whoever does not take up his cross and follow me cannot be my disciple" (Luke 14:27); "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:9-10); "Whoever acknowledges me before men, I will also acknowledge him before my Father in heaven. But whoever disowns me before men, I will also disown him before my Father in heaven" (Matt. 10:32-33).

If you do not confess Christ openly and stand with him even in the face of ridicule, I do not see what right you have to consider yourself any different from Pontius Pilate, for it was fear that kept him back from righteousness. Do you respect Christ? So did Pilate. Do you honestly want to do the right thing? So did he. Do you say, "I find no fault in Jesus"? This was Pilate's testimony. But his fear of Caesar triumphed over his more noble instincts. Be careful that you are not following in his train.

Loss of Communion

It may be the case that you really are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, though for the most part secretly. If so, I want to encourage you to an early boldness by showing the sad results of failing to proclaim Christ openly.

The first result is a loss of fellowship with Christ. I think it is this that comes through most clearly in the case of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea. We do not know when Joseph first heard of Jesus and believed on him, but it was probably early. Nicodemus knew of Jesus from the beginning, for he had come to him when his teachings and miracles had first became known. These men might have profited from two, perhaps three years of the most intense communion and fellowship with Jesus. They could have learned from his teaching, benefited from his example, received instruction from him directly as to how the advance of the kingdom of God in the world was to be carried out. We are told of Joseph that he was actually "waiting for the kingdom of God." Yet he missed it—because he would not confess Christ openly.

Again I quote Maclaren. "Any neglected duty puts a film between a man and his Savior; any conscious neglect of duty piles up a wall between you and Christ. Be sure of this, that if from cowardly or from selfish regard to position and advantages, or any other motive, we stand apart from him, and have our lips locked when we ought to speak, there will steal over our hearts a coldness, his face will be averted from us, and our eyes will not dare to seek, with the same confidence and joy, the light of his countenance. What you lose by unfaithful wrapping of your convictions in a napkin and burying them in the ground is the joyful use of the convictions, the deeper hold of the truth by which you live, and before which you bow, and the true fellowship with the Master whom you acknowledge and confess."

Besides, it is not only communion with Christ that you lose. You also lose that blessed and valuable communion that you should and must have with other Christians. They are with Christ; if you are not with him, you are not with them either and you will suffer for it. An ember isolated from other embers soon burns out and is nothing but dead ashes. Place it near others and the flame soon grows and sets other wood burning. If you have never learned this before, put it down as a great and unalterable principle: Christians need other Christians. You need them. If you think you do not, you are either a fool or hopelessly proud or arrogant.

I think I can hear some objections. The first is that Christians are often a very sorry bunch. True, but is that not also the case with you, particularly if you are a secret believer? I will tell you one thing: If you refuse to identify with other believers because you think they are sorry specimens of discipleship, you are actually considering yourself superior and that is a very questionable stance for one who is supposed to have confessed his sin and turned from all self-righteousness to faith in Jesus Christ. If you really are a sinner, then you belong with those sinners for whom Christ died. If you consider yourself better than they are, what makes you think that you have actually been born into God's family?

Again, what company have you found that is superior? That of unbelievers? The world? If you are thinking along those lines, you are a great fool, for it is the world that, for all its supposed glamour and sophistication, crucified your Master. What makes you think it will treat you more kindly when once it finds that you belong to him?

I hear another objection. You say that you would like to come out for Christ but that others whom you love and respect—perhaps a husband or wife, children or parents—are holding you back. Held back by those you love? I do not see how you can say that you love them if you are unwilling to take that one stand which by the grace of God is most likely to be used by him in their conversions. More than in any other way God's grace spreads through families. If you love them, you will come out for Christ and then look to him for help in bringing them to that same belief and profession.

There are those who have done it. I think of one girl who became a Christian in Philadelphia and then went home at considerable personal loss to reach her parents for Christ. They are now believers and leaders in the Christian community in which they live. I think of another girl, a Filipino, who returned to an island village in which there was not even one single Christian. But she identified with Christ, and many have now come to know him.

Drawn by Love

I know that it is not arguments of this kind that will ultimately reach you. It is only love for Christ himself, love that will be generated at Christ's cross.

Here I may be encouraging, for it was obviously the death of Christ that brought cowardly Joseph and weak Nicodemus from their places of hiding. It is true, much to their shame, that during the days of his ministry they had failed to profess Christ openly. But in his death—at the precise moment when even the other, bolder disciples had fled—these came forward, touched by that loving sacrifice which Jesus made for our salvation. They awoke to their cowardice—and to God's love. Again, I do not say that they were necessarily believers. Guilty consciences have done as much on many similar occasions. But the death of Christ obviously awakened something within them, and they seemed willing at last to identify themselves as his followers.

God can do that with you, if you will but look on Christ's passion. The Bible says, "God demonstrates his love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). It is in Christ's death that we see God's love. Does that not move you? True, you may have held back before, hardly knowing whether you were a true believer or not. But you can come forward. He died for you. He paid the price for your sin. He bore the anguish of the cross for your salvation. How can you fail to love him? If you love him, how can you fail to confess that to everyone?

I will give you one more incentive. Notice that in his burial Jesus is already taking the first step toward that exaltation at God's hand that is now his, from which he shall come forth in power at the end of the age. There was a true day of the jackal when men cursed and laughed and hated and spit upon him. There was a day of humiliation, but that day is now past. It ended with his death. Now even in his burial he is attended with love as those who have the means to care for his body and bury him honorably wait upon him. It was prophesied. Isaiah tells us that although he was to die in the company of the wicked he was to be attended by the rich in his death (Isa. 53:9). Besides, this is now followed by resurrection victory and the ascent to heaven.

The Christ you are asked to follow is not a humiliated Jewish preacher but the Lord of glory. Indeed, he does not merely ask you to come to him; he commands it. He tells you to turn from your sin and come to him openly for salvation. Will you do that? Will you come? "The Spirit and the bride say, 'Come!' And let him who hears say, 'Come!' Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take the free gift of the water of life" (Rev. 22:17).

Chapter 254.

The Not-Quite-Empty Tomb

John 20:1-10

One of the great historical evidences of Jesus' resurrection is the empty tomb. But the remarkable and startling fact is that when Peter and John arrived at the tomb on the first Easter morning, it was not quite empty. The body of Jesus was gone, but something was still there: the graveclothes. Something about them so struck John, at least, that he believed in the resurrection.

Significantly, this is the first time a disciple indicated belief in the resurrection. During the last century a well-known French critic of the Gospels, Ernest Renan, argued that Christian faith in the resurrection was the result of the rumors spread by Mary Magdalene, who had suffered a hallucination, thinking she had seen Jesus. But Mary could not have suffered a hallucination. The last thing in the world she ever expected was her Lord's resurrection. And John testifies that he believed some time before Mary returned to the tomb and met Jesus.

Events of Easter Morning

Jesus had been crucified either on Friday (as the church has generally believed) or else on Thursday (which is less widely held but which seems to fit the evidence better). He lay in the tomb until the resurrection, which certainly took place before dawn on Sunday morning. At this point the women came to the tomb from Jerusalem bearing spices to anoint his body. There were at least four women and probably more. Matthew says that the group included Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, that is, Mary the mother of James. Mark adds that Salome was present. Luke says that Joanna was also along and others. These women started out while it was yet dark and arrived at the tomb in the early dawn when it was difficult to distinguish objects.

On reaching the tomb the women were astonished to find the stone removed from the entrance.

We must imagine them standing about, afraid to go too close and wondering what had happened. Who moved the stone? Had the body of Jesus been stolen? Had Joseph of Arimathaea removed it to another place? What were they to do? At last they decided that the disciples must be told, and Mary Magdalene was dispatched to find them. Not one of them imagined that Jesus had been raised from the dead.

After awhile it began to grow lighter and the women grew bolder. They decided to look into the tomb. There they saw the angels. The women were afraid. But an angel said, "Do not be afraid, for I know that you are looking for Jesus, who was crucified. He is not here; he has risen, just as he said. Come and see the place where he lay. Then go quickly and tell his disciples" (Matt. 28:5-7).

Mary meanwhile found the two chief disciples, Peter and John, presumably in John's house where the beloved disciple had taken Jesus' mother on the day of the crucifixion (John 19:27).

The two disciples started for the tomb, running and leaving Mary far behind. Outrunning Peter, John arrived at the tomb first, stooped to look through the narrow opening, and saw the graveclothes. Then Peter arrived, out of breath and in a hurry; he brushed John aside and plunged into the tomb. When John saw the graveclothes, he saw them only in a cursory manner and from outside the tomb. The Greek uses the most common word for seeing (blepō); it suggests nothing more than sight. But when Peter arrived he scrutinized the graveclothes carefully. The Scripture uses a special word (theoreō) for what Peter did (from it we get our words "theory" and "theorize"). Moreover, it tells what Peter saw. The Bible says that Peter "went into the tomb. He saw the strips of linen lying there, as well as the burial cloth that had been around Jesus' head. The cloth was folded up by itself, separate from the linen" (John 20:6-7). At this point John entered, saw what Peter had seen (this time the word is oraō, meaning "to see with understanding"), and believed in Jesus' resurrection (v. 8).

After this the appearances of the Lord began. Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene who arrived back at the tomb after John and Peter had returned to the city. Next he appeared to the women, then to Peter alone, then to the Emmaus disciples, finally, later that night, to all the disciples as they were gathered together in the upper room. All the disciples who saw the risen Lord believed. But John believed first, and he did so before he actually saw Jesus. What made him believe? What did he see that convinced him of Jesus' resurrection?

Jewish Burial

It is helpful at this point to know something about the modes of Jewish burial. Every society has its distinct modes of burial. In Egypt, bodies were embalmed. In Rome and Greece they were often cremated. In Palestine they were neither embalmed nor cremated. They were wrapped in linen bands that enclosed dry spices and placed face up without a coffin in tombs, generally cut from the rock in the Judean and Galilean hills. Many of these tombs exist today and can be seen by any visitor to Palestine.

Another factor of Jewish burial in ancient times is also of special interest for understanding John's account of Jesus' resurrection. In The Risen Master, published in 1901, Henry Latham calls attention to a unique feature of Eastern burials that he noticed when in Constantinople during the last century. He says that funerals he witnessed often varied in many respects, depending upon whether the funeral was for a person who had been poor or for one who had been rich. But in one respect all the arrangements were identical. Latham noticed that the bodies were wrapped in linen cloths in such a manner as to leave the face, neck, and upper part of the shoulders bare. The upper part of the head was covered by a cloth that had been twirled about it like a turban. Latham concluded that since burial styles change slowly, particularly in the East, this mode of burial may well have been practiced in Jesus' time. He argued that this is all the more probable since the practice in 1900 meshes nicely with what is told of the graveclothes in John's Gospel.

There is additional evidence for this thesis. Luke tells us that when Jesus was approaching the village of Nain earlier in his ministry, he met a funeral procession leaving the city. The only son of a widow had died. Luke says that when Jesus raised him from death two things happened. First, the young man sat up; that is, he was lying upon his back on the bier without a coffin. Second, he began to speak. Hence, the graveclothes did not cover his face. Separate coverings for the head and body were also used in the burial of Lazarus (John 11:44).

We have every reason to believe that Joseph of Arimathaea and Nicodemus buried Jesus Christ in a similar manner. The body of Jesus was removed from the cross before the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, washed and wrapped in linen bands. Seventy-five pounds of spices were carefully inserted into the folds of the linen. Aloe was a powdered wood like fine sawdust with an aromatic fragrance; myrrh was a fragrant gum that would be carefully mixed with the powder. Jesus' body was encased in these. His head, neck, and upper shoulders were left bare and a linen cloth was wrapped about the upper part of his head like a turban. The body of Jesus was then lovingly placed within the sepulcher where it lay until sometime on Saturday night or early Sunday morning.

The Resurrection

What would we have seen had we been there at the moment at which Jesus was raised from the dead? Would we have seen Jesus stir, open his eyes, sit up, and begin to struggle out of the bandages? That would have been a resuscitation, not a resurrection. It would have been as if he had recovered from a swoon or had merely been raised from death as he had raized Lazarus. He would have been raised in a natural body rather than a spiritual body; that was not the case at all.

If we had been present in the tomb at the moment of the resurrection, we would have noticed either that the body of Jesus would have seemed to have disappeared or else that it was changed into a resurrection body and passed through the graveclothes and out of the sealed tomb just as it was later to pass through closed doors. John Stott says that the body was "vaporized, being transmuted into something new and different and wonderful." Latham says that the body would have been "exhaled," passing "into a phase of being like that of Moses and Elias on the Mount."

What would have happened then? The linen cloths would have subsided once the body was removed because of the weight of the spices that were in them, and they would have been lying undisturbed where the body of Jesus had been. The cloth which surrounded the head, without the weight of spices, might well have retained its concave shape and have lain by itself separated from the body cloths by the space where the Lord's neck and shoulders had been.

This is exactly what John says he and Peter saw when they entered the sepulcher. John was first at the tomb, and as he reached the open sepulcher in the murky light of early dawn he saw the graveclothes lying. There was something about them that attracted John's attention. First, it was significant that they were there at all. John stresses the point, using the word for "lying" at an emphatic position in the sentence. We might translate, "He saw, lying there, the graveclothes" (v. 5). Furthermore, the clothes were undisturbed. The word that John uses (keimena) occurs in the Greek papyrii of things that have been carefully placed in order. One document speaks of legal documents, saying, "I have not yet obtained the documents, but they are lying collated." Another speaks of clothes that are "lying (in order) until you send me word." Certainly John noticed that there had been no disturbance at the tomb.

At this point Peter arrived and went into the sepulcher. Peter saw what John had seen, but in addition he was struck by something else. The cloth that had been around the head was not with the other clothes. It was lying in a place by itself (v. 7). What was even more striking, it had retained a circular shape. John says that it was "wrapped together." We might say that it was "twirled about itself." There was a space between it and the cloths that had enveloped the body. When John saw this he believed.

What did John believe? I imagine that he might have explained it to Peter like this. "Don't you see, Peter, that no one has moved the body or disturbed the graveclothes? They are lying exactly as Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea left them on the eve of the Sabbath. Yet the body is gone. It has not been stolen. It has not been moved. Clearly it must have passed through the cloths, leaving them as we see them now. Jesus must be risen." Stott says, "A glance at these grave clothes proved the reality, and indicated the nature, of the resurrection."

How foolish in the light of such evidence are non-Christian explanations of the events of Easter morning. Some have taught that the body of Jesus was stolen, but in that case the presence of the graveclothes is inexplicable. They would have been removed along with the body. Others have taught that Jesus revived in the tomb and escaped after having unwound the linen bands. In that case the linen would have been displaced. Even if we can imagine that Jesus replaced the clothes where they had been and somehow moved the stone, there is still a problem with the spices, for these would have been scattered about the tomb. Of this there is not the slightest suggestion in the Gospel. None of these explanations will do. The disciples saw everything in order, but the body was gone. Jesus had indeed been raised, and in a resurrection body.

What John Believed

There are a few lessons that arise out of this narrative. The first is that God has provided perfectly adequate evidence of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. The evidence consists of the claims of those who saw Jesus between the day of his resurrection and the day of his ascension into heaven, the empty tomb, the changed character of the disciples, the authenticity of the records, and the evidence of the undisturbed burial garments. The evidence is there, and the evidence of the graveclothes alone was sufficient to quicken faith in John. We conclude that if men fail to believe, it is because they will not believe, not because the evidence is lacking.

Second, the experiences of Peter and John at the tomb indicate that the body of the Lord was glorified. It was sown a natural body and was raised a spiritual body. In this body Jesus lives, seated at the right hand of God where he intercedes for his own until the moment when he will return again in judgment. Today we need not think of Jesus as the vulnerable Jesus of history. Jesus died, but he died once for all. He was buffeted and spat upon and cursed, but that will not be repeated. We pray today to a powerful Lord, to an exalted Lord. This Lord will return one day to take his own to be with him in glory.

Finally, the transformation of the body of Jesus Christ points to a new mode of life for all believers. He is the first fruit. We, the harvest, shall be like him in our bodies as well as in his traits of character. Our resurrection bodies will be better than our old physical bodies. They will not be our physical bodies resuscitated. Our bodies hamper us. They tie us to earth, to habits, even to traits of character that we have inherited from our parents through their genes. They slow our thought processes. When we are sufficiently tired they carry us away in sleep. Eventually they die. But we are to gain by death. The resurrection body will not hamper us. The body of the risen Christ is the forerunner of our bodies, and it was and is wholly subservient to his wishes. It did not hamper him. It freed him. In that body he knew no pain, no suffering, no want. For us there will also be freedom. There will be no want. There will be unlimited awakefulness and unlimited opportunities for service.

In one of his great sermons on the resurrection D. L. Moody tells the story of a bright young girl about fifteen years of age who was suddenly cast upon a bed of suffering, completely paralyzed on one side and nearly blind. She could hardly see, but she could hear. As she lay in bed one day she heard the family doctor say to her parents as they stood by the bedside, "She has seen her best days, poor child." Fortunately the girl was a believer, and she quickly replied, "No, doctor, my best days are yet to come, when I shall see the King in his beauty." Her hope, like ours, lay in the resurrection.

Chapter 255.

The Day Faith Died

John 20:11-16

If there is any story in all literature more poignant than the story of Mary Magdalene's meeting with Jesus in the garden on the first Lord's day, I do not know what it is. But to understand it we have to put ourselves in the frame of mind of the disciples between the afternoon of Jesus' crucifixion and the morning of his resurrection, and that is not easy to do. Our experience of Easter is one of faith and joy. But in the days that elapsed between Christ's death and resurrection, those who were closest to him were filled with the deepest disillusionment and gloom. They had been told of Christ's resurrection, but they had not understood it. Therefore, when Jesus died, there is a sense in which they died also.

For three years this mixed body of men and women had followed Jesus in his itinerant preaching ministry. They did not understand much of what he said. But they tried to, and what they did understand they believed. When Jesus died, their faith died, and they began to demonstrate the death of faith by scattering back to where they had been before Jesus had called them to discipleship. The women went home. Cleopas and Mary returned to their village. The others would have returned to Galilee eventually, for they did this anyway even after they had been convinced of Christ's resurrection. In earlier days they had given good testimonies—"You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16), "We believe and are sure that you are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (John 6:69)—but in the period between the crucifixion and the resurrection this had become past tense. They had believed once, but it was over.

I Will Not Believe

No one better illustrates the death of faith than Thomas. We are not told much about him, only that he was inclined to a very sober estimate of things. We call him "doubting Thomas," but to speak accurately, he was no doubter at this point. He was an outright unbeliever. Alexander

Maclaren has written, "Flat, frank, dogged disbelief, and not hesitation or doubt, was his attitude. The very form in which he puts his requirement shows how he was hugging his unbelief, and how he had no idea that what he asked would ever be granted. 'Unless I have so-and-so I will not,' indicates an altogether [different] spiritual attitude from what 'If I have so-and-so, I will,' would have indicated. The one is the language of willingness to be persuaded, the other is a token of a determination to be obstinate."

It was not a very commendable attitude, but thus it was. And thus it was with all the disciples— before the resurrection.

We Had Hoped

Moreover, it was not only faith that had died in these disciples; hope had died also. They had possessed such great hopes. Yet all these had been dashed into pieces by Christ's crucifixion.

The great example of the death of hope is the statement of the Emmaus disciples recorded in Luke 24:21, though it was, of course, true of them all. Like the others, these two disciples had looked for the dawning of Messiah's reign upon earth. They thought that Jesus was that Messiah; so they had followed him, looking for a place in his kingdom. But now the inconceivable had happened. Jesus had died, and their hopes had died with him. So clouded were their minds by this disappointment that they did not even recognize the Lord when he drew near them on the Emmaus way. He asked what they had been talking about and why they were sad. They answered, "Are you only a visitor to Jerusalem and do not know the things that have happened there in these days?"

"What things?"

They answered, "About Jesus of Nazareth. He was a prophet, powerful in word and deed before God and all the people. The chief priests and our rulers handed him over to be sentenced to death, and they crucified him; but we had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel" (Luke 24:17-21). Isn't it interesting that they used the word "redeem," because, of course, that is precisely what the Lord was doing —redeeming Israel, and all who should thereafter believe on him as Savior from sin. But that is not what they were thinking. They were thinking of the national, temporal, messianic redemption upon which their hopes had been set throughout the three years of his ministry. They had hoped for that, but when Jesus died they knew at last that it was not coming.

Love Lives

Faith had died and hope had died. But there was one thing that had not died—love. For in spite of their cruel disillusionment and virtual despair, the disciples all still loved their Master and could not cease thinking of him and grieving over him. The great example is Mary.

We do not know a great deal about Mary of Magdalene. But we must be careful to distinguish what we do know from those spurious details that have been added to the account by years of tradition. The Bible tells us that Mary had been the object of Christ's special grace, and that he had sent seven demons out of her (Luke 8:2). For no sound reason at all, church tradition identified her with the unnamed sinner of Luke 7, who anointed the feet of Jesus in the house of a wealthy Pharisee—probably because Mary of Bethany later did the same thing in the house of Lazarus, and there was a confusion of these two accounts and the two Marys. After this she was assumed to have been a prostitute before Christ saved her, and by the seventeenth century "Magdalene" was being used as a word to describe a reformed prostitute. We do not know whether this was her case or not. But Christ had saved her from something terrible, and she had learned to love him. Jesus said that the one who has been forgiven much, loves much (Luke 7:47). This was true of Mary. Thus, earlier in Jesus' ministry we learn that she ministered to him out of her substance (Luke 8:3), and we find that at the end she is still trying to do this by anointing his body.

We will never understand the account of Christ's appearance to Mary at the tomb unless we recognize that it was love, and only love, that brought her here. She had possessed faith once, as had the others. She had hoped. But now faith and hope were gone. Only love caused her to seek the body and held her close to the tomb.

Mary was one of the group of women who had been in Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion and who had therefore witnessed the Lord's agonies. We read on three separate occasions that she was among those women who saw the crucifixion (Matt. 27:55-56; Mark 15:40; John 19:25). No doubt she witnessed the other events as well—the roar of the crowd as, goaded by the priests, they shouted, "Take him away! Crucify him! Crucify him!"; the judgment of Pilate; the procession to Calvary, during which time Christ fell under the weight of the cross and had to be relieved of it by Simon of Cyrene in order that the death march might proceed; the driving of the nails; the terrible cries ("I thirst"; "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"); the darkness; the earthquake; at last death. Mary witnessed all this. It would have been a severe strain on even the strongest of men. Who could stomach such things? Yet, through it all, there is Mary. What keeps her there? Not curiosity, certainly. Not faith. Not hope in a miracle. Mary is there only because she loves Jesus and consequently will not leave until the end.

And even then her love lived on, for though Jesus was gone, Mary still wished to do something for him. She determined to buy spices, and the others agreed. They did this just before the shops closed for the Passover Sabbath. The Sabbaths went by, first the Passover Sabbath (which, in that year, probably fell on a Friday) and then the regular Saturday Sabbath. Thus, it was on the following Sunday morning that Mary and the other women made their way to the tomb to perform their last services. They knew that the stone had been placed over the entrance to the burial cave, for they were asking, "Who will roll away the stone for us from the door of the tomb?" If we ask, "But then how did they expect to anoint the body?" the answer is that they did not know. They hoped that someone might be there to move the stone, but they were not really thinking clearly at that point.

Upon reaching the graveyard they noticed that the stone had been moved. It suited their purpose, but it was not what they had been expecting. So they stopped and asked themselves what they should do. At last they decided that the disciples, Peter and John, should be told. So Mary was either dispatched or else volunteered to tell them. While she was gone (and, therefore, unknown to her), the remaining women went forward, saw and heard the angels, and then rushed off in amazement to convey the angels' message: "He is not here. He is risen, just as he said" (Matt. 28:6). Shortly after they had gone, Peter and John arrived, having received Mary's message and then raced to the tomb.

Where was Mary? She had been left behind by Peter and John, gentlemen that they were! But that did not disturb her, for her mind was on Jesus. Quite naturally she set out for the tomb once more.

I wonder if you can identify with the strain this woman was under. She had seen the person she loved most in all the world taken from her and brutally executed. She had planned to perform some last rites on the body, but this had been frustrated, at least temporarily. She had been going back and forth from the city to the tomb in the dark or semidark for what must have seemed hours. Now she arrives back at the tomb to find Peter and John and the other women gone. She is alone, totally deserted, and it is beyond her emotional capacity. She bursts out weeping. Undoubtedly she had wept before, at the crucifixion. The days of the Sabbaths had been filled with weeping. How she could find more tears is almost beyond understanding. But there were some. It is therefore with tear-filled eyes that she looks into the sepulcher and sees the angels.

"Woman, why are you crying?" they ask her.

She answers, "They have taken my Lord away, and I don't know where they have put him." Mary is not startled by the angels, as the women who preceded her were. Perhaps she did not even recognize that they were angels. We read, therefore, that "at this, she turned around and saw Jesus standing there" (John 20:14).

Rabboni

Mary did not recognize Jesus, even after he had spoken to her. It is foolish to ask why she didn't recognize him. Later when he presented himself to the Emmaus disciples, they did not recognize him either; so perhaps his appearance was changed. Besides, Mary was not seeing clearly, and she certainly did not expect the resurrection. "Woman, why are you crying? Who is it you are looking for?" It was the voice of Jesus, but Mary did not recognize it. She imagined that the One speaking to her was the gardener.

Mary answered in what is surely one of the most touching sentences in all human literature. "Sir, if you have carried him away, tell me where you have put him, and I will get him."

Barnhouse writes of this poignant offer, "She was still thinking in terms of a dead body. She had been weeping for three days and three nights and her heart was empty even though she still had a few tears left. She had passed through unutterable anguish and had been for many hours without sleep. She had been three times out to the tomb and twice back to the town. [Now] she offered to carry away the full weight of the body of a man, plus the hundred pound weight of myrrh and aloes. The Bible tells us that the body had been anointed with one hundred pounds of spices which Nicodemus had wrapped in the linen which enshrouded the body (John 19:39). Even if Jesus were slight of weight, Mary was offering, without thinking, to carry away a weight of body and linen cloth and ointments which would go beyond the strength of many a strong man. But she did not think of this for she loved the Lord Jesus Christ, and though her faith and hope were dead, her love was strong. Here is one of the greatest character portrayals in all of literature, human or divine. Here is the heart of a good woman. Here is love, offering to do the impossible as love always does."

At this point Mary must have turned her back on Christ once again; for later, after he had called her name, we read that she turned back to him. She was not interested in the gardener. She had made her request of him in her grief and confusion. But her heart was still true to the Lord, and she turned back to the tomb where she had seen his body last.

"Mary!"

"Rabboni (Master)!"

As Mary responded to his pronunciation of her name, she turned back to Christ again. When she had supposed him to be only the gardener, she had no interest in him or anything he might say. But now she had heard her name from Jesus' lips; and as sheep know the voice of their shepherd when he calls them by name, so she recognized him and responded joyfully, "Master!" In that moment Mary experienced her own resurrection, for she was reborn. Faith had died, but now it came leaping from its tomb. Hope had evaporated, but now it gathered again around the person of the Lord.

The Greatest of These

You may be one who has never known any of these three responses to Jesus Christ—neither faith nor hope nor love. You say that you cannot believe, that you have no grounds for hope, that you do not see how you can love him. If this is your case, may I suggest that you begin with love. Begin with the knowledge that he loves you. That love is shown by his death for you. He commends his love to you by this fact. The Book of Romans says, "But God demonstrates his love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). Can you not focus on his death on your behalf and love him for that? I am convinced that if you do focus on his death, you will hear him call your name and, when he does, you will recognize him and respond gladly.

'John! Mary! Peter! Alice! James! (Whatever your name is!)"

"Master!" In that moment faith will be born in you and hope will triumph. You will be his forever.

Faith, hope, and love! Three great virtues! "But the greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13).

Chapter 256.
New Relationships for a New Age

John 20:17

In the last century the well-known German historian Adolf Harnack made popular a phrase that in his judgment summed up the whole of Christianity: "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man." This, said Harnack, is the teaching of the Scriptures. We all have one father, and we are all brothers and sisters in the one family of God, which is the human race.

Harnack should have known better than that, for in defining the message of the Bible in this way he made two fundamental errors. First, the use of the word "Father" for God and the words "brother" and "sister" for men and women occurs only in reference to believers. God is not said to be the Father of all men, nor are all men and women said to be brothers and sisters. In fact, as in the case of Christ's conversation with the rulers of his day (found in John 8), some persons are said to be children of their "father the devil" (John 8:44). We are all God's offspring, as Paul indicated in speaking to the Athenians (Acts 17:28). We are his creatures. But only those who believe on Christ are said to be children of their heavenly Father.

Second, Harnack erred in failing to see that the relationships of which the Bible speaks are not things intrinsic to humanity but rather something new that has been established by the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

This latter truth is particularly evident in the verses to which we come now, because in these verses, for the first time and therefore significantly following his death and resurrection, Jesus begins to introduce these themes into his teaching. He had spoken of God as Father before, but not in this way. Before this he had not referred to the disciples as brothers at all. Now because of the new age of the church that he had ushered in, he also ushers in a new set of relationships.

It is interesting to contrast what Jesus did as he entered into his kingdom with what another king, mentioned in literature, did as he entered into his. The king is Henry V, whose character is carefully analyzed by Shakespeare in the three plays Henry IV, Part 1, Henry TV, Part 2, and Henry V. In his youth the young prince Hal had friends who were not a credit to him. They were low types, the kind who spent their time drinking, gambling, and running around with loose women. The best known of these lowly companions was John Falstaff about whom other plays were written. In these days Henry did not live like a king. But the time came when he ascended the throne and, although his friends thought that now they would be ushered into the palace and be able to carry on their dissolute life under the king's protection, the new king turned his back on them and began to conduct himself as worthy of his new position.

In a similar way our Lord had what we might call "low" companions during the days of his earthly ministry, though of course he did not defile himself through his association with them. But by contrast, when he entered into glory through his death, resurrection, and ascension, he did not turn his back on his companions but rather ushered them into relationships that before this were uniquely his own. Now God becomes their Father as well as his, and they are given family privileges.

A Problem Text

There are three new relationships in this verse: a new relationship to Christ, a new relationship to the Father, and a new relationship to one another. But this is a problem verse, and it is only when we understand the importance of the first of these new relationships, the new relationship to Christ, that we can begin to sort out the difficulties.

The main difficulty is that the Lord tells Mary Magdalene, "Do not hold on to me, for I have not yet returned to the Father." Yet we know from a parallel incident in Matthew that he apparently allowed the other women who had been to the tomb to touch him just a few minutes later on the same day (Matt. 28:9). Again, we might ask, "Why shouldn't Mary touch him?" This would have been the most natural thing in the world, and it seems harsh to our way of thinking to have Jesus rebuke her or stop her obvious act of love and adoration in midcourse.

We must acknowledge that there is no general agreement by commentators on how to interpret this verse. Nor can we even say that there is a conservative view versus a liberal one. Students of the Gospel are simply undecided. The three general categories of interpretation are, however, well suggested by the footnote at the bottom of page 1156 in the New Scofield edition of the Bible. It suggests, "(1) That Jesus spoke to Mary, acting, as it were, as the High Priest fulfilling the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). Having accomplished the sacrifice, He was on His way to present the sacred blood in heaven; and, between the meeting with Mary in the garden and the meeting of Mt. 28:9, He had so ascended and returned—a view in harmony with types. (2) That Mary was gently rebuked by Christ in the command, 'Touch me not' (lit., 'Stop clinging to me').

The Lord taught Mary that now she must not seek to hold Him to the earth but, rather, become His messenger of new joy. And (3) that He merely meant: 'Do not detain me now; I am not yet ascended; you will see me again; run rather to my brethren,' etc."

One thing we can say of this difficulty: it does suggest the basic reliability of the narratives, as do all apparent contradictions or difficulties. If the writers of the four Gospels were making their stories up in collusion with each other, they would certainly not have allowed such problems to stand. Matthew and John would not have allowed the contradiction between one person being forbidden to touch Jesus and others being permitted to touch him, or at least they would have provided some explanation. They would have settled on how many angels there were at the tomb and who saw them. They would either have explained why Jesus was not always recognized or else have eliminated this obvious embarrassment to their claims concerning the resurrection. The reason why these difficulties are allowed to stand is that, whatever the explanation of them may be and whether or not the disciples themselves knew the explanation, this is simply the way things happened. Consequently, they record them accurately as witnesses. The alleged discrepancies have the ring of truth about them.

Yet that does not help us determine how this verse should be taken. I would suggest that whatever the particular tone of the words may be and whether or not Christ actually ascended to the Father many times between his resurrection and final ascension from the Mount of Olives forty days later (I believe he did, though not for the reasons suggested by the first of the Scofield notes), the main sense of the passage is that Mary's relationship to Jesus (and also that of the other disciples) is now different. They are to know him in a different way than they did during the days of his earthly ministry.

Here a verse from Paul's second letter to the Corinthians is illuminating. Paul says in the context of arguing that all things have become new for those who are in Christ, "So from now on we regard no one from a worldly point of view. Though we once regarded Christ in this way, we do so no longer" (5:16). To know Christ after the flesh is obviously to know him as the disciples did during the days of his earthly ministry—as a man whom they could hear and see and handle (cf. 1 John 1:1-3). To know him as we do today is to know him spiritually, that is, by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit who reveals the Lord Jesus Christ to us as the Son of God and Savior. We notice, for example, that this is the emphasis with which this chapter of John ends, for John summarizes his account of Christ's works by saying, 'Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:30-31).

This means that Mary was now to know Christ as her Savior, and we are to know him as the Son of God and our Savior too. Do you thus know him? The Holy Spirit is given to lead you to that knowledge. Come to him. Believe on him. If you do not know him as the Son of God and your Savior, you do not really know him at all. If you do, then the other relationships follow.

God Our Father

The first new relationship which follows upon our new relationship to Christ is a vertical one. It is our relationship to God the Father. But we must notice that while it is analogous to Jesus' relationship to the Father, it is nevertheless not identical to his. It has been pointed out many times by those who have studied this verse that when our Lord said that he was ascending to the Father he did not say, "I am returning to our Father and our God." He said rather, "I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." If he had said the former, he would have been putting himself on the same level as the disciples—as a man only. Instead, he indicates that while it is true that God has now become our Father in a way that was not true previously, this is nevertheless not the same as his relationship. He is the Son of God in a unique sense, for he is God (cf. John 1:1-2; 10:30). We enter into an analogous relationship only because of what he has done for us through his atonement.

What is involved here is our adoption into the family of God. We are not naturally born into God's family. We are alienated from God and are born outside it as heirs of sin and death. But God is gracious; therefore, by the death of Christ and by the application of that death to us by the Holy Spirit, God brings us back into fellowship with himself and grants us family privileges.

Could anything be more utterly unexpected or overwhelming than the new relationship with God that is bestowed on his children? It is hard to think so. Justification is overwhelming enough, for it is all of grace. God did not need to justify us. Having justified us he could still have left us on a much inferior level of status and privilege. But he has gone far beyond what we could ever conceive of or expect by taking us into his own family where our status and privilege are that of daughters and sons. So great is God's condescension in this act of adoption that we would be inclined to dismiss this relationship, thinking it presumption, were it not that God has made a special effort to seal these truths to our hearts. As Paul has written, "No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love him—but God has revealed it to us by his Spirit" (1 Cor. 2:9-10).

What are these privileges? One is prayer, for access to God is based on our adoption. It is only because of our adoption that we can approach God as "Father," and it is only through the Spirit of adoption that we can be assured that he is indeed our Father and that our prayers are heard by him. This is what Paul is speaking of when he says, "For you did not receive a spirit that makes you a slave again to fear, but you received the Spirit of sonship. And by him we cry, 'Abba, Father'" (Rom. 8:15).

A second and related privilege of our new relationship to God is that we can have confidence before him. We are his children, and we can know that nothing can ever destroy that relationship.

If God is our Father, he will help us in the days of our spiritual infancy, teaching us to walk spiritually and lifting us up when we fall down. If he is our Father, he will care for us throughout the days of our earthly pilgrimage and will abundantly bless us. As our Father, he will guide us in the way we should go and eventually bring us home to heaven to be with him forever.

Brothers and Sisters

It is not only that Christians have a new relationship to God as a result of his act of adoption. They also have a new relationship to one another. Before, they were outside the family of God, each going his or her own way in opposition to and sometimes in only thinly veiled hostility toward each other. Now they belong to a new family and must love each other and work together as brothers and sisters. "Consequently, you are no longer foreigners and aliens, but fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household" (Eph. 2:19).

This is suggested by the word "brethren" in our text. It is a powerful and unexpected word, for it has not been used in this sense before in John's Gospel. The word occurs four times in chapters 2 and 7. But on each occasion it refers to those who were Christ's brethren according to the flesh, that is, to the children of Mary by Jesus' adoptive father, Joseph. In chapter 20, for the first time (and once more in 21:23), it refers to those who have believed on Christ and have therefore entered into God's family.

The attitudes that should flow from these new relationships do not always follow naturally or easily. But that is all the more reason to grasp this concept forcefully and work at the relationships. John White has put the task in these terms, 'You were cleansed by the same blood, regenerated by the same Spirit. You are a citizen of the same city, a slave of the same master, a reader of the same Scriptures, a worshiper of the same God. The same presence dwells silently in you as in them.

Therefore you are committed to them and they to you. They are your brothers, sisters, your fathers, mothers and children in God. Whether you like or dislike them, you belong to them. You have responsibilities toward them that must be discharged in love. As long as you live on this earth, you are in their debt. Whether they have done much or little for you, Christ has done all. He demands that your indebtedness to him be transferred to your new family."

Membership in God's family does not mean that we will be insensitive to faults on the human level. Indeed, we must be sensitive to them if we are to have any hope of reducing them and improving the quality of our family fellowship. But it does mean that we will not be overly sensitive to the faults of our brothers and sisters in Christ and even less that we will be critical. Instead, we will be intensely committed to each other with a proper family loyalty and will work to help each other live the Christian life.

Chapter 257.
The Best News Ever Heard

John 20:18

The story of Christ's appearance to Mary Magdalene and his commissioning her to tell the disciples of his resurrection concludes with the statement that she did what he told her to do. This is deceptively simple because it is actually a record of the first announcement of the best news this world has ever heard. It was an announcement of the Lord's resurrection.

When World War II ended, the joyful news was flashed around the globe, and at once people everywhere were ecstatic. I was just a lad at the time. My father had been in the service for some years, and the family was then stationed at a large military base in the southern United States. We were far from the action. But even now I can recall the yelling and shouting that occurred when news came of the war's end. The ending of World War II was great news. Yet, great as that news was, it did not compare with the truly stupendous news of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. This message was better then, and it is even better today.

Unshakable Evidence

Let me ask a very simple question and then give a few plain answers. Why is the resurrection of Jesus Christ the best news the world has ever heard? The answers are: because it is true, because it came after an apparent defeat, because of all that it proves, and finally because it demands a lifesaving response from each of us.

First, Jesus' resurrection is good news because it is true. It is always possible to have reports of events that sound like good news but later prove to be disappointments because the facts of the reports are wrong or the events did not actually happen. Referring again to World War II, this very thing occurred several times before the war really ended. False reports of the war's end spread; they were eventually proved false and so were terribly disappointing. The same was true of reports of a near end to the war in Vietnam. This was not the case with news of Jesus' resurrection.

We do not have space in one message to go into the evidences for the resurrection of Jesus Christ at length, but we can suggest a few of them. The first great evidence for the resurrection of Jesus Christ is the evidence of the narratives themselves. These stand up to the most stringent of critical scrutinies. To begin with, they are apparently four independent accounts. They were obviously not made up in collusion; for if they were, they would not possess the number of apparent contradictions they contain: the number of angels at the tomb, the number of women who went to the garden, the time of their arrival, and other things. These accounts can be harmonized, but the point is this: had the writers gotten together to make up a story, the apparent discrepancies would have been eliminated. On the other hand, it is also apparent that they did not make up the stories separately, for if they had done this, there would never have been the large measure of agreement they possess. The setting and the characters are the same, and the sequence of events makes sense. What does this mean? Just this: If the accounts were not made up in collusion and if they were not made up separately, the only remaining possibility is that they were not made up at all. That is, they are four true, independent accounts by those who knew the facts they wrote.

Next there is the evidence of the empty tomb, coupled with the evidence of the moved stone and the undisturbed graveclothes. How are we to account for these things? Some have imagined that either the Roman or Jewish authorities moved the body. But they had no reason to do this, especially since it would have involved violating the officially sealed tomb; and, had this occurred, it is inconceivable that the true circumstances would not have been revealed later after the disciples had appeared in Jerusalem, proclaiming their belief in Jesus' resurrection. It would have been easy for Jesus' enemies to produce a body had there been one. On the other hand, the friends of Christ did not steal the body of Jesus, for they would hardly have been willing to die (as most of them later did) for a deception.

It is possible to add the changed character of these men as an evidence, for whatever happened turned them from disillusioned cowards into mighty proclaimers of the Christian message.

Then, too, we must add the fact that Jesus appeared, not just to one or two women in a garden under somewhat eerie circumstances, but to a wide variety of people in numerous circumstances. Paul lists many such appearances, noting that one time Jesus appeared to a group of five hundred believers (1 Cor. 15:6).

Again, one of the great evidences of the resurrection is the unexpected and unnatural change of the day of worship from Saturday, the Jewish day of worship, to Sunday in Christian services. Nothing but the resurrection of Jesus on Sunday explains it.

What are we to say of these evidences? Matthew Arnold, not overstating the case, once said, "The resurrection of Jesus Christ is the best attested fact in history." Lawyers in particular have seen this truth.

Some of the best books on the resurrection have been written by lawyers, some of whom originally set out to disprove it. I am thinking of men like Frank Morison, Gilbert West, J. N. D. Anderson, and others. Sir Edward Clark, another English jurist, once wrote, "As a lawyer I have made a prolonged study of the evidences for the first Easter day. To me the evidence is conclusive, and over and over again in the High Court I have secured the verdict on evidence not nearly so compelling. ...As a lawyer I accept it unreservedly as the testimony of men to facts that they were able to substantiate."

This is the first reason why the resurrection of Jesus Christ is good news. It is good news, not merely because it is a nice story which gives us an opportunity for a holiday once a year, but because it is true. As truth it is one of the most stupendous and important facts of history.

Wellington Defeated

Second, the resurrection of Jesus Christ is good news because it came after an apparent defeat. A victory is always good news, but news of victory after news that a battle has apparently been lost is even better.

Let me illustrate this by the way in which news of the Battle of Waterloo first came to England. There were no telegrams or radio sets in those days, but everyone knew that a great battle was pending and they were anxious to hear what would happen when Wellington, the British general, faced Napoleon. A signalman was placed on the top of Winchester Cathedral with instructions to keep his eye on the sea. When he received a message, he was to pass the message on to another man on a hill. That man was to pass it to another. And so it was to go until news of the battle was finally relayed to London and then across England. At length a ship was sighted through thick fog on the English Channel. The signalman on board sent the first word—"Wellington." The next word was "defeated." Then fog prevented the ship from being seen. "Wellington defeated!" The message was sent across England, and gloom descended over the countryside. After two or three hours the fog lifted, and the signal came again: "Wellington defeated the enemy!" Then England rejoiced.

In the same way, Jesus' death plunged his friends into sadness. It was an apparent defeat. But on the third day he rose again in victory. When Jesus died men might have cried, "Christ is defeated, wrong has triumphed, sin has won." But after three days the fog lifted and the full message came through to the world: 'Jesus is risen; he has defeated the enemy."

Essential Doctrines

Third, the resurrection is good news because of all that it proves. What does it prove? The answer is: It proves all that needs to be proved. It proves the essential doctrines of Christianity.

In the first place, it proves that there is a God and that the God of the Bible is the true God. Reuben A. Torrey, who often spoke and wrote well on these themes, put it this way: "Every effect must have an adequate cause ... and the only cause adequate to account for the resurrection of Christ is God, the God of the Bible. While here on earth, as everyone who has carefully read the story of his life knows, our Lord Jesus went up and down the land proclaiming God, the God of the Bible, 'the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob' as he loved to call him, the God of the Old Testament as well as the New. He said that men would put him to death, that they would put him to death by crucifixion, and he gave many details as to what the manner of his death would be. He further said that after his body had been in the grave three days and three nights, God, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob, the God of the Bible, the God of the Old Testament as well as the God of the New Testament, would raise him from the dead. This was a great claim to make. It was an apparently impossible claim. For centuries men had come and men had gone, men had lived and men had died, and so far as human knowledge founded upon definite observation and experience was concerned, that was the end of them. But this man Jesus does not hesitate to claim that his experience will be directly contrary to the uniform experience of long, long centuries....

"That was certainly an acid test of the existence of the God he preached, and his God stood the test. He did exactly the apparently impossible thing that our Lord Jesus said he would do.... The fact that Jesus was thus miraculously and marvelously raised makes it certain that the God who did it really exists and that the God he preached is the true God."

Second, the resurrection proves Jesus' deity. When Jesus lived on earth, he claimed to be equal to God and that God, this God, would raise him from the dead three days after his execution by the Roman authorities. If he was wrong in this, his claim was either the raving of a deranged man or blasphemy. If he was right, the resurrection would be God's way of substantiating the claim. Did he substantiate it? Did Jesus rise from the dead? Yes, he did! So the resurrection is God's seal on Christ's claim to divinity. This is why Paul, who knew that Jesus had been raised, writes that Jesus was "declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4). This is good news! If Jesus is God, then God is like Jesus. It means that God is not distant, arbitrary, or unreal. He is a God who loves us and who came to earth to give himself a ransom for our sins.

Then, too, the resurrection proves that all who believe in Jesus Christ are justified before God. Paul teaches this in Romans also, for he states that Jesus "was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (Rom. 4:25). How does this happen? Jesus had claimed that his death would atone for man's sin. He said that he had come "to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28). He died as he said. But the question still remained: Can it be true that the death of this one man is acceptable to God on behalf of others? Suppose he had sinned? In that case, he would have been dying for his own sin rather than the sins of others. Did he sin? Or was his atonement accepted? Three days pass. Christ rises. Thus, his claim is established. God has shown by the resurrection that Christ was sinless and that he has accepted his atonement.

Torrey said this: "When Jesus died, he died as my representative, and I died in him; when he arose, he rose as my representative, and I arose in him; when he ascended up on high and took his place at the right hand of the Father in the glory, he ascended as my representative and I ascended in him, and today I am seated in Christ with God in the heavenlies. I look at the cross of Christ, and I know that atonement has been made for my sins; I look at the open sepulcher and the risen and ascended Lord, and I know the atonement has been accepted. There no longer remains a single sin on me, no matter how many or how great my sins may have been."

The resurrection of Jesus Christ also proves that the believer in Christ can have a supernatural victory over sin in this life, for Jesus lives to provide supernatural power to do it. This is an argument developed in the sixth chapter of Romans. In the opening verses of that chapter Paul writes, "We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life" (Rom. 6:4). This means that by faith all who believe in Christ are united to Christ so that his power becomes available to them. We may be weak and utterly helpless, unable to resist temptation for a single minute. But he is strong, and he lives to give help and deliverance. Victory is never a question of our strength, but of his power. His power is what we need.

Torrey, whom I have just quoted, tells a story that illustrates this point. He tells of four men who were once climbing the most difficult face of the Matterhorn. There was a guide, a tourist, a second guide, and a second tourist, all roped together. As they went over a particularly difficult place, the lower tourist lost his footing and went over the side. The sudden pull on the rope carried the lower guide with him, and he carried the other tourist along also. Three men were dangling over the cliff. But the guide who was in the lead, feeling the first pull upon the rope, drove his ax into the ice, braced his feet, and held fast. The first tourist then regained his footing, the guide regained his, and the lower tourist followed. They then went on and up in safety.

So it is in this life. As the human race ascended the icy cliffs of life, the first Adam lost his footing and tumbled headlong over the abyss. He pulled the next man after him, and the next and the next until the whole race hung in deadly peril. But the second Adam, the Lord Jesus Christ, kept his footing. He stood fast. Thus, all who are united to him by a living faith are secure and can regain the path.

Finally, Jesus' resurrection is evidence for our own resurrection and of a life with Jesus in glory beyond the grave. Jesus said when he was here on earth, "I am going ... to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am" (John 14:2-3). He is preparing that place now. Can we trust him? Was he telling the truth? The resurrection vindicates these claims.

Come and Learn

I have given three good reasons why the resurrection of Jesus Christ is the best news this world has ever heard: (1) because it is true, (2) because it came after an apparent defeat, and (3) because of what it proves. But there is a fourth reason also. Jesus' resurrection is good news because it demands a lifesaving response in faith from each of us. Have you responded in faith to this One who died for you and rose again on that far-off first Easter morning?

This is worth asking, because we recall that according to Mark's Gospel those to whom Mary first gave this report did not respond positively. They did not believe her: "When they heard that Jesus was alive and that she had seen him, they did not believe it" (16:11). It was only after Christ's further appearances and a further proclamation of the message that they came to him.

There is some news that is restricted by its very nature. It applies to one or two individuals but not to everyone. A promotion is good news to the man who receives it but not to the two or three others who failed to get the job. The results of an election are good news to the winning party but not to the losing party. Even so generally applicable a report as a reduction of federal taxes is good only to those who pay taxes or who live in the country where the reduction is to take place. Almost all human news is so restricted. But the news of the resurrection is for all.

What is your relationship to the risen Lord? Have you heard the good news? Have you believed it? Have you trusted in him? This is the heart of Christianity. It is not to be found in the liturgies of the churches, nor in the specific formulations of Christian theology, important as they may be. Christianity is Christ, the risen Christ. He died and rose again for you. Won't you come to him?

Chapter 258.
The Real Last Words of Christ

John 20:19-20

I do not know who it was who first conceived the idea of preaching on the so-called "seven last words of Christ," but whoever he was, he certainly struck upon a popular note. From my early days I remember sermons preached on this theme, generally on Good Friday or during the weeks preceding Easter. No doubt you remember many such sermon series also. It has always struck me as a bit incongruous, however, that in speaking of the seven last words of Christ the choice has always been made of those words spoken by Jesus in the hours immediately preceding his death by crucifixion—"Father, forgive them; for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34); 'Woman, here is your son" (John 19:26); "Today you will be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43); "I am thirsty" (John 19:28); "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mark 15:34; Matt. 27:46); "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit" (Luke 23:46); "It is finished" (John 19:30)—when actually these were not the last words Christ spoke upon earth nor, for that matter, even the most significant.

To say that these sentences were the last words of Christ is to imply that with the speaking of them the words of Christ ceased. It is to say that there was no resurrection. Since this is wrong, I am going to suggest that in the closing chapters of John's Gospel we actually have a series of "last" words, spoken after the resurrection, which may be more important and may have a greater claim to our attention than the sayings more commonly thought of.

What are these words? They are: "Peace be with you" (20:19-21); "As the Father has sent me, so I am sending you" (20:21); "Receive the Holy Spirit" (20:22); "Stop doubting and believe"
(20:27); "Blessed are those who have not seen, and yet have believed" (20:29); "Feed my sheep" (21:16-17; cf. v. 15); and "Follow me" (21:19; cf. v. 22). These seven sayings may be described as: a great bequest, a great commission, a great consolation, a great challenge, a great benediction, a great responsibility, and a great invitation. We are going to look at the first of these—a great bequest—in this study.

Shalom

John introduces this first great word of the Lord Jesus Christ by writing, "On the evening of that first day of the week, when the disciples were together, with the doors locked for fear of the Jews, Jesus came and stood among them and said, 'Peace be with you!' After he said this, he showed them his hands and side. The disciples were overjoyed when they saw the Lord" (20:1920).

I know that when Jesus greeted his disciples by speaking of peace in the upper room on the evening of the day in which he rose from the dead, he used a very common greeting. The word was Shalom. It was often used the way we use the word "Hello." Still, there is more to it than that. For one thing, it was never used in a flippant manner. It did not mean "Hi." It was a serious greeting. For another, it was always related in some measure to the thought of peace being God's gift, and is therefore much more closely paralleled in English by the wish, "God bless you."

Moreover, in the New Testament the thought of God's giving peace to men is always connected with what Jesus accomplished by his death and resurrection. Thus, in the Book of Romans Paul writes of peace as one of the results of our justification: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:1). It is certainly in this sense that Jesus uses the word in his greeting to the assembled group of disciples. He had gone to the cross. He had been raised from the dead. Now, as the result of what he had accomplished, he was dispensing real peace to those who believed on him.

What is peace? One definition applies the word to a relationship between countries, calling it "an agreement to end hostilities." Another calls it "public order." A third definition calls peace "harmony in personal relations." None of these definitions, good as they are, does justice to what Jesus really meant when he offered peace to men.

When Jesus spoke of peace to his disciples he was speaking, first of all, of peace with God. This is the peace bought by his suffering on the cross, and it is significant because of the fact that people are not at peace with God naturally. According to the Bible men are at war with God. They are opposed to him. Consequently, it was up to God to make peace through Christ's cross.

It follows from this that the peace must be on God's terms. Aboard the battleship USS Missouri in Tokyo Bay, off the coast of Japan, General Douglas MacArthur, commander of the armed forces of the United States in the Far East, received the symbols of surrender of the Japanese people. Japan had been decisively defeated as a result of the war in the Pacific, and she surrendered on this occasion on America's terms. What would we think of a case in which the Japanese arrived at the peace table prepared to bargain on terms of a settlement? We would say, "How ridiculous! The time for bargaining is past." At this point, MacArthur was to dictate terms of peace, and the people of Japan were to receive them.

"Well," says God, "if you recognize this truth on the human level, recognize it spiritually. This is the way it must be between myself and rebellious, sinful men and women. People come to me to present their terms. They say, 'If you do so-and-so for me, then I'll serve you and we can get along together.' But there is no room for bargaining. If you want peace, you must receive it in the way I provide it. Jesus died to make peace. If you are going to enter into my peace, it must be by faith in him and what he has done."

The wonderful thing is that when we come to God on such terms we find that he is not hostile. He is no longer looking toward us in wrath. There are no frowns. Instead, he receives us with smiles and makes us his daughters and sons.

The Peace of God

When Christ offers us peace he does so in another sense also. It is true that he offers us peace with God. This is what is mentioned in the verse I quoted from Romans: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (__romans__5:1). But it is also true—gloriously true—that he offers us the peace of God also. It is God's own peace offered to us. The Bible speaks of this peace when it says, "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6-7).

This was a wonderful word for the disciples. They had gone through the most traumatic week of their lives. For three years they had followed Jesus in and out of hundreds of villages in Palestine and had come both to know and love him. They had watched him do miracles. They had heard him teach. They knew that hostility was growing against Jesus on the part of the Jewish rulers.

They had warned him not to go to Jerusalem. Still they were unprepared for what happened. Suddenly, there was an arrest by night in the Garden of Gethsemane, and they scattered in fear, presumably returning in the dark to Bethany. Jesus did not appear. When these frightened men finally got to Jerusalem several days later, after much agony, they learned that the worst had happened. Jesus had been tried and crucified. Then, almost on top of that, and before they had even adjusted to the thought of his death and burial, word came of an empty tomb and of several alleged resurrection appearances.

If ever there was an agitated and confused group, it was this small, fearful band of Christ's disciples. But then Jesus came! One minute they were alone. The next minute he was there. How glad they were to hear him calm their troubled spirits and still their hearts. "Peace! Peace be unto you!"

Do you know this peace? There is no peace in the world. Chamberlain promised the English people "peace in our time," but the words were scarcely out of his lips before Adolf Hitler was bombing Danzig for the start of World War 2. "Peace" was the cry of the students in the turbulent 60s, accompanied by their ubiquitous peace sign. But all the idealism, songs, drugs, and optimism of the decade did not create a peaceful world. We have had wars in every decade since, many of them —in South America, Africa, the Balkans, the Middle East, and other places.

This might not be so bad if it were possible for those who truly want peace to find it in the privacy of their souls. If only we could escape to a place of inner rest, away from those who hate peace and fight others for their own selfish gains. But that place does not exist, and the reason it does not exist is that we carry the seeds of turmoil in our hearts. Our basic problem is that we are not at peace with God, and deep within we know that this is the case. Moreover, this disharmony constantly breaks forth to disturb our relationships with other people and even our own personal repose. We are all agitated people. But Jesus made peace between his Father and all who trust in him by his reconciling death for sinners on the cross. Because those who know and trust Christ have been given peace with God they can now also experience peace with others and in the innermost recesses of their souls.

Do you know this peace? There are often difficulties in life. You may be experiencing some. There are upsetting events—the death of a relative or friend, the loss of a job leaving you without a sure future, the sting of failure, the loss of friends. There are other causes of upset and agitation. Yet Jesus offers peace in the midst of them.

Many Gifts

We must not think that when Jesus spoke of peace to the disciples he was listing all the benefits of his death for them. This was only one of many gifts which are the result of his death and resurrection.

One of the additional gifts is access to the presence of God through prayer (Rom. 5:2). Prayer is not for everyone. There is not a line in the Bible to suggest that God listens to, much less answers, the prayer of one who is not a believer in Jesus Christ. In fact, the Bible states explicitly that the only way in which anyone can come to God in prayer is through Jesus. He said, "I am the way and the truth and the life, no one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6). The best man or woman in this world is unable to come into the presence of God on the basis of any merit of his own. Yet, on the ground of the death of Christ, the worst sinner who ever walked the face of this earth but who has turned from his sin and accepted Jesus Christ as his Savior can come at any time of the day or night, any day of the year, and with boldness can speak out of the longing of his heart to God and receive what he asks.

The Bible also tells us that the death of Christ gives us a sure and certain hope. Hope refers to the future, more particularly to what lies beyond death. Before Christ died we knew nothing of what lay beyond. He said, "I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me, that where I am, you also may be" (John 14:23). He said these things, but we could not be certain of them. He died. Then he rose again. Now we have one who has passed through the portal of death and who has returned. It is as he said. There is a future. There is a heavenly home, and he has gone to make it ready for us.

Are these the only results of Christ's death and resurrection? No, there are more. He gives us the Holy Spirit. He gives us eternal life. We have the Bible. We have a status before God as daughters and sons. We are heirs with Christ, coheirs with him of God's glory. We have his promises, among which is his promise to meet all our needs "according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

His Messengers

The final point of Christ's words to the disciples on the occasion of his first appearance to them after his resurrection was that they now had a job to do. Jesus said, "Peace be with you" (v. 21). This was for them. But if they had received God's peace through faith in his death and resurrection—as well as his many other gifts—they were nevertheless not at liberty to keep the good news to themselves. Now they were to become his messengers.

Have you believed in the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior? Is he your Lord? If so, this commission applies to you also. How will you heed it? Will you begrudge the time it takes, giving God the bare minimum of your effort? Or will you give him your entire self to be used by him as he desires? Only the latter course assures deep personal blessing.

There is a story told in folklore of a king who commanded his subjects to bring burlap bags to the palace. It was a peculiar request, to say the least, and naturally some of the subjects were offended. No one could understand why the king had commanded them to bring bags. Those who were offended brought the smallest sacks they could. Others brought old ones or ones filled with holes. When they arrived at the palace the king did not take the sacks from them. Instead he ushered them into his storerooms and invited them to fill their sacks with gold and carry it home. Those who had come resentfully with the smallest bags received very little while those who had brought the king the largest and best bags received more.

So it is spiritually. God asks for our all, but he does not do so to make us unhappy. His way is the way of blessing. God says, "Do not come to me with thimbles. Come to me with arms and hands wide open and see if I will not fill them with every spiritual blessing. If you will be my messengers, I will make your life full and make you a blessing."

Chapter 259.
"So Send I You"

John 20:21

The last two chapters of John contain what I have called "the real last words of Christ." Spoken after the resurrection, as opposed to those more commonly discussed words spoken from the cross, they are words of encouragement, instruction, and promise: "Peace be with you" (20:19);
"As the Father has sent me, so I am sending you" (20:21); "Receive the Holy Spirit" (20:22); "Stop doubting and believe" (20:27); "Blessed are those who have not seen, and yet have believed" (20:29); "Feed my sheep" (21:16-17: cf. v. 15); "Follow me" (21:19; cf. v. 22).

Our text contains the second of these last words, though, as we will note, it follows quite closely upon the first and leads to the third. It is John's version of the Great Commission.

The Great Commission occurs five times in the New Testament, once at the end of each of the four Gospels and once in the opening chapter of Acts. The repetition is significant. Anything God says is important; if something is repeated more than once, it is especially important.
Besides, in each case the emphasis is different. Matthew emphasizes the authority of the Lord. Standing on a mountain, presumably looking out over numerous towns and villages, Jesus says,
"All authority in heaven and in earth has been given to me. Therefore, go and make disciples of all nations" (28:18-19). In Mark the emphasis is on the final judgment: "Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved; but whoever does not will be condemned" (16:16). Luke presents the commission as the fulfillment of prophecy: "This is what is written: The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day; and repentance and forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (24:46-47). Acts presents a program for world evangelization: "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (1:8).

These words are drawn from a variety of circumstances and were spoken to a variety of people. John's version is unique in that it is probably the first expression of this command and links our commissioning to the prior commissioning of our Lord.

Peace Be with You

John's words are linked to the first of the seven last words, which occurs just two verses before.
Lest we miss this connection, John repeats it in the verse which is our text. The full text says, "Peace be with you. As my Father has sent me, so I am sending you."

This is not accidental. In fact, the reason is apparent. It is simply that we must ourselves have peace, both inwardly and outwardly, before we can effectively preach the gospel of peace to others. There are two kinds of peace involved here, as we saw in our last study. The first is peace with God achieved by the death of the Lord on our behalf. In ourselves we are not at peace with God. We are at war with God. But Christ has made peace by bearing the punishment due us for our sins. In bestowing this peace he provides us with forgiveness of sins and the assurance of it. The second peace is the peace of God. The disciples were cowering in an upper room. They were afraid, but Jesus told them to have no fear but rather to be of good courage. They were in hiding, but he told them to abandon their shelter and go out into the world as his missionaries. Christ's words seem to be the opposite of the disciples' experience. But they are reasonable because of who it is who speaks them. He is the risen Lord. He was arrested, beaten, crucified. But he rose again. It is as the One who has been triumphant over death and sin that he now speaks peace to his followers.

John Stott writes of this passage, "We learn then that the Church's very first need, before it can begin to engage in evangelism, is an experience and an assurance of Christ's peace—peace of conscience through his death that banishes sin, peace of mind through his resurrection that banishes doubt.... Once we are glad that we have seen the Lord, and once we have clearly recognized him as our crucified and risen Savior, then nothing and no one will be able to silence us."

Into the World

The gift of peace is not the characteristic emphasis of this verse, however. Instead, as we have already indicated, the emphasis is on the connection between our commissioning and the commissioning of the Lord Jesus Christ by his Father. These words are a command to evangelize, but they are more than this; they establish a pattern for us as we evangelize. The key words are "as" and "so"—"As my Father has sent me, so I am sending you." They mean that our mission in the world is to be patterned on Christ's. He was the first missionary; our labors are to be conducted like his.

But what does that mean specifically? The first thing it means is that, as Jesus was sent "into the world," so also are we sent "into the world." This context is not made explicit in John 20, but it is clearly stated in that verse from Christ's high priestly prayer which is a close parallel to it. There Jesus says, "As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world" (John 17:18). This is the principle of incarnation, the principle of becoming one with those we would help. Think how significant it is that Jesus came "into the world." It means that he did not stay in heaven, though he certainly could have. It means that he did not shout words of salvation to us from the safety of heaven's ramparts. Having determined to come down to us, he did not even then come in the effulgence of his divine glory but rather divested himself of that glory and appeared in humble form. In fact, he did not even appear in a human disguise, which is what the Gnostics taught, but actually became a human being, just like us. He was born; he grew; he suffered; eventually he died.

That is what it means to come "into the world." Since this is the way Jesus came into the world, this is the way we are to come also. We are to become one with those to whom we are sent. If we do not, we fail in carrying out the spirit even if not the letter of the Lord's commission.

Most of us are guilty at precisely this point, and the evangelical church in particular is guilty. We have retreated from the world rather than invading the world. We have retreated to the suburbs or whatever our equivalent may be. Schools, churches, magazines, institutions, individuals—many have done this. They have retreated to where it is nice or safe or nonthreatening, and as far as one can tell from their actions, what they are actually saying is that the world can go to hell. Shame on us! We spend millions of dollars to send faithful women and men overseas to tell the Good News there. But we will not go to our cities or neighbors if to do so costs us comfort or prestige.

Here is John Stott's statement of the problem. "I personally believe that our failure to obey the implications of this command is the greatest weakness of evangelical Christians in the field of evangelism today. We do not identify. We believe so strongly (and rightly) in proclamation, that we tend to proclaim our message from a distance. We sometimes appear like people who shout advice to drowning men from the safety of the seashore. We do not dive in to rescue them. We are afraid of getting wet, and indeed of greater perils than this. But Jesus Christ did not broadcast salvation from the sky. He visited us in great humility.... We cannot give up preaching, for proclamation is of the essence of salvation. Yet true evangelism, evangelism that is modeled on the ministry of Jesus, is not proclamation without identification any more than it is identification without proclamation. Evangelism involves both together."

Stott continues, "Frankly, this is my own greatest dilemma and problem as a parish minister. I love to preach the Gospel—to those who will listen to it. I find no greater joy in any ministerial activity than in the exposition of God's Word, whether to believers or to unbelievers, who come to Church (or even to open-air services) to hear it. But how are we to identify with the people of the parish who will not hear? That is the problem. How can we become so one with secular men and women, as Christ became one with us, that we express and demonstrate our love for them, and win a right to share with them the good news of Christ?"

Do not think that I have a simple answer to this. I do not. I am ready to confess that this is also a great problem (and failure) for me as well. But while I do not know the full answer, I do know this: We are not really fulfilling the Great Commission until we live with, befriend, love, and enter into the experiences of those to whom we are sent.

If we are going to go into the world as Christ was in the world, we are going to have to learn how to become friends with unbelievers and then work out the issues of life by their side.

To Save Sinners

The second area in which our mission is to be patterned on the mission of Jesus is its purpose. We are sent into the world as Christ was sent into the world—that is context. But why are we sent into the world?—that is purpose. It is seen in Paul's solemn affirmation to Timothy: "Here is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance: Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—of whom I am the worst" (1 Tim. 1:15). Christ came into the world to save sinners. And so must we, if we would be faithful to his commission.

This can be applied profitably on two levels. First, our purpose must actually be to see others saved and not merely to fulfill our duty as witnesses by unloading a certain presentation of the gospel on them. It is true that we cannot save anyone and that our duty in one sense is simply to be Christ's witnesses. We are to share the gospel with others whether they believe or not, knowing that ultimately the drawing of the unbeliever to Christ is God's doing. But this does not mean that we have no interest in whether or not they will believe or that we should not use every means at our disposal to see that they do. Do we talk too much? Perhaps. But it can never be that we overidentify or overwork while waiting for Christ to be formed in others by God.

Jesus said, "No one can come to me, unless the Father who sent me draws him" (John 6:44). But that did not prevent him from doing everything in his power to teach others and persuade them of the truth of the gospel.

The second way in which the verse may be applied is by stressing the word "sinners." In the first case, we stressed the word "save" ("Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners"). Now we must say, "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Those who consider themselves theologians may be raising the objection, "But aren't all of us sinners?" Of course, that is true. But I remember as well that our Lord once said, "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners" (Matt. 9:13). Jesus had been eating in the house of Matthew, the tax collector, and many of Matthew's low friends had come to eat with him. The Pharisees had rebuked Jesus for associating with such people. They thought that it was beneath his dignity as a distinguished rabbi. Jesus did not buy this line of reasoning. Instead, he taught that it was precisely to such persons that he was sent.

That is what I am talking about. I am saying that if we would go into the world as Christ went into the world, we must go to such people. Someone has defined a banker as a man who lends money to those who can prove they do not need it and refuses to lend money to those who do. That may be an unfair appraisal of the banking industry, but it is accurate where the philosophy of the world is concerned. The world gives to those who can give back—with interest. It expends praise, kindness, and generosity on those who do not need them. But this is not Christ's way. He went to the bankrupt. If this is his way, it must be ours also.

What would Jesus say if he were here to instruct us? He would say, "When you invite someone to dinner, invite someone who will not be able to invite you back." He would say, "Feed the hungry; give drink to the thirsty; clothe him who has nothing; visit the prisoner. None of these are in a position to return the favor."

There is one more thing that comes from Paul's statement. It is an explanation of why we do not naturally think as Christ thinks. Notice that when Paul said, "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" he went on to add "of whom I am chief. "Jesus came to save sinners. Paul likewise went to sinners, and the reason Paul went is that he knew he was one of them. In fact, he was the chief. That suggests why we do not go. We think we are better than others and are concerned to maintain our position. We feel that we would have to stoop to save sinners, and we do not want to do it. Jesus had to stoop. He laid a real glory aside in order to become man and die for our salvation (Phil. 2:5-8). We do not have to stoop. We are beggars among beggars. Our task is that of one beggar telling another where to find bread. When we get that into our heads we will actually go to those who really need us and help them as the Lord did.

Glorified in Them

Not only is our mission to be like that of the Lord in its context and purpose, it is to be like his in its goal as well. What is that goal? Well, in John 17, in the midst of that prayer in which the Lord intercedes for us in regard to the lives we are to live in this world, Jesus said first, "I have brought you glory on earth," and then a little later added, "All I have is yours, and all you have is mine. And glory has come to me through them" (vv. 4, 10). These verses and others teach that the ultimate goal of Jesus' coming was to glorify the Father, that is, to make his glory known. Then, because our goal is to be patterned on his, they likewise teach that we are to glorify Jesus by our thoughts, words, and actions.

This is our mission: (1) We are to go into the world, as Jesus entered into the world; (2) We are to go so that people might be saved through faith in him; (3) We are to glorify Christ, as he glorified the Father.

Some years ago Peter K. Haile, assistant headmaster of the Stony Brook School on Long Island, told a story that illustrates this point and gives a closing challenge. He had a missionary friend, a woman doctor, who went to India on rather short notice because of a pressing need in a certain hospital. She had not had time to go to language school but instead was put to work in the hospital immediately, where she spoke through an interpreter. After she had been there a while she wrote to the Hailes expressing frustration and discouragement. She had been trying to show love and gentleness to the people, but they did not seem to be responding. She asked them to pray about it. A few weeks later another letter came, this time saying that she had discovered what the problem was. It was the translator. She had been loving, but he was apparently a rude, arrogant fellow who never conveyed her concern for the patients at all. He was a barrier to her message.

We are interpreters of the Lord Jesus Christ in this world. What is the picture of Jesus that others have through our speech and actions? What picture do they have of him in me? Do they see his glory? Or do they see my lack of concern, pride, and impatience? May God make us interpreters for Christ who present him as he truly is.

Chapter 260.
Sins Remitted and Retained

John 20:22-23

One of the points at which Roman Catholic and Protestant theology part company is over the interpretation of John 20:22-23. It is not a minor matter. Consequently, since I am a Protestant and since we have now come to this text in the course of our systematic exposition of John's Gospel, it is both necessary and proper to give the Protestant view of these verses.

We begin with the acknowledgment that there is much common ground between believing Catholics and believing Protestants and that in many areas this unity is far greater than that between conservatives and liberals in either of their camps. For example, both believe in the Trinity with its corresponding assertion of the full deity of both the Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. Both believe in the virgin birth, works of healing, Jesus' resurrection, other miracles, and the giving of the Holy Spirit to Christ's followers. We believe in Jesus' vicarious death for our sins, the inspiration and authority of Scripture, the visible return of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the final judgment, and other doctrines. The scope of this agreement is suggested by the nearly universal use throughout Christendom of the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed, which contain these teachings.

Nevertheless, there are differences; otherwise there would not be the various ecclesiastical and theological divisions we have. To name just a few, there are differences in the way we view church traditions, the doctrine of justification, the church, sacraments, and the role of the clergy (which is of particular interest here). On the basis of this text and some others the Roman church has built its doctrine of a special priesthood to whom has been committed the power of absolution of sin. In normal practice this authority is exercised through the confessional. Most Catholics would acknowledge that in the ultimate analysis it is God who forgives sin and that this is on the basis of Christ's death. But they would add that God does so in response to the action of the priest so that where the priest absolves, God forgives, and where the priest does not absolve, God allows the sins and judgment to remain. Protestants maintain that this is all backward. What happens is that God first forgives; then, on the basis of that forgiveness, believers (both clergy and laymen) proclaim that this is so.

The issues are the way in which forgiveness of sins comes to men and women, the role of laymen and clergy and the nature of the Great Commission with which all this is inseparably connected. It is the difference between absolution and proclamation, between the priesthood of the Roman church and the priesthood of all believers in Protestantism.

Divine Forgiveness

Why, then, does the Protestant church take these verses, the third of Christ's "last" words, as it does? Is it not simply twisting a text that in its clearest and simplest sense seems to be granting a special authority to forgive sins to a special body of chosen men and their successors?

Not at all. We maintain that this is not the clear or simple meaning of the text. Nor is it the theology of the Word of God generally. There are five reasons for thinking as we do.

1. It is a teaching of Scripture, reiterated on many occasions, that there is none who can forgive sins but God only. The power of forgiving sins is his prerogative. The clearest statement of this is from an incident early in Christ's ministry. Jesus had been preaching in a certain house when friends of a paralyzed man had lowered the invalid through the roof to Christ's feet. He saw their faith and said to the paralyzed man, "Son, your sins are forgiven" (Mark 2:5). Some of the scribes immediately objected, saying (to themselves), "Why does this fellow talk like that? He's blaspheming! Who can forgive sins but God alone?" (v. 7). This was a true principle. So the Lord used it to lead them to consider his claims to divinity. He showed that in this case the healing of the body and the forgiveness of sins would be identical; consequently, when he healed the man, as he then did, it was proof that he had power to forgive sins and was therefore God (vv. 9-10). The argument would be meaningless if human beings were able to forgive sins under any circumstances whatever.

2. There is no instance in any of the New Testament books of any apostle taking on himself the authority to absolve or pardon anyone. This is important because it relates to a fundamental rule of Scripture interpretation, namely, that every text must be interpreted within its historical and biblical context, and never in isolation. To interpret this text correctly we must ask what Jesus meant by it and what the disciples understood him to be saying.

Did the apostles understand Christ to be imparting to them the authority to forgive sins? Not at all. If they did, they would undoubtedly have claimed and exercised such powers, which we do not find. Instead, when Peter said to Cornelius, "All the prophets testify about him that everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name" (Acts 10:43), he clearly reiterated three times over that remission of sins is in Christ and by Christ. Similarly, when Paul said, 'Through Jesus the forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you" (Acts 13:38), he was pointing to Christ alone as the remitter. What the apostles did in these and other instances is preach the gospel, declaring with authority the terms on which God forgives sins, namely, on the basis of Christ's death and through faith in him alone. As John Stott says, "The Apostles understood that the authority the risen Lord had given them was the authority of a preacher and not that of a priest."

3. It is a fatal defect in the Roman view of the priesthood that believers other than the apostles were present on this occasion and that the authority here given, whatever it may be, must therefore have been given to them as well as to the apostles, and therefore to Christians generally. The reason for saying this is that the group to which Jesus spoke the words recorded by John was undoubtedly the same group about which Luke writes in the last chapter of his Gospel, and we know from Luke's account that it contained at least Cleopas and the other disciple who had been with him on the road to Emmaus (cf. Luke 24:18, 33; John 19:25), and probably others who were not apostles.

Moreover, this fits the context as a whole. For the authority to "remit or retain" is preceded by (1) the gift of peace, (2) the Great Commission, and (3) the impartation of the Holy Spirit, all of which are clearly given to all Christians. If the latter gift is restricted to a special order of clergy, then peace, the Great Commission, and the gift of the Holy Spirit must be restricted to them too. If they are not restricted, as they are not, then all believers can proclaim forgiveness through faith in Christ.

4. According to the best texts, the verbs "are remitted" and "are retained" are in the perfect tense, which suggests, though it does not prove conclusively, that the forgiveness involved is something which has already been determined in heaven and is now merely proclaimed on earth. The translations which best reflect this tense would be "have been forgiven" and "have been retained." The New American Standard Bible makes this explicit by saying, "If you forgive the sins of any, their sins have been forgiven them; if you retain the sins of any, they have been retained," and then by adding in a marginal note, "I.e., have previously been forgiven." The NASB does the same thing with Matthew 16:19 and 18:18.

5. The Greek words for "whosoever" and "them" (which refers back to the first use of "whosoever") are plural. In other words, it is the sins, not of whatever person, but of whatever persons about which this verse is speaking. Leon Morris observes, 'Jesus is not speaking of individuals, but of classes. He is saying that the Spirit-filled church has authority to declare which are the sins that are forgiven and which are the sins that are retained. This accords with Rabbinical teaching which spoke of certain sins as 'bound' and others as 'loosed.' This referred to classes, not to individuals, and this is surely what Jesus is saying also."

We conclude that for the reasons given, John 20:23 is to be taken in precisely the way Luke records Christ's teaching given on the same occasion of which John speaks. Luke records that after Jesus had opened the disciples' understanding to know what the Bible had to say about his death for sins, he said to them, "This is what is written: The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, and repentance and forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. You are all witnesses of these things" (Luke 24:46-48). In neither of these texts is anyone authorized to remit sins; rather all are commissioned to preach it on condition of repentance and faith.

A Few Conclusions

If this is the proper interpretation, as I believe it is, then a number of conclusions follow. First, the mission of the church in the world must contain involvement and proclamation.

In our earlier study of John's version of the Great Commission, verse 21, we pointed out that if we are sent into the world as Christ was sent into the world, then we must truly be in the world and not merely shouting the gospel to it from afar. This is the principle of incarnation.

It is important. Moreover, evangelicals especially must give attention to it, for we have been far too inclined to retreat into the safety of our evangelical ghettos and merely proclaim the Word abstractly or indirectly. We do not like to get involved, and the liberal wing of the church has been superior to many of us in this area. But this is only half of the story, for if it is true that Christians must be involved in the world if they are to reach the world, it is no less true that they must have a message for the world and actually proclaim it to the world if they are to fulfill the Lord's commission.

There is a tendency to glorify "dialogue" today in some circles. Those advancing this approach say correctly that we must be willing to sit down beside unbelievers and learn from them. But then they add, "We must listen to them without presuming to think that we have anything to say to them. We have nothing to teach them. We must let them teach us." In this they are wrong. Of course, we must be ready to listen to others and learn from others. The world has much to teach us, and we must learn from it if for no other reason than that we will thereby discover how to communicate the gospel better. But we cannot give up preaching. We cannot give up proclaiming the gospel of salvation that has been entrusted to us.

Second, the words of the Lord about the forgiveness and retention of sin throw emphasis upon what the Reformation theologians called the priesthood of all believers. In pre-Reformation theology the idea of the priesthood had been restricted to the clergy. These persons had special authority and prerogatives and were considered to be on a higher level than the laity. The Reformers denied that this was biblical and substituted instead a parity between clergy and laity in which there were no distinctions of privilege but only of office. In the teaching of the Reformers this meant that Christians had the same privileges before God. All had the same duties. All were to serve together within the one fellowship of the church. If a biblical distinction is to be made, it must be made between the great Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, and his followers—just as it may also be made between Jesus as the Prophet and ourselves as lesser prophets or between Jesus as the King and ourselves as those who rule only because he rules.

We are not the priest, the prophet, or the king. But as God has sent Jesus into the world, so also does he send us into the world with the result that we are to function in each of these areas. We function as priests in offering ourselves up to God in service and in praying for and with others. We function as prophets in proclaiming what God has recorded in Scripture for our and others' benefit. We function as kings when we first rule ourselves well and then also those for whom we are responsible.

The question is, Do we who hold to the priesthood of all believers actually do these things or do we leave our responsibilities to others? Above all, do we take the gospel of God's grace in Christ to those who need to hear it and proclaim on God's own authority that those who will repent of sin and turn in faith to Christ as their Savior have had their sins forgiven and that those who will not come to Christ are not forgiven and will have to face God's judgment? Believers have many privileges. But they also have many responsibilities, chief of which is the faithful proclamation of the gospel.

Finally, there is this conclusion. We have pointed out that the privileges and duties of which Jesus speaks are for all believers, but we must also note that they are for all believers. Therefore, we warn that acquaintance with spiritual truth is not sufficient; membership in a church is not sufficient; the name of Christian is not sufficient. What is necessary is new life from God which inevitably results in a turning away from sin to faith in Jesus as the Son of God and Savior.

Here is where verse 22 comes in. It says that Jesus breathed on his disciples and said to them, "Receive the Holy Spirit." Some have imagined a contradiction between John, who apparently speaks of the impartation of the Holy Spirit to the disciples on the night of the resurrection, and the author of the Book of Acts, who speaks of a special coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost fifty days later. But this is unnecessary. Obviously the Holy Spirit came in power in a special way on Pentecost to inaugurate the church age. But are we to suppose that there was no impartation of the Spirit or no working of the Spirit in disciples' lives before that time? Earlier in Christ's ministry, Peter had confessed that he was "the Christ, the Son of the living God," and Jesus had responded by saying that this had been revealed to Peter by God. Was this apart from the Spirit? Did Peter believe without the opening of his mind and heart by the direct action of the Holy Spirit upon him? Similarly, early on the morning of the resurrection, John had entered the empty tomb and "believed" in the resurrection. Was this insight achieved apart from the Spirit?

The Holy Spirit was there all along and would be so in even greater measure at Pentecost. What Jesus is indicating in our text is that he is the source of the Spirit and that nothing can be done in the Christian life (indeed, one is not even a Christian) apart from the Spirit's activity.

Christ's breathing on, and imparting the Holy Spirit to, his disciples reminds one of the creation, in which the almighty God breathed into the first man, Adam, so that he became "a living soul" (Gen 2:7). Jesus is teaching that we must be created anew if we are truly to be his and serve him faithfully.

All Things New

Have you been made new? If so, all things are new and God's blessings are yours in full measure. Arthur Pink sees this passage as presenting all those new features of Christianity that are ours through Jesus. "1. Christ is known in a new way, no longer 'after the flesh,' but in spirit, on High. 'Touch me not... ascended' (20:17). 2. Believers are given a new title—'brethren' (20:17). 3. Believers are told of a new position—Christ's position before the Father (20:17). 4. Believers occupy a new place—apart from the world (20:19). 5. Believers are assured of a new blessing—'peace' made and imparted (20:19, 21).

6. Believers are given a new privilege—the Lord Jesus in their midst (20:19).

7. Believers have a new joy—through a vision of the risen Lord (20:20). 8. Believers receive a new commission—sent into the world by the Son as He was sent by the Father (20:21). 9. Believers are a new creation—indicated by the 'breathing' (20:22). 10. Believers have a new Indweller—even the Holy Spirit (20:22). How Divinely meet that all this was on the 'first of the week'—indication of a new beginning, i.e., Christianity supplanting Judaism!"

Has God made these things new for you? If not, you know the way. It is through Christ, who calls you to repent of sin and turn to him in humble faith. He died for you. Believe it and come to him.

Chapter 261.
Faithless or Faithful?

John 20:24-28

A number of years ago a book was published in America entitled This Believing World. It was a popular book because its thesis was popular—at last count it had gone through more than thirty editions. It said that everywhere and under all sorts of conditions men and women are naturally believers and are addicted to proclaiming their convictions.

The book may be right if the faith it speaks of is the kind of faith we observe generally. The world is not opposed to faith in general terms. But the book is fundamentally wrong if it is speaking of the kind of faith required in biblical Christianity. Christianity requires faith in God as he is revealed in Jesus Christ, and this means acceptance of the truth of our deep spiritual need and of the work of the divine Christ in providing the basis for our salvation from sin by his death.

It involves faith in him and in the demonstration of the truth of his work and teachings by the resurrection. Is the world a "believing world" in this sense? Not at all! In fact, the opposite is the case. The world is totally disbelieving, and it remains so unless God himself brings faith out of non-faith, just as he is able to bring life out of death or the whole of creation out of nothing.

But, of course, that is precisely what God does. He not only creates and loves and dies that those whom he has made but who have fallen into sin might be redeemed, he also leads them to faith, thereby producing in them that which they could never produce in themselves.

This is the meaning of the great and moving story that is the true climax and end of John's Gospel.

Doubting Thomas

The story concerns the meeting of Jesus and Thomas one week after the resurrection. Thomas had not been with the others on that earlier Sunday when Jesus had first appeared to the disciples in the upper room. We are not told why. We are told only that Thomas was not there, had missed seeing Jesus as a result, and, when told of the appearances of the Lord, replied, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it" (v. 25). In the sequel Jesus appears to Thomas to lead him to faith, and Thomas concludes the story with the highest profession of belief in Jesus recorded in the pages of any of the Gospels. He worships him, saying, "My Lord and my God" (v. 28).

This story has given us the well-known English epithet "a doubting Thomas." But we have to be careful how we use it. For one thing, we must not use it to disparage Thomas as if he only (and not the other disciples or, for that matter, even ourselves) doubted the resurrection. We remember that none of the other disciples believed either until Jesus had revealed himself to them, and neither do people today naturally believe. That is why we speak of "unconditional election" and "irresistible grace." If we do believe, it is only because God is there beforehand leading us to do it.

Again, we must not use the phrase "a doubting Thomas" to suggest even for a moment that it is just natural for some people to disbelieve and that they are therefore less guilty or are to be excused because of this disposition. We cannot fail to notice that although Jesus comes down to the level of his doubting disciple to lead him to faith, he does not at all suggest that his unbelief is excusable.

Thomas was indeed a doubter. He was not lacking in courage, loyalty, or devotion to Jesus, but he did have a gloomy disposition. He looked on the darker side of things. Therefore, when the death of the Lord was reported, he responded with the understandable declaration, "I will not believe it."

We see this characteristic in Thomas at every point at which he appears in John's Gospel. The first time he appears is in chapter 11. At this point Jesus was in a remote area of the wilderness country beyond the Jordan River where he had gone because of the danger in Jerusalem. We are told toward the end of the preceding chapter that when he had been in Jerusalem the Jews "tried to seize him, but he escaped their grasp" (10:39). Word came to him that his friend Lazarus, who lived in Bethany near Jerusalem, was sick. At first Jesus delayed for two days. But at last he announced his intention to return. Undoubtedly the disciples were frightened. They reminded him of the danger. They said, "But Rabbi, a short while ago the Jews tried to stone you, and yet you are going back there?" (11:8). Jesus was adamant. I imagine that there was a long pause as the disciples looked around at one another as if to ask if anything could be done to get him to change his mind or even if they would themselves go with him. But at last Thomas spoke up, saying, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (v. 16). What an interesting thing to say! The words were honest, loyal, and courageous, but they were not cheerful. They were quite grim.

The second time Thomas is brought to our notice is in John 14. Here Jesus is in the midst of his final discourses to his disciples before his arrest and crucifixion. He has spoken of heaven, concluding, "I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me, so that where I am, you may be also. You know the way to the place I am going" (vv. 2-4). These were great promises. But Thomas was unwilling to let them pass without confessing that he and presumably others also did not really know what Jesus was talking about. His gloomy reply was, "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?" (v. 5).

Pink says of this incident, "He reminds us very much of John Bunyan's 'Fearing,' 'Despondency,' and 'Much Afraid,' in his Pilgrim's Progress—types of a large class of Christians who are [his] successors."

The Other Disciples

Before we think of Christ's appearance to Thomas we must notice something else, however, for in its own way it is also very important. Even before the Lord came to Thomas, the other disciples had gone to him with the message that Jesus was risen, and it was undoubtedly because of their witness, even though it was not believed, that Thomas was with the others when Jesus appeared on that second Sunday.

Those in the Reformed, or Calvinistic, tradition sometimes give the impression that, because people are hopelessly lost in sin and only God can save them, there is little or nothing we can do. Consequently, when a person will not believe or will not even come naturally into a fellowship of Christians where the gospel is preached and Christ is likely to make himself known, we tend to give up. We say, "There is nothing we can do now. It is up to God." Well, in a sense it is up to God; it is always up to God even when results are forthcoming. But the fact that men and women are lost in unbelief and that only God can save them is no excuse for us to do nothing. On the contrary, we must do as these early disciples did. We must seek out the one who is missing. We must go to him or her and call that one to faith. We must say, "The Lord is risen. We have seen him. Come with us and believe on Jesus."

If some of us were among that first crowd of disciples, I think I know what would have happened. Jesus would have appeared and gone, and the group that had seen him would have been discussing his appearance. The name of Thomas would have come up. Someone would have said, "What shall we do about Thomas? I suppose we should seek him out and tell him."

"No," says another, "he should have been here. He is one of us. His duty was to be with us. If he had been here, he would have seen the Lord too. It's just too bad."

Again, I suppose a sense of obligation might have emerged, but the announcement might have been done in this fashion. The "faithful" might have said, "Thomas, you should have been with us on Sunday evening. The Lord appeared (and he is probably not going to appear again), but we wanted to tell you this since it is our duty as one Christian to another. Mend your ways." They could have said this. But they did not. Instead, they were so filled with joy in the knowledge that Jesus was alive that they went to tell everyone, especially those who had been with Jesus during the earthly ministry. They sought out Thomas and made sure that he was with them when they gathered together to worship on the second Sunday.

There are Christians who have a naturally gloomy temperament. These tend to go off by themselves; this is a characteristic of that temperament. Yet these are the ones who can least afford to be alone. Gloom and despair prey upon them, and such people will become more gloomy and less believing if left alone. Go to them. Find them. Bring them back into that fellowship you enjoy.

Behold My Hands

It is true, however, that in spite of their concern for Thomas, and as important as this was, the disciples could not change his mind. Nor can we change the minds of other people or convert them. God must do that. So what we read next is that Jesus appeared to lead this doubting apostle to faith.

Jesus did it by inviting Thomas to perform his empirical test, that is, by coming down to his level and engaging him in a way that would best lead him from unbelief to commitment. Thomas had asked for something he had no right to ask for. He had said, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails are, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it"

(v. 25). To treat the risen Lord in that fashion would be irreverent. Moreover, as he said it Thomas implied that the test was impossible; he had no intention of believing. Thomas was definitely out of line, faithless. Yet Jesus came down to his level, as he always does. He appeared to Thomas and said, "Put your finger here; see my hands. Reach out your hand and put it into my side" (v. 27).

How gracious our God is! We have no right to demand anything of him. Yet he who has created us and has died to redeem us stoops to provide what we need. Do we need evidence? If we do and if we will approach the matter honestly, we will find the proof of his deity, death for sinners, resurrection, and promised return overwhelming.

Do you say, "But I don't see it"? Then come to him. Ask for the evidence. You will find that God, who is far more anxious to reveal himself to you than you are to find him, will provide the revelation.

It is striking, however, that in this case the thing that actually convinced Thomas was not the empirical test he had demanded. He had demanded to put his finger into the holes of the nails in Christ's hands and thrust his hand into the wound in his side. But when Jesus presented himself and invited Thomas to reach out his finger and stretch forth his hand, Thomas did not actually do it. He was convinced without these assurances and fell at Christ's feet exclaiming, "My Lord and my God."

What convinced Thomas? Some have suggested that it was Christ's obvious knowledge of what Thomas had said, though Jesus had not been physically present when Thomas said it. To do that, so the argument goes, Jesus would have had to be God. But logical as this is, I do not find myself believing that this is what really got through to Thomas. What finally got through to him was the presence of Christ, identified by the wounds in his hands, feet, and side. It was the Christ of the cross who reached Thomas.

This is the greatest proof of all: the love of Christ revealed in his wounds. Charles Spurgeon once wrote of this: "In these times, when the foundations of our faith are constantly being undermined, one is sometimes driven to say to himself, 'Suppose it is not true.' As I stood, the other night, beneath the sky, and watched the stars, I felt my heart going up to the great Maker with all the love that I was capable of. I said to myself, 'What made me love God as I know I do? What made me feel an anxiety to be like him in purity? Whatever made me long to obey my God cannot be a lie.' I know that it was the love of Jesus for me that changed my heart, and made me, though once careless and indifferent to him, now to pant with strong desires to honor him. What has done this? Not a lie, surely. A truth, then, has done it. I know it by its fruits. If this Bible were to turn out untrue, and if I died and went before my Maker, could I not say to him, 'I believed great things of thee, great God; if it be not so, yet did I honor thee by the faith I had concerning thy wondrous goodness, and thy power to forgive'? and I would cast myself upon his mercy without fear. But we do not entertain such doubts; for those dear wounds continually prove the truth of the gospel, and the truth of our salvation by it. Incarnate Deity is a thought that was never invented by poet's mind, nor reasoned out by philosopher's skill. Incarnate Deity, the notion of the God that lived, and bled, and died in human form, instead of guilty man,... is itself its own best witness. The wounds are the infallible witness of the gospel of Christ."

Do not misunderstand me here. If you have honest intellectual questions about Christianity, God will provide intellectual answers for them. He gave you a mind as well as a heart. He will provide what you need. But the thing that will ultimately win you is not so much the reasoned arguments, though they are often important stepping stones, but the love of Christ demonstrated by his death for you.

"My Lord and My God"

Here is some encouragement. We have been discussing Thomas, the most doubting of all Christ's apostles. But notice that when the Lord revealed himself to Thomas, Thomas moved from doubt to the greatest testimony of faith in Christ recorded by this or any other Gospel. He said, "My Lord and my God." "Lord" was sometimes used of Christ by others, often with less than its full meaning. But here it must have all the content it will bear—'Jehovah, Master, Sovereign." "God" is a new form of address; no one had previously addressed the Lord in this way. It represents a great insight of faith, perhaps even greater than that similar confession of the apostle Peter for which he was commended by Christ (Matt. 16:13-17). Then, lest all this should be thought insufficient, Thomas adds the personal pronoun, saying, "My Lord and my God." It was not enough that Jesus be both God and sovereign. He was now to be that for Thomas personally.

This is the high point of the Gospel. It is the climax. John shows here how one who began as a great doubter came by the grace of Christ to that confession with which the Gospel began: "And the Word was God" (John 1:1). It was to lead people to this conviction that the book was written (John 20:30-31).

No case is hopeless. Your case is not hopeless. God took Abraham, the pagan, and made him into a pillar of faith and the father of his people. He took Moses, the stammerer, and made him into the greatest vehicle for the communication of the word of God until Paul. He made the shepherd boy David into a king; Peter "the weak" into Peter "the rock"; John the Son of Thunder into the apostle of love; Paul, the persecuter of Christians, into a faithful ambassador and martyr. He can do that for you. Allow him to do it. Believe on Christ. Rather than being faithless, may you be one who, like Thomas, was found "faith-full."

Chapter 262.
A Great Benediction

John 20:29

It is a remarkable characteristic of the Word of God that it is filled far more with blessings than with curses. There are curses, to be sure. There are warnings of judgment. But when all is put together, the blessings are far more numerous and more wonderful than any of these more somber elements.

The Bible begins with a blessing, for we are told that after each day of creation God commented upon the work, saying, "It is good." The Bible ends with a blessing, "The grace of the Lord Jesus be with God's people. Amen" (Rev. 22:21). In between are such verses as: "God blessed them and said to them, 'Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it'" (Gen 1:28); "I will bless you; I will make your name great, and you will be a blessing" (Gen. 12:2); "After Jacob returned from Paddan Aram, God appeared to him again and blessed him" (Gen 35:9); "The LORD bless you and keep you; the LORD make his face shine upon you and be gracious to you; the LORD turn his face toward you and give you peace" (Num 6:24-26); "Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked" (Ps. 1:1); "Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD" (Ps. 33:12); "Blessed are they whose ways are blameless" (Ps. 119:1); "Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him" (Rom. 4:7-8; cf. Ps. 32:1-2); "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord" (Rev. 14:13). In my concordance I find 375 Old Testament passages that deal with God's blessing. I find 108 separate passages in the New Testament.

It is not surprising in view of this wonderful characteristic of our God and of his revelation to find that the Lord Jesus Christ, the incarnate God, also had many words of blessing during the days of his ministry. We think of the beatitudes of Matthew 5, an obvious example (vv. 3-11). There are blessings pronounced upon children (Mark 10:16), upon one or more of the disciples (Matt. 13:16; 16:17), upon faithful servants of God (Matt. 24:46), upon those who hear the Word of God and keep it (Luke 11:28). There is the benediction at the close of John's Gospel, which is our text: "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed" (John 20:29).

This blessing, the fifth of Christ's "last" words in John's Gospel, is great for several reasons, among them that it is the last of Christ's blessings spoken while on earth. Appropriately, it is one that concerns not just a single person or a limited group of people but rather all who should believe on him as Savior.

What Does Christ Mean?

What does Jesus mean when he says, "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed"? Does he mean that a subjective faith is better than an objective faith, that a faith that has no relation to evidence is better than a faith that has? Does he mean that only a faith like that is blessed? It is hard to think that this is his meaning, because he has just provided tangible evidence of his resurrection for Thomas by appearing to him and inviting him to put his finger into the holes of his hands and thrust his hand into Christ's side. Again, it is clear that John did not interpret Christ's words in this way, because immediately after this John says that he has written certain things in his Gospel in order that those who read might believe.

So we may grant that Jesus is not advocating a faith entirely without evidence. But that still does not answer the question. What does Jesus mean? I believe he is speaking, not of a subjective faith, but of a satisfied faith. He is speaking of faith that is satisfied with what God provides and is therefore not yearning for visions, miracles, esoteric experiences, or various forms of success as evidence of God's favor. More than that, he is saying that a faith without these things is not inferior to but is actually superior to a faith based upon them.

Take these things one at a time and see why this is so. Take visions, first of all. If you are a normal Christian, I am sure there have been times when you have been discouraged, perhaps overcome with doubt, and you have said, "Oh, if God would only reveal himself to me in some special way so that my sight, touch, or hearing could assist my faith." We remember that there were people in the Bible who had such evidence. Abraham saw visions; he spoke with the three angelic visitors; he heard the voice of God from heaven on Mount Moriah. Moses met God on the mountain; on one occasion Moses was hidden in a cleft of the rock and witnessed the fire, wind, and earthquake as Jehovah passed by. Isaiah had a vision of God high and lifted up. The disciples saw Christ in the days of his flesh. Paul was caught up to the third heaven. John himself had the magnificent visions recorded for us in the Book of Revelation. "Why can't we have something similar?" we argue. "Surely we could believe much better and be far more effective in our Christian walk and witness if we did."

But that is not true, even though we like to tell ourselves that it is. For one thing, we usually want such experiences for the wrong reason—vanity. We would have a far higher opinion of ourselves if we should be granted an experience which most do not have. For another thing, visions do not necessarily lead to greater faith. In the opening pages of Miracles by C. S. Lewis, the wellknown Oxford professor and author tells of a friend of his who once saw a ghost. Before the vision, she disbelieved in an immortal soul. After it, she still disbelieved. Obviously, faith gives meaning to experience rather than the other way around.

Second, there are miracles or other special acts of God's providence. Do you pray for miracles? Do you think you could believe God better if you saw some? The opposite is the case. If you are looking for miracles (which God sometimes does provide, but seldom), you will gradually become insensitive to the thousands of normal evidences of God's mercy which you receive constantly.

Third, there are people who think they would be stronger in faith and be better able to live the Christian life were they to have some special esoteric experience. We read a passage like 1
Corinthians 12:9-10, where Paul speaks of God granting to some "gifts of healing by the one Spirit, to another miraculous powers, to another prophecy, to another distinguishing between spirits, to another speaking in different kinds of tongues, and to still another the interpretation of tongues," and we think that if we could only do or experience something like that, we would be stronger and happier as Christians. But that is not true either. God sometimes grants such experiences for the good of his church; the very fact that Paul lists these gifts in 1

Corinthians 12 is evidence that he does. But surely anyone who reads these chapters carefully will note that Paul does not encourage us to seek these experiences. If anything, he seems to warn against them, and he certainly does not pronounce any special blessing upon their exercise. Why? Because the blessings of the gospel are for those who live by faith and not by sight, who live by their faith in the character and benevolence of God and not in the evidence of visions, miracles, or other such experiences.

There is one other item which must not be left out, if only because it is so common in our day. It is the supposed evidence of success, measured by the number of people converted, church growth, income for Christian institutions and other such things. Does this mean that we are not to work to see as many people converted as possible? Does it mean that we are not to be concerned with church growth? Does it mean that we should not be concerned with the level of income necessary to run Christian schools, missions, churches, and other institutions? Not at all. But it does mean that we are not to tie our faith in God to such circumstances. We are to pray and believe and go on working even when we do not see this kind of numerical blessing.

What is faith? Faith is believing God on the basis of his Word and then acting upon it. This is true faith. It is this that God blesses. God promises a blessing upon those who have faith. We cannot repeat that enough. God blesses faith, and not the living out of some unusual experience.

How could it be otherwise if (1) God is to be fair in his dealings with his people and (2) the blessings of which he speaks are to be for all? Suppose it to be the other way. Suppose God's blessing were linked to the unusual. In that case, either his blessing would be for a small and select company only, or else the things we consider unusual would have to become commonplace, in which case they would cease to have the character of "special evidences." They would be like those other countless evidences of God's providence which we enjoy daily but do not regard so highly, simply because they are common. No, the blessings of God are for all; and they are based, not upon the unusual in Christian experience, but upon faith which by its very nature and definition is common to all who call upon the name of Christ as God and Savior. This is why the Gospel of John ends on this note. It ends here because John wants to encourage everyone to believe on Jesus and enjoy God's blessings.

What Blessings?

What are those blessings? There are many ways to answer that question, because faith is discussed again and again throughout the Bible. But we may answer it at this point just from John's Gospel, remembering that John's Gospel is the Gospel of faith preeminently. In John the Greek word for faith (pistis) always occurs in its verbal form (pisteuō) and is therefore translated "believe." But in that form it occurs more often in John than in any other biblical book, even Romans (which has much to say about faith) or books that are longer. We find the word 101 times in John's Gospel, compared with a combined use of "faith" and "believe" 64 times in Romans and only 22 times in Mark. So John is obviously concerned with faith and considers it of prime importance. What does he say of the blessings that flow from it? The following ten items are prominent.

1. It is by faith that we become children of God and thus enter into the privileges of being in God's spiritual family. John indicates this at several points but especially in the first chapter, where he says, "Yet to all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God" (1:12). Certainly this is a great blessing and the source of many others that follow.

2. It is through faith that we have eternal life. This is the teaching of the best-known verse in the Gospel, John 3:16. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life." Death is an "enemy" (1 Cor. 15:26). But death shall be conquered by faith, which unites us to Christ who conquered it.

3. By faith we are delivered from judgment. John quotes Jesus as saying, "I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life" (5:24).

4. John 6:35 teaches that faith ushers us into the blessings of spiritual satisfaction now: "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty." To come to Christ is to believe on Christ; that is what the parallelism suggests. So belief in Christ is set forth as the key to having all spiritual longings fulfilled.

5. Jesus also calls faith the means for entering into the final resurrection: "I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in me will live, even though he dies; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die" (11:25-26). The blessings of the resurrection are for those who believe on Jesus.

6. Faith in Jesus is also said to be the way in which we become blessings to others, as the Holy Spirit who communicates all God's blessings works through us. This is taught in John 7:38-39: "'Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him.' By this he meant the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were later to receive." The image is of a broad river flowing through a desert land, giving life and joy to all who come upon it.

7. Through faith we see the glory of God. "Then Jesus said, 'Did I not tell you that if you believed, you would see the glory of God?'" (11:40). Without faith we will be like the heathen, who are surrounded by the glory of God in nature, yet either do not see it or else attribute it to that which is not God by a worship of idols. It is only as we look to God that our eyes are increasingly opened to see what he is doing.

8. Faith is the secret of a holy life. Jesus said, "I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness" (12:46). In biblical language, darkness is the darkness of sin (cf. 1 John 1:5-10). So walking in the light means walking in holiness by means of the spiritual and moral life which God gives.

9. The blessing of a fruitful and effective life comes by faith. Jesus said, "I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father" (14:12). This does not necessarily refer to what we would call miracles, though taken together the disciples may well have performed more miracles than Jesus did. It refers rather to the many works of witnessing, preaching, and Christlike service performed by Christian people. They are performed by those who take God at his word and go out boldly to do his bidding.

10. Finally, it is through faith that we receive the benefits of Jesus' prayers on our behalf. He said, "My prayer is not for them alone. I pray also for those who will believe in me through their message" (17:20). If, as we are told in James, "the prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective" (5:16), how much more shall the prayers of the Lord Jesus Christ avail for us! If we lacked all other promises of blessing through faith, this alone should be enough.

Only Believe

What I have written here applies most directly to those who are Christians, to those who have believed on Jesus and to whom these blessings are therefore given. But it applies to nonChristians too in that you are challenged to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior.

Do not say, as many do, "I think I could believe in Jesus if he would just appear to me in some special way. I could believe if I had some miraculous vision." That is not true, though you may think so. Pharaoh did not believe though he witnessed the greatest collection of signs and wonders ever granted to one man at one period of history. Those things are of no use to you. The problem is not miracles or the lack of them. The problem is sin. You are a sinner, and Jesus is the answer to your sin. He died for you, bearing your punishment. Now you must come to him in simple faith. You cannot see him. But you can find him if you seek him with your whole heart.

Chapter 263.
Why This Book Was Written

John 20:30-31

Have you ever read a book and wondered afterward why anyone would write it? I have read quite a few books like that, and I have thought of a number of reasons why they were written. Sometimes people write because their jobs depend on it. This is particularly true of professors in some colleges and universities. They must "publish or perish." If they don't, they do. Some people write because they think it is good for them to write. President Kennedy once gave Richard Nixon some advice along this line. He said it was good for a public figure to write a book, because it disciplined him to think and work in a certain way. Still other persons write as an ego trip. They want their names to be known.

These reasons for writing are largely unworthy, of course. But next to books that evoke answers like these are others so clear in their point and so helpful in developing it that their worth is immediately apparent. Such are the classics. Such is the Bible. So too is that one part of the Bible, the Gospel of John, which we have been studying.

Why was the Gospel of John written? The author tells us why in the verses that close chapter 20 and that therefore properly close the book (since chapter 21 is in the nature of an epilogue). John says, 'Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (vv. 30-31). John is saying that there were many other things about which he could have written but that the things he did write were chosen rigorously on the basis of a two-part goal. That goal centers in a person, the Lord Jesus Christ. The first part, the chief, is that those learning about Jesus might believe that he is the Christ, the Son of God. The second part, a consequence of the first, is that the one believing might have eternal life through Christ's name.

Other Books, Other Authors

This is what sets John (and also the Bible as a whole) apart from most other books, including some very good ones. Many are written to glorify the writer. I think of a book entitled Dear Me. It was about the author. Other books are memoirs of famous people. John is not like this, however, and neither is the Bible as a whole. The inspired writers freely identify themselves. But then they lose themselves in their theme and never glorify either themselves or their achievements. On the contrary, if they speak of themselves at all, it is to tell of their own shameful failures that we might glorify God the more.

There is no example more striking in this regard than the apostle John. He was alert and sensitive. He was a member of the small band of disciples and had therefore traveled with Jesus during the days of his ministry. He was even a member of what we might call "the inner circle," composed of Peter, James, and John. John must have known more about Jesus by way of actual fact, sympathy, and direct experience than anyone. Yet so far was he from calling attention to himself or his own superior knowledge that he does not even mention himself by name while composing the Gospel.

Spurgeon, in one of his excellent sermons, points to the amazing reserve the apostle John exercised in refusing to use personal reminiscences and details to embellish his Gospel. "He omits, as if of set purpose, those places of the history in which he would have shone. He and James and Peter were frequently selected by the Master to be with him when others were excluded, but of these occasions he says nothing. At the resurrection of the daughter of Jairus it is said of the disciples, as well as of the relatives and the multitude, that the Lord put them all out, and only suffered the three to be with him. This was a singular honor, but John does not say a word about the raising of the daughter of Jairus.... Even more striking is the fact that the Master when he took with him the eleven to the garden, left the major part of them at the gate, but he led the three further into the garden, and bade them wait at about a stone's-cast distance, where some of them heard his prayers, and observed the bloody sweat. John, who was one of them, says nothing about it. He leaves out that which would have brought John into the front, in order that he may fill up the whole foreground of his canvas with the portrait of his Lord. Everything is subordinated to the one grand end 'that ye should believe that Jesus is the Christ.'"

The purpose that John had and reveals so clearly should be the goal of every Christian. When John the Baptist was approached about the astonishing success of Jesus in gathering disciples to himself, he replied, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30). So Jesus must. We must be certain that even in our witnessing we do not detract from him.

Another reason why many books are written is to satisfy curiosity. These books generally sell well because people have great curiosity about certain things. Over the years there have been scores of books by people who have worked for those who are famous and who pretend to let us in on their secrets. People buy these books because they want to know details about the lives of the people involved. But John, though he deals with the most famous person who ever lived, does not write in that fashion.

We would have. Had I been writing about Jesus, I would have recorded a physical description. I would have told how tall he was, how much he weighed, the color of his eyes and hair, and other items of that nature. I would have told of his childhood, his first friends, what people thought of him before he began his earthly ministry. I would have told what finally happened to Nicodemus (did he actually become a believer or not?), the reaction of the leaders of Israel to news of Christ's resurrection, and other such things. Our love for Christ tends to ennoble everything he did and would have caused us to be as faithful as Samuel Johnson's Boswell in recording it. But the Holy Spirit did not so lead the Gospel writers. As John indicates, he wrote only that which would lead us to faith in Jesus as the Christ and Son of God, not to satisfy our understandable but useless curiosity.

Chain of Witnesses

Here is how John's concluding words must be taken. It is as though he is saying, "Look, you have been reading and studying my Gospel for some time now, and you have come to the end. Have you grasped my purpose? Can it be that you have missed it after all this time? In case you have missed it, let me spell it out, Jesus did many, many things, but I have not recorded all of them. I have recorded only a part. But I have recorded that part so that you, you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you might have life through his name."

Have you ever thought of the Gospel of John in that light? Have you noticed that for all its deep theology the Gospel is really nothing more than a series of testimonies to Christ?

Let us consider them in sequence. In the opening pages of the Gospel, after John's own introduction, we have the first testimony—that of John the Baptist. As John tells it, the leaders of Jerusalem came to the Baptist to ask who he was, and after denying that he was Elijah, "that prophet," or the Christ, John described himself as one who had come simply to announce the Messiah and point to him. The next day he had his chance. Jesus passed by, and John pointed him out to two of his own disciples, saying, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29). Later he formalized his witness saying, "I would not have known him, except that the one who sent me to baptize with water told me, 'The man on whom you see the Spirit come down and remain is he who will baptize with the Holy Spirit.' I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God" (vv. 33-34).

The same chapter contains three further testimonies to Jesus. When John had pointed Jesus out to his disciples, they left John and followed Jesus. They then spent the rest of the day with Jesus and were so impressed that one of them, Andrew, immediately set off to find his brother Peter and said to him, "We have found the Messiah (that is, the Christ)" (v. 41). In the next verses Jesus finds Philip and calls him to discipleship, and Philip then goes to call his friend Nathanael. Philip's words to Nathanael are: "We have found the one Moses wrote about in the Law, and about whom the prophets also wrote—Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph" (v. 45). At first Nathanael is skeptical, but after he meets Jesus and is confronted with his supernatural knowledge, he declares movingly, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (v. 49).

In chapter 2 we have the first of Christ's many miracles, the changing of water into wine at a marriage feast in Cana. The climax of this story is verse 11, where we are told of the miracle's effect upon the disciples who alone of all the guests knew of it: "This, the first of his miraculous signs, Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. He thus revealed his glory, and his disciples put their faith in him."

The next two chapters introduce us to three representative figures and to others who are associated with them. They give their testimonies. The first figure is Nicodemus. He has little understanding; it is not said that he believes. But the account of his conversation with Jesus leads into John's own comments regarding the person and work of the Savior. He is described as "God's one and only Son" (3:18), whom God gave so that the world might not perish (v. 16).

The woman of Samaria dominates chapter 4. Unlike Nicodemus, who was a person of repute and privilege, she was an immoral representative of a despised race. She was also a woman. But Jesus revealed himself to her and led her to faith. Her testimony is in the form of a question that she asked the men of the city after she had conversed with Jesus. She said, "Come, see a man who told me everything I ever did. Could this be the Christ?" (v. 29). As a result of her witness many of the citizens of Sychar came out to meet Jesus and later said to the woman, "We no longer believe just because of what you said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Savior of the world" (v. 42).

At the end of chapter 4 we have the story of the nobleman whose son was dying. Jesus healed the son by a word, without going to the home. The result was that the father "and all his household believed" (v. 53).

In chapter 5 Jesus himself lists the testimonies that were given to him, testimonies that God the Father provided. The first is John the Baptist, whose witness was that of a prophet inspired by God. The second is the witness of Christ's works or miracles; Jesus always attributed these to the power of the Father at work within him. The third is the direct witness of God himself, presumably by a voice from heaven. At last there is the testimony of the Scriptures that, Christ says, "are the Scriptures that testify about me" (v. 39).

In chapter 6 the five thousand are fed; the result is that many come to believe on Jesus. We are told, "After the people saw the miraculous sign that Jesus did, they began to say, 'Surely this is the Prophet who is to come into the world'" (v. 14). Later when Jesus refused to conform to the materialistic expectations of the crowd many of these disciples left him. But when he returned to his own small band to ask if they wanted to go away, these refused and instead gave great testimony to him. Peter was the spokesman. He said, "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life. We believe and know that you are the Holy One of God" (vv. 68-69).

In chapter 7 "many of the crowd put their faith in him" (v. 31). Some said, "Surely this man is the Prophet" (v. 40). Others said, "He is the Christ" (v. 41).

Chapter 8 also tells us that "many put their faith in him" (v. 30).

Chapter 9 contains the story of the man born blind. This man did not seek Christ, because he could not even see to seek him out. Jesus sought him, as he seeks each of us, and he restored the man's sight both physically and spiritually. The restoration of spiritual sight is seen in the man's growing awareness of who Jesus was and of his significance for him personally. At the beginning he calls Jesus "the man" (v. 11). Later he is "a prophet" (v. 17). Still later he concludes that he must be "from God," for if he were not, "he could do nothing" (v. 33). At last, after Jesus had found him a second time and had revealed himself to be the Son of God, the man who had been born blind fell at his feet and worshiped him as "Lord" (v. 38).

Chapter 11 contains the account of the resurrection of Lazarus, and the result of this last of the miracles is that "many of the Jews who had come to visit Mary, and had seen what Jesus did, put their faith in him" (v. 45).

In chapter 12 Jesus enters into Jerusalem on a donkey on what we have come to call Palm Sunday. On this occasion the people who went out of the city to meet him cried out, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! Blessed is the King of Israel!" (v. 13). Later in the same chapter we are told that "many even among the leaders believed in him" though they did not confess him "for fear they would be put out of the synogogue" (v. 42).

After the resurrection we have the experiences of Peter and John, Mary, the disciples as a whole, and eventually Thomas. The latter account concludes with the great confession, "My Lord and my God" (20:28). Clearly, from first to last, the Gospel is a testimony to the Lord Jesus Christ.

The ABCs

I come now to the final and most important question: If John's purpose and the purpose of the Holy Spirit who inspired his writing is to lead men and women to faith in Jesus as the Son of God and Savior, shall that purpose fail where you personally are concerned? Do you believe? You have undoubtedly known of Christ and his work for many years. You may even have followed these studies of John's Gospel over a long period of time. What a tragedy it would be to come to the end of such a study and fail to enter into eternal life through faith in Jesus yourself. Do not allow that to happen. Believe on him. Believe now.

You say, "What does that mean? What must I do?" I will make the answer as simple as I can. Think of it as the ABCs of believing. First, A. You must accept the basic teachings about Jesus of Nazareth as fact. That should be easy, for they are fact. The reason many doubt them is not because the facts are uncertain—they are as well attested as any facts of history—but because they have not really investigated them. If you have difficulty at this point, begin to study the Gospels and ask yourself if these teachings and narratives ring true. Are they consistent with themselves and with what we know of human life? Is Jesus believable? Second, B. Believe on him personally. This is more than merely believing facts. It is believing them in relationship to yourself. It is believing that he came to die for you, that he is the way to God for you, that he is your Savior. Finally, C. Commit yourself to him. At this point he actually becomes your Savior and your God, as he did for Thomas in the verses immediately before the text we are studying.

Will you do that? Do not put it off. People always find ways of putting off what they know they ought to do, particularly when it is good for them. Some say, "I would like more information." You have more than enough information right now. Some say, "I would like to confirm these things by some personal, emotional experience." God does not save by experiences. He does so through faith in Jesus Christ. Believe on Jesus. These things are written that you might believe in him and that believing you might have life through his name.

Chapter 264.
"It is the Lord"

John 21:1-11

At first reading, the final chapter of John seems the strangest in the Gospel, most of all because it looks as if it has been added on. The verses that end chapter 20 seem to mark an end to the book as a whole, and the confession of Thomas which comes immediately before them is obviously the climactic point of John's narrative. What can be added after Thomas falls down and worships Jesus as "My Lord and my God"? The only thing that could possibly be added, according to our thinking, is an account of Christ's final ascension to heaven. But John 21 does not contain that incident. Instead, it deals with a miraculous catch of fish in Galilee followed by some words of Jesus to his disciples on that occasion. These difficulties, as well as others, have led some scholars to suggest that this last chapter was added to the Gospel (perhaps badly) by another writer after John had already finished it. Many have accepted this, although there is not a shred of manuscript evidence in the theory's support.

The key to understanding this chapter is to see it as a parallel to the first part of chapter 1. John 1:1-14 is a prologue, in which the preincarnate activity of the Lord is summarized. These verses, 21:1-25, are an epilogue. Their emphasis is upon the postresurrection ministry of the Lord in which he now rules his church and directs its members in their Christian growth and service. It would be proper to call this last chapter a pageant. It is history—the events and conversations really happened—but it is symbolic history by which the essential principles concerning Christ's rule over the church during this age are forcefully communicated.

We see in these verses: (1) the assembled church, (2) the possibility of serving Christ in the energy of the flesh, (3) the fruitlessness of such efforts, (4) the direction of Christian work by Jesus and the blessing that follows upon obedience to that direction, (5) Christ's temporal provision for his followers, (6) the only acceptable motive for Christian service, (7) the value of diversity within the church, (8) the importance of regular feeding upon the Word of God, and (9) the necessity for close personal discipleship for all Christians.

Christ's Own Together

The disciples had been scattering back to their accustomed haunts and homes after the crucifixion, and this had been true for some even after the resurrection. The shepherd had been smitten; the sheep were scattering. Yet here we find them in Galilee, where everyone knew them and knew that they had gone off to follow Jesus, not scattering as we might think they would, but rather holding together as if they were still a special company with a unique bond. What can account for this? Alexander Maclaren writes, "There is only one explanation... Jesus Christ had risen from the dead. That drew them together once more. You cannot build a church on a dead Christ; and of all the proofs of the Resurrection, I take it that there is none that it is harder for an unbeliever to account for, in harmony with his hypothesis, than the simple fact that Christ's disciples held together after he was dead, and presented a united front to the world."

Moreover, it is not only significant that they were together. It is also important to note who were together. John says, "Simon Peter, Thomas (called Didymus), Nathanael from Cana in Galilee, the sons of Zebedee, and two other disciples were together," seven in all.

The names of Peter and Thomas, which appear in the first and second positions, are obviously significant. Thomas was the rank unbeliever to whom Jesus had appeared and whose story is told just verses before this. Peter is the denier who is to be recommissioned to service in the verses immediately following. Can we miss that the church is made up of those who were doubters, deniers, and sinners of many varieties, but who have been brought to faith by Christ and have had their sins forgiven? These are the ones who do Christian work—normal people, with all the failings we are heir to, not fictitious characters of superhuman faith and fortitude.

Again, it is not just Peter and Thomas who are mentioned. There is Nathanael, whose only other appearance in the Gospel is in chapter 1. This makes us think of chapter 1 and suspect that there may be a deliberate throwback to those opening narratives. Who took part in those narratives? Peter and Nathanael were two. We have reason to believe that John himself was another, being the unnamed disciple who, with his friend Andrew, first followed Jesus. In this last chapter John appears again as one of the sons of Zebedee. Is it not possible that the two unnamed disciples of chapter 21 are Andrew and Philip, who are mentioned in 1:40 and 43 respectively, and that John is intentionally making this parallel?

If John is making this parallel, showing that the five of chapter 1 are here at the end also, then this is a testimony to God's perseverance with those who are his own. Those whom he calls follow Christ, and these are not lost. If these are not the same disciples as in chapter 1, we at least have an indication that all kinds of disciples (including some who are not even officially named) are in Christ's fellowship.

Without Me, Nothing

The second major point of these verses is one that evangelicals in the twentieth century especially should pay attention to: the sad possibility of attempting to serve Christ in the energy of the flesh and consequently of accomplishing nothing. This is what the incident involving Peter indicates.

Peter was impatient as usual. So rather than waiting inactively for the Lord's further appearances to him and the other disciples, Peter proposed to redeem the time by fishing. The idea seemed good to the others. So the disciples set out immediately and spent the night in hard labor. The text says, "That night they caught nothing" (v. 3). Some commentaries suggest that Peter was being disobedient to the Lord in proposing this fishing trip, because, so the argument goes, he had been instructed only to return to Galilee and wait there for Jesus. I do not think it is necessary to say this. Whatever else he was doing, Peter was in Galilee and he was waiting, though obviously filling in the time by fishing. No, the point of the story is not disobedience. It is rather to teach us what happens when we try to accomplish spiritual things by our own strength and at our own direction.

We must remember that fishing symbolizes evangelism, though Peter was obviously not thinking of this at the time. At the beginning of the three-year ministry there had been a similar incident. Jesus had been teaching the multitude while sitting in Peter's boat, and after he had finished he told Peter to move out into deeper water and let down his nets. Peter replied that he had toiled all night and caught nothing. But he did what Jesus had said, with the result that his net now enclosed so many fish that it broke. Peter was impressed, and so were his partners, James and John. But Jesus said, "Don't be afraid; from now on you will catch men" (Luke 5:10). From that time on, in the vocabulary of Jesus and his disciples, "fish" obviously suggested "men and women" and "fishing" symbolized "evangelism."

In chapter 21 we find Peter fishing again with similar results. He catches nothing until Jesus comes and directs his expedition. The point is clearly that our attempts to bring forth spiritual fruit are worthless unless Jesus himself directs and blesses them.

The Lord's Intervention

There is a third element in the story. The disciples had been fishing all night. They had caught nothing. I am sure, therefore, that having toiled all night and accomplishing nothing, they were discouraged and not even thinking of the Lord. If they were thinking of anything, it was probably how tired and hungry they were; if they were looking forward to anything, it was probably getting a bite to eat and then going to bed. But it was at that moment, when they were least thinking of Jesus, that the Lord appeared. They were not seeking him, but he sought them.

We never seek Jesus of our own free will, unaided by the Holy Spirit. If we do seek him, it is only because he is there beforehand moving us to do it. One of our hymns says it nicely.

> I sought the Lord, and afterward I knew
> He moved my soul to seek Him, seeking me;
> It was not I that found, O > Savior true; No, I was > found of Thee.
> Thou didst reach forth Thy hand and mine enfold; I walked and sank not on the storm-vexed sea; 'Twas not so much that I on Thee took hold, As Thou, dear Lord, on me.
> I find, I walk, I love; but O the whole

Of love is but my answer, Lord, to Thee!
For Thou wert long beforehand with my soul; Always Thou lovest me.

I am glad it is that way, aren't you? If spiritual blessing depended upon our seeking out the Lord, there would be no blessing. The reason there is blessing is that Jesus seeks us out, often when we least expect it.

The Lord does three things. First, he asks a question. The point of the question is to reveal to the disciples their own need and failure. Have you ever noticed as you have read through the Bible how God likes to ask questions? I think of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden after they had sinned. God asks this question, "Where are you?" And later, "Who told you that you were naked? Have you eaten from the tree that I commanded you not to eat from?" (Gen. 3:9, 11). He asked the woman, "What is this you have done?" (v. 13). Later, in the account of Cain and Abel, when Cain was displeased that his offering was rejected, God asked, "Why are you angry? Why is your face downcast? If you do what is right, will you not be accepted?" (Gen. 4:6-7). Through Nathan God asked David, "Why did you despise the word of the LORD by doing what is evil in his eyes?" (2 Sam. 12:9). God asked Isaiah, "Whom shall I send? And who will go for us?" (Isa. 6:8). The Lord asked, "Who do you say I am?" (Matt. 16:15), "You do not want to leave too, do you?" (John 6:67), "Who is it you want?" (John 18:4), "Woman, why are you crying? Who is it you are looking for?" (John 20:15). God did not ask these questions because he did not know the answers. He was not trying to figure out whether Adam was hiding behind the maple tree or the elm tree. God asks questions to get us to face the situation.

Thus it is in our story. Jesus asked, "Friends, haven't you any fish?" (v. 5). He meant, "Have you caught anything?"

They had to answer sadly, "No." They had to admit they were failures.

This is what Jesus asks us when we have been trying to go it on our own. "Have you caught anything? Have you been successful? Are you satisfied?" He asks these questions so that we might recognize our hunger, need, and failure, and turn to him.

This leads to the next step in the story, for after having asked his question the Lord next gives a command. In this case he tells the disciples, "Throw your net on the right side of the boat and you will find some" (v. 6). Why the right side? Because that was the side they were directed to by Jesus! If he had said the left side, there would have been fish there. They would have swarmed there from every part of the lake of Galilee, so anxious would they have been to be caught. The point is not where the work is to be done or how. It is whether it is being done under Christ's direction and in obedience to him or by our own wisdom and initiative.

Perhaps this is the point at which Jesus is speaking to you as you read this chapter. You have been aware of your own emptiness and failure. You have been trying to go it on your own and have been unsuccessful, as such attempts always are. Perhaps Jesus is saying, "I have a work for you to do. I have a way for you to do it. I want you to stop what you are doing and listen to me and do what I ask you to do."

Third, the Lord sends blessings. First, he had asked a question; second, he had given a command. Now in response to their obedience to his command, Jesus sends such a great catch of fish that they are unable to draw the catch to land. The fish (153 of them) symbolize men and women won for Christ. In the earlier story in Luke 5, the net was broken. Here it remains intact (v. 11), for none of those whom God has called and given to Jesus will be lost. Those whom we convert may well be lost; such are not true conversions. But those whom God calls to Christ through us will never be lost. These are given to Jesus and are held secure by both him and the Father.

A Great Discovery

There is one last point. In the middle of the story, when Jesus had first appeared on the shore and had called to the disciples, none of them recognized him. But when they obeyed his instructions and so participated in the blessing of the great catch of fish, they made the discovery that this was the Lord. John said it first: "It is the Lord!" The others undoubtedly also recognized it in that moment.

Have you made that discovery? If you have not, I can tell you how it must be made. It is made as you obey Christ's commands. He may seem distant and unreal to you. That is natural, because sin separates us from him. But if you will obey him, he will work in your life and you will find him as surely as the disciples did when they obeyed him beside the lake of Galilee. Do you ask, "But what should I do? What does he command?" If you are a Christian, you must follow his leading as I have already indicated. If you are not a Christian, you must turn from your sin and call upon him as your Savior. The Lord said, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). John says to believers, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteouness" (1 John 1:9).

There is no discovery greater than this. On one occasion a group of students asked the great doctor and inventor Sir James Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform, "What do you consider to be the most outstanding discovery you have ever made?" Simpson replied, "Young men, the greatest discovery I have ever made is that Jesus Christ is my Savior; that is by far the most important thing a person can ever come to know." It is true. Finding Jesus may mean a life of poverty, hardship, and even acute physical suffering. But it also means finding that One who alone is totally faithful as our Savior, Companion, and Friend.

Chapter 265.
"Come and Dine"

John 21:9-14

John's epilogue contains a fifth principle of Christian service, namely Christ's provision for his followers, suggested by the words "Come and have breakfast" in verse 12. I would like to consider this gracious invitation in the context of four other "comes" scattered throughout the Gospels.

Come and See

The first invitation occurs early in John's Gospel. It is "come and you will see" (John 1:39). John the Baptist had been standing by the Jordan River one day when the Lord Jesus Christ walked by. John pointed to Jesus, saying, "Look, the Lamb of God." Two of John's disciples heard this testimony and interpreted it as a command to follow Jesus. So they left John and followed him. When Jesus saw them following he stopped and asked, "What do you want?"

They answered, "Rabbi, where are you staying?"

He said, "Come and you will see."

This invitation is far more than an encouragement to these two disciples to learn where Jesus was living. It is an invitation to come to him for salvation, discovering that he is the Savior. In this context the words have the same meaning as that great invitation of Psalm 34:8 ('Taste and see that the LORD is good"). The disciples came, tasted, and saw; then they went to their relatives and friends to say, "We have found the Messiah" (John 1:41; cf. vv. 45, 49).

"Come and see." Of the five verses that we will consider, this is the only one that is directed to absolutely everyone. It is true that those who are not among the elect will not heed Christ's call and will not come. But this does not alter the fact that the invitation is to them as well as to all others. When God calls people to faith he is not mocking. He is issuing a genuine invitation, which is at the same time a command. If we do not come, it is not because we are not invited. It is because we are stubborn, sinful, and rebellious.

In his own valuable study of this verse and other invitations, Donald Grey Barnhouse notes that, in order that he might not violate human personality, Jesus graciously uses different methods to invite different people. We see it in John 1 but also throughout the book. When Andrew went to find Peter and brought him to Jesus, Jesus confronted him by making a play on his name. Peter (or Simon) meant "a little stone" or "pebble," the kind of thing that could easily be kicked about, as Peter could be. So Jesus said, "Thou art Simon, the son of Jonah; thou shalt be called Cephas [which means] ... a stone" (v. 42 KJV). In this encounter Jesus showed his knowledge of Peter's name and character, even without being told about it. Moreover, he assumed the authority to change Peter's name, thus providing precisely the kind of leadership this vacillating disciple both needed and respected. He told him that he was going to turn Peter the jellyfish into Peter the giant.

Later in John 1, we read that Jesus calls Philip. Philip goes to get his friend Nathanael. Nathanael is skeptical and says, "Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?"

Philip invites him to "Come and see," using the same invitation Jesus had used earlier.

When Nathanael does come, Jesus approaches him by showing his supernatural knowledge of what he had been doing even before Philip called him. He said, "I saw you while you were still under the fig tree before Philip called you" (v. 48). Apparently this was what Nathanael needed, for he responded with a testimony of faith in Jesus: "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (v. 49).

So it is throughout the Gospel. Jesus approaches each on his or her own level. He speaks to Nicodemus on the intellectual level, discussing epistemology (how one can know). He talks to the woman of Samaria on the level of her need as a sinner and in terms of an image she could well understand: "Everyone who drinks this water will be thirsty again, but whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst" (4:13-14). He meets the nobleman of chapter 4, the multitude of chapter 6, the man born blind of chapter 9 on the level of their physical need. At the end he reaches Mary by the utterance of her name—"Mary" (20:16)—and Thomas by the invitation to make an empirical test of the reality of his resurrection ("Put your finger here; see my hands. Reach out your hand and put it into my side," v. 27).

God is not touchy. He stoops to our level individually when he gives his call. Barnhouse writes, "I tell you, whoever you are, that God will meet you on your own ground. He will make himself so clear that if you say no to him, you will be a hypocrite when you are saying it. And forever after, you will never be able to look yourself in the eye again and call yourself an honest man." If you are new in your exposure to Christian things, you should begin with this open invitation.

Come and Learn

The second invitation is one of my favorites. It is one I frequently use in opening our morning worship services at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls" (Matt. 11:28-29). There is a lot in this verse. There is a description of our need. There is a promise of rest, and that of two kinds: a rest that is given, corresponding to justification, and a rest that is found, corresponding to sanctification. But the part of the verse I am interested in is that which speaks of learning. It is the invitation to "come and learn" of Jesus.

This is the emphasis of the passage where these verses occur. Jesus had been preaching in his own area of the country, but most of those who lived there had not believed on him. They had rejected John the Baptist, an austere prophetic figure. They had rejected Jesus, who had come eating and drinking. But some had believed, and Jesus was rejoicing in them. He prayed, "I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and learned, and revealed them to little children. Yes, Father, for this was your good pleasure" (Matt. 11:25-26). Now, in order to follow up on these, he issued the invitation to "come and learn" of him.

Here is a wonderful truth. No one need be an intellectual giant to understand the gospel and become wise in spiritual matters. On the contrary, although the wise are not excluded, God has actually chosen

"the foolish things of the world to shame the wise" (1 Cor. 1:27). This happens when they come to Christ and learn of him.

If you will come, you will find that Jesus is a wonderful teacher. He is wise and kind. He is patient. He will teach what you most need to know. Moreover, if you will come to him and allow him to teach you, you will soon excel in that wisdom which is pleasing to God and, as Psalm 119 promises, you will have "more insight than all [your] teachers" (v. 99). I know many Christians who are like that. They have never taken formal academic degrees. Some do not even speak good English. But they are wise spiritually because they have learned from him who is wisdom itself.

Come and Rest

In Mark 6:31 we have another invitation: "Come with me by yourselves to a quiet place and get some rest" In this context the disciples had been off on a training mission, and there had been so much "coming and going that they did not even have a chance to eat." The Lord knew that they needed a vacation.

Every so often you meet some Christian worker who thinks that he has to do the whole thing by himself and who works so hard that he has a nervous breakdown. Usually a person like this has a theological reason for his behavior, for he believes that if he does not work at the pace he is working someone else might be lost. He thinks that if he does not speak to ten or twenty people each day those ten people may go to hell. He thinks that if he does not raise an extra hundred thousand (or two hundred thousand) dollars, workers will not be sent to certain fields and those who live on those fields will be lost. He carries this great burden upon his shoulders, and it is just too much for him. He breaks down under it. Where did he ever get that idea? It is not in the Bible. Salvation is of God (Jonah 2:9). We are responsible only to obey him.

I know someone will object, "But if people believe that, aren't they going to be lazy and fail to do what they should do in serving Christ?" I admit that many Christians are lazy. But it has not been my experience that these are the ones who believe what I have been teaching. On the contrary, those with the highest view of the sovereignty of God in salvation are the most active.

Why is that? It is because they know what a great privilege it is to be associated with God in the work of evangelism, and it is because they know that their labors will be blessed as he blesses. Barnhouse writes on this point: "It is a tremendous thing to come into a recognition of this fact. Then you can do your work and when you've finished you say, 'Lord, it's up to you.' When you know that, you see, you don't have to go fussing and say, 'Well, now, could I have done it better?
Where could I improve?' The real question is: Were you yielded to the Lord? Did you ask the Holy Spirit to use you? Was there any part of your being that was not surrendered? If there wasn't, then you simply say, 'Lord, I am a pipe. I can carry the water. You're responsible for the pressure. You're responsible for the flow.'"

Come and Eat

The fourth invitation is the one found in John 21, which we are studying. It is to "come and dine" (v. 12). The disciples had been fishing all night and were hungry. But when they came to land they found that Jesus had already prepared "a fire of burning coals there with fish on it" (v. 9). He invited them to partake of it. Then we read, 'Jesus came, took the bread and gave it to them, and did the same with the fish" (v. 13). How like the Lord! Even in his resurrection glory he was not unmindful of the physical needs of his disciples, and he was active in providing for them. He continues to do so today. This truth enabled Paul to write, even while in prison, "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

This invitation involves fellowship with Jesus and not merely physical provisions. In the Bible eating always suggests fellowship. For us eating is often a hurried thing, something we do on the run to some other activity. We grab a sandwich and a glass of milk. We buy a hamburger and eat it in the car. This was not possible in Bible times. Meals required preparation, and they were more drawn out affairs.

Consequently, to eat with a person was to have fellowship with him or her.

It is interesting that the Greek word koinonia is translated by two English words, which have the same basic meaning. One is "fellowship." The other is "communion," as in the communion service. Fellowship and communion mean the same thing. Think of that now in relation to the communion service. We invite a person to communion, or we say, "I'm going to take communion." But what this really means is that we are going to take fellowship or that we invite the other person to fellowship with us around the Lord's table. What is the church but one great fellowship? It is a fellowship of Christians with the Lord and with one another.

We sing about it in one of our communion hymns written by the great Scottish divine Horatius Bonar.

> This is the hour of banquet and of song;
> This is the heavenly table spread for me;
> Here let me feast, and, feasting, still prolong
> The brief, bright hour of fellowship with thee.

Our Lord invites us to this table that we might fellowship with him and each other, in the communion service and in the daily exercise of our life together.

Some Christians are going to heaven miserably; others are going with the joy of heaven in their hearts and on their faces. What is the difference? The difference is that the latter have learned to come and dine with Jesus and with each other. The Christian life is not a showcase for superstars. It is a shared life in which our joy is in Jesus. If you lack that joy, take time to be with him. Turn off the television. Lay aside that worthless book. Forego that useless activity. Spend time with Jesus in the Word, preferably with other Christians, if that is possible. He will speak to you from his Word and show you the meaning of true Christian fellowship.

Come... Inherit

There is one more invitation. None of us has heard it yet, but we shall hear it one day if we are truly God's children. In Matthew 25, toward the end of that great sermon given on the Mount of Olives shortly before his arrest and crucifixion, Jesus had been talking of the sheep and the goats. He described their separation into two groups, the sheep on his right hand and the goats on his left. He then continues, "Then the King will say to those on his right, 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world. For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you invited me in, I needed clothes and you clothed me, I was sick and you looked after me, I was in prison and you came to visit me'" (vv. 34-36). To those who have known him and been changed by him the Lord says, "Come... take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you."

We do not have much of an inheritance now. Or if we do, it is destined to pass away. All we know here, save the Word of God, shall pass away. But there is an inheritance laid up for us; there is a kingdom laid up for us. And we shall surely inherit both if we are Jesus' people.

I think here of 2 Timothy 1:12, in which Paul writes of his hope of this inheritance. The words come toward the end of his life. He has labored long through many hardships. He has been beaten, stoned, imprisoned. "Yet," he says, "I am not ashamed, because I know whom I have believed, and am convinced that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day." Paul is saying that he has invested in Jesus. He has laid up treasure where "moth and rust [do not] destroy, and where thieves [do not] break in and steal" (Matt. 6:19). Now, as he comes to the end of a long life, he knows that the Lord Jesus Christ has not disappointed him.

Jesus will never disappoint anyone who trusts him.

Chapter 266.

Peter's Restoration

John 21:15-17

If each of us knew how sinful we really are, we would not be so shocked or subdued by our failures. But most of us do not know the depths of our own depravity. So we are shocked, particularly by a fall into serious moral sin or by our surprising ability to deny Jesus Christ.

When we sin in such ways, it is a tactic of the devil to argue that, having sinned, we have forfeited our chance for a successful and happy Christian life and that we might as well go on sinning. Like most of the devil's statements this is untrue. Though we sin, we have nevertheless not forfeited our chances for a full Christian life, nor dare we go on sinning. Instead, the Christian way is that of repentance and restoration. This is the point of the story of Peter's restoration by Jesus in John 21. Peter had failed the Lord in his hour of apparent need. He had abandoned him and had compounded his cowardice by a threefold denial that he had ever known him. Yet Jesus loved Peter, and Peter knew that he loved Jesus.

Peter's Boast and Fall

To understand the story of Peter's restoration we need to understand something about Peter's fall. Its cause was self-confidence, intensified perhaps by Jesus' revelation of his weakness. It had started in the upper room when Jesus had been speaking about love. Jesus had given his new commandment—"Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another" (John 13:34)—but instead of this humbling Peter, as it should have done, it actually set him thinking how much he loved Jesus. Therefore, when Jesus spoke of going away and of the fact that the disciples would not be able to follow him, Peter rightly sensed that he was speaking of his death and expostulated, wrongly, "Lord, why can't I follow you now? I will lay down my life for you" (John 13:37).

Jesus rebuked Peter by challenging his profession of loyalty: "Will you really lay down your life for me? I tell you the truth, before the rooster crows, you will disown me three times" (v. 38).

I doubt if Peter heard anything Christ said in the upper room from that point on. He certainly did not ask any more questions, though he had been prominent enough in the first half of the evening's activities. The questions are now asked by Thomas and Philip. I suspect that Peter was stunned by Christ's prophecy and was saying to himself, "He is wrong. He has no right to think so poorly of me, nor to speak that way in front of the others. I will never deny him, no matter what the others do."

I believe this because the subject came up again after the small band had left the upper room and was on its way to the Garden of Gethsemane. Significantly, it was raised by Peter, which showed that he had been mulling over Christ's words in the mean time. Jesus was speaking of the scattering of the disciples, his crucifixion, and of his intention to gather them together again after his resurrection. But Peter broke in to say, "Even if all fall away on account of you, I never will" (Matt. 26:33). Jesus repeated his prophecy of Peter's denial. But Peter answered again, "Even if I have to die with you, I will never disown you" (v. 35). According to Luke's account, Jesus told Peter that he had prayed for him that his faith should not fail. But in spite of these earnest words, Peter remained unconvinced and so went self confidently to his downfall.

Each of the Gospels tells us that Peter denied the Lord three times. While Jesus was on trial, Peter, who waited outside in the courtyard of the high priest, was declaring, "I do not know the man..... I do not know what you are talking about.... I am not his disciple."

Restoration

This is helpful for understanding the way in which Jesus approached Peter to restore him to service. The exchange has three parts. First, Christ's question. Second, Peter's response. Third, Christ's command.

The first thing we notice about Jesus' question to Peter is the name by which he addressed him. Jesus asked, "Simon son of John, do you truly love me more than these?" (John 21:15). It was Peter's old name, the name he had possessed before he met Jesus. We read about it in chapter 1. When Peter had been brought to Jesus, Jesus had greeted him by saying, "Thou art Simon, the son of Jonah; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone" (John 1:42 KJV). This was a play on words. The old name meant "pebble," a light, unstable thing. But Jesus said that he was going to name Peter "a rock." He was saying that he was going to turn Peter the jellyfish into a solid and courageous person. Now, in recollection of this earlier incident, Jesus goes back to the old name in order to remind Peter of his weakness.

The second thing to note about Jesus' question is the word for "love," which he uses. Again, there is a play on words, but it is lost in most English translations simply because we only have one word for love in English while the Greek has several. In the original of this paragraph there is a play on two of these Greek words. One word is agapaō, the great New Testament word for love; it is the word always used in relationship to God. When we read, "For God so loved the world" (John 3:16) or "God is love" (1 John 4:8), the word is agapaō. The other word is phileō, a human love expressing itself in friendship. We might say that it is the highest love of which we are capable apart from the new birth and the internal working of God's Spirit to form the character of Christ within us. We get the effect of the exchange between the Lord and Peter if we refer to the first of these loves as "one-hundred-percent love" and the second as "sixty-percent love." The exchange is as follows.

Jesus initiated the conversation by asking Peter if he loved him with the highest love possible: "Simon, son of Jonah, do you love me with a one-hundred-percent love—more than these others?" Some commentators have suggested that as Jesus said this he waved his arm about over the lake and boats and other disciples, meaning, "Do you love me more than these things?" But in view of Peter's earlier protestations, it is probably more specific than this. Peter had said that he loved Jesus more than the other disciples did and that he would prove it by dying for him if need be. He had made this profession just after Jesus had instructed the disciples to love one another with a "one-hundred-percent love." In view of this background Jesus is probably asking Peter, "Peter, what do you have to say now? You once boasted that your love for me was onehundred-percent and that it was greater than the love these other disciples have for me. Is it true?

Do you love me that way?"

Peter, now greatly humbled by his denial of Christ, replies with the lesser word: "Yes, Lord; you know that I love you with a sixty-percent love." That is a greatly subdued Peter. He is not saying that he does not love Christ. He does love him. But he is not boasting of his love, and above all he is not saying that it is greater than someone else's love. He is simply saying that his heart is open to Christ and that Christ therefore knows that he loves him with the best love of which he, a sinful human being, is capable. Before he had declared that Christ's "knowledge" of himself and the future was mistaken. Now he appeals to that knowledge as the basis of his confidence.

The second time the Lord asks his question of Peter he uses the same word for love again, though this time he mercifully drops the comparison: "Simon, son of Jonah, do you love me with a one-hundred-percent love?" Peter replies as he did the first time, "Yes, Lord; you know that I love you with a sixty-percent love."

The third time the question is asked the Lord comes down to Peter's level and uses Peter's word: "Simon, son of Jonah, do you love me with a sixty-percent love?" This is as much as to say, "All right, Peter, I know you are incapable of the kind of love I have for you and that you are right in affirming only what you are able to do. But do you really love me even on this level? Do you really love me with a sixty-percent love?" Peter, who again has no confidence in his own ability even to see into his own heart, replies, "Lord, you know all things; you know that I love you." When Jesus then goes on to give his command it is as much as to say, "All right, Peter, I'll work with that, because I am able to bring that limited love up to the height I desire, the height at which I have ordained you to function."

The last thing we need to note about the Lord's question to Peter is its threefold repetition. Why did Jesus ask three times whether Peter loved him? The answer is obvious: because of Peter's threefold denial. Peter had denied three times. Now Jesus asks him to affirm publicly three times that he loves him. This is why "Peter was hurt"—"because Jesus asked him the third time, 'Do you love me?'"

Does it seem cruel to you that the Lord asked Peter three times in front of the others whether he loved him, in clear reference to his earlier threefold denial? It seemed to be; it was certainly painful. Yet in the ultimate analysis it was not cruel. The truly cruel thing would have been to let the matter go on festering in Peter so that throughout his entire life both he and the others would think that he was somehow inferior and unworthy of office though he had undoubtedly repented of the sin with weeping, as the Bible tells us. The kind thing was the public restoration so that Peter and the others would henceforth know that Peter's past was past and that the Lord had himself commissioned him to further service.

That is why the Bible calls for public confession of sin. God does not wish to be cruel to us, though the experience of confession is painful. It is to end the matter so that we can pick up and go on with Jesus.

Peter's Response to Jesus

Part of Peter's response to Jesus has been covered in looking at Jesus' question, the most important aspect being Peter's unwillingness to use Jesus' word for love. Peter had learned about himself from the experience. He had indeed fallen. But his faith had not failed, as Jesus said it would not (Luke 22:32). Now he was ready to strengthen his brethren.

There is another aspect of Peter's response that we have not adequately considered, however. It is Peter's repeated appeal to Christ's knowledge. In each case he answered Christ's question by affirming his love and then saying, 'You know that I love you" (vv. 15-17). He might have said, "As I know my own heart, I swear that I love you." But Peter had said something like that once and had been dead wrong. Obviously there could be no confidence in his self-knowledge. What confidence there could be would have to be in Christ's knowledge of him—warts and all.

This seems illogical, of course. Peter was weak and sinful. He now knew this. Christ knew all things, as Peter had come to discover. How with that combination could Peter possibly be encouraged by an appeal to Christ's knowledge? It seems illogical, but this is actually the strength of one who has met Christ and known himself to be loved by him. Peter was a sinner. Yes! But a forgiven sinner. Therefore, though conscious of sin, Peter nevertheless knew that Jesus could look beneath the surface of his denial to see a heart that had been made new and truly loved him.

There is joy in an awareness of God's omniscience—for two reasons.

First, God knows the worst about us and loves us anyway. If God did not know all things, we might fear that someday something evil in us would spring up to startle God and turn his affection from us. He would say, "Oh, look at that horrible sin! I didn't know that was there. How terrible! That changes everything. I won't have anything to do with that person anymore." If God were not omniscient, that might well happen. But God knows all things. He knows the worst about us and loves us anyway. The Bible teaches that it was "while we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). Second, since God knows all things he also knows the best about us, though others do not. The disciples might have been startled by Peter's defection. They might have said, "If Peter is capable of denying Jesus like that, who knows what other sins are lurking within him. He might even be a false disciple." But Jesus knew better. He knew Peter's heart and love. It is not surprising in view of this knowledge that Peter appeals to him.

Never say, "I can do it, Lord. I know I can. I know my heart." Say rather, "Lord, you know what is there. You put it there. You know what love I have for you. Take it and make it into something that will abound to your glory."

A Gracious Command

The final part of this repeated exchange between the Lord and Peter is the Lord's gracious command: "Feed my sheep." I say it is gracious because it is not what we might logically expect. Peter had been a leader and then had fallen. For Jesus to come to him mercifully and tenderly to restore him was the height of graciousness. If, having restored Peter, he had said, "All right, Peter, you can go home now and do the best you can as an active layman. You are one of mine. I do not reject you. But, of course, I can never use you in a place of leadership again"—if he had said that, who could blame Jesus? Jesus would be entirely within his rights to answer like that. But this is not what he does. Instead, he tells Peter to "feed my sheep." Earlier he had called him to evangelism ("from now on you will catch men," Luke 5:10). Now he gives him the even greater responsibility of teaching those who have been caught.

What is the prerequisite for such service? What is the only acceptable motive for leading and teaching others? It is not moral perfection in the teacher; otherwise there would be no teachers. It is not an academic degree. It is not an overwhelming urge to "bring in Christ's kingdom," not the ability to raise more money than the man before, or build a bigger cathedral than the former minister. There is only one prerequisite. It is love for Christ issuing in the desire to serve him. "Do you truly love me?"

"Yes, Lord."

"Take care of my sheep."

This love does not get wrapped up in mystical experiences. It cares for others. John said it well in his first letter, "Dear children, let us not love with words or tongue but with actions and in truth" (1 John 3:18). If we love Christ, we will love those others for whom he also died and we will do our best to serve them in love.

Chapter 267.
Christ's Next-to-Last Word

John 21:17

The last two chapters of John's Gospel contain the parting words of Jesus to his disciples, which I have referred to as "the real last words of Christ." In doing this, I have contrasted the words spoken after the resurrection with those seven, more commonly studied words, spoken before. These postresurrection words are: (1) "Peace be with you" (20:19, 21); (2) "As the Father has sent me, I am sending you" (20:21); (3) "Receive the Holy Spirit" (20:22); (4) "Stop doubting and believe" (20:27);

(5) "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed" (20:29);

(6) "Feed my sheep" (21:17;cf.v. 15);and (7) "Follow me" (21:19, cf. v. 22). I have spoken of these as: a great bequest, a great commission, a great consolation, a great challenge, a great benediction, a great responsibility, and a great invitation.

As we draw to the end of chapter 21 we come to the sixth and seventh of these "last" words, and we notice something interesting about them. They are each repeated, the sixth ("Feed my sheep") three times (vv. 16, 17, and, with a slight variation, v. 15) and the seventh ("Follow me") twice (vv. 19, 22). The repetition grows out of the narrative, but it is significant in itself. When God says something once we should listen. When he says it more than once the words should command our prolonged, rapt, undivided, and obedient attention.

Christ's Sheep

We notice first that the sheep mentioned here are Christ's sheep, for he says, "Feed my sheep." They are his in two ways. First, by creation—he made them. Second, and even more importantly, by redemption. On an earlier occasion the Lord had said, "I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep" (John 10:11). In speaking to the Ephesian elders just before his final departure to Jerusalem, Paul said, "Keep watch over yourselves and all the flock of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers. Be shepherds of the church of God, which he bought with his own blood" (Acts 20:28). If the flock were ours, we could do with it as we wished or as we thought best. But if it is Christ's, as it is, then we must do as he wishes, recognizing our responsibility to him.

Peter understood this, for years later, when he came to give instructions to the leaders of the church, he spoke of their responsibility to the chief Shepherd as a motivation for the faithful performance of their duties. "To the elders among you, I appeal as a fellow elder, a witness of Christ's sufferings and one who also will share in the glory to be revealed: Be shepherds of God's flock that is under your care, serving as overseers—not because you must, but because you are willing, as God wants you to be; not greedy for money, but eager to serve; not lording it over those entrusted to you, but being examples to the flock. And when the Chief Shepherd appears, you will receive the crown of glory that will never fade away" (1 Peter 5:1-4). There is nothing that will make us more diligent in Christ's service than the firm recognition that we are only undershepherds of that Chief Shepherd to whom the flock belongs and to whom we are responsible.

The Task Assigned

At this point we have a very big topic. We have "the sheep," the flock of Christ. We have the shepherd. We have ourselves as undershepherds. Even if we should restrict our attention to our own role as undershepherds, we could consider the many traits of character we must have to be effective in our assigned task or even the areas in which we must operate to fulfill it. As far as traits are concerned, we have the need for humility, hard work, self-control, temperance, gentleness, the proper management of one's own household, piety, and many other things that the New Testament mentions explicitly. Under the second category, we might consider being examples to the flock, exercising discipline and effective oversight.

But the burden of our text, while not excluding these other matters, is nevertheless more restricted. It tells us that our responsibility as undershepherds is primarily to feed the sheep which have been entrusted to us. How? By teaching, sharing, and in any other way communicating the Word of God. There is nothing else upon which Christians can feed. So our job is to teach the Bible both by word and example.

Here we must be very practical, for the difficulty at this point is generally not one of ignorance of what we should do but rather of how the task should be done. The principles that should govern our responsibility in this area are the same as those that should govern our own personal study of God's Scriptures. There are five of them.

1. We should teach the Bible on some regular schedule. We recognize this need in our own study of the Word of God, for one of the things we rightly stress in this area is the need for daily devotions. In the Lord's Prayer we ask God to "give us this day our daily bread," and while it is true that this refers to all our daily needs, physical as well as spiritual, it certainly does not exclude the need for a daily feeding upon God's Word. For this reason a popular devotional guide is called Daily Bread. Another, which makes the same point, is called Manna in the Morning. A third is Daily Light. Just as we each individually need a daily period of feeding upon God's Word, so should there be a regular teaching and communicating of the Word by all who are in positions of spiritual authority.

One obvious place for this is the preaching that goes on Sunday by Sunday in a faithful, Bibleteaching church. But that is only one area. Another is some kind of a weekly Bible study or Bible class. Some exercise this responsibility in a less formal way through work with neighbors or fellow employees. The point is merely that this must be regular. An occasional testimony does not fill the bill.

2. Our teaching or otherwise communicating the truths of the Bible should also be systematic. That is, instead of an occasional or random comment upon the Bible or an occasional, unrelated lesson, there should be an attempt to progress in a deliberate fashion through one or more books of the Bible or even through the Bible as a whole. Many people do not really study the Bible; they do not know how. They merely read it. This is not bad. It is wonderful. But it does leave a special area of responsibility to leaders to teach those passages.

I would suggest this procedure. First, present the book as a whole, reading it carefully together four or five times. Second, divide the work into sections, just as you would divide a contemporary manuscript into chapters (not necessarily the same chapters as in our Bibles), subsections within those chapters and paragraphs. Third, relate these sections to one another, asking: Which are the main sections dealing with the main subjects? Which are introductory?

Which are excursions? Applications? This study should lead to a general outline of the book. Fourth, proceed to a more detailed study of the individual sections. Ask: What is the main point of this section? To whom is it spoken? How does it apply? What are the conclusions that flow from it? Finally, study individual phrases and key words. This kind of study will not be possible in every teaching situation, but it should be done by the teacher as preparation for his or her own teaching at the very least. To feed others we must first be fed.

3. The Bible should be taught as comprehensively as possible. I mean by this that we are not to become specialists in prophecy or Pauline studies or the nature of the flood to such a degree that we neglect the larger picture that those we teach obviously also need to know. The Bible is balanced in its many emphases. Christianity is meant to be balanced. If we do not study and teach the Bible comprehensively, we will become unbalanced and the church will be warped.

4. We must teach the Bible prayerfully. One obvious lack in the American church today is good systems of effective Bible study. But having said this, it is also necessary to say that we can have good systems, even superb and highly sophisticated systems, and still miss the point of Bible study by failing to ask God to speak to us through it. The scribes were great scholars, but they became mechanical in the working out of their method and so missed the Bible's main teaching. They failed to recognize the Christ when he came.

In Psalm 119 the author gives expression to the attitude we should have when he writes, "Do good to your servant, and I will live; I will obey your word. Open my eyes that I may see wonderful things in your law" (vv. 17-18). What will happen if our study and teaching is preceded by a prayer like this? Several things. First, it will make us conscious that we are actually meeting with God in our Bible study and not merely going through a prescribed religious ritual. Second, we will be sensitive to what God is saying to us and will be able to alter our lives and behavior accordingly. Third, it will make us conscious of the needs of others so that we will be able to teach them effectively. There is nothing more exciting in our fulfillment of Christ's commission to feed his sheep than to know that God himself is actually speaking to us and through us to his people.

5. The final point is that we must study the Word of God obediently. When God speaks, he speaks for a purpose. He expects us to obey him. Do we obey him? If we do, our lives and the lives of those for whom we are responsible will be changed. Our churches will be changed, and so will our society.

A Word to Preachers

All this applies quite broadly, for there are very few of us who do not have some degree of responsibility for someone. We are all usually undershepherds in some way. But I want to say a special word to preachers, for the task of teaching the Word of God is particularly their own. The minister has many functions. He must administer, counsel, visit, and do scores of other things. But just as the primary responsibility of a carpenter is to build and a painter to paint, so the primary responsibility of a pastor is to teach the Word of God. Indeed, if he does not, how can he expect the other undershepherds of his flock to fulfill their share of this responsibility?

There is a decline in this area today due to a prior decline in a belief in the Bible as the authoritative and inerrant Word of God on the part of the church's theologians, seminary professors, and those ministers who are trained by them.

Inerrancy and authority go together, for it is not that those who abandon inerrancy as a premise on which to approach the Scriptures necessarily abandon a belief in their authority. On the contrary, they often speak of the authority of the Bible most loudly precisely when they are abandoning the inerrancy position. It is rather that, lacking the conviction that the Bible is without error in the whole and in its parts, these scholars and preachers inevitably approach the Bible differently from inerrantists, whatever may be said verbally. In their work the Bible is searched (to the degree that it is searched) for whatever light it may shed on the world and life as the minister sees them and not as that binding and overpowering revelation that tells us what to think about the world and life and even formulates the questions we should be asking of them.

The problem is seen in a report of a panel discussion involving a rabbi, a priest, and a protestant minister. The rabbi stood up and said, "I speak according to the law of Moses." The priest said, "I speak according to the tradition of the church." But the minister said, "It seems to me...."

It is hard to miss the connection between belief in the authority and inerrancy of Scripture issuing in a commitment to expound it faithfully, on the one hand, and a loss of this belief coupled to a neglect of Scripture and an inability to give forth a certain sound, on the other.

Dr. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is one who makes this connection. He writes on the decline of preaching: "I would not hesitate to put in the first position [for the decline]: the loss of belief in the authority of the Scriptures, and a diminution in the belief of the Truth. I put this first because I am sure it is the main factor. If you have not got authority, you cannot speak well, you cannot preach. Great preaching always depends upon great themes. Great themes always produce great speaking in any realm, and this is particularly true, of course, in the realm of the church. While men believed in the Scriptures as the authoritative Word of God and spoke on the basis of that authority you had great preaching. But once that went, and men began to speculate, and to theorize, and to put up hypotheses and so on, the eloquence and the greatness of the spoken word inevitably declined and began to wane. You cannot really deal with speculations and conjectures in the same way as preaching had formerly dealt with the great themes of the Scriptures. But as belief in the great doctrines of the Bible began to go out, and sermons were replaced by ethical addresses and homilies, and moral uplift and socio-political talk, it is not surprising that preaching declined. I suggest that this is the first and greatest cause of this decline."

So here is my word to preachers. You above all men have been given the task of feeding Christ's sheep by a careful, regular, and systematic teaching of the Bible, but you will never do this unless you are convinced of the truthfulness of every word you find there. So settle this first. Is this book the very Word of God in the whole and in its parts? Has God spoken infallibly in its pages? If not, seek another profession. If he has, then proclaim this Word with all the strength at your disposal.

"Feed My Lambs"

There is one last word based upon a slight variation in Christ's command between verse 15 and verses 16 and 17. It is a variation between "Feed my sheep" (in the second and third instances) and "Feed my lambs" (in the first).

I admit that this may be only a stylistic variation—many commentators say so. Again, it may only be a suggestion that all Christ's people are children—"lambs" as well as "sheep." But when I remember the concern of our Lord for children and the teaching of Scripture that children especially are to be brought up in the nurture and admonition of Christ, I wonder if Jesus is not saying clearly, "And when you are feeding my sheep, do not forget the children; in fact, begin with the children, for the kingdom of heaven is of such as these."

The church's best ministers have felt this and have thus spent time with children. I give two examples: Martin Luther and John Wesley. What did Luther do? He produced the Smaller Catechism which was especially for children. It was nonpolemical and presented the gospel clearly. Luther once said that he would be glad to have all his works perish except the reply to Erasmus (The Bondage of the Will) and this catechism. Wesley, who, like Luther, was greatly concerned for children, advised his pastors: (1) where there are ten children in a society, meet them at least an hour every week; (2) talk with them every time you see any at home; (3) pray in earnest for them; (4) diligently instruct and vehemently exhort all parents at their own houses; and (5) preach expressly on education.

Such work is not glorious. It will not capture the world's attention. But it is a command of Christ, and the one who will do this will have the joy of knowing that in serving "one of the least of these" he has served Christ.

Chapter 268.
Roads to Glory

John 21:18-23

As I begin this study of Christ's words about the lives and deaths of Peter and John, I am reminded of the distinction the Swiss doctor Paul Tournier makes between the world of things and the world of people and of his emphasis upon the astonishing variety in the latter. When we look at the world of things—from the smallest grain of sand or rose petal to the planets and stars—we are impressed with the infinite variety. But on further examination we see that there is a remarkable sameness. Some objects are virtually identical—the grains of sand, for instance, or manufactured objects like cars, frisbees, or boxes of detergent sitting on a supermarket shelf. The world of persons is not like that. True, there are patterns that seem to repeat themselves. We have extroverts and introverts, active and lazy people, those who are mentally healthy (whatever that is) and those who have one or more mental disorders. But even in dealing with these general categories the thing that impresses the careful observer most is the uniqueness of the individual. People are different. A psychologist who classifies his patients too quickly is a bad psychologist. A person of whatever training who readily puts people into boxes is not wise but foolish. The reason for this seemingly infinite variety within the world of persons stems from God's purposes in creating people in his own image. Unfortunately the church, which should be most anxious to preserve and develop this variety, is often opposed to it and instead attempts to force its adherents into the same mold.

Peter and John

It is precisely this problem with which the next section of Christ's conversation with Peter is concerned. Jesus revealed something of what was in store for Peter in his service for him. "When you were younger you dressed yourself and went where you wanted; but when you are old you will stretch out your hands, and someone else will dress you and lead you where you do not want to go" (v. 18). This is a prophecy of Peter's death by martyrdom, as John points out. It is as much as to say that Peter's former boast, which he had not been able to keep ("I will lay down my life for you," John 13:37), would be granted. Peter would die for Jesus.

Peter turned around, saw John following, and in full accord with the impetuous curiosity with which he was born asked, "Lord, what about him?" (v. 21).

Jesus replied, "If I want him to remain alive until I return, what is that to you? You must follow me" (v. 22). In other words, 'John's form of service will be different from yours, but that is not to be your concern." We may say on the basis of this incident that we are not to be overly concerned with, still less judge another Christian's calling, but are to get on with our own.

Youth and Age

There are several differences in these verses, either stated or implied, the first being the difference between youth and old age. Christ speaks of that in the case of Peter alone, because he contrasts his youth, in which he freely did what he wanted, with his old age, in which things would happen over which he had no control.

What are the characteristics of youth? One of them is confident preparation for action, suggested by the words "When you were younger you dressed yourself and went where you wanted." It is a period of life in which bright plans are made and first steps are taken to accomplish those plans. Another characteristic of youth is self-reliance. Alexander Maclaren writes that self-reliance "is a gift and a stewardship given (as all gifts are stewardships) to the young. We all fancy, in our early days, that we are going to build 'towers that will reach to heaven.' Now we have come, and we will show people how to do it! The past generations have failed, but ours is full of brighter promise. There is something very touching, to us older men almost tragical, in the unbounded self-confidence of the young life that we see rushing to the front all around us. We know so well the disillusion that is sure to come, the disappointments that will cloud the morning sky. We would not carry one shadow from the darkened experience of middle life into the roseate tints of the morning. The 'vision splendid will fade away into the light of common day,' soon enough. But for the present this self-reliant confidence is one of the blessings of your early days."

There are weaknesses of youth, as we know. There is lack of experience and therefore often foolishness. There are passions of youth which need to be disciplined and challenged. But for all the weaknesses, there are still dreams and energies without which we would all be much poorer. Therefore, when we think of God's gifts to the church we should not forget the gifts of youth, nor should we despise them. We should not attempt to put old heads on young shoulders.

The other side of this contrast is old age, and the point about age that the Lord wishes to bring out is that things will be done to us against our inclination. In this case Jesus is speaking of Peter's martyrdom, presumably by crucifixion. This was not something Peter would have chosen for himself, any more than we would choose the sickness, limitations of opportunity, disillusionments, or other problems that frequently come with advancing years. Yet these were given to Peter (as to us), and they are as necessary for the church as the dreams of youth.

I notice one very significant thing about the way John refers to the prophecy concerning Peter.

He says, 'Jesus said this to indicate the kind of death by which Peter would glorify God" (v. 19). John does not say this about the dreams of Peter's youth but about his suffering. For "it is not only by acting, but chiefly by suffering, that the saints glorify God." When God spoke of Paul to Ananias he said, "I will show him how much he must suffer for my name" (Acts 9:16). It was in such suffering that Paul glorified God. The differences between youth, young adulthood, middle age, older middle age, and old age are God-given. We need the experiences of all and should not attempt to force the patterns of one age upon another.

Our Temperaments

The second area of differences is temperaments. In this passage there is a distinction between

Peter, the impetuous disciple, and John. Every time we see Peter we see him as a man of action. He is the first to speak and the first to act—not always wisely but always first. When Jesus asked, "Who do you say that I am?" it was Peter who answered: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). When Jesus was being arrested, it was Peter who drew his sword and cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest (John 18:10). Here in John 21, after recognizing the voice of Jesus when he called from the shore, he immediately jumped into the water and made his way to Jesus. Peter is a consistent activist. John, on the other hand, is almost never the one to speak. He owns no sword. He cuts off no ears. When Jesus appeared on the shore and Peter jumped into the water to swim toward him, John remained in the boat and landed the catch that Jesus had provided. John is the thinker. Yet Jesus had a place for him just as surely as he had a place for noisy Peter. He teaches this by saying, "If I want him to remain alive until I return, what is that to you?" (v. 22).

Forms of Service

This leads to a third area of difference among Christians, namely, our callings or forms of service. These involve our spiritual gifts.

I think here of that book by the well-known Chinese evangelist Watchman Nee, the title of which is taken from this passage: What Shall This Man Do? Nee begins by arguing correctly that the calling of God is always a distinctive calling. That is, it is never merely general, but is always personal in the sense that it is directed to a specific individual and has a specific service in view. "When God commits to you or me a ministry, he does so not merely to occupy us in his service, but always to accomplish through each of us something definite towards the attaining of his goal.... He calls us to serve him in the sphere of his choice, whether to confront his people with some special aspect of the fulness of Christ, or in some other particular relation to the divine plan. To some degree at least, every ministry should be in that sense a specific ministry."

Moreover, as Nee goes on to point out, because the ministries vary, so also will the gifts of those who are called by God to fill them. Nee demonstrates this point in a very interesting way. He takes Peter first of all, and he highlights his calling by the phrase "fishers of men." Peter's calling "was to bring men, urgently and in great numbers, into the kingdom." That is, he was called to evangelism. It is true that all Christ's disciples are called to evangelism but not all have this gift preeminently. Peter did. Therefore we find him being used to bring three thousand persons to faith in Christ at Pentecost, and later five thousand believed as a result of his preaching.

In the same way, we have those with the gift of evangelism today. We are all to evangelize. But a man like Billy Graham obviously has this gift to an exceptional degree, and he has been used much as God used Peter. If we look to organizations, we have Campus Crusade for Christ, which is clearly strong in this area. Crusade has mobilized hundreds of thousands to tell others about Christ. It may be true, and probably is, that the Graham crusades and Campus Crusade are not particularly deep where matters of theology are concerned. But I have no sympathy with those who look down on them and say, 'They don't present the gospel quite right; they don't have a proper presentation of the Calvinistic principles; the four spiritual laws are inferior to the five points." They have been used by God and many have become Christians through them. We should rejoice in these great ministries of evangelism.

Second, Nee turns to the apostle Paul and describes Paul's calling as that of a "tentmaker." He means by this the task of building up or ordering the church of God. "Whereas Peter initiated things, Paul's task was to construct. God entrusted to him in a special way the work of building his church, or in other words, the task of presenting Christ in his fulness to men, and of bringing those men as one into all that God had in his mind for them in Christ. Paul had glimpsed that heavenly reality in all its greatness, and his commission was to build together the gathered people of God, according to that reality."

We have people who are called to this ministry in our day also. In discussing evangelism I spoke of Campus Crusade. Here we might discuss the work of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, which is strong on teaching and building Christian character. Again, this does not mean that Crusade has no concern for discipleship; it does. This does not mean that InterVarsity is not concerned with evangelism; it is. But I say this to point to InterVarsity's unique ministry in developing Christian habits and character through small, indigenous Bible studies and grappling with current problems in a scholarly way through its publication ministry. As we look out upon the church today we see literally thousands of leaders in key positions who have been trained by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. The same thing is true of churches. There are churches with the gift or evangelism. There are others—Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia is one of them—that have the gift of upbuilding. In Philadelphia we say that some are obstetricians; they bring the babies into the world. Others, like Tenth, are pediatricians; they nurture the child.

Finally, Nee gets to the apostle John, characterizing him as a "mender-of-nets," from that setting in which John is first seen and called by Jesus (Matt. 4:21). He means that John's specific task, exercised long after Peter and Paul had completed their work and had been taken to heaven, was to restore that which was being torn down. This may not be the best way to describe John's ministry. But it is true that he does do a work of restoration. In contemporary life I would place such study centers as the L' Abri Fellowship in Switzerland, the Ligonier Valley Study Center in Florida, and the Traci Community of New Delhi, India, in this category.

"Follow Me"

There is this brief conclusion. I have written about the advantages of the various distinctions cited—the advantages of youth and age, those who are activists and those who are thinkers, the evangelists, restorers, and builders. But to be honest, we must also point out that each has it problems too. Those who are young tend to be foolish in their headstrong self-reliance. The old tend to become concerned with their own affairs and therefore selfish. The weakness of the activist is insensitivity to others who move at slower paces. The thinker can become lazy. The evangelist can become shallow. The builder or restorer can become critical of those whom he regards as inferior. The advantages of each age, temperament, or calling can easily be marred by sin.

But there is a solution. It is the solution Jesus told Peter (and presumably John as well): "Follow me." Why is this a solution? First, because if we are following Jesus, then our eyes will be on Jesus and he —not our own particular and imperfect form of it—will be seen as the standard of Christian service. If you have your eyes on yourself, you expect people to measure up to you and judge them to be inferior if they do not. With your eyes on Jesus, he becomes the standard for both you and them and he actually draws you together rather than allows you to be driven apart. I was walking along the street once, following another person. I turned aside much as Peter did when, looking away from Jesus, he saw what John was doing and I bumped into a telephone pole. We will bump into one pole or another if we take our eyes off Jesus.

Second, if we have our eyes on Jesus, we will see not only something about him but something about ourselves as well. What we will see about ourselves is that we are at best "unprofitable servants." There will be no room for boasting, no room for arrogant self-sufficiency. We are inadequate, unprofitable. What we need is Christ ... in his own person, first of all, and also in one another.

Chapter 269.
Christ's Last Word

John 21:22

The last recorded words that Jesus spoke before his ascension are found at the beginning of the Book of Acts. They contain the promise of power through the Holy Spirit and the command to go into all the world with the gospel. But these are not the last words of Christ recorded in John's Gospel. It is not that John did not know of Christ's teaching on these other points. The fourth Gospel contains more instruction about the Holy Spirit than any other Gospel, and it contains its own version of the Great Commission ("As my Father has sent me, so I am sending you," 20:21).
It is rather that John wished to emphasize Christ's call to discipleship as the Gospel closes. In John's Gospel the last words of Christ are: "Follow me."

Strikingly, these are also nearly the first words of Christ in this Gospel. John first quotes Christ in connection with the episode in which Andrew and the other unnamed disciple follow Jesus at the direction of John the Baptist. Jesus' first words to them are: "What do you want?" (1:38). But as soon as they reply by asking where he is spending the night, he answers by the first of his great invitations: "Come and see" (v. 39). This is an invitation to discipleship. But lest we should miss this, Christ's next utterance, an invitation to Philip, is literally "Follow me" (v. 43).

In a very real sense, then, these are the first and last words of Christ in John's Gospel. They are a reminder that Christianity is Christ, not just believing in some abstract sense, but believing in him to the point of turning our back on all else to follow him.

Self-Denial

These seventh and last words of Christ may be difficult to obey, as we will see. But they are not difficult to interpret if for no other reason than that Jesus himself supplies the interpretation in other places. The key passage is Luke 9:23-25 (and the parallel, Mark 8:34-37). Here Jesus says, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me. For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me will save it. What good is it for a man to gain the whole world, and yet lose or forfeit his very self?"

These words, like John 21:19-22, are an invitation to follow Jesus. But, unlike the verses in John, they explain what such discipleship means. Specifically, they teach that discipleship means (1) self-denial and (2) taking up one's cross in Christ's service.

The first point, self-denial, should not be difficult for any true Christian to understand, for this is where Christianity begins. To be a Christian means to have turned our back on any attempt to please God through our own human abilities and efforts and instead to have accepted by faith what God has done in Christ for our salvation. We cannot save ourselves. So becoming a Christian means dying to those old, worthless efforts to merit something from God. It means saying no to them in order that we might receive salvation as God's free gift. Christianity begins with self-denial. So in one sense the Christian life is merely continuing on in the way we have started. It is turning our back on self to follow Jesus.

This does not mean that it is easy to do, however, as I have already pointed out. We are surrounded by a world that says no to nothing. It tells us that saying yes to every desire and whim we have is not only good for us but also good for others (because we will be nicer people for them to know) and for the economy (because the world is supposed to thrive by selfindulgence). In the midst of such a culture, the word of Jesus seems unrealistic and austere, and if it does not seem austere, "we are not really letting it speak to us," as Francis Schaeffer observes in his study of True Spirituality.

What does it mean to deny oneself in order to be Christ's disciple? The first thing it means is that we must renounce sin. That is, we must repent of sin and determine to go in the holy way which Christ set before us. John Stott writes of this first step, "Renunciation of sin... can in no circumstances be bypassed. Repentance and faith belong together. We cannot follow Christ without forsaking sin. Moreover, repentance is a definite turn from every thought, word, deed and habit which is known to be wrong. It is not sufficient to feel pangs of remorse or to make some kind of apology to God. Fundamentally, repentance is a matter neither of emotion nor of speech. It is an inward change of mind and attitude towards sin which leads to a change of behavior. There can be no compromise here. There may be sins in our lives which we do not think we ever could renounce; but we must be willing to let them go as we cry to God for deliverance from them."

This is not a general renunciation. It is as specific as specific sins. It is a renunciation of anything that is contrary to God's revelation of himself; that is, anything contrary to the Bible. Take the Ten Commandments as one area in which renunciation of sin may be tested. The first commandment says, "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). Here is an obvious negative. It tells us that we are to say no to anything that would take God's rightful place in our lives. Is it an actual idol? We must say no to the idol; we must burn it or destroy it, as many primitive people have done when they have responded to the gospel. Is it money? We must get rid of the money, for it is better to be poor and a close follower of Christ than rich and far from him. Money is not something that necessarily takes the place of God in a life. It is possible to be a devoted and deeply spiritual Christian and rich at the same time. But if money has become a god, then we must say no to it. Has another person taken the place of God? Has a business? An ambition? Your children? Fame? Achievement? Whatever it is, we must say no to it if it is keeping us from Christ.

We must test ourselves on each of the other commandments. "Thou shalt not kill." This means that we are to say no to any desire to take another's life or slander another's reputation. "Thou shalt not commit adultery." We are to say no to any desire to take another man's wife or another woman's husband. "Thou shalt not steal." We must say no to the desire to take someone else's property. If we have not said no at these points, we can hardly pretend that we are living in the newness of Christ's resurrection life. Indeed, we are not living the life of Christ at all.

The second thing self-denial involves is renunciation of anything that is not God's will for our lives. This is related to the previous point about sin, for sin is not God's will and must be renounced. But there are things that are not contrary to the Bible's moral code, yet because they are not God's will for us personally they must be renounced too in order that we might do his will for us. For instance, there is nothing wrong with marriage. On the contrary, marriage has been established by God and has his blessing. But marriage may not be the will of God for you; and if it is not, then you must say no to marriage consciously and deliberately. The same thing holds true for a profession. God has a plan for each life. Our business is to discover it and fulfill it. It may be that when you become a Christian you already are engaged in the work God has for you. If so, you should continue in it joyfully. On the other hand, God may want you to change professions. He may wish to call you into specific Christian work or another profession. If he does, you must be ready to obey.

Under items that may not be God's will for our lives we must give special emphasis to our possessions. This is true for two reasons. First, a love of possessions is something Jesus specifically warned about in his dealings with those who said they wished to follow him. Second, the love of possessions is a particular snare for today's affluent Christians.

On one occasion a rich young ruler came to Jesus and asked what he might do to inherit eternal life. Jesus told him to keep the commandments—not that it would ever be possible for him to keep them perfectly and receive eternal life thereby, but in order to show him his need, as the continuation of the story indicates. The young man was evidently a self-satisfied individual, because after Jesus had listed the commandments for him—"You shall not murder, You shall not steal, You shall not bear false witness, Honor your father and mother, and Love your neighbor as yourself—the man replied ignorandy, "All these things I have done since I was a boy. What else must I do?" The Lord then put his finger on that sin which for him was greater than all others — his love of possessions. "If you want to be perfect, go and sell what you have and give it to the poor; and you will have treasure in heaven and come and follow me." The young man went away sorrowful, because he had great possessions (Matt. 19:16-26; cf. Mark 10:17-27; Luke 18:1827).

The possession of things is in the same category as marriage or a career, in the sense that they are not wrong in themselves. Indeed, our possessions may well be the gift of God to us to be used rightly. Still, although possessions are not wrong in themselves, they are a special snare for American Christians because they so easily blind us to the needs of others, occupy our time exclusively, and make us self-satisfied and selfish. I know Christians who have immense talent. But they are useless in Christian work because they are fully occupied either managing or enjoying their possessions. Is that what God gave you your possessions for? Did he make you well-off so that you would indulge yourself while others are perishing? Did he make you rich so that you do not need to worry about anything?

Americans have more than anyone else in the world. But it has not made us more compassionate. It has made us indulgent. What would Christ say if he were here? I think he would tell many of us, "If you want to be perfect, go and sell what you have, and give it to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me."

Taking Up the Cross

Jesus' second directive to explain the meaning of following him is "take up [your] cross daily." This suggests two things. If we had lived in Jesus' day and had seen a man carrying a cross, it would have meant that the man was a condemned criminal and was on his way to a place of execution. The cross symbolized this. So when Jesus said that those who followed him were to take up their crosses he meant that they were to follow him to death, denying themselves even to the point of facing execution. In this sense the phrase "take up [your] cross" intensifies the phrase "deny [yourself]," as we have expounded it.

The second truth that this requirement suggests goes beyond the earlier statement. To deny yourself is negative. This phrase suggests the positive counterpart to self-denial. It is embracing God's will, including the denial of self, wholeheartedly.

On this point I have been helped by some of the writings of Elisabeth Elliot. She writes, "I think there is a great deal of nonsense taught about this business of bearing our cross. For example, when people shrug their shoulders and say, 'Well, I suppose that's meant to be my cross,' they suggest that the cross is some inevitable circumstance which cannot be avoided. But the cross can be avoided. So I think that what Jesus is getting at here is the voluntary positive acceptance of what he is asking of us, whatever it may be. It is not servility. It is not a cop-out. It is not resignation or fatalism. It is a very positive voluntary act of the will, a Yes to God. In other words, we must say No to ourselves in order to say Yes to God.

"This should be the dominant theme of our lives: 'Yes, Lord, what do you want me to do?' There are all kinds of things we cannot avoid: difficulties, blindness, a drunken husband, an intractable teenage child, a limitation of whatever sort (all of us have our particular set of limitations in which we are meant to glorify God). But we can go through life gritting our teeth, clenching our fists and even saying Yes to God in the sense of 'Well, if this is what you want, I'll take it,' without ever once in joy and voluntary obedience saying, 'Yes, Lord, I delight to do this for you.'"

God's will is not grievous. The Bible calls it the way of wisdom and says, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace" (Prov. 3:17). But sometimes it seems grievous to us, and at that point we must simply live by faith accepting the apparently "grievous" will of God gladly. Elliot concludes, "So let us carry the cross every day, not in the sense of something we hate but in the sense of something which God is asking us to do and which we therefore determine to do joyfully."

"Follow Me"

We come at last to the phrase with which we started: "Follow me." I ask this question: How do we learn the kind of self-denial and taking up of the cross with which Jesus prefaces this command? The answer is: By following him and constantly keeping our eyes upon him. Does this seem like circular reasoning? It seems to be, but it is actually progressive. In order to follow Jesus we must deny ourselves and take up our crosses, but we learn these by following. So it is by degrees and by a continuous discipleship that we learn to follow and by following learn.

How could it be otherwise if Jesus is our supreme example in all things? Where else could we learn self-denial but from him who said no even to the glory of heaven in order to become man and die for our salvation (Phil. 2:5-11). The author of Hebrews captures this when, in the verses immediately following his great chapter on the heroes of the faith, he writes, 'Therefore, since we also are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us throw off everything that hinders and the sin that so easily entangles, and let us run with perseverance the race marked out for us. Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:1-2).

He is our perfect example. It is an example of self-denial, of taking up the cross—not with a grim determination to do the "undesirable" will of God but, by contrast, to do it joyfully. It was "for the joy that was set before him" that Christ endured the cross.

He did something else too, though the disciples did not understand it at the time. He spoke of his resurrection, thereby teaching that discipleship, though it involves a true and sometimes painful death to our own desires, is nevertheless the way to the fullness of living both now and hereafter. We find this throughout the New Testament. The apostle Paul writes in Romans, "If we have been united with him like this in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection" (Rom. 6:5). We die to self, but we do so in order that we might live to Christ. We die "that the body of sin might be done away with, that we should no longer be slaves to sin" (v. 6). We read the same thing in Galatians. "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20). In the biblical scheme of things death is always followed by life, crucifixion by resurrection. It is this that is truly exciting and for which we thrill to follow Jesus.

When we give up trying to run our own life or when we give up that thing that seems so precious and so utterly indispensable to us, it is then (and only then) that we suddenly find the true joy of being a Christian and enter into a life so freed from the obsession that we can hardly understand how it could have had such a hold on us.

This is the primary difference between a joyless and a joyful Christian, a defeated and a victorious one. The joyless Christian may have followed Jesus in some general sense. He may have died in Christ abstractly. But he has certainly never known these truths in practice. On the other hand, the joyful Christian has found satisfaction in whatever God dispenses to him and is truly satisfied, for he has said no to anything that might keep him from the richness of God's own presence and life.

Chapter 270.
Things That Should Be Written

John 21:24-25

In this study I come to the end of my exposition of John's Gospel. People aware of the number of years I have spent in the study and exposition of John ask, "How, after the writing of all these sermons, do you find anything new to say about John's Gospel?" In one sense I can understand this question, for I have certainly covered many subjects and explored many lines of thought while studying this book. But in another sense I cannot understand it at all. For, in studying any Scripture portion, the more one seeks to understand and expound the text, the more its truly inexhaustible nature is sensed.

My studies of John began during my years of graduate study in Switzerland, at which time I read nearly every major commentary on the Gospel and delved into hundreds of other studies of particular subjects or problems related to my study. I preached on this book on Sunday mornings at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia for more than eight years. The result is 270 separate sermons occupying nearly 2,000 pages of printed text. There are 2,700 pages of typescript. Yet I have not covered it all; and I suspect that I could do it all over again from the beginning and learn even more than I did the first time—so infinite is God's Word.

Trying to teach John's Gospel in some depth has given me a special perspective from which to understand the last verses, and these in turn have encouraged me as I draw to an end. They are a closing attestation that identifies the Gospel writer and declares his writing trustworthy. Then comes the interesting addition: 'Jesus did many other things as well. If every one of them were written down, I suppose that even the whole world would not have room for the books that would be written." Apparently the author or authors of this verse felt the immensity of what could be written about Jesus and knew that the writer had recorded only a small part.

The Book's Perfection

I sense another thing, and that is the perfection, or wholeness, of the book, expressed in a satisfying rounding off of its material. It begins with Jesus—"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God" (1:1), and it ends with Jesus—'Jesus did many other things as well" (21:25). It begins with the impressive testimony of John the Baptist—'John testifies concerning him. He cries out, saying, 'This was he of whom I said, "He who comes after me has surpassed me because he was before me"' From the fulness of his grace we have all received one blessing after another" (1:15-16). It ends with an equally impressive testimony concerning that other John, the son of Zebedee, who wrote the Gospel—"This is the disciple who testifies to these things and who wrote them down. We know that his testimony is true" (21:24).

There are a number of ways of regarding the plural "we" of verse 24. Some, perhaps the majority of conservative scholars, have taken it as merely an indirect reference by the author to himself. Others see the word as pointing to some official body of Christians who are adding their attestation to John's testimony.

The issue is not a big one, but the second view seems best. Conceivably the author of the Gospel wrote the words. Yet this is improbable. If the author composed these verses, then he is identifying himself as the beloved disciple, which he has avoided doing earlier in the Gospel. Up to this point he has been careful to remain anonymous. Moreover, the first person plural of the final phrase of verse 24 is different from John's own way of referring to himself (e.g., John 19:35). The earlier verse is like these concluding verses in that it refers to the witness of the beloved disciple and affirms that it is reliable. But there the author refers to himself as "he that saw it" and who therefore knows that his is reliable testimony. These last verses distinguish between the writer or writers and the witness: "we know that his testimony is true."

These facts suggest that the "we" of verse 24 is to be understood as representing some official body—perhaps the church or churches John served—capable of identifying the author with the beloved disciple, an eyewitness of many if not all of the events described, and of attesting his character and the inherent reliability of his testimony.

A Faithful Testimony

I have said that the issue of the authorship of these last verses is not a big one, but that does not mean that there is nothing to be learned from the verses themselves considered in the light of their authorship. In fact, they have much to teach us. They teach that the doctrines of Christianity rest, not on the unstable foundation of mere wishful thinking or speculation, but on facts observed by and duly authenticated by eyewitnesses of Christ's ministry. They say three things about this foundation.

First, they affirm that the men who recorded the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth (in this case, John, the beloved disciple) were eyewitnesses of the events they describe. The first phrase of verse 24 points to this by identifying the author of the Gospel with the beloved disciple described as being present with the Lord in Galilee in the verses which immediately precede.

This is of great importance. It would be important in any attempt to establish fact, as, for example, in a criminal trial. In such trials, facts must be established by eyewitness testimony, not by hearsay. In addition to this, the issue of fact is particularly important for Christianity, more so than for virtually any other world religion. In other religions it is usually the founder's ideas that count. In Christianity it is the facts. Is Jesus who he is declared to be? Did he do what he is reported to have done? Did he teach what he is claimed to have taught? Did he actually rise from the dead? Other religions may be content to live by ideas alone. But Christians readily confess that if Jesus is not the Son of God and did not speak with the authority of God, then his ideas have no more validity than any other teacher's and are, in fact, actually worse because he claimed divinity for himself and was therefore either insanely mistaken or deliberately misleading at this point. Christians confess that "if Christ has not been raised, your faith is futile; you are still in your sins" (1 Cor 15:17). On the other hand, if Jesus is God and did rise from the dead, he deserves and indeed demands our allegiance, and it is the height of folly and even rebellion against God to neglect him. Even more, there is salvation in no one else (John 14:6; Acts 4:12).

How can these facts be established? By the eyewitness testimony of those representatives of Christ specially appointed to bear such testimony. These are the apostles, the author of the fourth Gospel being one of them.

No one knew the importance of such testimony more than John, for in his first epistle he says of the apostles' testimony, 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at and our hands have touched—this we proclaim concerning the Word of life. The life appeared; we have seen it and testify to it, and we proclaim to you the eternal life, which was with the Father and has appeared to us. We proclaim to you what we have seen and heard" (1 John 1:1-3).

Why was John in particular concerned with such testimony? The answer lies in the fact that John, writing in the latter years of the first Christian century, was among the last of the New Testament writers and was therefore addressing a generation unfamiliar with the eyewitnesses' testimony to Christ's life. When Paul wrote (back in the middle of that century), he could refer almost in passing to "five hundred" who had seen the resurrected Christ, "most of whom were still living" (1 Cor. 15:6). But John could not. These had died in the meantime, and John therefore found it necessary to stress this eyewitness testimony as Christianity's foundation. Besides, when John was writing, a form of Gnosticism was beginning to infiltrate the apostolic churches which denied the need for historical facts as a basis for religious belief. Indeed, it considered faith superior to the facts of history, and it spiritualized them. This threatened true faith. So John more than other writers wants to emphasize Christianity's historical foundations.

We might sum up the matter like this: "An unbelieving world required evidence for the religious claims of Jesus and his followers. And the deviation toward an esoteric religion within the Church required immediate correction by a reiteration of the historical groundings of the faith." John met such demands by stressing the role of eyewitnesses in establishing the historical claims of Christianity.

Second, the writers of the concluding verses of the Gospel (whoever they may have been) affirm that the author of the Gospel not only was an eyewitness of the events he describes but actually wrote these things down. It seems a truism to say that the author of a book actually wrote the book, and it is. But it is not a foolish thing to emphasize in view of some of the criticisms of the Scriptures both in the past and now.

People who have not had the opportunity to do extensive New Testament studies can hardly be aware of the degree of reluctance in many scholarly circles to admit that the words of the New Testament go back to eyewitnesses. For many the tone of the documents and the corresponding, nonbiblical evidence compel belief in some kind of historical base for Christianity—though one senses they wish there were none. But others deny it entirely, some radically. Rudolf Bultmann of Germany is the most startling example. For Bultmann and his followers the New Testament in no sense comes from eyewitnesses. Instead, Bultmann envisions a period in which stories of Christ circulated in the church and in which they were formed and embellished (even invented) on the basis of the church's current needs and its "Spirit-led" understanding of the significance of Jesus. The New Testament is therefore the product of the church and not of the apostles, though these undoubtedly exerted an influence in the early stages. On this basis, Bultmann says we can merely affirm that Jesus existed but denies we can have any certain historical information about him.

The authors of John 21:24 did not have Bultmann in mind as they wrote, of course, but by the guidance of the Holy Spirit they did speak directly to his unbelief as well as to that of any other similarly thinking scholars. These verses say that the eyewitness actually "wrote these things." Are they right? Are they speaking truthfully? If they are—and why should the authors of these verses be lying?—then we have in this Gospel (and the others) an accurate account of what the companions of Jesus, led by the Holy Spirit, considered necessary for us to know concerning him. It follows that we can read these words with the confidence that this is the case, and that Jesus was indeed as they describe him.

These authors affirm a third thing. They have said that the author of the Gospel was an eyewitness of the events of Christ's ministry. They have added that he actually wrote the Gospel, that is, he did not merely communicate these stories verbally while allowing someone else to record them, whether accurately or not, but himself actually did the writing. This said, however, they now add that the one who has written these things is trustworthy. Their specific words are: "We know that his testimony is true."

Why should it be necessary to add this statement? For this reason. It is possible that a person could be an eyewitness of the life of Jesus and then sit down to write a gospel about it but for whatever reasons decide to write something other than what he had actually witnessed. He might hate Jesus and therefore invent stories to cast a shadow over his name. Again, he might admire Jesus more than is fit and therefore eliminate anything that could be thought derogatory and instead invent stories or teachings to enhance his image. Such things are possible theoretically. But the authors of these last verses declare that such was not the case. They say instead that John was a man of integrity, that his words can be trusted and that, so far as they were able to verify his teaching (whether by the testimony of other eyewitnesses or by personal interrogation) they have found it to be absolutely trustworthy.

Can we not say the same? We are in no position to verify the facts of Christ's life as they did; we live nearly two thousand years after the events. But we can note that many of these witnesses sealed their testimony by their own blood. Would they give their lives for what they knew to be a put-on? Would they suffer for a farce? To ask such questions is to answer them. Of course not! If ever there were men of integrity, it was these men. If ever a series of events of history has been ruthlessly verified, it is these events.

Do you believe them? Will you believe them? We recall that John himself said of his writing, "These [things] are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:31).

One Thing More

There is one more thing that I must mention as I close. I note as I read the last verse of John that the authors seem to be saying that Jesus did many things, all of which are now past, and we could almost interpret that as suggesting that the life of Christ is over. Nothing could be farther from the case. On the contrary, the whole last chapter (which does not even end with an ascension) is meant to show the living Christ in fellowship with his people within the ongoing life of his church.

Due to his union with believers—"I am the vine, you are the branches ... apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5)—there is a sense in which Jesus' life and works are not ended but rather continue in the church as he accomplishes his will through us. I see this in an interesting way. I note that although this Gospel ends with a reference to the "things Jesus did" (past tense), the very first verses of the very next book of the Bible speak of "all that Jesus began to do and teach until the day he was taken up" (Acts 1:1-2). It means, if I may put it this way, that in one sense Jesus' life, important and unique as it is, was only a beginning; it lives on in the life, deeds, words, and teachings of his redeemed community.

You are a member of that community if you have believed on Christ as your Savior. You are part of the church if you have been born again. Are you continuing Christ's works? Is his life being lived in you? While we are in this life, all that we will ever know of Jesus' earthly life has already been written. There is no more. We have it in the four Gospels and in a few scattered references in the Epistles. But his works are nevertheless going on, and it is your privilege and duty to be a channel for them.

Jesus said, "I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father" (John 14:12).

Jesus begins that saying with the words "verily, verily" or "amen, amen." It means "truly, truly" or "what I am about to say to you is so."Jesus often began important sayings in that way. We, on our part, also say "amen." But our "amens" properly come at the end of such sayings, by which we acknowledge our acquiescence in his testimony. We have a case at the end of the Gospel. "Amen" is the way the book ends. It means "these things are true, and we who say 'amen' now stake our lives upon them." Is this the case with you? God grant that it may be so, and to him be glory. Amen.

This file was downloaded from Z-Library project

Your gateway to knowledge and culture. Accessible for everyone.

z-library.se singlelogin.re go-to-zlibrary.se single-login.ru

Official Telegram channel

Z-Access

https://wikipedia.org/wiki/Z-Library